Duty to Perfect Appeal Rests With Appellant: The defendant filed a notice of appeal with the City Court after being convicted of his fourth DUI. The defendant's attorney failed to complete and return a praecipe to transmit the record to District Court within the 30-day time limit. The Supreme Court held that no right to a trial de novo existed. The duty to perfect the appeal lay with the appellant, and there was no assertion by the defendant that the request for transmittal had been made within the 30-day period. St. v. Speith, 244 M 392, 797 P2d 221, 47 St. Rep. 1630

(1990), followed in St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993), and distinguished in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Physical Filing Required: "Giving written notice" of intention to appeal requires that notice must be actually received and filed by the court, not that it simply has been mailed. St. v. Arthur, 234 M 75, 761 P2d 806, 45 St. Rep. 1741 (1988), following St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978). Arthur was distinguished in St. v. Price, 271 M 409, 897 P2d 1084, 52 St. Rep. 527 (1995).

Waiver of Jury Trial in Justice Court — Right to Jury Trial on Appeal: Defendant waived the right to jury trial in Justice Court and was convicted in a bench trial. It was his right, after making a timely request, to a trial by jury on appeal to the District Court. St. v. Bender, 232 M 424, 756 P2d 1157, 45 St. Rep. 1165 (1988).

Notice of Appeal Not Timely Filed — Appeal Properly Dismissed: The right to appeal a criminal conviction from Justice's Court to District Court is purely statutory, and compliance with this section is required to perfect an appeal. Unless a party has made timely compliance by giving written notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after judgment, the District Court does not acquire jurisdiction. Therefore, where 21 days elapsed from judgment to filing of notice of appeal, the District Court had no other course but to dismiss the appeal. St. v. Hartford, 228 M 254, 741 P2d 1337, 44 St. Rep. 1500 (1987), distinguished in St. v. Price, 271 M 409, 897 P2d 1084, 52 St. Rep. 527 (1995), and St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Trial De Novo of Criminal Case on Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Review Justice's Court Order Suppressing Evidence: A criminal case on appeal from Justice's Court to District Court must be tried anew in the District Court pursuant to this section, regardless of which party appeals. Accordingly, a District Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review a Justice's Court order suppressing evidence. St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987), followed in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992), and in St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993).

Notice to Defendant: Giving notice of an intention to appeal under this section requires that the defendant receive notice. St. v. Province, 226 M 425, 735 P2d 1128, 44 St. Rep. 775 (1987), distinguished in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Appeal of Guilty Plea in Justice's or City Court: From the standpoint of reason, justice, and public policy, an appeal of a guilty plea in Justice's Court or City Court may be tried anew in District Court provided it is properly perfected. However, this holding does not give the District Court original jurisdiction of a DUI case in violation of 3-5-302. St. v. Waymire, 226 M 406, 736 P2d 106, 44 St. Rep. 759 (1987).

Necessity of Posting Bond: An appeal bond is not required to perfect an appeal from a Justice Court to a District Court in a criminal matter. St. v. Bush, 164 M 81, 518 P2d 1406 (1974), holding that an appeal bond is required, is expressly overruled. State ex rel. Abbitt v. Justice Court, 220 M 210, 714 P2d 140, 43 St. Rep. 300 (1986).

Timely Notice of Appeal to Wrong Court: Tecca was convicted in City Court, and his attorney filed a timely notice of appeal in City Court 5 days after judgment specifying that the appeal would be to Justice Court. The appeal should have been to District Court. On August 7, 11 working days after judgment, a correct notice of appeal was filed. However, since 46-17-311 requires that a notice of intent to appeal a judgment of a City Court or Justice Court be filed within 10 days of the judgment, the trial judge dismissed the appeal for failure to file a timely notice of appeal. The Supreme Court agreed with the trial judge that the August 7 notice was not timely but found that the original notice, though in error, was timely filed in the proper court. Noting a similar decision in Adair v. Justice Court, 213 M 466, 692 P2d 13, 41 St. Rep. 2241 (1984), the court reversed the trial judge, holding that where error occurs in a notice of appeal which is timely filed, the defendant should be granted 10 days from the date of remittitur to file a statutorily correct notice of appeal pursuant to 46-17-311. St. v. Tecca, 220 M 68, 713 P2d 541, 43 St. Rep. 180 (1986).

Appeal Perfected if, Inter Alia, Transmission of Record Requested: Defendant appealed a City Court D.U.I. conviction to District Court. The Supreme Court vacated District Court's dismissal of appeal and remanded for a determination of whether defendant had requested transmission of the record within the 30-day statutory period for perfecting appeal. The court rejected the District Court conclusion that regardless of when defendant initially requested transmission of the record, he had failed to perfect the appeal because he failed to see that the record was actually transmitted. This conclusion was erroneous in light of St. v. Main, 191 M 304, 623 P2d 1382, 38 St. Rep. 205 (1981), and St. v. Dubray, 201 M 327, 654 P2d 970, 39 St. Rep. 2142 (1982), followed in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997). Billings v. Seiffert, 215 M 381, 697 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 448 (1985).

Jurisdiction Over Appeals From Justices' Courts: The Supreme Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review the judgments or orders of the Justices' Courts. Adair v. Lake County Justice Court, 213 M 466, 692 P2d 13, 41 St. Rep. 2241 (1984); State ex rel. Estes v. Justice Court, 129 M 136, 284 P2d 249 (1955).

When Appeal Perfected: Defendant was convicted in Justice's Court of driving under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Within 6 days after trial, defendant's attorney mailed a notice of appeal. Within 5 days, the Justice's Court signed the stay of execution but failed to transmit the record to District Court as the defendant had requested. Four months later the defendant learned that the record had not been transmitted when the County Attorney filed a motion to dismiss. The District Court ordered the appeal dismissed because the record had not been transmitted within 30 days of judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court ordered the appeal reinstated, holding that a defendant perfects on appeal from a Justice's Court to a District Court when he requests the Justice's Court to transmit the record and fulfills the other criteria of this section. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the appeals statutes are a trap for the unwary, rather than a device to assume timely review of a lower court judgment. A defendant has the right to expect a Justice's Court to timely honor his request. St. v. Dubray, 201 M 327, 654 P2d 970, 39 St. Rep. 2142 (1982), followed in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Effect of Failure to Transfer Record: Where after filing notice of appeal to District Court defendant failed to have record of Justice's Court proceedings transferred to the District Court within the statutory time limit, he did not perfect his appeal and thus waived his right to appeal. St. v. Crane, 196 M 305, 639 P2d 514, 39 St. Rep. 126 (1982).

District Court Not Appellate Court for City or Justice's Court:

A District Court may not sit as a court of review. Therefore, on appeal from a Justice's or City Court, the District Court must try a case de novo and may not remand it. Hardin v. Myers, 194 M 248, 633 P2d 677, 38 St. Rep. 1512 (1981).

The District Court does not, on appeal from a police court (now City Court), sit as a court of review, but it tries the cause de novo. White Sulphur Springs v. Voise, 136 M 1, 343 P2d 855 (1959).

Burden of Appellant to Ensure Timely Appeal — Ineffective Counsel Not Reason to Excuse Untimely Appeal: Where the defendants were convicted in City Court of disorderly conduct on December 14 and judgment and sentence were orally pronounced in court on that date, the defendants' telephone call to the city magistrate on January 23 requesting the transmission of the City Court record could not prevent an untimely appeal, when the records were actually transmitted on January 28. The duty to perfect the appeal lies with the defendants. Their failure to ensure the timely transmission of the records mandates dismissal of the appeal. Nor should the defendants be entitled to an appeal because the appeal was not perfected due solely to the ineffectiveness of counsel. The decision to allow an appeal for such a reason rested, if at all, with the District Court. St. v. Main, 191 M 304, 623 P2d 1382, 38 St. Rep. 205 (1981).

Time for Appeal Not Dependent on Written Judgment or Decision on Appointment of Counsel: Where the defendants were convicted of disorderly conduct in City Court on December 14 and judgment and sentence were orally imposed on that date, the transmission of the City Court record to District Court on January 28 came too late to perfect an appeal and the District Court's dismissal of the appeal was therefore proper. The time allowable for transmission of the record on appeal is not dependent upon service of a written judgment when judgment has been pronounced orally in open court; nor, as the defendants claimed, is the time limit tolled during any time spent in determining whether the defendants are entitled to appointed counsel. Timely transmission of the record is in no way hampered by the preliminary inquiry into defendants' indigence. St. v. Main, 191 M 304, 623 P2d 1382, 38 St. Rep. 205 (1981).

State Not to Appeal Justice's Court Dismissal: When a criminal cause in Justice's Court was dismissed because a witness subpoenaed by both parties testified for the prosecution and failed to appear for the defendant, the State had no right to appeal because 46-20-103 applies only to appeals from District Court and 46-17-311 allows appeals from Justice's Court only for the defendant. (See 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Sanchez, 187 M 434, 610 P2d 162 (1980).

Duty to Perfect Appeal — Filing With Wrong Court: When the defendant inadvertently filed his notice of appeal with the wrong court, the District Court, he did not perfect his appeal in the manner required by law and the Justice of the Peace had no duty to transmit the record to the District Court. State ex rel. Ross v. Mallory, 184 M 29, 601 P2d 385 (1979).

Time for Appeal: The time for appeal from a Justice's Court conviction runs from the date of verbal pronouncement of judgment in open court, and written notice of appeal must be filed with the Justice's Court within the 10-day period. St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978), followed in St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Exclusive Remedy for New Trial: An appeal to the District Court for a trial de novo is the exclusive remedy for obtaining a new trial in Justice's Court proceedings. Forsythe v. Wenholz, 170 M 496, 554 P2d 1333 (1976), followed in Rickett v. Billings, 262 M 339, 864 P2d 762, 50 St. Rep. 1586 (1993), and affirming Hardin v. Myers, 194 M 248, 633 P2d 677 (1981).

Interlocutory Orders: Viewing this act as a whole, it is clear that the State may appeal from interlocutory orders; this section was meant only to define and delimit the defendant's right to appeal. (But see 1985 amendment note.) St. v. Bergum, 164 M 155, 520 P2d 653 (1974).

Mandamus: Since this section provides a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, mandamus did not lie to compel a Justice of the Peace to honor an affidavit of disqualification. Bailey v. St., 163 M 380, 517 P2d 708 (1973).

Increased Sentence: The District Court may increase the sentence or punishment imposed by a Justice of the Peace after a trial de novo on a misdemeanor charge. St. v. Fissette, 159 M 501, 498 P2d 1208 (1972), following Colten v. Ky., 405 US 913, 32 L Ed 2d 584, 92 S Ct 1953 (1971).

Objection to Form of Undertaking: When the defendant sought to appeal the decision of the Justice of the Peace and his undertaking was not in proper form but was approved by the Justice, it was improper for the court to dismiss the appeal for insufficiency of the form of the undertaking when no objection to the form was made in the Justice's Court of original jurisdiction. Clark v. District Court, 142 M 56, 381 P2d 472 (1963); Reidelbach v. District Court, 142 M 52, 381 P2d 470 (1963).

Effect of Payment of Fine After Appeal: When the defendant was convicted in a police court (now City Court) of the violation of a town ordinance and appealed to the District Court and served notice of his appeal while in jail serving a sentence imposed for his nonpayment of the fine, the fact that the defendant had paid the fine before the hearing of the appeal did not effect an abandonment of his appeal. White Sulphur Springs v. Voise, 136 M 1, 343 P2d 855 (1959).

Dismissal for Want of Prosecution Void: When an appeal was taken to the District Court from a conviction in a police court (now City Court) for a liquor law violation but neither the city nor the defendant requested the cause be set for trial, the judge of the court could not order the appeal dismissed "for want of prosecution" without giving notice to the defendant. State ex rel. Healy v. District Court, 125 M 77, 230 P2d 763 (1951).

Amended Pleadings: On appeal from a Justice's Court in a misdemeanor case, the case must be tried de novo in the District Court on the papers and files in the former, unless the latter court allows other or amended pleadings and each party has the benefit of all legal objections made in the Justice's Court. St. v. Benson, 91 M 109, 5 P2d 1045 (1931).

No Right of Appeal by Cities: The defendant, charged with wrongfully obstructing an alley, was proceeded against under the former statutes governing criminal procedure in police courts (now City Courts), was convicted, and appealed to the District Court where the complaint was dismissed. The court held on appeal by the city that since the statute did not grant the right of appeal to cities in criminal causes tried in Justices' Courts or police courts, the appeal did not lie. (See 1985 amendment note.) Miles City v. Drum, 60 M 451, 199 P 719 (1921).

Waiver of Certain Irregularities:

The result of an appeal from a judgment of a Justice of the Peace in a prosecution for a misdemeanor is to abrogate that judgment and to hold the defendant under the original warrant of arrest for a trial de novo in the District Court, and the defendant cannot complain, on habeas corpus, of any irregularity committed by the Justice in rendering the judgment. Hosoda v. Neville, 45 M 310, 123 P 20 (1912).

A party cannot, under the guise of an application for a trial de novo, insist that irregularities to which he made no objection shall be taken note of or that the judgment, which is abrogated by the appeal, be reversed on account of them. It is therefore immaterial, on the trial of the case appealed, whether the Justice lost jurisdiction by conducting the trial in part on a legal holiday or failed to comply with the statute in giving judgment or pronouncing sentence. In re Graye, 36 M 394, 93 P 66 (1907).

Since the District Court does not, on appeal from a Justice's Court, sit as a court of review but tries the case de novo, any irregularities attending the rendition of the judgment in a case in which the Justice had jurisdiction of the offense charged and of the defendant are waived by taking the appeal. St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907), followed in Billings v. McCarvel, 262 M 96, 863 P2d 441, 50 St. Rep. 1460 (1993).

Record on Appeal: In the absence of a specific statutory provision on the subject, the original files, together with a copy of the docket minutes, constitute the record on appeal in a criminal case from a Justice's to a District Court. In re Graye, 36 M 394, 93 P 66 (1907).

Appeal Bond to Perfect Criminal Appeal: Because there is no statutory basis or court rule requiring an appeal bond to perfect an appeal in a criminal case from Municipal Court, the Municipal Court may not require one. Missoula v. Shea, 202 M 286, 661 P2d 410, 40 St. Rep. 91 (1983).

Case Notes
Remand or Order to Lift Stay Unnecessary Upon Affirmation by Appellate Court — Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Municipal Court Appeal Affirmed but Remanded by District Court: A Municipal Court sentenced Costa for misdemeanor traffic offenses, then stayed imposition of sentence pending Costa's appeal to District Court. The District Court affirmed judgment and remanded to the Municipal Court for imposition of sentence. The question then arose as to whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to address the District Court's decision. The Supreme Court noted that the definition of remand is to send something back for further action; however, the Legislature did not intend to require an appellate court to formally remand in cases involving affirmed criminal judgments. In addition, it is unnecessary for an appellate court to direct that a stay pending appeal be lifted once a defendant has exhausted the right to appeal and the underlying judgment and sentence have been affirmed. Therefore, the District Court's remand was premature, unnecessary, and of no immediate consequence and had no effect on the Municipal Court's final judgment and sentence. The Municipal Court stayed Costa's sentence pending appeal, which presumably encompassed an appeal to the Supreme Court, so because the District Court's remand was unnecessary, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction over Costa's appeal. Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006).

CHAPTER 18
SENTENCE AND JUDGMENT

Chapter Commission Comments
Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes
Presumption of Punishment for Going to Trial Based on Difference Between Pretrial Offer and Actual Sentence — Remand: As set out in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), when a District Court becomes involved in plea negotiations and an offer is made, any difference in the sentencing after trial must point out the factors justifying an increased sentence, and failure to enumerate the factors leads to the presumption that a greater sentence has been imposed for a vindictive purpose. Here, when the District Court failed to justify having an 11-year sentence run consecutively rather than concurrently with another sentence, the Baldwin standard requiring an explanation for imposing a harsher sentence than that offered in plea negotiations was not met, constituting reversible error. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Absence of Facts Indicating Unconstitutional Sentence — Maximum Sentence Affirmed: Brown cited St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), and St. v. Tate, 196 M 248, 639 P2d 1149 (1982), in arguing that a disparity between his sentence for deliberate homicide and a plea bargain offered by the state indicated that his due process rights were violated. The Supreme Court distinguished Baldwin and Tate because in Brown's case, the District Court was not directly involved with the plea negotiation process. Rather, the District Court enumerated a lengthy list of factors that were considered in imposing the maximum sentence on Brown. Absent anything in the record to support Brown's claim that his sentence was unconstitutional, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. St. v. Brown, 2003 MT 166, 316 M 310, 71 P3d 1215 (2003).

Defendant's Affirmation of Correctness of Information in Presentence Investigation Constituting Waiver of Due Process Challenge: McLeod challenged the legality of his dangerous drug sentence on due process grounds because the sentencing court relied on a presentence investigation (PSI) report that indicated that McLeod had five previous felony drug convictions instead of the actual four previous convictions. A convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation. Here, McLeod was given proper notice of the information in the PSI, availed himself of the opportunity to extensively review the information, was represented by counsel at the time that the PSI was made known to him and reviewed the information with counsel, and was given repeated opportunities to rebut the information but chose instead to affirm the accuracy of the PSI. Thus, pursuant to St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), McLeod was afforded the process due to a criminal defendant at sentencing. McLeod's affirmation of the correctness of the PSI constituted a waiver of a due process challenge, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

Failure of District Court Judge to Abide by Plea Agreement Entered With Previous District Court Judge — Doubt Regarding Plea Resolved in Favor of New Trial: At a change of plea hearing in December 2000, Tweed pleaded guilty to two counts of sexual intercourse without consent pursuant to a plea agreement in which the state agreed to drop two counts of felony sexual assault and recommended 30-year concurrent sentences on each count with 20 years suspended. In March 2001, Tweed appeared for sentencing before a new District Court Judge. The new judge called the probation officer who conducted the presentence investigation, and pursuant to the probation officer's recommendations, the new judge rejected the terms of the plea agreement and sentenced Tweed to concurrent 30-year sentences with only 10 years suspended. Tweed moved to withdraw the guilty pleas, but the motion was denied, and Tweed appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's contradictory statements gave credence to Tweed's claim that he held a mistaken understanding of the binding effect upon the court of the pretrial agreement's sentencing recommendations. In view of the irregularities in the interrogation at the change of plea hearing, any doubt about whether Tweed was precluded from entering a knowing, voluntary, and intelligent plea should be resolved in favor of a trial on the merits. The denial of Tweed's motion to withdraw the guilty pleas was an abuse of discretion, and the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002).

Reliance of Sentencing Judge on Other Conviction Valid at Time of Sentencing but Later Found Invalid — Inability of Defendant to Address Vacation of Prior Convictions as Due Process Violation: In 1983, Bauer was charged with and convicted of two felonies in Silver Bow County and sentenced to terms in the state prison. Bauer challenged the convictions. About 8 years later, Bauer was charged with felony intimidation in Powell County and was sentenced to an additional 5 years in prison. Following the 1991 prison riots, Bauer was moved to Blaine County, where he was later charged with three felonies arising out of an incident with a female inmate at the Blaine County jail. The presentence investigation report (PSI) referred to the Silver Bow County convictions, and the sentencing court expressly referred to the PSI in sentencing Bauer. The court held that if Bauer was successful in challenging the 1983 convictions, the sentences for the Blaine County offenses would run from the date of judgment and sentence and Bauer would be credited with any time served from the date of filing of the information to the date of imposition of the Blaine County sentences. Bauer's 1983 sentences were subsequently voided based on newly discovered DNA evidence that exonerated Bauer. Bauer then sought postconviction relief on grounds that his due process rights had been violated when the sentencing court in Blaine County relied on the now incorrect information in the PSI regarding the Silver Bow County convictions. Under both the federal and state constitutions, a defendant is protected from a sentence predicated on misinformation about that defendant's criminal history and must be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Bauer could not be said to have been given that opportunity because the 1983 convictions were still valid at the time of sentencing in Blaine County, nor did the sentencing court have a full opportunity to consider the procedural and substantive consequences of the actual vacation of the 1983 convictions or the specific grounds upon which postconviction relief was granted by the Silver Bow County court. What was correct information at the time of sentencing became misinformation after the fact. Notwithstanding that the sentencing court specifically stated that it did not rely on the 1983 convictions, the Supreme Court reversed on grounds of fundamental fairness, refusing to allow the misinformation to go unchallenged before the District Court by denying Bauer the opportunity to be resentenced on the basis of materially accurate information. The case was remanded for resentencing before a new District Court Judge. Bauer v. St., 1999 MT 185, 295 M 306, 983 P2d 955, 56 St. Rep. 715 (1999), following St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), and Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Different Sentencing Judge — No Presumption of Vindictiveness When Sentence Increased on Remand: Due process rights on resentencing create a presumption of vindictiveness when a sentence is increased on remand. However, when a different judge performs resentencing, there is no presumption of vindictiveness; rather, the defense must show actual vindictiveness. St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Due Process at Sentencing — Protection of Community Versus Defendant's Liberty Interest: At the sentencing stage, due process requires that a convicted person's liberty interest and the risk of unjust deprivation of that interest be balanced against the state's interest in protecting the community. Due process must be observed and defendant's rights protected, but it is clear that his liberty interest does not rise to the level of an accused's at trial. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986), followed in St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990).

No Right to Second Psychiatric Examination: Defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, pursuant to pleas of guilty, and was sentenced to death. Judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Subsequently, defendant filed a motion for an additional psychiatric evaluation based on the case of Ake v. Okla., 470 US 68, 84 L Ed 2d 53, 105 S Ct 1087 (1985), which was decided after arguments in defendant's case. The Supreme Court distinguished the facts of defendant's case from the facts in Ake and denied defendant's motion. The Supreme Court found that defendant had already been afforded his right to access to a competent psychiatrist for the preparation of a defense based on his mental condition and was not entitled to an additional psychiatric examination. The Ake decision lacks direct application to Montana's capital sentencing proceedings and defendant's case. St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110, 42 St. Rep. 1348 (1985).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Jail Sentence for DUI Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: The defendant, who has an extensive record of driving under the influence of alcohol, was convicted on three counts of driving under the influence (DUI) and sentenced to serve 10 months in the county jail. The defendant contends her sentence is cruel and unusual punishment and a denial of equal protection because it may be greater than would be served in the state prison for a more serious offense since county jail inmates are not entitled to statutory good time allowance or parole eligibility as are prison inmates. However, the sentence falls within the maximum authorized by statute and is not so disproportionate to the crime that it shocks the conscience and outrages the moral sense of the community or of justice. Therefore, the sentence imposed is not cruel and unusual punishment that would render it unconstitutional. St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817, 41 St. Rep. 2178 (1984).

No Jury Finding of Previous Conviction Necessary for Increased Penalty: The defendant was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, and after stipulating to his prior conviction and being sentenced to an increased penalty because of that conviction, argued on appeal that the District Court had no jurisdiction to sentence him to an increased penalty under subsection (2) of 45-8-316 because the jury had not found the fact of his previous felony. On appeal the Supreme Court held, under the rationale of St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435 (1978), that the prerequisites for the heavier sentence were not an element of the crime and that no finding by the jury on the issue of the defendant's previous conviction was therefore necessary. St. v. Sanders, 208 M 283, 676 P2d 1312, 41 St. Rep. 338 (1984).

Out-of-Court Conference Between Sentencing Judge and Probation Officer — Denial of Due Process: The defendant was denied due process when the sentencing judge conferred with the presentence investigation officer behind closed doors where no opportunity was provided for argument, rebuttal, or explanation. St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Rules of Evidence Not Applicable to Sentencing: The Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing hearings. The court correctly used relaxed rules of evidence during the sentencing hearing. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

State Responsible for Medical Costs Incurred After Defendant Sentenced to State Prison — State as Defendant's Legal Custodian: At the time of defendant's sentencing, she was pregnant and her child was due to be born within a few weeks. She was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment in state prison with 2 years suspended. Rather than ordering defendant's transfer to the state prison immediately upon sentencing, the District Court ordered that defendant remain in the county jail until the baby's birth so that defendant could be attended by her personal physician. In a dispute between the county and the state Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) concerning who bore the responsibility for defendant's medical costs, the Supreme Court ruled that the responsibility was that of the state. The Supreme Court reasoned that since once the District Court has imposed a valid sentence, it lacks jurisdiction to modify it, the defendant became the legal responsibility of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) as soon as the judgment was filed. Wilkinson v. St., 205 M 237, 667 P2d 413, 40 St. Rep. 1239 (1983).

Disparity Between Sentence Offered in Plea Bargaining and Sentence Actually Rendered After Trial:

Because of the difficulty of distinguishing between situations where leniency is offered in exchange for a plea and situations where the defendant is punished for exercising his right to trial by jury, a sentencing court that becomes involved in the plea bargaining process and imposes a harsher sentence after trial than was offered in exchange for a guilty plea must specifically point out the factors that justify the increased sentence. (Citing St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981).) St. v. Tate, 196 M 248, 639 P2d 1149, 39 St. Rep. 69 (1982). Baldwin was distinguished in St. v. Smith, 276 M 434, 916 P2d 773, 53 St. Rep. 459 (1996).

To protect a criminal defendant's constitutional rights in plea bargaining situations and to help preserve public confidence in the judicial process, we today adopt ABA Standard 14-sec. 1.8(b). To implement that standard and to facilitate judicial review, a sentencing court that becomes involved in the plea bargaining process and imposes a harsher sentence after trial than was offered in exchange for a guilty plea must specifically point out the factors that justify the increased sentence. In this case, we cannot tell from the record why the trial court offered a very lenient sentence (45 days' jail time) in exchange for a plea of guilty. Nor can we tell why the court found imposition of a harsher sentence appropriate after jury trial (10 years' jail time). We have no assurance that the trial court did not increase the sentence in retaliation for defendant's insistence on a trial by jury. St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222, 38 St. Rep. 882 (1981), distinguished in St. v. Smith, 276 M 434, 916 P2d 773, 53 St. Rep. 459 (1996).

Defendant Sane at Time of Crime — Insane at Other Times: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, contended that sentencing a man suffering from severe mental illness to prison violates the constitutional ban against cruel and unusual punishment as well as 53-21-101. When a defendant is convicted and claims that he was suffering at the time of the crime from a mental disease or defect that rendered him incapable of conforming his conduct to the requirements of the law, the sentencing judge is to consider the relevant evidence of the defendant's disorder. If the judge finds the defendant did not suffer mental illness at the time of the crime, he is to be sentenced according to the guidelines in this chapter. If the finding is to the contrary, the defendant must be sentenced to Warm Springs. Despite the lack of provisions in Title 46, ch. 14, for sentencing a defendant who was sane at the time of the crime but may be insane at other times, Title 53, ch. 21, relating to treatment for mental illness, does not apply to criminal defendants. The defendant's claim that he is covered by Title 53, ch. 21, is in error. Without a finding of insanity followed by sentencing to a penal institution without provision for adequate treatment, defendant has suffered no statutory or constitutional violation. St. v. Mercer, 191 M 418, 625 P2d 44, 38 St. Rep. 312 (1981).

Increase of Sentence After New Trial — Due Process: The defendant, who had been sentenced to 100 years' imprisonment for deliberate homicide, was not denied due process of law when, after a new trial on the same charge, he was sentenced to death. The due process clause is not offended by all possibilities of increased punishment upon retrial after appeal, but only those that pose a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness. When the District Court Judge was replaced for the new trial and sentencing and the new judge stated his reasons for imposing the death penalty with clarity, the threat of vindictiveness was not a realistic likelihood. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Part Case Notes

Sentencing Judge Aware of Other Conviction That Was Overturned on Appeal — No Error: As a result of his involvement in one incident, defendant was convicted at separate trials of criminal possession of dangerous drugs and of aggravated assault. His drug possession conviction was reversed on appeal. Prior to this reversal, he was sentenced on the aggravated assault charge. The sentencing judge alluded to the drug conviction. Defendant claimed, in an appeal of the aggravated assault conviction, that the District Court erred by considering a conviction that had later been overturned. The Supreme Court upheld the sentencing, stating that if it is obvious from the record that the judge did not rely on the infirm conviction and the sentence would not have been different had the judge disregarded the prior conviction, the Supreme Court will find no prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Van Haele, 207 M 162, 675 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1964 (1983).

Sentencing Judge's Private Out-of-Court Contact — Violation of Defendant's Right to Due Process: Private out-of-court contact by the sentencing judge with defendant's former employer affected the sentencing process and defendant's right to due process. Defendant was entitled to be resentenced by a different judge. St. v. Baker, 205 M 244, 667 P2d 416, 40 St. Rep. 1244 (1983).

Plea Bargain Nonbinding on Court: Defendant was charged with two counts of felony theft in a welfare fraud case. In conjunction with a plea bargain, she pleaded guilty to both counts and the State recommended a 3-year suspended sentence. The District Court ordered defendant to serve 3 years in prison with all but 30 days suspended and ordered restitution. Defendant contended the court erred by not imposing the sentence recommended by the State. The Supreme Court, relying on St. v. Mann, 169 M 306, 546 P2d 515 (1976), said that where the defendant was informed by the court that the recommendation of the State is not binding upon it and defendant stated she understood, she is bound by the sentence. St. v. Gray, 204 M 153, 665 P2d 781, 40 St. Rep. 735 (1983).

Factors in Sentencing — Reference to Retracted Psychiatric Report: At presentence hearing psychiatrist testified that his prior psychiatric report diagnosing defendant as antisocial was inaccurate. The judge's order stated that the report had been considered in passing sentence. The mere reference to the retracted report was not sufficient grounds for reversal, as the judge heard the retraction by the psychiatrist and there was no indication that he did not abide by the retraction. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Sentencing Prerequisites — Reading of Entire Transcript: The fact that the judge sentencing defendant following negligent homicide conviction did not read the entire trial transcript prior to passing sentence did not mandate reversal. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

State's Introduction of Testimony and Exhibits at Sentencing Hearing: Petitioner alleged that the State's introduction of testimony and exhibits at his sentencing breached the plea agreement in which the State agreed to make "no sentencing recommendation". In view of the fact that there is no positive point in law on the State's introduction of evidence at the sentencing, as here, the State requested in fairness that a more equitable solution than granting request to withdraw the plea would be to allow petitioner to be resentenced, pursuant to the express terms of the plea agreement without any testimony or evidence introduced by the State or any statement by the prosecutor, and the Supreme Court so ordered. Gardipee v. Blodgett, 193 M 314, 631 P2d 1270, 38 St. Rep. 909 (1981).

This statement expresses the purpose of sentencing which is not merely to punish but is oriented toward rehabilitation. It recognizes the necessity of focusing attention on the particular offender and that in many cases the best method of dealing with a particular offender is not incarceration.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 in (3)(h) in second sentence before "counsel" deleted "court-appointed" and inserted "assigned"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 581 in (2)(a) at end inserted "and to hold an offender accountable"; in (2)(b) after "public" inserted "reduce crime, and increase the public sense of safety"; in (2)(d) at end inserted "to provide rehabilitation and reintegration of offenders back into the community"; inserted (3)(i) providing that sentencing practices should promote and support restorative justice principles; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 189 in (3)(a)(v), at end, substituted "a state prison" for "the state prison or the women's correctional system" (voided by Ch. 474 amendment); and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 474 in first sentence in (1) and at beginning of (2), after "correctional", inserted "and sentencing"; in second sentence in (1), after "crime", deleted "and for the rehabilitation of the convicted"; in first sentence in (2), after "is to", substituted language outlining state policy and (3) outlining sentencing principles for "protect society by preventing crime through punishment and rehabilitation of the convicted. The legislature finds that an individual is responsible for and must be held accountable for the individual's actions, including, whenever possible, the restoration of all pecuniary losses sustained by a victim of the offense. Corrections laws and programs must be implemented to impress upon each individual the responsibility for obeying the law. To achieve this end, it is the policy of the state to assure that prosecution of criminal offenses occurs whenever probable cause exists and that punishment of the convicted is certain, timely, and consistent. Furthermore, it is the state's policy that persons convicted of a crime be dealt with in accordance with their individual characteristics, circumstances, needs, and potentialities. Finally, it is the policy of the state to recognize that the interests of crime victims should be considered so that, to the extent possible, victims of crime may be protected from threat of future harm by the offender.

(3) (a) Sentences imposed upon those convicted of crime must be based primarily on the following:

(i) the crime committed;

(ii) the prospects of rehabilitation of the offender;

(iii) the circumstances under which the crime was committed;

(iv) the criminal history of the offender; and

(v) consideration of alternatives to imprisonment of the offender in the state prison or the women's correctional system.

(b) Dangerous offenders who habitually violate the law and victimize the public must be removed from society and correctively treated in custody for long terms, as needed. Other offenders must be dealt with by probation, suspended sentence, community corrections, community service, or fine whenever the disposition appears practicable and not detrimental to the needs of public safety and the welfare of the individual. Whenever possible, sentences for offenders must include restitution to the victim, payment of costs as provided in 46-18-232, and payment of costs of court-appointed counsel as provided in 46-8-113.

(4) It is also the policy of the state that alternatives to imprisonment, such as community corrections, should be used whenever appropriate for nonviolent felony offenders in order to provide them opportunities to gain work experience, to learn life skills, to obtain education and training, or to participate in other activities that will reduce recidivism and enable offenders to become productive members of society"; and made minor changes in style.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 125 in (2), at end of second sentence, inserted phrase relating to restoration of pecuniary losses by victim and inserted last sentence relating to interests and protection of crime victims.

Chapter 546 in (3)(a)(v) substituted "women's correctional system" for "women's correctional center"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 10 in (3)(a)(v) substituted reference to the Women's Correctional Center for reference to a women's correctional facility; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (3)(a)(v) concerning sentencing alternatives; in (3)(b), near middle of first sentence after "suspended sentence", inserted "community corrections, community service"; inserted (4) concerning alternative sentencing for nonviolent felony offenders; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1983 Amendment: Substituted a new, three-subsection policy relating to protection of society; acceptance of responsibility for one's actions; certain, timely, and consistent punishment; individual treatment in fashioning punishments; what sentences must be primarily based on; and payment of restitution or costs for former text that read: "This chapter shall be liberally construed to the end that persons convicted of a crime shall be dealt with in accordance with their individual characteristics, circumstances, needs, and potentialities; that dangerous offenders shall be correctively treated in custody for long terms as needed; and that other offenders shall be dealt with by probation, suspended sentence, or fine whenever such disposition appears practicable and not detrimental to the needs of public safety and the welfare of the individual."

CASES UNDER CURRENT LAW

Failure of Defendant to Admit Incest — Sentence Not Considered More Harsh Given Relevant Sentencing Factors: Bullman consistently maintained that he was not guilty of incest with his stepdaughter because he was never married to her mother. Because Bullman refused to admit guilt and was thus ineligible for community-based treatment, he asserted that he was sentenced more harshly by being sentenced to prison. The Supreme Court examined the record and disagreed. The sentencing court was aware of the prohibition against sentencing a defendant to prison because the defendant does not admit guilt, but the court also considered numerous other relevant factors in sentencing Bullman to prison in addition to the expert opinion that Bullman was not a candidate for community-based treatment, including: (1) the significant impact of the crime on the victim; (2) the need to protect society; (3) Bullman's need for appropriate treatment; (4) Bullman's criminal history; and (5) Bullman's long history of substance abuse. Given these sentencing factors, the Supreme Court could not conclude that Bullman was sentenced to prison for failure to admit guilt, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Forty-Year Sentence for Two Counts of Vehicular Homicide Legal and Affirmed: Following conviction for two counts of vehicular homicide while under the influence, Baker was sentenced to 15 years suspended on the first count and 25 years with 5 years suspended on the second count. Baker contended that the 40-year sentence violated Montana's correctional and sentencing policies because the length of the sentence was not understandable, commensurate with punishment imposed on other persons committing the same offense, or neutral with respect to Baker's race. The Supreme Court concluded that the sentence was well within the statutory parameters as to length and therefore legal. Baker's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Baker, 2008 MT 396, 347 M 159, 197 P3d 1001 (2008).

No Error in Treating Retribution as Component of Punishment: Rickman asserted that the sentencing court improperly considered retribution as a factor in sentencing Rickman to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that retribution has repeatedly been held to be a component of punishment. It was appropriate for the sentencing court to consider that the victim was innocent and to consider the impact of the homicide on the victim's family. The judgment and commitment of the sentencing judge indicated that retribution was only the third basis for the sentence, and in light of Rickman's minimal potential for rehabilitation and Rickman's significant threat to the public, the sentencing court's use of the word "retribution" comported with state sentencing policies and procedures. Rickman's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008).

Partial Parole Restrictions Affirmed: Rickman was sentenced to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. Rickman appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court had no authority to restrict parole eligibility for only part of the sentence. Noting that challenges to partial parole restriction have been upheld since at least 1988, the Supreme Court disagreed with Rickman's assertion. A sentencing court has discretion to impose parole restrictions, and if a sentencing court has discretion to impose a restriction of no parole eligibility, then a sentencing court can likewise impose a restriction of limited parole eligibility. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008), and St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Negligent Homicide Considered Crime of Violence — Consideration of Sentencing Alternatives to Prison Not Required: English asserted that because negligent homicide is not a crime of violence, the trial court erred by failing to consider sentencing alternatives to prison pursuant to subsection (3)(f) of this section when sentencing English to 20 years in prison for negligent homicide. The Supreme Court found the argument unpersuasive. Under 46-18-104, a crime in which the offender causes serious bodily injury or death to a person other than the offender is defined as a violent crime. English negligently caused the death of another person, and the trial court did not err in ruling that the negligent homicide was a crime of violence or by failing to consider sentencing alternatives to prison. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Sentence for Negligent Homicide Not Considered "Trial Tax" in Violation of Due Process: English contended that a sentence of 20 years with 10 suspended for negligent homicide constituted a "trial tax" imposed for taking the case to trial rather than pleading guilty, in view of the disparity between his sentence and cases cited by the trial court in which defendants pleaded guilty or nolo contendere. The Supreme Court disagreed. The trial court focused on the aggravating circumstances in English's case, not on the sentences imposed in prior negligent homicide cases, and there was no indication that the trial court imposed a "trial tax" on English for proceeding to trial. There may be appropriate differences between sentences imposed on defendants who have pleaded guilty and those who have proceeded to trial for the same offense. The sentence was within statutory parameters, did not violate English's due process rights, and was affirmed. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Lack of Remorse Not Sole Sentence Enhancement Factor — Incest Sentence Affirmed: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in augmenting a sentence for incest simply because defendant did not show remorse or admit guilt. The Supreme Court noted that St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), prohibits enhancement of a sentence solely because a defendant is not remorseful or refuses to be accountable for the defendant's conduct. However, in this case, the sentencing court did not rely solely on defendant's attitude in enhancing the incest sentence but also considered defendant's risk of reoffending, risk to society, prospects for rehabilitation, character, background, history, and mental and physical functioning. Thus, Shreves was distinguishable, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Challenge to Equity of Sentence Properly With Sentence Review Division, Not Supreme Court: A challenge to the equity of a sentence, as opposed to the legality of a sentence, properly lies with the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court, which does not review a sentence on appeal for mere inequity or disparity. In this case, defendant cloaked an equity challenge in the vestiges of a constitutional argument in seeking Supreme Court review, but the court declined to address it, leaving the matter to the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004), following St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202 (1995), and followed in St. v. Baker, 2008 MT 396, 347 M 159, 197 P3d 1001 (2008).

Failure to Pay Debts Noted in Sentencing — Poverty and Social Status Not Improperly Considered: The District Court listed numerous reasons for sentencing Nolan for criminal endangerment and resisting arrest, including the violence of the offenses at issue, Nolan's 25 traffic-related convictions, his 2 prior felony convictions involving violence, and the numerous opportunities previously given to Nolan to be a responsible, law-abiding citizen. One of the court's additional considerations was that Nolan did not pay his debts, including child support, while employed. Nolan contended that the court's consideration of his poverty as a sentencing criteria was an unconstitutional infringement on his due process rights. However, failure to pay debts does not generally equate with poverty, and because indigency or poverty was not the touchstone for imposing the maximum allowable punishment, the District Court did not improperly rely on Nolan's poverty in sentencing Nolan to less than the maximum penalty allowed. Nolan's contention that the sentencing court relied on his social status was also unfounded, even though testimony was given regarding the number of Nolan's children who were born out of wedlock. Nolan did not object to the inquiries when they were made, and Nolan opened the door to the inquiries by presenting both witness testimony and his own statement regarding being a good father and loving his children. Nolan's due process rights were not violated through mention of his failure to pay bills and father children out of wedlock, and the sentences were affirmed. St. v. Nolan, 2003 MT 13, 314 M 47, 62 P3d 1118 (2003), distinguishing St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000).

Sentence Based on Refusal to Admit Guilt Violative of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Shreves was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison, with no parole for 60 years. At trial, Shreves chose to testify on his own behalf and assert his innocence, and at sentencing, Shreves chose not to testify, but his counsel indicated that Shreves maintained his innocence. The District Court imposed the sentence based in significant part on Shreves' failure to show remorse or responsibility. Shreves appealed on grounds that it was improper to hold his refusal to admit to the crime against him in determining the sentence. The state contended that the sentencing court properly considered the lack of remorse as a factor relevant to Shreves' rehabilitation and the danger presented to the community and argued that the lack of remorse was based on trial testimony and evidence. The Supreme Court considered whether Shreves adequately invoked the right to maintain silence, the scope of the oral sentence that controlled over the subsequent written sentence as it related to the entire sentence, and the District Court's decision to base its sentence in large part on Shreves' refusal to admit to the crime. Although lack of remorse can be considered as a sentencing factor, a sentence that is based on a refusal to admit guilt cannot be upheld. Here, the Supreme Court was unable to find a sentencing distinction between punishing Shreves for remaining silent and the proper consideration of Shreves' failure to show remorse. A sentencing court may not draw a negative inference of lack of remorse from a defendant's silence at sentencing when the defendant has maintained innocence throughout the proceedings. Shreves was improperly penalized for maintaining his innocence pursuant to the constitutional right to remain silent. The sentence was therefore illegal. Shreves' conviction was reversed, and the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), distinguished in St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004), and St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), St. v. Kelly, 265 M 298, 876 P2d 641 (1994), St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Mental Disease Not Affecting Ability to Appreciate Criminality of Behavior — Prison Sentence, Rather Than Hospitalization, Appropriate: Smith contended that the District Court erred in concluding that he did not suffer from a mental disease or defect that rendered him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law, pursuant to 46-14-311 and 46-14-312, and that because of his personality disorder, he should have been sentenced to the state hospital rather than the state prison for felony assault and assault on a peace officer in order to satisfy state principles of prevention and reformation in light of his unique and particular posture as a mentally ill person. However, even assuming that Smith had a mental disease or defect, the District Court found that Smith's mental condition did not have the effect of rendering him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law. Smith failed to satisfy this additional element of 46-14-311, so hospitalization was not required under 46-14-312. St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000).

Incorrect Sentences for Operating Vehicle Without Insurance and Accident Involving Damage to Vehicle Reversed: Clark was charged on two occasions with multiple misdemeanor traffic offenses. The District Court properly based its sentencing on the factors in this section, but incorrectly applied the 1995 version of 61-6-304 in sentencing Clark to 6 months in the county jail for operating a vehicle without valid liability insurance when the 1993 version of the statute in effect at the time that the crime was committed allowed a maximum sentence of 10 days. The court also sentenced Clark to 10 days' imprisonment and fined him $100 for a conviction under the 1995 version of 61-7-118 related to an accident involving damage to a vehicle, but the 1993 version in effect at the time that the crime was committed allowed for the imposition of imprisonment or a fine, but not both, upon a first conviction. These sentencing errors constituted reversible error as a matter of law, and the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing consistent with the applicable statutes. St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000).

Similar Purposes of Adult and Youth Sentencing Statutes Regarding Public Safety and Rehabilitation: In its transfer order, the Youth Court concluded that adult sentencing policies are similar to the sentencing purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act in that both are designed to ensure rehabilitation, accountability, and protection of the community. Spina contended that the conclusion was a misstatement of the law because the declaration of purpose in the Montana Youth Court Act does not promote accountability. The Supreme Court held that, although not identical, the statutes have similar purposes, including holding individuals accountable for their actions through the imposition of restitutionary measures. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Prison Murder — Death Sentence Not Imposed Under Influence of Passion, Prejudice, or Arbitrary Factors: Johnson was convicted of killing another prison inmate and contended on appeal that the death sentence was imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors because the District Court predicated its sentence on Montana's correctional policy, as set forth in this section, but that the policy does not expressly provide for death as punishment for any crime. The Supreme Court agreed that the statute does not expressly discuss death as a punishment for criminal conduct, but noted that, being a general declaration of state correctional policy, the statute also does not discuss most of the sentencing options allowed by law. Notwithstanding the fact that the death sentence has been affirmed as constitutional, the District Court's findings reflected its consideration of the general statutory principles that a sentence be based primarily on the crime committed, the prospects of rehabilitation, the circumstances under which the crime was committed, and the offender's criminal history. The circumstances of this crime, coupled with Johnson's long history of assaultive and predatory behavior both in and out of prison, were reflected in the court's analysis and showed that the court carefully and dispassionately considered all the evidence before it concluded that the death penalty was appropriate. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998).

Application of Repealed Dangerous Offender Law to Offender Who Committed Crime Before Repeal and Was Sentenced After Repeal: The rule that the sentencing law in effect at the that time a crime is committed governs the sentence to be imposed applies to situations in which that law is amended after the crime is committed but before the sentence is imposed and in which the law still exists when the sentence is imposed. It is the law as it read prior to the amendment that governs the sentence. This rule does not apply to a situation in which a sentencing law in effect when a crime is committed is repealed before imposition of sentence. In this case, a dangerous offender statute in effect when Wilson committed his crimes was repealed before the judge sentenced him for the crimes, yet the judge used it to designate Wilson as a dangerous offender, thus increasing the punishment. In this type of situation, when the effect of the repeal is to lessen, not to increase, punishment and the repealer has no saving clause, the law in effect at the time of sentencing applies. Because the dangerous offender statute had been repealed before sentencing, it was not in effect at the time of sentencing and did not apply to the sentence. St. v. Wilson, 279 M 34, 926 P2d 712, 53 St. Rep. 1034 (1996).

Dangerous Offender Determination — Record Found to Show "Articulated Reasons": Hofman pleaded guilty to aggravated assault, felony assault (now assault with a weapon), misdemeanor assault, and criminal mischief. At the time of sentencing, the District Court designated Hofman a dangerous offender (See 1995 repeal of 46-18-404). Citing St. v. Ford, 218 M 215, 707 P2d 16 (1985), Hofman alleged that the District Court record lacked "articulated reasons" for the designation as dangerous offender. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and noted that the District Court Judge referred to facts demonstrating Hofman's propensity for violence and pointed out that Hofman had been given numerous opportunities to change. The Supreme Court held that the District Court adequately stated the reasons for the designation. St. v. Hofman, 275 M 455, 913 P2d 1256, 53 St. Rep. 223 (1996).

Alternative Sentencing for Nonviolent Offenders a Consideration, Not a Presumption: Stevens asserted that state law created a presumption that nonviolent felony offenders be alternatively sentenced rather than imprisoned and that the trial court's statement that the state had placed special emphasis on punishing sex offenders when the victims were under 16 years of age was contrary to the policy of alternative sentencing. The Supreme Court held that the record indicated that the trial court had considered alternative sentencing and found it inappropriate because of the nature of the crime and that the sentencing order was not error. St. v. Stevens, 273 M 452, 904 P2d 590, 52 St. Rep. 1078 (1995).

Prisoner Rehabilitation Not State Obligation: The plaintiffs sought recovery in tort from the state on the basis that the state was negligent in releasing a nonrehabilitated prisoner who killed their child. The Supreme Court held that the state is not a guarantor of its rehabilitation facilities and that the court would not impose that obligation on the state. VanLuchene v. St., 244 M 397, 797 P2d 932, 47 St. Rep. 1609 (1990), followed in King v. St., 259 M 393, 856 P2d 954, 50 St. Rep. 848 (1993).

Consecutive Terms Allowable for Sexual Assault: The District Court did not err in sentencing defendant to two consecutive terms upon conviction of sexual assault when the factors in this section were considered and the sentence fell within the legal limits of 45-5-502. St. v. Gilpin, 232 M 56, 756 P2d 445, 45 St. Rep. 863 (1988).

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

Sentence of 100 Years — Based on Prevention of Future Crimes: On conviction of deliberate homicide the defendant received the maximum allowable sentence, 100 years, and was determined ineligible for designation as a nondangerous offender, or for parole. On appeal, he argued the sentence was not based on any credible evidence presented at the sentencing hearing or contained in the presentence report, but was motivated by the trial court's desire for vengeance on behalf of the victim's family. The court indicated it imposed the sentence because it believed defendant should be removed from society. The Supreme Court held that the sentence did not violate Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., which requires that "laws for the punishment of crime shall be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation" (amended in 1998 to read "prevention, reformation, public safety, and restitution for victims"), nor did it violate 46-18-101, which provides that the policy behind sentencing is the rehabilitation, if possible, of convicts. Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., allows a trial court in its discretion to base a sentence on the principle of prevention of future crimes. This includes the power to remove a person from society, as the court found necessary in this case. Also, the sentence is within the permissible statutory range, and in the absence of clear abuse of discretion is properly reviewed by the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), followed in St. v. Valcourt, 254 M 174, 835 P2d 753, 49 St. Rep. 686 (1992).

Constitutional Requirement Satisfied by Sentence Founded on Prevention and Reformation: The defendant, who has an extensive record of driving under the influence of alcohol, was convicted on three counts of driving under the influence (DUI). She was sentenced to serve time in the county jail. The defendant contends her sentence violates the constitution as it does not provide for her rehabilitation. Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., requires that laws for punishment of crime be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation (amended in 1998 to read "prevention, reformation, public safety, and restitution for victims"). The defendant's sentence furthers the prevention principle through her incarceration, addresses the reformation principle through ordering her to abstain from the use of alcohol, and provides the avoidance of further incarceration as an incentive to reform. Thus, the constitutional requirement is satisfied. St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817, 41 St. Rep. 2178 (1984).

No Proof Erroneous Information Considered by Sentencing Court: The defendants were sentenced to lengthy prison terms for deliberate homicide. They contend the sentencing judge considered information from a psychiatrist that is not directly reflected in the record, but the record does not support their contention. The comments concerning the doctor's report were made by defense counsel during oral presentation to the sentencing court. The defendants have failed to show that any information furnished by the psychiatrist was considered improperly by the court; thus they have failed to show any erroneous information was considered by the court in passing sentence. St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

Objection to Sentence for Punishment Rather Than Prevention and Reformation — Lack of Proof: Objection that sentence was for punishment rather than for prevention of further crime and reformation of defendant was clearly without merit, as there was no evidence or authority cited by appellant to establish that the sentence would not deter him or others from future wrongful conduct or that the sentence would not lead to reformation. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Mention of "Setting an Example" at Sentencing — Not Error Viewed in Context: Although the trial court did mention "setting an example" when imposing sentence, that is not a reason for remanding for resentencing as a violation of Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., because the judge's use of the presentencing report and his reasons for the length of the sentence indicate no impropriety in the sentencing. St. v. DeSilva, 209 M 169, 679 P2d 1237, 41 St. Rep. 620 (1984).

Consideration of Indigency in Sentencing — Violation of Due Process: Defendant was convicted of theft of public assistance funds in violation of 45-6-301 and sentenced to the maximum term of imprisonment, 10 years. The sentence was then suspended on the conditions that defendant seek alcohol treatment, make restitution of the funds, and pay the fees of his court-appointed attorney. The Supreme Court ruled that if the reason for defendant's receiving the maximum sentence was that he is indigent and will therefore make restitution slowly, the sentence is a violation of his right to due process. The court remanded the case for reconsideration of the sentence in view of the opinion. St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168, 41 St. Rep. 91 (1984), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Timing of Sentencing Required to Bring Defendant Within Operation of Statute: Where the defendant was convicted of two counts of negligent homicide following a previous conviction for burglary within 5 years prior to the negligent homicide convictions, the District Court did not err in sentencing the defendant under the persistent felony offender statute. The defendant's contention that he is not "presently being sentenced for a second felony" until after the court has determined to sentence him to a term of imprisonment for more than 1 year is a hypertechnical construction of the statute intended to avoid the clear intention of the Legislature. The defendant's case is covered by the legislative mandate (deleted by a 1983 amendment) that the chapter be liberally construed to the end that dangerous offenders be correctively treated in custody for long terms as needed. St. v. Ballard, 202 M 81, 655 P2d 986, 39 St. Rep. 2342 (1982).

Discretion of Court — Different Sentences for Co-Offenders: On appellate review, undermining the legality of a sentence requires a showing that the judge abused his discretion in the sentencing process. There was no abuse of discretion where defendant and another were separately convicted of the same burglary, the other person was offered and accepted a bargain for a 3-year deferred sentence, and defendant was offered a bargain for a 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended, refused it, and was tried, convicted, and sentenced to 10 years. There was a strong possibility that his alibi defense was frivolous, and he had a prior felony record. St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982).

Codefendants — Disparate Sentences — Suspension Versus Twenty Years: Defendant, a 28-year-old male with a history of involvement with weapons, and his codefendant, a 58-year-old alcoholic with no record of violence, were each convicted of two counts of kidnapping and two counts of assault in regard to two girls 12 and 14 years old. Defendant was sentenced to two consecutive 10-year prison sentences on the kidnapping convictions and to 6 months on each assault charge, to run concurrently with each other and with the kidnapping sentences. Codefendant, defendant's natural father, received a 10-year sentence, all of which was suspended on the condition that he commit himself to alcohol treatment at a state institution and remain a law-abiding citizen. The Supreme Court ruled that there was no denial of equal protection as claimed by defendant. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Dangerous Offender Determination — Use of Defective Information: After defendant and his father kidnapped two minor girls and took them to the father's house, father told defendant to "go get the gun" and defendant did so and placed it between the two men on the couch where they were sitting. The girls were not threatened with the gun. The trial judge told defendant that "the reason you're designated a dangerous offender is that's about the fourth gun incident you were in". Review of the record on appeal showed: (1) a possible misapprehension of defendant's actual criminal background and apparent confusion as to the crimes involved; (2) no convincing evidence that this was defendant's fourth gun incident; and (3) an indication that one of the prior convictions considered by the judge was constitutionally defective because defendant did not have counsel. The sentencing court cannot rely upon a previous criminal record in sentencing if that record contains constitutionally infirm convictions. Defendant had a right to have his sentence based upon substantially correct information and was entitled to a rehearing on his designation as a dangerous offender. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Partially Disabled Defendant — Excessive Sentence: Ordinarily a sentence is not cruel and unusual punishment if it is within the maximum established by statute, and review properly lies with the Sentence Review Division. The fact that defendant is partially disabled does not automatically render him incapable of harming other persons or society, and the facts here are sufficient to justify the designation of dangerous offender. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

Reasonable Notice as to Witness — Remoteness of Evidence: The State, during sentencing, intentionally surprised the defendant by testimony of two women with whom the defendant had allegedly had sexual contact without consent some 10 years earlier. The court ordered resentencing because of the State's denial of reasonable notice. The defendant did not waive his right to complain when he did not request a continuance at the time of sentencing. The question of admissibility of such evidence as having a bearing on the sentencing and as to whether it is remote and uncorroborated was left to the reasonable discretion of the trial court. St. v. Price, 191 M 1, 622 P2d 160, 37 St. Rep. 1926 (1980).

Presentencing Hearing — Cross-Examination: An in-chambers interview with the victim in order to determine her feelings as to an appropriate sentence, where defendant was absent, defense counsel was denied cross-examination, and no opportunity was afforded the defense to refute the information, violated defendant's right to be sentenced under circumstances free from misinformation. Sentence was vacated and the case remanded for resentencing. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Constitutionality of Death Sentence: Under the law at the time of the crime, which has since been amended and then repealed, there was discretion in the procedures for imposing the death sentence. The statutes were held to have met the three general criteria requisite to a valid death penalty statutory scheme: (1) at least one statutory aggravating circumstance before a death sentence may be considered; (2) allowance for consideration of mitigating circumstances relating to the individual defendant; and (3) prompt judicial review. The Montana statutory scheme afforded the defendant the procedural safeguards necessary to protect his substantive right to be sentenced without arbitrariness or caprice. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

CASES UNDER FORMER "NONDANGEROUS OFFENDER" DESIGNATION LAW

Designation as Dangerous Offender Supported by Record: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged her designation as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. The Supreme Court reviewed the findings of fact made by the District Court and noted that the District Court had made findings concerning her lack of remorse, the fact that she did not act with strong provocation, and the possibility of her committing the crime again. Because of these findings, the Supreme Court upheld the designation as a dangerous offender. St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Error in Determining Offender Status When Statute Not in Effect: As set out in St. v. Stevens, 273 M 452, 904 P2d 590 (1995), the law in effect at the time of the commission of a crime, rather than the law at the time of sentencing, controls as to the possible sentence. Finley committed an offense on August 20, 1989. At that time, 46-18-404 (now repealed) did not grant a District Court the authority to determine dangerous or nondangerous offender status. The amendment that instituted that authority took effect October 1, 1989. Thus, the District Court had no authority to determine Finley's status, and its designation of Finley's offender status was reversible error. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), followed in Chandler v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 294, 302 M 309, 18 P3d 312, 57 St. Rep. 1247 (2000).

Designation Upheld: In a prosecution for kidnapping and assault, the District Court articulated numerous reasons for designating each defendant as a dangerous offender. These reasons included a chemical dependency problem, continuing to drink and engage in unlawful acts despite treatment, numerous misdemeanor convictions and a juvenile record, lack of remorse, disrespect for and a defiance of the law and its officers, a failure to recognize that the unlawful actions were wrong, and a finding that the defendant posed a threat to the public and the victims. When the District Court clearly articulated its reasons in support of its determination that the defendants presented a danger to society and the victims and its reasons were fully supported by the record, the court did not abuse its discretion when it designated the defendants dangerous offenders (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for the purposes of parole. St. v. Eichenlaub, 272 M 332, 901 P2d 90, 52 St. Rep. 786 (1995).

Dangerousness to Others as Basis for Designation as Dangerous Offender: Henrich was convicted of several crimes stemming from the sexual abuse of his daughters and was designated a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404). Henrich appealed the designation, claiming that there was insufficient evidence of his dangerousness. The Supreme Court found that in making the designation, the District Court considered the evidence at trial, the presentence investigation report, and the sentencing hearing. The District Court found that Henrich was a danger to his daughters. Because dangerousness to others may serve as a basis for the designation, the Supreme Court upheld the designation. St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994).

No Statutory Requirement of Dangerous Offender Designation — Court's Discretion: The provisions of 46-18-404 (now repealed) are mandatory only when the circumstances require the court to sentence one as a nondangerous offender. If a defendant satisfies only one of the prerequisites of this section for designation as nondangerous, then the court may in its discretion designate the defendant either dangerous or nondangerous. The court must exercise its discretion, and when the court refused to do so because it erroneously interpreted statute and concluded that it had no discretion, its designation of the defendant as dangerous must be reversed. St. v. Lorenz, 267 M 186, 883 P2d 98, 51 St. Rep. 1027 (1994).

Failure to Articulate Reasons for Dangerous Offender Designation as Warranting Remand: The District Court designated defendant as a dangerous offender for parole purposes but failed to articulate why defendant represented a substantial danger to other persons or to society. Under the rationale of St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514 (1993), the Supreme Court remanded for additional articulation of the District Court's reasons for a dangerous or nondangerous designation. St. v. Wing, 264 M 215, 870 P2d 1368, 51 St. Rep. 223 (1994), on remand, reversed and remanded for further proceedings in St. v. Lorenz, 267 M 186, 883 P2d 98, 51 St. Rep. 1027 (1994).

Defendant to Be Sentenced Under Statute Existing at Time of Original Sentencing: Suiste argued that the District Court had violated the ban against ex post facto legislation by designating him as a dangerous offender when it revoked his suspended sentence for a crime that he was originally convicted of in 1979. By so doing, Suiste argued that the court was subjecting him to a harsher penalty than he could have received at the time that he committed the offense. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was entitled to be sentenced under the statute in effect at the time of the original sentencing. St. v. Suiste, 261 M 251, 862 P2d 399, 50 St. Rep. 1309 (1993).

Convicted Felon Designated Nondangerous Offender for Purposes of Parole Eligibility Not Automatically Entitled to Bail Pending Appeal: Prior to his conviction for deliberate homicide, Moore was allowed bail, and following conviction, he was designated a nondangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. After conviction, Moore was denied bail pending appeal. Moore petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of law pursuant to 46-18-404 (now repealed). The Supreme Court found that the criteria for admitting a defendant to bail pending appeal and the criteria for designating the defendant a nondangerous offender are not the same. Under 46-18-404(1)(b) (now repealed) the trial court is required to determine whether the defendant constitutes a "substantial danger to other persons or society", while under 46-9-107, the trial court may not allow bail pending appeal unless it finds that the defendant "is not likely to flee". The Supreme Court held that it could therefore be appropriate to designate a defendant such as Moore a nondangerous offender for the purposes of parole eligibility but also be appropriate to deny him bail pending appeal. Moore v. McCormick, 260 M 305, 858 P2d 1254, 50 St. Rep. 1054 (1993).

Dangerous Offender Designation Consistent With Defendant's Actions and Prior Record: Defendant asserted error in being designated a dangerous offender because the District Court miscounted his felony convictions. However, the court's misinterpretation of defendant's criminal record was not reversible error, and the dangerous offender designation was appropriate given defendant's five felony convictions and his obvious threat to society, evidenced by his longstanding serious drug problem and his current offenses, including a high-speed chase through downtown Billings while under the influence of drugs, which resulted in property damage and injuries to innocent persons. St. v. Willson, 250 M 241, 818 P2d 1199, 48 St. Rep. 907 (1991).

Designation as Dangerous Offender Not Error: It was not error to designate defendant as a dangerous offender after he was convicted of aggravated kidnapping, aggravated assault, felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and resisting arrest. Defendant had beaten his common-law wife over a period of at least 2 hours. St. v. Brady, 249 M 290, 816 P2d 413, 48 St. Rep. 667 (1991).

Nature of Crime Sufficient to Designate Person as Dangerous Offender — Reasons Required to Be in Findings: The defendant argued that the trial court erred in designating him a dangerous offender because he had never been convicted of a previous crime. The Supreme Court held that the vicious nature of the offense was sufficient to allow the trial court to designate the defendant a dangerous offender but remanded the case because the trial court is required to state in its findings the reasons for the designation. St. v. Belmarez, 248 M 378, 812 P2d 341, 48 St. Rep. 472 (1991), followed in St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514, 50 St. Rep. 270 (1993), and St. v. Evans, 272 M 58, 899 P2d 1073, 52 St. Rep. 593 (1995).

Designation as Extremely Dangerous Person — Limitation of Eligibility of Parole: In its reasons for sentence, the District Court characterized defendant as "shrewd, self-serving, deceitful, extremely dangerous, a high risk for escape and for future crimes". This designation was sufficient to take defendant out of the category of nondangerous offender and to warrant limiting his eligibility for parole for 25 years. St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Defendant Designated Dangerous Offender — No Felony Convictions in Previous Five Years: The defendant appealed his sentencing as a dangerous offender on the basis that his prior felony convictions were of a nonviolent nature and occurred more than 5 years prior to his conviction. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had not abused its discretion in characterizing the defendant as a dangerous offender due to the serious nature of the present crime that the defendant had committed. St. v. Mazurkiewicz, 245 M 172, 799 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 1962 (1990).

Dangerous Offender Designation With No Previous Convictions: The defender argued that the lower court had erred in designating him a dangerous offender for selling drugs when he had no previous convictions. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision on the basis that the lower court had found that the defendant had been involved in the operation for a long period of time on a large scale and therefore represented a substantial danger to society. St. v. Baldwin, 242 M 176, 789 P2d 1215, 47 St. Rep. 614 (1990).

Separate Crime Not Created by Dangerous Offender Provision — Due Process Considerations: Defendant argued that the restriction of parole eligibility under 46-18-404 (now repealed) was a distinct crime separate from the underlying offense or was an element of the underlying offense and as such the prosecution must charge dangerous offender status in the information or indictment and prove it beyond a reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the dangerous offender status does not create a separate crime or element of a crime but rather is part of a sentencing scheme that does not circumvent due process. While federal due process imposes some limits beyond which states may not go, application of the reasonable doubt standard has always depended on how state legislatures choose to define a crime. St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), followed in St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), and St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994). Byers was overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995). See also McMillan v. Pa., 477 US 79, 91 L Ed 2d 67, 106 S Ct 2411 (1986), and Patterson v. N.Y., 432 US 197, 53 L Ed 2d 281, 97 S Ct 2319 (1977).

Facts Supporting Dangerous Offender Status:

The sentencing court satisfied the articulation requirements of 46-18-404 (now repealed) when, among other factors, it considered: (1) the presentence report; (2) the defendant's prior criminal history; (3) the inability of defendant to live in the community for more than 3 years without being convicted of felony drug possession and felony assault (now assault with a weapon); and (4) the violence of the crimes and the danger to the victim. St. v. Hawkins, 239 M 404, 781 P2d 259, 46 St. Rep. 1786 (1989).

Designation as a dangerous offender was proper upon finding that defendant: (1) admitted daily use of "lots of cocaine" prior to arrest; (2) had intense anger for any kind of authority; (3) had a long history of misdemeanor arrests; (4) threatened to harm several witnesses or their families; and (5) committed a serious crime while still on parole. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988).

Sufficiency of Reasons When Set Out in First Portion of Judgment: Although the list of findings articulating defendant a dangerous offender was set out in the first portion of a sentence and the dangerous offender designation in the latter portion, it was all part of the same judgment and therefore sufficient to meet the articulated reasons requirement. St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989).

Consideration of Persistent Criminal Conduct in Designation as Dangerous Offender: The District Court properly exercised its discretion in designating defendant a dangerous offender after considering defendant's persistence in criminal conduct and the failure of earlier discipline to deter or reform him. St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989). See also St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Statutory Conditions Mandatory Before Nondangerous Designation Required: Both conditions outlined in 46-18-404 (1) (now repealed) must be met before a court is required to designate an offender as nondangerous: (1) lack of a felony conviction in the preceding 5 years; and (2) a finding that defendant does not present a substantial danger to society. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Lengthy Sentence for Nondangerous Offender: Defendant pleaded guilty to charges of felony aggravated burglary and felony attempted mitigated deliberate homicide pursuant to 45-6-204 and 45-4-103. He was designated a nondangerous offender but sentenced to 30 concurrent years. The sentence is proper as it is within the legal limits set forth in the applicable statutes. The court considered the required factors listed in this statute in setting sentence. St. v. Almanza, 229 M 383, 746 P2d 1089, 44 St. Rep. 2064 (1987), followed in St. v. Losson, 262 M 342, 865 P2d 255, 50 St. Rep. 1588 (1993).

Questionable Presentence Report — Substantial Support for Dangerous Offender Designation: Defendant contended he was improperly designated a dangerous offender due to hearsay and inaccuracies in the presentence report, but the trial court did not appear to rely on any particular offense or incident, emphasizing instead the brutality of the assault, subsequent witness tampering, and a general inability to conform to the law. Even without the questionable presentence report, there was substantial support for the designation. St. v. Bingman, 229 M 101, 745 P2d 342, 44 St. Rep. 1813 (1987).

Reasons for Finding Set Forth by Court: The trial court adequately articulated its reasons for finding defendant a dangerous offender when it stated it had reviewed the presentence report, found the crime committed was particularly vicious, determined that the victims did not provoke defendant, and found that defendant's history and the facts of the case indicate he represents a substantial danger to society. St. v. Bell, 225 M 83, 731 P2d 336, 44 St. Rep. 56 (1987).

Defendant on Bail Designated Dangerous — Use of Juvenile Offenses in Sentencing: It was not an abuse of discretion to designate as a dangerous offender a defendant who argued on appeal that releasing him on bail after conviction and prior to sentencing was an implicit finding that he was not dangerous to society and that juvenile convictions were considered. The judge properly considered matters arising between conviction and sentencing in determining the dangerous offender designation, and evidence of juvenile offenses is prohibited only when the defendant was less than 18 when the offense for which he is currently being sentenced was committed. Defendant was 19 at that time. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Right to Notice That State Will Seek Dangerous Offender Designation: Because 46-18-404 (now repealed) states the substantive criteria upon which a nondangerous offender designation must be based, no notice other than notice of the sentencing hearing is needed to comport with due process and it is not a denial of due process that the state is not required to give notice that it will seek application of a dangerous offender designation and to state the factual basis for the requested designation. The statutes governing sentencing provide ample notice of matters that may come up at the sentencing hearing. These statutes, along with notice of the hearing date, the full disclosure of presentencing information in open court, and defendant's ability to propound evidence, confront witnesses, and participate in the hearing, provide a full panoply of due process safeguards for defendant's liberty interest. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Term "Substantial Danger" Not Void for Vagueness: As used in 46-18-404 (now repealed) requiring a court to find that a convicted person is a substantial danger to other persons or society before the court may designate him a dangerous offender, the term "substantial danger" is not so loose and uncertain that a court's discretion in defining the term is unfettered. The term does not violate due process for vagueness. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

No Collateral Estoppel and Due Process Bars to Sentencing: Defendant argued that collateral estoppel and due process barred his status as both a persistent felony offender and dangerous offender because the designations served to sentence him twice for the same offense. The court found no merit to the argument. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985).

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Dangerous Offender Determination — Use of Defective Information: After defendant and his father kidnapped two minor girls and took them to the father's house, father told defendant to "go get the gun" and defendant did so and placed it between the two men on the couch where they were sitting. The girls were not threatened with the gun. The trial judge told defendant that "the reason you're designated a dangerous offender is that's about the fourth gun incident you were in". Review of the record on appeal showed: (1) a possible misapprehension of defendant's actual criminal background and apparent confusion as to the crimes involved; (2) no convincing evidence that this was defendant's fourth gun incident; and (3) an indication that one of the prior convictions considered by the judge was constitutionally defective because defendant did not have counsel. The sentencing court cannot rely upon a previous criminal record in sentencing if that record contains constitutionally infirm convictions. Defendant had a right to have his sentence based upon substantially correct information and was entitled to a rehearing on his designation as a dangerous offender. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

"Dangerous Offender" Designation — Findings Required — Mere Recitation of 46-18-404 (Now Repealed) Insufficient:

On appeal from his conviction for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, the defendant alleged error in his designation as a "dangerous offender" for purposes of parole because the designation was conclusory. In the McFadden case, the Supreme Court held that a court must articulate its reasons for the designation and that a mere recitation of the statutory language was insufficient. The reason articulated in this case was that the defendant represented a substantial danger to other persons in society in the opinion of the court. That was found to be a mere recitation of 46-18-404 (now repealed). Because the record of the case revealed substantial evidence which could have led the District Judge to designate the defendant "dangerous", the case was remanded for findings to support the conclusion. Without having the reasons articulated in the judgment, it could not be determined whether there was an abuse of discretion by the judge. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981), following In re McFadden, 185 M 220, 605 P2d 599, 37 St. Rep. 55 (1980).

Under 46-18-404 (now repealed), an individual may be designated a dangerous offender if, in the discretion of the sentencing court, he is determined to represent a substantial danger to other persons or society; however, more than a mere recital of the statutory language is required. The sentencing court must articulate its reasons underlying its determination. The record revealed that the District Court never found that petitioner represented a substantial danger to other persons or society but rather concluded that petitioner was not able to be rehabilitated because he had not been truthful with the court and designated him a dangerous offender on that basis. The designation was not supported by substantial credible evidence. In re McFadden, 185 M 220, 605 P2d 599, 37 St. Rep. 55 (1980).

Delay in Determination as Nondangerous: Delay of 5 months from conviction until defendant was declared "nondangerous" because the judge wanted a psychological evaluation of the defendant did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Nor was the time taken unreasonable, in that it was in the interest of justice to obtain more information about the offender. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Dangerous Offender Designation — Prior Guilty Plea — With Conviction After Current Conviction: Defendant was convicted of robbery and designated a dangerous offender. The felony burglary conviction upon which the defendant's dangerous offender designation was based was not a conviction for these purposes because the burglary conviction did not occur until some time after he was found to be a dangerous offender. The fact that the defendant had pleaded guilty to burglary prior to the time of his designation as a dangerous offender was of no consequence because 46-18-404 (now repealed) required a felony conviction within the 5 years preceding the commission of the offense for which the defendant was being sentenced. St. v. Fisher, 190 M 295, 620 P2d 1215, 37 St. Rep. 1988 (1980).

Designation of Convict as Nondangerous Offender When Court Fails to Designate as Dangerous: In appealing his conviction for robbery, the defendant claimed that the trial court erred in determining that it was required as a matter of law to designate the defendant as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. The Supreme Court agreed that the sentencing court was not statutorily required to designate him as a dangerous offender and thus could have designated him as nondangerous. The Supreme Court, in remanding for resentencing, specifically noted 46-18-404 (3) (now repealed), which covers the case when a trial court does not make a designation of dangerousness. To declare a defendant ineligible for parole eligibility, the sentencing court is statutorily required to designate him as dangerous for that purpose as a part of the sentence. When a court fails to do so, 46-18-404 (now repealed) declares that the defendant is to be designated as a nondangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. St. v. Dahl, 190 M 207, 620 P2d 361, 37 St. Rep. 1852 (1980), followed in St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989), and St. v. Lorenz, 267 M 186, 883 P2d 98, 51 St. Rep. 1027 (1994).

Parole Eligibility — Ex Post Facto Application: Defendant committed a crime in 1975 for which he was tried and convicted in 1979. In sentencing defendant, the trial court declared him a dangerous offender under 46-18-404 (now repealed), and declared him ineligible for parole under 46-18-202. Both of these statutes became effective July 1, 1977. Application of a law which eliminates or delays a defendant's parole eligibility after the criminal offense has been committed is ex post facto as applied to that defendant and is therefore unconstitutional. St. v. Beachman, 189 M 400, 616 P2d 337 (1980).

Jurisdiction to Designate Dangerous Offenders: At a previous hearing on the State's petition to revoke defendant's probation, the trial court not only revoked his probation but erroneously designated him as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility, which function is reserved to the sentencing court. Neither 46-18-404(1) (now repealed) nor 46-18-203 gave the District Court authority to determine at the revocation hearing that the defendant was a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. In fact, when the sentencing court placed defendant on probation and suspended the 10-year sentence, the effect was to determine that defendant did not represent a substantial danger to society. Smith v. St., 186 M 52, 606 P2d 153 (1980).

Designation Mandatory: Under former law, designation of an offender as nondangerous for purposes of parole eligibility was mandatory if either of the conditions of 46-18-404(1) (now repealed) were met. Grifaldo v. St., 182 M 287, 596 P2d 847 (1979).

2005 Amendment: Chapter 222 in (1) in second sentence near beginning after "section" deleted "in cases in which the defendant is charged with a misdemeanor offense", near middle after "to be" deleted "observed and", and after "present" inserted "and allowing the party speaking to be seen" and in third sentence at end inserted "and has informed the defendant that the defendant has the right to object to its use"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

1997 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 163 in (1) inserted second through fourth sentences regarding the acceptability of a judgment rendered through audio-video communications; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 26, 1997.

Chapter 378 at beginning of (3)(a) inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the more appropriate.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 163, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-12-211, 46-16-105, 46-17-203, 46-18-102, and 46-18-115] applies to guilty pleas entered and sentences pronounced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 1997.

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

1983 Amendment: Inserted (3)(b) requiring the judge to clearly state his reasons for the sentence.

Case Notes

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999).

Due Process Requirements of Written Statement for Revoking Deferred Sentence — Record of Factfinding and Basis of Review Adequate: The District Court revoked Baird's deferred sentence, but Baird asserted that his due process rights were violated because the court failed to advise him of the reasons for the revocation in a written statement as required in this section and Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 US 778 (1973). The Supreme Court found Baird's reliance of this section and Gagnon to be misplaced. Rather, the sentencing court's memorandum combined with the hearing transcript may provide the necessary written statement explaining the evidence relied on and the reason for the revocation decision. Due process is achieved when the oral and written record support accurate factfinding and appellate review. In Baird's case, when read as a whole, the oral and written records provided an adequate basis for review and were adequate to determine that the District Court's decision to revoke the sentence was based on permissible grounds supported by the evidence. Thus, Gagnon and its progeny were adequately addressed, and Baird's sentence revocation was affirmed. St. v. Baird, 2006 MT 266, 334 M 185, 145 P3d 995 (2006). See also Black v. Romano, 471 US 606 (1985), and St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786 (2000).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Extensive Statements of Sentencing Reasons Not Required: Flanagan contended that the District Court erred by giving inadequate reasons for imposing a 10-year suspended sentence for sexual assault. The Supreme Court disagreed. As established in St. v. Goulet, 277 M 308, 921 P2d 1245 (1996), extensive statements of sentencing reasons are not required. Here, the District Court stated that it suspended Flanagan's entire sentence because of mitigating circumstances, including Flanagan's age of 75 years, significant health problems, amenability to community treatment, and the fact that a 10-year supervision period could effectively extend for the remainder of Flanagan's natural life. This adequately satisfied the statutory requirements for a statement of sentencing reasons. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Suspended Sentence Properly Revoked — Remand for Entry of Findings to Support Resentence: The District Court revoked Anderson's suspended sentence and resentenced him to 10 years with 6 years suspended. Anderson appealed on grounds that his failure to comply with sentencing conditions requiring him to maintain employment and perform community service did not rise to a level to support revocation, and that the sentencing judge failed to clearly state the reasons for the sentence. The Supreme Court noted that a single violation of the terms of a suspended sentence is sufficient to support revocation of a suspended sentence. Anderson admitted that he had performed only 4 hours of the required 100 hours of community service since the original sentence was imposed, and had paid only $275 of a total of $1,805 due in restitution. Anderson also had a significant criminal history, was convicted of three additional felonies since beginning probation, and failed to comply with a number of terms and conditions of the suspended sentence. Thus, revocation of Anderson's suspended sentence was not an abuse of discretion. However, the sentencing court's stated reason for resentencing Anderson, namely that it was the state's recommendation, neither informed Anderson of the reasons underlying the sentence nor provided guidance for review. Therefore, the case was remanded for resentencing, and the entry of findings was to be sufficient to support the sentence. St. v. Anderson, 2002 MT 92, 309 M 352, 46 P3d 625 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204 (1992).

Question Whether Parole Denied for Failure to Satisfy Additional Treatment Conditions — Remand: Ringewold pleaded guilty to two counts of felony assault and was sentenced to a total of 14 years' commitment to the Department of Corrections. The next day, Ringewold was placed in the state hospital. The placement order allowed Ringewold to petition for a conditional release from the hospital, but did not specify any conditions. About 17 months later, Ringewold petitioned for release from the hospital. The state agreed that a hearing on the petition was proper, but argued that if it was found that Ringewold no longer suffered from a mental disease or defect that presented a risk to Ringewold or others, it was appropriate to remand Ringewold to the Department. The District Court ordered an independent mental evaluation, but it was never performed. Ringewold then filed another petition for release, but about the same time, the hospital staff determined that Ringewold would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment and transferred him to the state prison pursuant to 46-14-312. At the request of counsel, Ringewold was transferred back to the state hospital, with the state conceding that hospital placement was proper and that Ringewold should be allowed to petition for release pursuant to 46-14-312. About 4 months later, the Department Director sought an order transferring Ringewold back to the prison on grounds that Ringewold continued to suffer from a dangerous mental disorder but would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment for the disorder. At a conditional release hearing about 9 months later, the District Court orally resentenced Ringewold to 8 years in prison. The court specified that the total sentence not exceed more than the original sentence, but the court also conditioned Ringewold's parole on completion of an anger management course, moral reconation therapy, and chemical dependence treatment. In a written amended judgment about 1 month later, the District Court reimposed the original 14-year sentence and restated the parole conditions. Ringewold appealed. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence was legally effective and constituted final judgment. However, it was not possible to determine from the record whether the additional conditions added to the sentence improperly lengthened Ringewold's sentence, so the case was remanded for supplementation of the factual record to determine if Ringewold was being denied consideration for parole because of failure to satisfy the additional treatment conditions and, if so, to strike the conditions from the amended judgment, because under those circumstances, the practical effect of the conditions would be to lengthen the sentence in violation of 46-14-312. St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Failure to Credit Inmate With Time Served Before Sentencing in Written Judgment After Allowing Credit in Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: At the sentencing hearing, Horton inquired as to whether he would get credit for time served between arrest and sentencing. The judge responded that credit would be granted automatically. However, in the written judgment entered 2 days later, the judge denied credit for time served because Horton was being held on a probation violation. Under 46-18-403, Horton was entitled to credit for each day of incarceration prior to or after sentencing, and pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the court's oral pronouncement controlled over the written judgment. Thus, the Supreme Court directed that the provision in the written judgment denying Horton credit for time served be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to 46-23-1031. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Retroactive Applicability of Judicial Rule Regarding Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: Retroactivity is a threshold matter that compels the evenhanded application of a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions to all similarly situated cases that are pending on direct appeal or not yet final. Therefore, all defendants whose cases meet those criteria are entitled to the retroactive application of a new judicial rule of criminal procedure. This standard applies irrespective of whether the new judicial rule constitutes a clear break from existing precedent and without regard to whether the rule was available to the District Court at the time that it ruled. Thus in the present case, the rule in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), that oral pronouncement of sentence controls over the written sentence for purposes of finality applied retroactively to Waters' appeal, even though the District Court did not have the Lane rule at the time of sentencing. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), following St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), overruling St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), Peterson v. Mont. Bank of Bozeman, N.A., 212 M 37, 687 P2d 673 (1984), and their progeny, and followed in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). See also Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989).

Oral Pronouncement as Legally Effective Sentence — Correction of Error in Written Judgment by Nunc Pro Tunc Order — Due Process and Double Jeopardy Rights Not Violated: The oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence. The written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. In the event of a conflict between the oral and written sentence, the oral controls. The sentencing court may correct an error in a written judgment and commitment by a nunc pro tunc order, pursuant to 46-18-117 (now repealed), to accurately reflect what was orally pronounced at the sentencing hearing. Absent evidence of a tangible detriment or concrete injury to defendant, a clarifying nunc pro tunc order does not jeopardize a defendant's due process rights or constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), overruling St. v. Enfinger, 222 M 438, 722 P2d 1170 (1986), St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177 (1988), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058 (1992), and St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), to the extent that those cases held that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, was to be considered the final, valid order, and followed and applied retroactively in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). The Supreme Court amended former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to reflect the Lane decision in In re Amending Rule 5 of the Mont. Rules of Appellate Procedure, 55 St. Rep. 1267 (1998). The Lane rule was applied retroactively in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999). Lane was also followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). See also St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Court's Reference to Aryan Nations at Sentencing Held Not Denial of Freedom of Religion or Speech: Finney pleaded guilty to charges of burglary and theft and was sentenced to a total term of 50 years. In a written statement prepared for the presentence investigation, Finney made references to the Aryan Nations organization and also appeared at the sentencing hearing with the words "white power" tattooed across his forehead. Finney petitioned for postconviction relief, alleging that the District Court had violated his rights of freedom of religion and speech by considering his membership in the Aryan Nations for purposes of sentencing. The Supreme Court reviewed the federal court cases cited by Finney, noting that those cases also indicated that if there was an otherwise legitimate reason for references to constitutionally protected membership in similar organizations, it was not error for those references to be made during the course of the trial. The Supreme Court pointed out that Finney's sentence was within the range of sentences allowed for the crimes Finney had committed and that the references made in Finney's case were limited references to those organizations made because Finney brought up the subject himself by his words or actions, were made by the prosecutor in order to clarify Finney's past criminal behavior, or were limited to comments by the court on those words or actions. The Supreme Court held that for these reasons, the District Court did not deny Finney his constitutional rights and there was no plain error. St. v. Finney, 281 M 58, 931 P2d 1300, 54 St. Rep. 58 (1997).

Recommendation of Prosecutor and Probation Officer Adequate Statement of Sentencing Reason — No Improper Reliance on Pending Charge in Sentencing: The District Court's statements both orally and in its written sentence that Goulet's sentence was imposed at the recommendation of the prosecutor and the probation officer, plus the court's consideration of Goulet's prior record and long history of contact with the legal system, were sufficient statements of sentencing reasons to comply with St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980). Further, in the present case, nothing in the record indicated that the sentencing court improperly relied on a pending deliberate homicide charge against Goulet in sentencing him for escape. St. v. Goulet, 277 M 308, 921 P2d 1245, 53 St. Rep. 739 (1996), following St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248 (1986), St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759 (1988), and St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990).

Variance Between Oral and Written Sentence Held Harmless Error: Graveley was convicted of solicitation to commit deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court announced Graveley's sentence of 40 years in the custody of the Department of Corrections, with the first 10 years in a prison environment. The District Court's written judgment omitted the reference to the first 10 years. The Supreme Court held that a review of the oral record showed that the District Court intended the reference to 10 years to mean a minimum of 10 years and that because under the written judgment Graveley would be eligible for a supervised release program earlier than under the oral pronouncement, Graveley was not prejudiced by the written judgment. The Supreme Court held that absent a finding that a sentence is erroneous or illegal, the District Court could not alter its sentence. However, the difference in this case between the oral pronouncement and written judgment was harmless error. St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996).

Evidence Viewed in Light Most Favorable to Prosecution: The trial court found the defendant guilty despite expert testimony favoring the defendant. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that a conviction may not be overturned if the evidence presented, when viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, would permit a rational trier of fact to find the essential elements necessary to establish the offense. St. v. Holman, 241 M 238, 786 P2d 667, 47 St. Rep. 256 (1990).

Failure to Articulate Reasons for Sentence as Dangerous Offender — Harmless Error: Any failure to articulate the reasons for declaring defendant a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) in pronouncing sentence constituted harmless error when the reasons were apparent in the transcript of the sentencing hearing. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988).

Claim of Reliance on Incorrect Information in Sentencing — Sentencing Court Presumed Correct: Defendant contended the District Court wrongly assumed he had two prior probation violations and relied on this incorrect information in sentencing. Although a defendant has a right to a sentence based on substantially correct information, the Supreme Court will not strain at worst-case assumptions to find a mistake on review. Rather than finding two previous probation violations, the District Court correctly recognized defendant's two prior chances to avoid a more severe penalty. The sentencing court was presumed correct and judgment affirmed. St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759, 45 St. Rep. 833 (1988).

Effect of Judge's Belief That Defendant Was Guilty of Charge for Which Acquitted: The judge did not abuse his discretion when he said that defendant was morally if not equally legally responsible for the death of a person defendant's father killed but that he could not sentence defendant for that. The judge then gave defendant the maximum sentence for each of the crimes of which he was convicted. Defendant was not convicted of homicide, and the judge's statement showed that the judge did not base the sentences on the homicide charge. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Failure to Set Forth Detailed Findings Harmless Error: The two defendants pleaded guilty to deliberate homicide, and the sentencing court, after making limited findings, sentenced each defendant to 100 years in prison. When the reason for a sentence is apparent from the record, the failure of the sentencing court to set forth detailed findings or reasons for the sentence imposed does not result in prejudice to the defendant and thus is harmless error, as no substantial right of the defendant was denied. St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

No Proof Erroneous Information Considered by Sentencing Court: The defendants were sentenced to lengthy prison terms for deliberate homicide. They contend the sentencing judge considered information from a psychiatrist that is not directly reflected in the record, but the record does not support their contention. The comments concerning the doctor's report were made by defense counsel during oral presentation to the sentencing court. The defendants have failed to show that any information furnished by the psychiatrist was considered improperly by the court; thus they have failed to show any erroneous information was considered by the court in passing sentence. St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

Failure to State Reasons for Sentence — Challenge to Revocation of Suspended Sentence: After the defendant was given a suspended prison sentence and ordered to pay restitution, the State moved to revoke the suspension because the defendant failed to make restitution. The defendant opposed the motion to revoke by arguing that the original sentence was invalid because the sentencing court failed to state the reason for the sentence, in violation of the requirements established in St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298, 37 St. Rep. 673 (1980). [A 1983 amendment required the judge to state reasons for the sentence.] On appeal, the Supreme Court held: (1) that despite the failure of the sentencing court to state its reasons, the sentencing court imposed exactly the sentence requested by the defendant; (2) that the reason for the sentence was apparent from the record; (3) that no prejudice resulted from the court's failure to state its reasons; and (4) that no purpose would be served in vacating the sentence or denying the petition to revoke. St. v. Carson, 208 M 320, 677 P2d 587, 41 St. Rep. 369 (1984).

Imposition of Sentence Without Stated Basis for Decision — Earlier Decision Prospective Only: The District Court did not abuse its discretion by imposing a sentence and judgment [prior to the 1983 amendment of this section] without first articulating the basis for its decision. Although St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), does require a court to articulate the basis upon which its sentencing discretion is exercised, that case was decided after the appellant was sentenced and thus does not apply. St. v. Garrido, 190 M 525, 621 P2d 1105, 38 St. Rep. 78 (1981), followed in St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

Delay in Determination as Nondangerous: Delay of 5 months from conviction until defendant was declared "nondangerous" because the judge wanted a psychological evaluation of the defendant did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Nor was the time taken unreasonable, in that it was in the interest of justice to obtain more information about the offender. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Waiver of Postponement of Sentencing Date:

A defendant convicted in a Justice's Court of driving a vehicle on a highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor waived postponement of the sentencing date when there was a stipulation to the sentencing date. Wilson v. Brodie, 148 M 235, 419 P2d 306 (1966).

When a person accused in a Justice's Court of a misdemeanor is convicted and the Justice immediately proceeds, upon the return of the verdict, to pronounce sentence without any objection from the defendant, his silence is a waiver of his right to a postponement of judgment. Hosoda v. Neville, 45 M 310, 123 P 20 (1912).

Delay in Sentencing Due to Motions of Defendant: While ordinarily the trial court in a criminal case should pass judgment without delay other than that provided by statute, in the absence of a statute declaring that sentence must be pronounced at the same term of court at which the verdict of guilty was returned, when the verdict was returned on Nov. 18, 1938, and sentence was not pronounced until Jan. 19, 1939, the delay being caused by the defendant's motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial and the hearings thereof, the complaint may not be made that the court lost jurisdiction or that the judgment was not pronounced in the trial term. St. v. Heaston, 109 M 303, 97 P2d 330 (1939).

Source: Model Sentencing Act, section 12.

There are only about 10 states which allow the jury to fix sentence as well as the verdict. Montana is among the states allowing the jury to fix sentence. (See [sections] 94-7411 and 94-7415 [repealed]). The intention of the above section is to eliminate the possibility of the jury assessing punishment. The jury has none of the information concerning the defendant that could be made available to a judge by a presentence investigation and in addition the jury lacks the training and experience of a judge.

Case Notes

Parole Officer's Sentence Recommendation Not Violation of Prosecutor's Plea Agreement: The defendant argued that the parole officer's sentence recommendation in the presentencing report was a violation of his plea agreement with the prosecutor and that he should have been allowed to withdraw his guilty plea. The Supreme Court held that the sentencing recommendation was provided for by statute, was merely one factor that the trial judge could consider, and was not a breach of the prosecutor's agreement. St. v. Milinovich, 248 M 373, 812 P2d 338, 48 St. Rep. 470 (1991), followed in St. v. Yother, 253 M 128, 831 P2d 1347, 49 St. Rep. 387 (1992). Yother was followed in St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Judgment Containing Reasons for Sentence Sufficient — Oral and Written Reasoning Not Required: The rationale set out in St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), acknowledging a defendant's right to be informed of the reasons underlying punishment, does not impose a duty on a District Court to set forth its reasoning orally in open court and in writing. It was sufficient when the reasons underlying a sentence were clearly stated in the judgment. St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759, 45 St. Rep. 833 (1988). See also St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990).

Jury Not to Consider Sentence: District Court properly refused to give and avoided prejudicial error by refusing to give defendant's requested instruction that there is a mandatory 2-year sentence for each verdict of guilty of kidnapping which may not be suspended or deferred by the court. Sentencing is solely for the court, and the jury is not to consider possible punishment upon conviction. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Failure to Include Reasons for Sentence — Abuse of Discretion: Failure of trial court to specify the reasons behind the determination of the defendant's sentence is an abuse of discretion. It is not enough that the sentence be within the statutory maximum. The defendant is entitled to know why the sentencing judge chose the particular sentence involved. St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), cited in St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248, 43 St. Rep. 1010 (1986).

Case Notes

Negligent Homicide Considered Crime of Violence — Consideration of Sentencing Alternatives to Prison Not Required: English asserted that because negligent homicide is not a crime of violence, the trial court erred by failing to consider sentencing alternatives to prison pursuant to 46-18-101(3)(f) when sentencing English to 20 years in prison for negligent homicide. The Supreme Court found the argument unpersuasive. Under this section, a crime in which the offender causes serious bodily injury or death to a person other than the offender is defined as a violent crime. English negligently caused the death of another person, and the trial court did not err in ruling that the negligent homicide was a crime of violence or by failing to consider sentencing alternatives to prison. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Use of Weapon by Person in Group Robbery but No Evidence That Defendant Used Weapon — Sentence as Violent Offender Reversed: Ferguson was one of a group of persons that attempted a robbery. It was uncontested that someone in the group brandished a knife, but testimony was conflicting whether it was Ferguson. Nevertheless, the trial court enhanced Ferguson's sentence because he was part of a crime of violence when a knife was used. However, the mere finding that someone in the group used a knife did not rise to the level of a finding that Ferguson used a knife. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed that part of Ferguson's sentence and remanded for sentencing Ferguson as a nonviolent offender. St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

No Evidence That Corporal Punishment Caused Mental Health Condition of Victim — Violent Felony Offender Designation Reversed: The sentencing court determined that Mason's excessive use of force in punishing a child with a belt constituted a violent offense and caused the child to develop a serious mental health condition, so Mason was designated a violent felony offender. However, the state produced no evidence that Mason caused the child's mental health condition or that the belt was used in a manner capable of producing death. Because the belt was not a deadly weapon, Mason's conduct did not satisfy the definition of crime of violence in this section. The violent felony offender designation was reversed. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003).

Error in Refusing to Classify Defendant as First-Time, Nonviolent Offender Following Conviction for Criminal Endangerment: Hocevar was convicted of criminal endangerment, which required a finding that her conduct created a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury. The District Court refused Hocevar's request to be treated as a first-time, nonviolent felony offender because she committed a crime of violence. However, the definition of crime of violence in this section means a crime in which an offender causes a serious bodily injury or death. Given the various options that were available to the jury, it could not be determined on appeal whether the jury found that Hocevar actually caused a substantial risk of death or merely caused a risk of serious permanent disfigurement or protracted loss or impairment of the function or process of a bodily member or organ. In light of the uncertainty, the District Court committed reversible error in concluding that Hocevar committed an act of violence and in refusing to classify Hocevar as a first-time, nonviolent felony offender. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Misdemeanor Offender Not Entitled to Consideration of Mandatory Sentencing Requirement Applicable to Nonviolent Felony Offenders: Renee was sentenced to incarceration for three misdemeanor violations. On appeal, Renee contended that because the misdemeanors were nonviolent offenses, the District Court erred in not complying with 46-18-201 by considering alternatives to sentencing for Renee's nonviolent offenses. However, the plain language of subsection (3) of this section applies only to defendants who commit a particular kind of felony that is nonviolent. Therefore, a misdemeanor offender is not entitled to have a sentencing court consider the mandatory sentencing requirements of 46-18-201 and 46-18-225, which apply only to felony offenders. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999).

Nonviolent Felony Offenders Not Similarly Situated With Misdemeanor Offenders — No Equal Protection Violation in Different Felony and Misdemeanor Sentencing Schemes: Renee contended that Montana's nonviolent felony offender sentencing statutes violated his equal protection rights to physical liberty as a misdemeanor offender because both kinds of offenders may be subject to imprisonment, thus both felony and misdemeanor offenders are similarly situated classes dealt with unequally under the law. The Supreme Court disagreed. Relying on Tigner v. Tex., 310 US 141, 84 L Ed 1124, 60 S Ct 879 (1940), the court found that the constitution does not require that things that are different in fact or opinion be treated in law as though they were the same. Misdemeanor and felony offenders are not similarly situated because of differences in the quality and duration of punishment, as well as the long-term effects on an individual's liberty interest brought about by a felony conviction as compared to that for a misdemeanor conviction. Renee failed to make the necessary threshold showing that misdemeanor and nonviolent felony offenders are similarly situated, so the equal protection challenge failed. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999), distinguishing In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997).

Threat of Confinement to Extract Sexual Favors Held Crime of Violence: Anderson was convicted of various offenses involving sex with his stepdaughter. The District Court held in a sentencing proceeding that Anderson committed a "crime of violence". The District Court's holding was based upon testimony taken in a mental examination of Anderson that Anderson had threatened his stepdaughter with confinement to her room unless she had sex with him. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that Anderson's act of menacing his stepdaughter with confinement unless she had sex with him constituted a "crime of violence". St. v. Anderson, 282 M 41, 934 P2d 1037, 54 St. Rep. 232 (1997).

Violence and Use of Shotgun During Robbery Not Proved — Violent Offender Designation Not in Order: The state's assertions that defendant was charged with robbery and that the victim alleged in the presentence investigation that defendant used a shotgun did not make defendant a violent offender. Defendant pleaded guilty to a robbery charge, not including violence, and the victim's allegation was unproved. St. v. Pence, 273 M 223, 902 P2d 41, 52 St. Rep. 937 (1995).

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 268 inserted (1)(c) requiring that a mental evaluation become part of the presentence investigation report, which must be available as provided in 46-18-113; in (2) in first sentence after "presentence" inserted "investigation"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 17, 2009.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 268, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies to a defendant convicted on a verdict of guilty or a plea of guilty or nolo contendere on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 17, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 in (1) near middle of second sentence after "45-5-627" inserted "45-5-601(3), 45-5-602(3), or 45-5-603(2)(c) or if the defendant was convicted under 46-23-507 and the offender was convicted of failure to register as a sexual offender pursuant to Title 46, chapter 23, part 5"; in (3) at end of second sentence after "under" substituted "53-1-203(5)" for "53-1-203(4)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 517 inserted (3) relating to the payment of the fee by defendant. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 483 in (1) at end of fourth sentence after "acceptable to" substituted "the department of labor and industry" for "the professional and occupational licensing bureau of the department of commerce"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Chapter 493 in (1) in third sentence in three places substituted references to defendant for references to offender; in (2) near end of second sentence after "probation" inserted "and parole" and at end substituted last sentence regarding presentence investigation for former sentence that read: "The district court may, in its discretion, order a presentence investigation for a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 493, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who are under the custody or supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 1, 2001.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 189 in (1), in third sentence after "45-5-625", substituted "or 45-5-627" for "involving a victim who was less than 16 years of age when the offense was committed", after "include" inserted "a psychosexual", and after "considering" substituted "the risk the offender presents to the community" for "community safety", in fourth sentence, after

"completed by a", substituted "sex offender therapist who is a member of the Montana sex offender treatment association or has comparable credentials acceptable to the professional and occupational licensing bureau of the department of commerce" for "person who is determined to be qualified under guidelines established by the department of corrections", and inserted fifth sentence regarding availability of the evaluation; in (2) inserted first sentence concerning presentence report; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in (1), at end of third sentence, inserted "unless the defendant was sentenced under 46-18-219"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 in (1), in fourth sentence, substituted "department of corrections" for "department of corrections and human services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-111, enacted as sec. 12 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 262 at beginning of third sentence of (1) inserted "If the defendant was convicted of an offense under 45-5-502, 45-5-503, 45-5-504, 45-5-505, 45-5-507, or 45-5-625 against a victim who was less than 16 years of age when the offense was committed" and near beginning of sixth sentence, before "court", inserted "district" and near end substituted "supreme court administrator" for "department of commerce"; and near beginning of (2), before "court", inserted "district". Pursuant to sec. 2, Ch. 347, L. 1993, a coordination instruction: in (1) changed "against a victim" to "involving a victim" and changed "supreme court administrator" to "county or the state, or both"; and in (2), near beginning of first sentence before "court", deleted "district".

Chapter 347 in (1), in second sentence after "court", substituted "shall consider the presentence investigation report prior to sentencing" for "may, in its discretion, order a presentence investigation for a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor", at beginning of third sentence inserted "If the defendant was convicted of an offense under 45-5-502, 45-5-503, 45-5-504, 45-5-505, 45-5-507, or 45-5-625 involving a victim who was less than 16 years of age when the offense was committed" and at end, after "treatment", inserted "of the offender in the least restrictive environment, considering community safety and offender needs", at beginning of fourth sentence inserted "The evaluation must be completed" and after "person" inserted "who is determined to be", and near end of sixth sentence substituted "county or the state, or both" for "department of commerce"; and substituted (2) requiring a presentence investigation report prior to sentencing for certain offenses for former language that read: "If the court finds that the record contains information sufficient to enable the meaningful exercise of discretion during sentencing, the defendant may waive a presentence investigation and report. Both the finding and the defendant's waiver must be made in open court on the record." Amendment effective April 16, 1993.

Coordination: Section 2, Ch. 347, L. 1993, provided: "If Senate Bill No. 125 is passed and approved and if it amends 46-18-111 by:

(1) inserting in subsection (1) the words "against a victim", then the word "against" is changed to "involved";

(2) substituting in subsection (1) the words "supreme court administrator" for the words "department of commerce", then the words "supreme court administrator" are changed to "county or the state, or both,";

(3) inserting the word "district" before the word "court" near the beginning of the first sentence of subsection (2), then the word "district" is stricken."

Senate Bill No. 125 was passed and approved as Ch. 262, L. 1993, and amended 46-18-111 in the manner indicated. The Code Commissioner subsequently revised the Ch. 262 version as directed, with the following exception: in subsection (1), "against a victim" was changed, pursuant to the Code Commissioner's authority in sec. 84, Ch. 10, L. 1993, to "involving a victim" to accurately reflect the amendment in Ch. 347, L. 1993.

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 800 substituted present language concerning presentence investigation and allowing waiver of investigation for former text that read: "No defendant convicted of an offense under 45-5-502 through 45-5-505, 45-5-507, or 45-5-625 against a victim who was less than 16 years old when the offense was committed may be sentenced or otherwise disposed of before a written report of investigation by a probation officer is presented to and considered by the court. The investigation must include an evaluation of the defendant and a recommendation as to treatment by a person qualified by professional experience. No defendant convicted of any other offense that may result in commitment for 1 year or more in the state prison may be sentenced or otherwise disposed of before a written report of investigation by a probation officer is presented to and considered by the court unless the court deems such report unnecessary. The court may, in its discretion, order a presentence investigation for a defendant convicted of any lesser crime or offense".

Coordination Instruction — Amendment Void: Section 2, Ch. 192, L. 1991, provided: "If Senate Bill No. 51 is passed and approved and if it includes a section amending 46-18-111, then 46-18-111 is amended by the insertion of the following language at the end of subsection (1) of 46-18-111 and [section 1 of this act] [amending 46-18-111] is void:

"The investigation must include an evaluation of the defendant and a recommendation as to treatment by a person qualified under guidelines established by the department of institutions [now department of corrections]. All costs related to the evaluation must be paid by the defendant. If the defendant is determined by the court to be indigent, all costs related to the evaluation are the responsibility of the district court and must be paid by the department of commerce under Title 3, chapter 5, part 9."" Senate Bill No. 51 was approved May 23, 1991, as Ch. 800, L. 1991, and included an amendment to 46-18-111. Therefore, the amendment to 46-18-111 contained in sec. 1, Ch. 192, L. 1991, is void. Amendment contained in coordination instruction effective July 1, 1991.

1985 Amendment: In first sentence substituted "an offense under 45-5-502 through 45-5-505, 45-5-507, or 45-5-625 against a victim who was less than 16 years old when the offense was committed may" for "a crime which may result in commitment for 1 year or more in the state prison shall", inserted second and third sentences requiring written report by probation officer to include an evaluation and a treatment recommendation and requiring the court to consider the report if it is possible defendant could be sent to the State Prison for a year or more, and transferred "unless the court deems such report unnecessary" to end of third sentence from end of first sentence.

Administrative Rules

Title 20, chapter 7, subchapter 3, ARM Sex offender evaluation and treatment provider guidelines and qualifications.

Case Notes

Sentencing Court's Consideration of Defendant's Background Information, Including Self-Reported Incidents of Sexual Contact With Children — No Error: While in sexual offender treatment, Hill admitted sexual contact with 12 or 13 other children. The District Court subsequently considered the self-reported acts in a psychosexual evaluation, which Hill maintained was a violation of the right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court disagreed. In a classic penalty situation where an accused cannot elect to exercise the right to remain silent because of the possibility of substantial penalties if the person chooses not to speak, the state is prevented from using the compelled statements in later criminal proceedings. However, Hill was not in a classic penalty situation, but rather in a classic plea bargain situation. By consent decree, the state offered Hill treatment in exchange for an admission of misdemeanor assault and an agreement to undergo treatment. Hill was not faced with penalties by refusing to reveal prior sexual contacts, and the consent decree was never revoked even though Hill violated it. Absent a classic penalty situation, Hill's right against self-incrimination was not violated by the District Court's consideration of Hill's character, history, mental and physical condition, and background, including the self-reported acts in the psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P3d 307 (2009). See also St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

No Error in Ordering Second Psychosexual Evaluation in Incest Case to Provide Updated Information for Risk Assessment: Having been convicted of eight counts of incest, the state requested that an independent second psychosexual evaluation be performed on Hamilton based on changed circumstances and because Hamilton's chosen evaluator opined that Hamilton could be designated a tier 1 low risk to reoffend. The District Court agreed and ordered a second evaluation with an independent evaluator, but Hamilton declined to participate. Without interviewing Hamilton personally, the second evaluator recommended a tier 2 risk designation, which the sentencing court applied. Hamilton appealed on grounds that there were no legal grounds for the state to seek a second evaluation because the first evaluation met the statutory requirements. The Supreme Court held that this section does not, by its plain language, provide that only one evaluator may be involved or that only one psychosexual evaluation report may be issued. Because of concerns that Hamilton's first evaluation was not independently conducted and that some of the factors in the first risk assessment had changed, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by ordering a second updated evaluation based on accurate information. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007).

No Error in Requiring Completion of Sexual Offender Course as Condition of Suspended Sentence for Burglary Conviction When Sexual Action Taken During Burglary: Following Marshall's conviction for burglary, the sentencing court imposed a 6-year deferred sentence with a number of conditions, including a requirement that Marshall complete a sexual offender course. Marshall argued that the court lacked authority to require the course because burglary was not a sexual crime. Nevertheless, the sentencing court designated Marshall as a level 1 sexual offender and required completion of the course, so Marshall appealed. The Supreme Court held that the condition was reasonably related to the crime because there was a nexus between sex offender treatment and the circumstances of the burglary. The presentence report revealed that during the burglary, Marshall became aroused after going through a woman's underwear drawer, took some underwear from the drawer, and masturbated on the woman's bed. Because the underlying factual situation included sexual actions taken by Marshall during the burglary, the sentencing court was not precluded from imposing sexual offender treatment as a condition designed to rehabilitate Marshall and to protect society, even though Marshall was not convicted of a sexual crime. St. v. Marshall, 2007 MT 218, 339 M 50, 170 P3d 923 (2007).

No Sentencing Error Based on Investigator's Alleged Bias in Preparing Accurate Presentence Report: Bar-Jonah contended that the trial court erred by not granting a motion to strike a presentence investigation (PSI) report prepared by an investigator who Bar-Jonah contended was biased and presented an incomplete report by failing to contact Bar-Jonah's family when preparing the social history. The Supreme Court noted that family contact is not statutorily required or implied, but that the report must be based on substantially correct information (see St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120 (1989)). In this case, the trial court based its sentence on a PSI prepared by Bar-Jonah's probation officer, on psychological evaluations conducted by Bar-Jonah's own psychologists, and on a sexual offender report prepared by another doctor. These documents adequately substantiated the trial court's rationale that the documents were within the purview of substantially correct information. Additionally, Bar-Jonah was provided a copy of the report and the opportunity to rebut the information but failed to meet the burden of showing that the information was materially inaccurate or prejudicial to warrant overturning the sentence. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Community Risk by Sex Offender — Sentencing Court Consideration of Information in Presentence Report Unrelated to Crime Charged Not Erroneous: Legg pleaded not guilty to felony sexual assault of a 9-year-old girl. The initial mental examination revealed that Legg was severely depressed but competent to understand the charges and appreciate the consequences of possible incarceration. Legg's counsel then requested a psychosexual evaluation of Legg. The analyst categorized Legg as a low-level offender and suggested that community placement and outpatient sexual offender treatment would be appropriate. Legg then entered a plea bargain wherein the state agreed to recommend sentencing in accordance with the evaluations. Legg pleaded guilty, and the District Court ordered a presentence investigation (PSI). The investigator discovered information that Legg had not revealed previously, including the fact that Legg was permanently prohibited from contact with his ex-wife and children and that there were other secondary victims of Legg's sexual abuse. The analyst who performed Legg's psychosexual evaluation then reclassified Legg as a moderate risk offender and recommended confinement rather than community placement because the risk was too great to treat Legg as an outpatient. Legg filed a motion in limine to exclude any evidence from the PSI from persons other than the victim, her family, or her therapists. The motion was not ruled upon, so the challenged evidence was not excluded. The state recommended a 30-year sentence with 25 years suspended, and Legg consented to the recommendation. However, after hearing from the victim's family, doctor, and counselor and from the analyst, the court sentenced Legg to 50 years with none suspended. Legg appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Consideration of all materials in the PSI was required under this section, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in doing so. Further, the statements by the sentencing court that the 50-year sentence was both to punish Legg and to protect society from Legg in the future were a sufficient explanation of the reasons for the sentence, as required under 46-18-115. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

No Requirement That Sentencing Court Consider and Rule on Each Treatment Recommendation in Presentence Report: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred by failing to consider sentencing recommendations in a presentence investigation (PSI) report in the least restrictive environment, arguing that the court must review and analyze each PSI recommendation for sentence so that a defendant may receive treatment in the least restrictive environment. However, defendant provided no authority that a sentencing court must itemize each piece of evidence presented and either accept or reject it. In this case, the court did not explicitly state that it considered each PSI recommendation, but the court did question the analyst who prepared the report and considered the recommendations of the County Attorney and defense counsel before sentencing and thus adequately considered the PSI recommendations. Judgment was affirmed. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Defendant's Affirmation of Correctness of Information in Presentence Investigation Constituting Waiver of Due Process Challenge: McLeod challenged the legality of his dangerous drug sentence on due process grounds because the sentencing court relied on a presentence investigation (PSI) report that indicated that McLeod had five previous felony drug convictions instead of the actual four previous convictions. A convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation. Here, McLeod was given proper notice of the information in the PSI, availed himself of the opportunity to extensively review the information, was represented by counsel at the time that the PSI was made known to him and reviewed the information with counsel, and was given repeated opportunities to rebut the information but chose instead to affirm the accuracy of the PSI. Thus, pursuant to St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), McLeod was afforded the process due to a criminal defendant at sentencing. McLeod's affirmation of the correctness of the PSI constituted a waiver of a due process challenge, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

Failure to Object to Conduct of Psychological Evaluation or to Continuation of Sentencing Hearing — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Osterloth was convicted of felony sexual assault and was required to undergo a sexual offender evaluation by a therapist of his choice at county expense. His scheduled sentencing was continued to allow the evaluation. On appeal, Osterloth contended that the District Court erred by sentencing him without an evaluation prepared by a qualified therapist, pursuant to this section, and by continuing sentencing instead of conducting a sentencing hearing without delay, as required in 46-18-115. The Supreme Court noted that under 46-20-104, it is precluded from considering an alleged error unless a timely objection was made or the criteria of 46-20-701 are met. Osterloth did not object to the evaluation being conducted by his own evaluator or to the sentencing continuation, nor did he assert that he could satisfy any of the requirements of 46-20-701. Thus, Osterloth waived the right to have the Supreme Court consider these alleged errors on appeal. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

Reliance of Sentencing Judge on Other Conviction Valid at Time of Sentencing but Later Found Invalid — Inability of Defendant to Address Vacation of Prior Convictions as Due Process Violation: In 1983, Bauer was charged with and convicted of two felonies in Silver Bow County and sentenced to terms in the state prison. Bauer challenged the convictions. About 8 years later, Bauer was charged with felony intimidation in Powell County and was sentenced to an additional 5 years in prison. Following the 1991 prison riots, Bauer was moved to Blaine County, where he was later charged with three felonies arising out of an incident with a female inmate at the Blaine County jail. The presentence investigation report (PSI) referred to the Silver Bow County convictions, and the sentencing court expressly referred to the PSI in sentencing Bauer. The court held that if Bauer was successful in challenging the 1983 convictions, the sentences for the Blaine County offenses would run from the date of judgment and sentence and Bauer would be credited with any time served from the date of filing of the information to the date of imposition of the Blaine County sentences. Bauer's 1983 sentences were subsequently voided based on newly discovered DNA evidence that exonerated Bauer. Bauer then sought postconviction relief on grounds that his due process rights had been violated when the sentencing court in Blaine County relied on the now incorrect information in the PSI regarding the Silver Bow County convictions. Under both the federal and state constitutions, a defendant is protected from a sentence predicated on misinformation about that defendant's criminal history and must be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Bauer could not be said to have been given that opportunity because the 1983 convictions were still valid at the time of sentencing in Blaine County, nor did the sentencing court have a full opportunity to consider the procedural and substantive consequences of the actual vacation of the 1983 convictions or the specific grounds upon which postconviction relief was granted by the Silver Bow County court. What was correct information at the time of sentencing became misinformation after the fact. Notwithstanding that the sentencing court specifically stated that it did not rely on the 1983 convictions, the Supreme Court reversed on grounds of fundamental fairness, refusing to allow the misinformation to go unchallenged before the District Court by denying Bauer the opportunity to be resentenced on the basis of materially accurate information. The case was remanded for resentencing before a new District Court Judge. Bauer v. St., 1999 MT 185, 295 M 306, 983 P2d 955, 56 St. Rep. 715 (1999), following St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), and Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Denial by Defendant of Sexual Crimes — Sentence Proper Absent Sex Offender Evaluation: Prior to sentencing McQuiston for convictions of incest and sexual intercourse without consent, the District Court ordered a presentence investigation report and ordered McQuiston to undergo a sex offender evaluation. No sex offender evaluation had been prepared at the time of sentencing, and McQuiston alleged error in imposing a sentence without the completed evaluation. Even though the evaluation was not mandatory because the victim was 19 years old when the offenses were committed, the record was clear that McQuiston denied the crimes and that sex offender treatment would be ineffective. Therefore, the court did not abuse its discretion in sentencing McQuiston without considering a sex offender evaluation. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Sentencing Without Consideration of Presentence Report — Reversible Error: The District Court's refusal to continue sentencing in order to allow inclusion in the presentencing investigation of a sex offender evaluation that had not been completed prior to the sentencing hearing, as required by this section, constituted reversible error warranting remand for resentencing in order that the report be considered. St. v. Alexander, 265 M 192, 875 P2d 345, 51 St. Rep. 474 (1994), followed in St. v. Barnhart, 283 M 518, 942 P2d 718, 54 St. Rep. 772 (1997).

Order and Waiver of Presentence Investigation Report: Absent certain circumstances, this section places an affirmative duty on the District Court to order a presentence investigation report in felony cases. A defendant is not under any obligation to request the report. The circumstances under which the court may decline to order the report require a finding by the court and a waiver by the defendant. Absent a finding and waiver, ordering the report as required by statute did not constitute error. The report must be official, be prepared by a probation officer, and contain the information mandated by 46-18-112. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

No Requirement for Consideration of Prior Convictions: When defendant was sentenced for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) conviction and for sexual assault and incest conviction at the same sentencing hearing, the District Court was not required to wait until the convictions for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) were affirmed on appeal before considering them for the purpose of sentencing defendant for the sexual assault and incest convictions. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Consideration of Polygraph Test in Mental Health Evaluations — No Error in Sentencing: Defendant presented the sentencing court with three evaluations that were conducted at his request and submitted by him in support of his recommendation for sentencing. On appeal, he complained that the court improperly considered the report of a lie detector test referred to in two of the evaluations. The judge was not required to consider the evaluations, but under the relaxed standards of evidence in a sentencing situation, he was free to do so. Polygraph information is inadmissible as evidence at trial; however, the Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing hearings. Defendant invited consideration of the evaluations and could not complain on appeal that it was in the record. Therefore, the court did not err in considering the evidence of the polygraph test at sentencing. St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989).

Information Additional to That in Presentence Report Presented at Sentencing Hearing — No Due Process Violation: The presentence investigation report submitted to the District Court showed that defendant had had his parole on another conviction revoked for carrying a concealed weapon. At the sentencing hearing the court, over defendant's objection, received into evidence a written report and additional testimony by defendant's former parole officer about the reasons that parole was revoked. Defendant's due process rights were not violated by this procedure. He was represented by a lawyer at the sentencing hearing, had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness regarding the new material, had the opportunity to rebut the new material, and could have called for a continuance in order to call his own rebuttal witnesses. St. v. Elliott, 221 M 174, 717 P2d 572, 43 St. Rep. 723 (1986).

Habitual Traffic Offender — Presentence Investigation Proper: The sentencing judge did not err in ordering a presentence investigation of a defendant convicted of operating a motor vehicle while designated a habitual traffic offender. The judge, in his discretion, may order a presentence investigation when the potential penalty is less than 1 year in prison. (See 2001 amendment.) St. v. Grant, 217 M 357, 704 P2d 1064, 42 St. Rep. 1248 (1985).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

No Error in Trial Court's Failure to Order Presentence Investigation Report: The two defendants, both 19 years of age, pleaded guilty to deliberate homicide. Without a presentence report, the District Court sentenced each defendant to 100 years in prison. When, as in this case, the sentencing court is fully apprised of the defendants' backgrounds and any mitigating factors, it is not error for the court to sentence the defendants without ordering a presentence investigation. The statute gives the trial court discretion to conclude that a report is unnecessary. In the present case, counsel for the defendants were asked if there was any reason for postponing sentencing and they stated there was no reason, which suggests a waiver by counsel of any presentence report. St. v. Hintz, 213 M 364, 691 P2d 814, 41 St. Rep. 2172 (1984).

Judge's Off-Record Meeting With Probation Officer — Defense and Defendant Absent — No Due Process Violation — Inaccuracy in Sentence Report or Prejudice Not Shown: The rule in St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), that an off-the-record private meeting between the sentencing judge and the probation officer without the presence of defendant or his counsel violates due process is to be applied prospectively only, unless, with respect to a sentence rendered prior to the date of the decision in Redding, appellant alleges and shows inaccuracies in the presentence report or prejudice arising from its use by the judge. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Presentence Report Recommendation Not Binding on Judge: A presentence report recommended that a convicted robber receive a sentence of 15 years. The trial judge imposed a sentence of 30 years, detailing the reasons for the sentence. The sentence was proper since there is no requirement that the sentencing judge adopt the recommendation of a presentence report or that he state reasons for any discrepancy between the recommended sentence and the one actually imposed. He need only state the reasons why the sentence is imposed. St. v. Stephens, 198 M 140, 645 P2d 387, 39 St. Rep. 822 (1982), followed in St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989), McPherson was cited in St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945, 52 St. Rep. 1204 (1995).

Due Process — Sentencing Without Newly Prepared Report: The sentencing of the defendant without a presentence investigation when the court was familiar with the defendant and his crimes and had before it, among other things, a presentence report prepared in another trial of the defendant and a letter written by a victim in the case to another judge in another matter did not constitute a denial of due process when the defendant had seen a copy of the presentence report and had been furnished with a copy of the letter and had the opportunity to mitigate their effect, if any, but did not. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Persistent Felony Offender: Although the State proved the defendant's status as a persistent felony offender by means of a prior felony conviction pending appeal, the need for a presentence investigation report was not thereby eliminated. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

Private Interviews by Sentencing Judge: A sentencing judge may not conduct his own presentence investigation by privately interviewing persons he believes to know more than they told at trial. By doing this, he becomes a fact gatherer as well as a fact finder, and thereby subjects a defendant to an impossible burden. St. v. Stewart, 175 M 286, 573 P2d 1138 (1977), followed in St. v. Baker, 205 M 244, 667 P2d 416, 40 St. Rep. 1244 (1983).

Improper Matter Considered in Sentencing: A court cannot rely upon a prior felony conviction in sentencing if the defendant was not represented by counsel. When improper matters are brought before the sentencing court and are not disclosed and explained at the sentencing hearing, a defendant has a right to be resentenced. Ryan v. Crist, 172 M 411, 563 P2d 1145 (1977).

Reading Juvenile Record Into Record: The trial court did not err in considering and reading into the record in open court prior events of an 18-year-old defendant's life as disclosed by his juvenile record under a former statute directing the judge to have a written report by the probation officer or parole officer and to consider the same before sentencing a defendant, since the defendant did not object to the reading into the record and since after reading into the record the judge asked "Is there any legal excuse why judgment and sentence of court should not be pronounced against you?" St. v. Manning, 149 M 517, 429 P2d 625 (1967).

Unsigned, Privately Submitted Report of Investigator: When the trial judge requested a presentence investigation, unsworn representations and recommendations set forth in the investigator's unsigned report privately offered to and privately received and adopted by the trial judge were not evidence. Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

Case Notes

No Error in Denial of Motion to Continue Sentencing Hearing for Further Review and Challenge of Accuracy of Presentence Investigation Report: Morrison was convicted of felony partner or family member assault, a sixth offense, misdemeanor criminal mischief, and misdemeanor disorderly conduct. A charge of felony aggravated burglary was dismissed. Two days before sentencing, Morrison received the presentence investigation report. The following day, concerned that the report recited facts relevant to the dismissed felony aggravated burglary charge, Morrison moved for a continuance of the sentencing hearing in order to investigate and contest those provisions of the report. At sentencing, the District Court entertained Morrison's arguments concerning the accuracy of the "circumstances of the offense" section of the report and decided to strike that section, stating that the court would not rely on that information for sentencing. The motion for continuance was denied. The court also offered to allow Morrison to question the author of the report regarding the accuracy of the section of the report detailing Morrison's criminal history, but Morrison declined the offer and elected to proceed with sentencing. Following sentencing, Morrison appealed on grounds that the District Court erred by denying the motion for continuance. The Supreme Court disagreed. By striking the questioned section of the report, the sentencing court removed any reference to disputed information in the report, and by declining the chance to question the accuracy of the report, Morrison waived any objection to proceeding to sentencing. The District Court did not abuse its discretion by denying the continuance motion, and Morrison's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Morrison, 2009 MT 397, 353 M 407, 220 P3d 659 (2009).

Sentencing Court's Consideration of Defendant's Background Information, Including Self-Reported Incidents of Sexual Contact With Children — No Error: While in sexual offender treatment, Hill admitted sexual contact with 12 or 13 other children. The District Court subsequently considered the self-reported acts in a psychosexual evaluation, which Hill maintained was a violation of the right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court disagreed. In a classic penalty situation where an accused cannot elect to exercise the right to remain silent because of the possibility of substantial penalties if the person chooses not to speak, the state is prevented from using the compelled statements in later criminal proceedings. However, Hill was not in a classic penalty situation, but rather in a classic plea bargain situation. By consent decree, the state offered Hill treatment in exchange for an admission of misdemeanor assault and an agreement to undergo treatment. Hill was not faced with penalties by refusing to reveal prior sexual contacts, and the consent decree was never revoked even though Hill violated it. Absent a classic penalty situation, Hill's right against self-incrimination was not violated by the District Court's consideration of Hill's character, history, mental and physical condition, and background, including the self-reported acts in the psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P3d 307 (2009). See also St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Sufficient Accurate Information to Support Sentence for Distribution of Methamphetamine: Harper was sentenced to 20 years in prison with 10 years suspended and fined $12,000 after pleading guilty to possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute. Harper appealed on grounds that the sentencing court based the sentence on inaccurate and insufficient evidence that Harper was the center of the drug operation. Harper had a right to be sentenced based on correct evidence, but also had the affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that the alleged misinformation was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report. In this case, the sentencing court did nothing more than consider relevant information relating to the nature and circumstances of the possession of drugs found during the search of Harper's home, including unrefuted information that Harper was at the center of a methamphetamine distribution business conducted from the home. Information in the presentence investigation report simply underscored Harper's involvement in drug distribution and supported that charge to which Harper pleaded guilty. The information was properly before the sentencing court, and the court did not err in imposing a sentence within the statutory parameters. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Harper, 2006 MT 259, 334 M 138, 144 P3d 826 (2006), followed in St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007), with respect to defendant's affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that alleged misinformation in a presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report.

No Sentencing Error Based on Investigator's Alleged Bias in Preparing Accurate Presentence Report: Bar-Jonah contended that the trial court erred by not granting a motion to strike a presentence investigation (PSI) report prepared by an investigator who Bar-Jonah contended was biased and presented an incomplete report by failing to contact Bar-Jonah's family when preparing the social history. The Supreme Court noted that family contact is not statutorily required or implied, but that the report must be based on substantially correct information (see St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120 (1989)). In this case, the trial court based its sentence on a PSI prepared by Bar-Jonah's probation officer, on psychological evaluations conducted by Bar-Jonah's own psychologists, and on a sexual offender report prepared by another doctor. These documents adequately substantiated the trial court's rationale that the documents were within the purview of substantially correct information. Additionally, Bar-Jonah was provided a copy of the report and the opportunity to rebut the information but failed to meet the burden of showing that the information was materially inaccurate or prejudicial to warrant overturning the sentence. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Community Risk by Sex Offender — Sentencing Court Consideration of Information in Presentence Report Unrelated to Crime Charged Not Erroneous: Legg pleaded not guilty to felony sexual assault of a 9-year-old girl. The initial mental examination revealed that Legg was severely depressed but competent to understand the charges and appreciate the consequences of possible incarceration. Legg's counsel then requested a psychosexual evaluation of Legg. The analyst categorized Legg as a low-level offender and suggested that community placement and outpatient sexual offender treatment would be appropriate. Legg then entered a plea bargain wherein the state agreed to recommend sentencing in accordance with the evaluations. Legg pleaded guilty, and the District Court ordered a presentence investigation (PSI). The investigator discovered information that Legg had not revealed previously, including the fact that Legg was permanently prohibited from contact with his ex-wife and children and that there were other secondary victims of Legg's sexual abuse. The analyst who performed Legg's psychosexual evaluation then reclassified Legg as a moderate risk offender and recommended confinement rather than community placement because the risk was too great to treat Legg as an outpatient. Legg filed a motion in limine to exclude any evidence from the PSI from persons other than the victim, her family, or her therapists. The motion was not ruled upon, so the challenged evidence was not excluded. The state recommended a 30-year sentence with 25 years suspended, and Legg consented to the recommendation. However, after hearing from the victim's family, doctor, and counselor and from the analyst, the court sentenced Legg to 50 years with none suspended. Legg appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Consideration of all materials in the PSI was required under 46-18-111, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in doing so. Further, the statements by the sentencing court that the 50-year sentence was both to punish Legg and to protect society from Legg in the future were a sufficient explanation of the reasons for the sentence, as required under 46-18-115. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Consideration at Sentencing of Alleged Crimes Dismissed by Plea Bargain Not Violative of Due Process: At sentencing, the District Court considered allegations of other crimes for which Mason had been initially charged but that had been dismissed by plea agreement. Mason contended that consideration of statements related to unproved conduct violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court noted that due process protects a defendant from being sentenced based on misinformation and requires that a defendant be given an opportunity to rebut any information that may lead to deprivation of life, liberty, or property, but does not protect against all misinformation unless the sentence is premised on materially false misinformation. The court also noted that St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376 (1996), allows a sentencing court to consider any evidence that has probative force, including other acts that have been dismissed by plea agreement, as in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981). Nothing in Mason's plea agreement prevented the state from presenting the facts of the case during the sentencing hearing, and in fact, that inquiry is required as part of the presentence investigation report under this section. Mason failed to show that the sentencing court relied on misinformation and thus was not entitled to resentencing on due process grounds. Further, the plea agreement required relinquishment of Mason's parental rights, so the sentencing court properly considered evidence of the danger Mason posed to the other children in order to approve that portion of the agreement. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), and St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Defendant's Affirmation of Correctness of Information in Presentence Investigation Constituting Waiver of Due Process Challenge: McLeod challenged the legality of his dangerous drug sentence on due process grounds because the sentencing court relied on a presentence investigation (PSI) report that indicated that McLeod had five previous felony drug convictions instead of the actual four previous convictions. A convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation. Here, McLeod was given proper notice of the information in the PSI, availed himself of the opportunity to extensively review the information, was represented by counsel at the time that the PSI was made known to him and reviewed the information with counsel, and was given repeated opportunities to rebut the information but chose instead to affirm the accuracy of the PSI. Thus, pursuant to St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), McLeod was afforded the process due to a criminal defendant at sentencing. McLeod's affirmation of the correctness of the PSI constituted a waiver of a due process challenge, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

No Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Parents of Sexual Assault Victim Not Parties to Plea Agreement: Following a guilty plea and conviction of sexual assault, Knox moved to withdraw the guilty plea, arguing that the County Attorney violated the terms of a plea agreement, which had recommended a 30-year suspended sentence and dropping a second sexual assault charge in exchange for the guilty plea, and indicated that the parents of the 5-year-old victim would not recommend incarceration in the victim impact statement of the presentence investigation. During the colloquy required by 46-12-210, the District Court informed Knox that, like the court itself, the parents were not bound by the plea agreement and could change their minds at any time as far as recommending future imprisonment, adding that if the parents did change their minds, that fact would not suffice as grounds for withdrawal of a guilty plea. Nevertheless, Knox voluntarily accepted the possible consequences of the plea and pleaded guilty. The parents then recommended imprisonment, and Knox was sentenced to 40 years with 18 suspended. A District Court may permit the withdrawal of a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, but the determination of good cause is discretionary, and each case is considered on its merits. Here, the District Court subsequently denied the withdrawal motion pursuant to the colloquy, and Knox appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. After applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), the Supreme Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion to withdraw and that Knox's guilty plea thus met the constitutional standard of a voluntary, intelligent, and knowing choice among options. The District Court acted according to statutory requirements when it made clear that the parents could make known their opinion and change their minds regarding Knox's incarceration because they were not parties to the plea agreement, pursuant to the court's duties in 46-18-115. Further, other evidence in a psychological evaluation indicated that Knox had violent tendencies that presented complications to successful treatment, had high-risk factors for violent recidivism, and had resisted treatment for chemical dependency in the past, so the parents' incarceration request was not a determinative basis for the sentence. St. v. Knox, 2001 MT 232, 307 M 1, 36 P3d 383 (2001).

Use of Presentence Investigation Report at Resentencing Hearing — No Due Process Violation: At a resentencing hearing, the petitioner objected to the evaluation and recommendation contained in the presentence investigation report in that it was not based upon the factual information provided to the probation officer, was biased in favor of the state, and was based on hearsay in uninvestigated reports and in that his criminal history data was not verified. On appeal, the petitioner claimed prejudice by a biased probation officer who wrote the report. The Supreme Court held that when the petitioner was provided with the report prior to the sentencing hearing, the petitioner was provided with the opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut the information, and the petitioner's counsel extensively cross-examined the author of the report, the petitioner could not establish that the court relied on any misinformation in sentencing. The petitioner was not entitled to resentencing on due process grounds. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Due Process Violation in Failing to Afford Defendant Opportunity at Sentencing to Rebut Information Not in Presentence Investigation Report: In sentencing Hocevar for criminal endangerment of one child, the District Court denied Hocevar's due process rights by finding by a preponderance of the evidence that Hocevar smothered two other children without affording Hocevar the opportunity procedurally to challenge the accuracy of the information, which was not contained in the presentence investigation report. As determined in St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), a sentencing judge may rely on facts outside the presentence report if, in order to avoid misinformation in sentencing, the defendant is given an opportunity to explain or rebut the information at the presentence hearing. The Supreme Court remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Reliance of Sentencing Judge on Other Conviction Valid at Time of Sentencing but Later Found Invalid — Inability of Defendant to Address Vacation of Prior Convictions as Due Process Violation: In 1983, Bauer was charged with and convicted of two felonies in Silver Bow County and sentenced to terms in the state prison. Bauer challenged the convictions. About 8 years later, Bauer was charged with felony intimidation in Powell County and was sentenced to an additional 5 years in prison. Following the 1991 prison riots, Bauer was moved to Blaine County, where he was later charged with three felonies arising out of an incident with a female inmate at the Blaine County jail. The presentence investigation report (PSI) referred to the Silver Bow County convictions, and the sentencing court expressly referred to the PSI in sentencing Bauer. The court held that if Bauer was successful in challenging the 1983 convictions, the sentences for the Blaine County offenses would run from the date of judgment and sentence and Bauer would be credited with any time served from the date of filing of the information to the date of imposition of the Blaine County sentences. Bauer's 1983 sentences were subsequently voided based on newly discovered DNA evidence that exonerated Bauer. Bauer then sought postconviction relief on grounds that his due process rights had been violated when the sentencing court in Blaine County relied on the now incorrect information in the PSI regarding the Silver Bow County convictions. Under both the federal and state constitutions, a defendant is protected from a sentence predicated on misinformation about that defendant's criminal history and must be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Bauer could not be said to have been given that opportunity because the 1983 convictions were still valid at the time of sentencing in Blaine County, nor did the sentencing court have a full opportunity to consider the procedural and substantive consequences of the actual vacation of the 1983 convictions or the specific grounds upon which postconviction relief was granted by the Silver Bow County court. What was correct information at the time of sentencing became misinformation after the fact. Notwithstanding that the sentencing court specifically stated that it did not rely on the 1983 convictions, the Supreme Court reversed on grounds of fundamental fairness, refusing to allow the misinformation to go unchallenged before the District Court by denying Bauer the opportunity to be resentenced on the basis of materially accurate information. The case was remanded for resentencing before a new District Court Judge. Bauer v. St., 1999 MT 185, 295 M 306, 983 P2d 955, 56 St. Rep. 715 (1999), following St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), and Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Applicability of "Catchall" Mitigating Circumstance to Postoffense Conduct: The enormously broad "catchall" mitigating circumstance in 46-18-304(8) reflects the Legislature's intent to permit a defendant to raise any and all facts and evidence that might mitigate against the death penalty, including evidence of conduct during incarceration subsequent to the offense. Evidence may include any evidence required in a presentence investigation under this section relative to a defendant's characteristics, circumstances, needs, and potentialities. In this case, the sentencing court erred by failing to order a presentence investigation and report that included consideration of defendant's admission of guilt, contrition, commitment to rehabilitation, and conduct while incarcerated, which were all relevant as mitigating evidence. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II), following Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586, 57 L Ed 2d 973, 98 S Ct 2954 (1978), Skipper v. S.C., 476 US 1, 90 L Ed 2d 1, 106 S Ct 1669 (1986), and Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Claim That Sentencing Based on Inaccuracies Unfounded — No Due Process Violation: Bishop claimed that his due process rights were violated in sentencing him for robbery, burglary, and use of a weapon because his sentencing was based on a presentence report that contained various inaccuracies. Under U.S. v. Wilson, 900 F2d 1350 (9th Cir. 1990), a court may not rely on materially false information when sentencing a defendant. On review, it was found that the alleged inaccuracies were primarily a matter of Bishop's interpretation of the facts rather than a material falsity. In light of the sentencing court's reliance on Bishop's criminal history in reviewing the presentence report, a 25-year sentence for robbery, a 10-year sentence for burglary, and a 5-year sentence for use of a weapon were affirmed. Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Parole Officer's Sentence Recommendation Not Violation of Prosecutor's Plea Agreement: The defendant argued that the parole officer's sentence recommendation in the presentencing report was a violation of his plea agreement with the prosecutor and that he should have been allowed to withdraw his guilty plea. The Supreme Court held that the sentencing recommendation was provided for by statute, was merely one factor that the trial judge could consider, and was not a breach of the prosecutor's agreement. St. v. Milinovich, 248 M 373, 812 P2d 338, 48 St. Rep. 470 (1991), followed in St. v. Yother, 253 M 128, 831 P2d 1347, 49 St. Rep. 387 (1992). Yother was followed in St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Reference to Victim Impact Information by Sentencing Judge Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Defendant claimed the death sentence was improper because the sentencing judge referred to the victim impact information contained in the presentence investigation report. Defendant cited the holding in Booth v. Maryland, 482 US 496, 96 L Ed 2d 440, 107 S Ct 2529 (1987), that it was a violation of the eighth amendment of the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.) for a sentencing jury to refer to information in a victim impact statement during the sentencing stage of a capital murder trial. The Montana Supreme Court held that Booth was factually distinguishable from Montana sentencing procedures, noting that a judge rather than a jury performs sentencing under Montana law. Furthermore, the judge may be allowed to hear and rule on the admissibility of evidence that the jury is not allowed to hear, yet he is still responsible for sentencing. Absent evidence that the judge was adversely affected by victim impact information, there was no constitutional violation. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988), followed in St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), and Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Court's Discretion to Disallow Second Evaluation: A defendant upset with an extremely negative presentence psychological evaluation requested a continuance so that he could obtain a second evaluation at his own expense. It was within the court's discretion to deny the request. St. v. Bradford, 228 M 438, 743 P2d 103, 44 St. Rep. 1661 (1987).

Hearsay and Probation Officer's Recommendation: Defendant's contention that hearsay tainted the presentence report was without merit. Section 46-18-112 authorizes a complete investigation into the background of the defendant and does not limit hearsay. The District Court's reliance upon the recommendation of the probation officer was not error. Section 46-18-302 authorizes the sentencing judge to consider the widest possible scope of inquiry when determining the sentence to be imposed. The court followed the position established in St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985), regarding the sentencing judge's discretion to use the presentence report and sentencing recommendations. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985).

Dismissed and Juvenile Charges Properly Included in Presentence Investigation Report: Where the defendant to a hit-and-run charge alleged he was prejudiced by the inclusion in a presentence investigation report of criminal charges made against him that were later dismissed and charges that were made while the defendant was a juvenile, the District Court did not err in considering both such charges. Under the rationale of St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222, 38 St. Rep. 882 (1981), the dismissed charges were properly included and considered, as were the juvenile charges under the rationale in St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318, 36 St. Rep. 2345 (1979). St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20, 40 St. Rep. 1786 (1983).

Consideration of Prior Charge of Aggravated Assault: The sentencing court here relied neither on an erroneous criminal record nor on erroneous information. The trial court was not required to shut its eyes to the facts underlying a prior charge of aggravated assault of which defendant was acquitted. It relied only on information volunteered by the defendant, and if the defendant believed that the presentence report distorted any of the information he had furnished, he was under an affirmative burden to refute, correct, or deny the facts related in the report. St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222, 38 St. Rep. 882 (1981), followed in St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005).

Burden on Defendant to Show Report Inaccurate: When matters contained in a presentence report are contested by the defendant, he has an affirmative duty to present evidence showing the inaccuracies contained in the report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979), followed in St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945, 52 St. Rep. 1204 (1995).

Report Not Prejudicial: The entire report is consistent with the purposes and rationale for requiring a presentence investigation. The report was properly used by the sentencing judge, provided him with a fair, objective review of appellant's history, and provides no basis to remand for a further resentencing hearing. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Arrest Record Not a Presentence Investigation: A letter, which was an arrest record of the defendant while under the supervision of the probation and parole office, was held not to be in the proper form for a presentence investigation. Murphy v. St., 181 M 157, 592 P2d 935 (1979).

46-18-113. Availability of presentence investigation report.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: The Commission felt that the defendant, as well as the prosecution, should have an absolute right to receive and review a copy of the presentence investigation report. This was made discretionary with the court under 1987 MCA 46-18-113. The Commission believed that it was unfair and, in fact, potentially a denial of constitutional due process to deny the defendant the sources of information contained in the presentence investigation report, including the identity of persons who provided such information.

Source: Model Sentencing Act, section 4.

If a sentence is to meet the purposes of [46-18-113] the judge must be armed with a professionally prepared report containing the necessary information. A pre-sentence investigation is the best way to obtain this information.

More and more jurisdictions are requiring a pre-sentence investigation of felony convictions (e.g., U.S., California, Colorado, Connecticut, New Jersey, Indiana, Michigan and Rhode Island).

The pre-sentence investigation provided for by this provision would not substantially change the law as it now exists in Montana.

The existing law as to the use of pre-sentence investigations was set forth in Kuhl v. District Court, 139 Mont. 536, 366 P.2d 347 (1961), in which the Montana Supreme Court stated it was mandatory under the provisions of sections 94-7813 and 94-7814 [repealed] that the trial court hold a hearing, either summary or regular, or formal, wherein witnesses who have knowledge of pertinent circumstances may be sworn, examined and give their testimony in the presence of the defendant and his counsel which would help in determining sentence.

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendment: Chapter 189 in (1), near middle of second sentence after "defendant's attorney", inserted "the probation and parole officer".

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 at end of (1) inserted last sentence allowing prosecutor to disclose contents of presentence report to victim.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1991 Amendment: Deleted former (1) that read: "(1) The judge may, in his discretion, make the investigation report or parts of it available to the defendants or others, while concealing the identity of persons who provided confidential information. If the court discloses the identity of persons who provided information, the judge may, in his discretion, allow the defendant to cross-examine those who rendered information"; in (1), before "record", inserted "court", after "record but" substituted "may not be opened for public inspection" for "shall be sealed and opened only on order of the court", and inserted last sentence concerning who is to be provided with the report; inserted (2) concerning other access to report; deleted (3) that read: "(3) If a defendant is committed to a state institution, the investigation report shall be sent to the institution at the time of commitment"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Error in Reliance on Presentence Report Not Offered as Exhibit When Report Part of Record: In sentencing Flanagan, the District Court based its findings on a presentence investigation report that was not admitted as an exhibit, which Flanagan asserted was a procedural error. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because the presentence report was already part of the record, as required by this section, it was not required that the report be offered or admitted into evidence at the sentencing hearing, and the District Court did not err in using the report as a basis for its findings. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Defendant's Affirmation of Correctness of Information in Presentence Investigation Constituting Waiver of Due Process Challenge: McLeod challenged the legality of his dangerous drug sentence on due process grounds because the sentencing court relied on a presentence investigation (PSI) report that indicated that McLeod had five previous felony drug convictions instead of the actual four previous convictions. A convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation. Here, McLeod was given proper notice of the information in the PSI, availed himself of the opportunity to extensively review the information, was represented by counsel at the time that the PSI was made known to him and reviewed the information with counsel, and was given repeated opportunities to rebut the information but chose instead to affirm the accuracy of the PSI. Thus, pursuant to St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), McLeod was afforded the process due to a criminal defendant at sentencing. McLeod's affirmation of the correctness of the PSI constituted a waiver of a due process challenge, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

No Reliance on Misinformation in Sentencing — Due Process Rights Not Violated: Despite the District Court's statement to the contrary, Winkle contended that the court relied on misinformation in sentencing, violating Winkle's due process rights. Due process requires that an offender be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Winkle argued that, given the timing of the information, he did not have an opportunity to rebut, so the court should have granted a continuance in the sentencing hearing. The decision to grant a continuance is in the discretion of the sentencing court, and the timeliness of a continuance motion is a legitimate factor for the court to consider in determining whether to grant the motion. When a criminal defendant contests matters in a presentence report, the defendant has an affirmative duty to present evidence establishing inaccuracies, and if the defendant feels that inadequate time has been allowed to accurately rebut the information, a motion for continuance is in order. Here, the motion for continuance was untimely because it was made after counsel twice indicated sentencing should proceed and after the oral imposition of sentence. Winkle's contention that the sentencing court erroneously relied on certain information in imposing sentence was also flawed. The court did not explicitly state the materials that it was deleting from the presentence report, and absent specific objection, a sentencing court is not required to do so. There was information that Winkle was unable to successfully complete the presentence investigation questionnaire, and this is the information that the court relied on. Failing to establish either any misinformation or that he had no opportunity to rebut information, Winkle's due process rights were not violated, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Winkle, 2002 MT 312, 313 M 111, 60 P3d 465 (2002), followed in St. v. Roedel, 2007 MT 291, 339 M 489, 171 P3d 694 (2007).

Information Additional to That in Presentence Report Presented at Sentencing Hearing — No Due Process Violation: The presentence investigation report submitted to the District Court showed that defendant had had his parole on another conviction revoked for carrying a concealed weapon. At the sentencing hearing the court, over defendant's objection, received into evidence a written report and additional testimony by defendant's former parole officer about the reasons that parole was revoked. Defendant's due process rights were not violated by this procedure. He was represented by a lawyer at the sentencing hearing, had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness regarding the new material, had the opportunity to rebut the new material, and could have called for a continuance in order to call his own rebuttal witnesses. St. v. Elliott, 221 M 174, 717 P2d 572, 43 St. Rep. 723 (1986).

Out-of-Court Conference Between Sentencing Judge and Probation Officer — Denial of Due Process: The defendant was denied due process when the sentencing judge conferred with the presentence investigation officer behind closed doors where no opportunity was provided for argument, rebuttal, or explanation. St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Confrontation of Witnesses — Discretionary at Presentence Hearing: Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault for pointing a gun at another person during a barroom altercation. A presentence investigation was completed and provided to the defense. The presentence investigation contained a number of statements by witnesses whose names were ordered withheld by the court. Defendant objected to the consideration of those statements because he was not allowed to confront the makers thereof. The Supreme Court held that the right of cross-examination at a presentence hearing is a discretionary matter with the trial court and that defendant's due process right was protected because he was represented by counsel at the time the information was made known to him and he was given the opportunity to rebut the information. St. v. Trangsrud, 200 M 303, 651 P2d 37, 39 St. Rep. 1765 (1982), followed in St. v. Gilpin, 232 M 56, 756 P2d 445, 45 St. Rep. 863 (1988).

Misinformation in Sentencing Report Alleged — Due Process of Law: Where the defendant was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and requested a psychiatric examination and evaluation report prior to sentencing, the court did not err in utilizing a report based in part on unsubstantiated charges of other alleged rape victims with whom the defendant was involved. The use of these allegations, provided to the psychiatrist by the County Attorney, did not violate the defendant's right against imposition of sentence predicated on misinformation because the court was fully informed of the defendant's contention and the defendant had adequate notice and time to prepare for the sentencing hearing. Cross-examination of all those contributing to a presentence report rests in the discretion of the trial court. St. v. Mackie, 191 M 138, 622 P2d 673, 38 St. Rep. 86 (1981).

Not Seen Before Sentencing — Postconviction Petition to Show Report Errors: Where petitioner in a habeas corpus action alleges that he did not have an opportunity to examine his presentence report prior to sentencing or to cross-examine witnesses in respect to the report, his claim of prejudice in sentencing will not prevail unless he can show something erroneous or some ambiguity in the presentence report. Following St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), the Supreme Court held that a convicted defendant has a due process guarantee against a sentence predicated on misinformation, but he cannot complain if the information in a presentence report is true. Spurlock v. Crist, 188 M 449, 614 P2d 498 (1980).

Proper Sentence — Fairness of Hearing: When the rules of evidence had been suspended, copies of reports were available to the defendant and he was allowed to examine the author of the presentence report, and many, many witnesses appeared, the court found it could not conceive of any way the hearing could have been conducted more fairly. St. v. Lopez, 185 M 187, 605 P2d 178 (1980).

Burden on Defendant to Show Report Inaccurate: When matters contained in a presentence report are contested by the defendant, he has an affirmative duty to present evidence showing the inaccuracies contained in the report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Inclusion of Juvenile Record in Presentence Report: Section 41-3-205 does not support appellant's contention that it was improper to include his juvenile record in a presentence report since that section applies only to dependence and neglect situations and not to proceedings for delinquents under the Montana Youth Court Act. Section 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216) does not support appellant's contention either, because the prevention of public dissemination of a juvenile record once that individual attains an age of majority is accomplished by sealing the presentence report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Application of Statutes: If and when the trial judge requests a written report of investigation, he must be governed by the statutes relating to such reports. Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

Right to Refute Report: The sentence of a defendant, who pleaded guilty to grand larceny, to 4 years in the state prison was reduced to 1 year by the Supreme Court when the trial court passed sentence upon receipt of private reports without allowing the defendant or his counsel to learn of the representations in the reports and holding a hearing for the presentation of evidence to refute such representations. Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute goes beyond the provisions of 1987 MCA 46-18-102 and mainly embodies due process constitutional law that has been developed in the federal courts and by the Montana Supreme Court. In accordance with the Montana Supreme Court's decisions, subsection (5) has been included to require that the sentencing court specifically state its reasons for the sentence, both in open court and in the written judgment. This will not only provide the defendant, the prosecution, and the public with the reasons for the sentence but will also provide a record for review by the Montana Supreme Court, the Sentence Review Commission, and the Parole Board [now Board of Pardons and Parole] at the time parole is considered.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 222 in (3) in third sentence near beginning after "section" deleted "in cases in which the defendant is charged with a misdemeanor offense" and in fourth sentence at end inserted "and has informed the defendant that the defendant has the right to object to its use"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 524 in (1) before "mandatory" substituted "imposition of a sentence enhancement penalty and the applicability of" for "applicability of sentencing enhancement provisions". Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 163 in (3) inserted third through fifth sentences regarding the acceptability of a court addressing a defendant personally through audio-video communications. Amendment effective March 26, 1997.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 163, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-12-211, 46-16-105, 46-17-203, 46-18-102, and 46-18-115] applies to guilty pleas entered and sentences pronounced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 inserted (4) requiring court to permit victim's statement at sentencing hearing and establishing procedures relating to the statement.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

No Error in Denial of Motion to Continue Sentencing Hearing for Further Review and Challenge of Accuracy of Presentence Investigation Report: Morrison was convicted of felony partner or family member assault, a sixth offense, misdemeanor criminal mischief, and misdemeanor disorderly conduct. A charge of felony aggravated burglary was dismissed. Two days before sentencing, Morrison received the presentence investigation report. The following day, concerned that the report recited facts relevant to the dismissed felony aggravated burglary charge, Morrison moved for a continuance of the sentencing hearing in order to investigate and contest those provisions of the report. At sentencing, the District Court entertained Morrison's arguments concerning the accuracy of the "circumstances of the offense" section of the report and decided to strike that section, stating that the court would not rely on that information for sentencing. The motion for continuance was denied. The court also offered to allow Morrison to question the author of the report regarding the accuracy of the section of the report detailing Morrison's criminal history, but Morrison declined the offer and elected to proceed with sentencing. Following sentencing, Morrison appealed on grounds that the District Court erred by denying the motion for continuance. The Supreme Court disagreed. By striking the questioned section of the report, the sentencing court removed any reference to disputed information in the report, and by declining the chance to question the accuracy of the report, Morrison waived any objection to proceeding to sentencing. The District Court did not abuse its discretion by denying the continuance motion, and Morrison's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Morrison, 2009 MT 397, 353 M 407, 220 P3d 659 (2009).

Sentencing Court's Consideration of Defendant's Background Information, Including Self-Reported Incidents of Sexual Contact With Children — No Error: While in sexual offender treatment, Hill admitted sexual contact with 12 or 13 other children. The District Court subsequently considered the self-reported acts in a psychosexual evaluation, which Hill maintained was a violation of the right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court disagreed. In a classic penalty situation where an accused cannot elect to exercise the right to remain silent because of the possibility of substantial penalties if the person chooses not to speak, the state is prevented from using the compelled statements in later criminal proceedings. However, Hill was not in a classic penalty situation, but rather in a classic plea bargain situation. By consent decree, the state offered Hill treatment in exchange for an admission of misdemeanor assault and an agreement to undergo treatment. Hill was not faced with penalties by refusing to reveal prior sexual contacts, and the consent decree was never revoked even though Hill violated it. Absent a classic penalty situation, Hill's right against self-incrimination was not violated by the District Court's consideration of Hill's character, history, mental and physical condition, and background, including the self-reported acts in the psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P3d 307 (2009). See also St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Determination of Restitution When Amount of Actual Loss Unknown: McMaster admitted taking money from Wright, but the actual amount could not be determined. The District Court received several restitution recommendations ranging from $12,914 proposed in the presentence investigation report to $334,425 based on a cash flow analysis. After considering testimony from numerous experts and from McMaster and Wright, the Court set restitution at $30,000, and McMaster appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. As established in St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), a victim may recover losses even though the actual losses are uncertain if the losses are calculated by use of reasonable methods based on the best available evidence. Nothing requires a court or victim to substantiate a restitution calculation with documentation, nor is a court circumscribed from relying on victim testimony presented at a sentencing hearing. The court properly considered McMaster's written statement and Wright's nonexpert undocumented testimony presented at the sentencing hearing. Substantial evidence supported the court's findings and the court did not abuse its discretion when it set restitution at $30,000. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 268, 345 M 172, 190 P3d 302 (2008).

Affirmative Duty of Defendant to Bring Evidence Outside Presentence Investigation Report to Sentencing Court's Attention: A defendant has an affirmative duty to bring evidence outside the presentence report to the attention of the sentencing court. If the evidence is not offered, there is no error based on its absence from the record, and the Supreme Court will not fault a sentencing court for failing to consider a report that was not before it. St. v. Herman, 2008 MT 187, 343 M 494, 188 P3d 978 (2008). See also St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945 (1995).

Ten-Year Sentence for Criminal Distribution of Dangerous Drugs Affirmed Despite Finding of Impaired Mental Capacity: Novak was sentenced to 10 years with 6 years suspended for selling 0.06 grams of methamphetamine to an undercover informant, despite a finding that Novak was eligible for an exception to the mandatory minimum sentence because of impaired mental capacity. Novak appealed the sentence, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The fact that Novak was eligible for a sentence exception did not mean that he was entitled to it. The sentencing court's oral pronouncement of sentence complied with statutory requirements by providing adequate reasons for imposing the sentence, and the sentence fell within the parameters of 45-9-101(4) and was not illegal. St. v. Novak, 2008 MT 157, 343 M 292, 183 P3d 887 (2008).

No Error in Treating Retribution as Component of Punishment: Rickman asserted that the sentencing court improperly considered retribution as a factor in sentencing Rickman to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that retribution has repeatedly been held to be a component of punishment. It was appropriate for the sentencing court to consider that the victim was innocent and to consider the impact of the homicide on the victim's family. The judgment and commitment of the sentencing judge indicated that retribution was only the third basis for the sentence, and in light of Rickman's minimal potential for rehabilitation and Rickman's significant threat to the public, the sentencing court's use of the word "retribution" comported with state sentencing policies and procedures. Rickman's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008).

Sentence for Sexual Assault Within Statutory Parameters and Adequately Explained: Rogers asserted that his sentence of 20 years with 10 years suspended for two counts of felony assault upon a minor was improperly based on his refusal to participate in a court-ordered psychosexual evaluation. However, nothing in the record indicated that the sentencing court even referenced Rogers' refusal to participate. The court's reasons for its sentence were many and were supported by the evidence. The sentence was within statutory parameters and thus was affirmed. St. v. Rogers, 2007 MT 227, 339 M 132, 168 P3d 669 (2007).

Rules of Evidence Inapplicable in Sentencing Hearings: The Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing hearings. A sentencing court may consider any relevant information relating to the nature and circumstances of the crime, the defendant's character, background, history, and mental and physical condition, and any other information that the court considers to have probative force. St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007), following St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003), St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), and St. v. Harper, 2006 MT 259, 334 M 138, 144 P3d 826 (2006).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Community Risk by Sex Offender — Sentencing Court Consideration of Information in Presentence Report Unrelated to Crime Charged Not Erroneous: Legg pleaded not guilty to felony sexual assault of a 9-year-old girl. The initial mental examination revealed that Legg was severely depressed but competent to understand the charges and appreciate the consequences of possible incarceration. Legg's counsel then requested a psychosexual evaluation of Legg. The analyst categorized Legg as a low-level offender and suggested that community placement and outpatient sexual offender treatment would be appropriate. Legg then entered a plea bargain wherein the state agreed to recommend sentencing in accordance with the evaluations. Legg pleaded guilty, and the District Court ordered a presentence investigation (PSI). The investigator discovered information that Legg had not revealed previously, including the fact that Legg was permanently prohibited from contact with his ex-wife and children and that there were other secondary victims of Legg's sexual abuse. The analyst who performed Legg's psychosexual evaluation then reclassified Legg as a moderate risk offender and recommended confinement rather than community placement because the risk was too great to treat Legg as an outpatient. Legg filed a motion in limine to exclude any evidence from the PSI from persons other than the victim, her family, or her therapists. The motion was not ruled upon, so the challenged evidence was not excluded. The state recommended a 30-year sentence with 25 years suspended, and Legg consented to the recommendation. However, after hearing from the victim's family, doctor, and counselor and from the analyst, the court sentenced Legg to 50 years with none suspended. Legg appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Consideration of all materials in the PSI was required under 46-18-111, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in doing so. Further, the statements by the sentencing court that the 50-year sentence was both to punish Legg and to protect society from Legg in the future were a sufficient explanation of the reasons for the sentence, as required under this section. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Failure to Establish Conflict Between Oral and Written Sentences — Waiver of Right to Request Modification of Written Judgment: After receiving a written judgment, Legg moved to amend or correct the judgment to include a designation of offender status and consideration of mitigating factors. Legg made the motion pursuant to 46-18-116, which allows modification of a written sentence to conform with the legally effective oral sentence within 120 days of the written sentence, but Legg failed to establish or discuss the existence of any conflict between the oral and written sentences or to move that the written sentence be amended. By the time that the issue arose on appeal, the 120-day time limit had passed, so Legg waived the right to request modification of the written judgment, and the Supreme Court declined to remand for resentencing on the issue. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

No Reliance on Misinformation in Sentencing — Due Process Rights Not Violated: Despite the District Court's statement to the contrary, Winkle contended that the court relied on misinformation in sentencing, violating Winkle's due process rights. Due process requires that an offender be given an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information, including presentencing information, that may lead to a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. Winkle argued that, given the timing of the information, he did not have an opportunity to rebut, so the court should have granted a continuance in the sentencing hearing. The decision to grant a continuance is in the discretion of the sentencing court, and the timeliness of a continuance motion is a legitimate factor for the court to consider in determining whether to grant the motion. When a criminal defendant contests matters in a presentence report, the defendant has an affirmative duty to present evidence establishing inaccuracies, and if the defendant feels that inadequate time has been allowed to accurately rebut the information, a motion for continuance is in order. Here, the motion for continuance was untimely because it was made after counsel twice indicated sentencing should proceed and after the oral imposition of sentence. Winkle's contention that the sentencing court erroneously relied on certain information in imposing sentence was also flawed. The court did not explicitly state the materials that it was deleting from the presentence report, and absent specific objection, a sentencing court is not required to do so. There was information that Winkle was unable to successfully complete the presentence investigation questionnaire, and this is the information that the court relied on. Failing to establish either any misinformation or that he had no opportunity to rebut information, Winkle's due process rights were not violated, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Winkle, 2002 MT 312, 313 M 111, 60 P3d 465 (2002), followed in St. v. Roedel, 2007 MT 291, 339 M 489, 171 P3d 694 (2007).

No Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Parents of Sexual Assault Victim Not Parties to Plea Agreement: Following a guilty plea and conviction of sexual assault, Knox moved to withdraw the guilty plea, arguing that the County Attorney violated the terms of a plea agreement, which had recommended a 30-year suspended sentence and dropping a second sexual assault charge in exchange for the guilty plea, and indicated that the parents of the 5-year-old victim would not recommend incarceration in the victim impact statement of the presentence investigation. During the colloquy required by 46-12-210, the District Court informed Knox that, like the court itself, the parents were not bound by the plea agreement and could change their minds at any time as far as recommending future imprisonment, adding that if the parents did change their minds, that fact would not suffice as grounds for withdrawal of a guilty plea. Nevertheless, Knox voluntarily accepted the possible consequences of the plea and pleaded guilty. The parents then recommended imprisonment, and Knox was sentenced to 40 years with 18 suspended. A District Court may permit the withdrawal of a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, but the determination of good cause is discretionary, and each case is considered on its merits. Here, the District Court subsequently denied the withdrawal motion pursuant to the colloquy, and Knox appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. After applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), the Supreme Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion to withdraw and that Knox's guilty plea thus met the constitutional standard of a voluntary, intelligent, and knowing choice among options. The District Court acted according to statutory requirements when it made clear that the parents could make known their opinion and change their minds regarding Knox's incarceration because they were not parties to the plea agreement, pursuant to the court's duties in this section. Further, other evidence in a psychological evaluation indicated that Knox had violent tendencies that presented complications to successful treatment, had high-risk factors for violent recidivism, and had resisted treatment for chemical dependency in the past, so the parents' incarceration request was not a determinative basis for the sentence. St. v. Knox, 2001 MT 232, 307 M 1, 36 P3d 383 (2001).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Due Process Violation in Failing to Afford Defendant Opportunity at Sentencing to Rebut Information Not in Presentence Investigation Report: In sentencing Hocevar for criminal endangerment of one child, the District Court denied Hocevar's due process rights by finding by a preponderance of the evidence that Hocevar smothered two other children without affording Hocevar the opportunity procedurally to challenge the accuracy of the information, which was not contained in the presentence investigation report. As determined in St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), a sentencing judge may rely on facts outside the presentence report if, in order to avoid misinformation in sentencing, the defendant is given an opportunity to explain or rebut the information at the presentence hearing. The Supreme Court remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Failure to Object to Conduct of Psychological Evaluation or to Continuation of Sentencing Hearing — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Osterloth was convicted of felony sexual assault and was required to undergo a sexual offender evaluation by a therapist of his choice at county expense. His scheduled sentencing was continued to allow the evaluation. On appeal, Osterloth contended that the District Court erred by sentencing him without an evaluation prepared by a qualified therapist, pursuant to 46-18-111, and by continuing sentencing instead of conducting a sentencing hearing without delay, as required in this section. The Supreme Court noted that under 46-20-104, it is precluded from considering an alleged error unless a timely objection was made or the criteria of 46-20-701 are met. Osterloth did not object to the evaluation being conducted by his own evaluator or to the sentencing continuation, nor did he assert that he could satisfy any of the requirements of 46-20-701. Thus, Osterloth waived the right to have the Supreme Court consider these alleged errors on appeal. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

Remand for Modification of Written Judgment to Conform to Oral Sentence: Osterloth contended that the District Court failed to comply with the provisions of this section, which require that in felony cases, the court state all reasons for the sentence in open court and in the written judgment, and that, as a result, he was entitled to be resentenced. Osterloth was partially correct, in that the written judgment must conform to the oral sentence; however, resentencing was not required. Rather, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence and remanded for entry of a modified written judgment setting forth the reasons for the sentence as stated in the oral sentence. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000). See also St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999).

Authority to Amend Written Judgment to List Reasons for Parole Restriction: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to state its reasons for restricting parole eligibility in the court's original written judgment and that further error occurred when the court amended the written judgment, following remand from the Sentence Review Division, to list the reasons parole was restricted. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court may correct an erroneous sentence at any time to correct clerical errors and to make the record reflect what was actually decided, as long as the correction does not set aside the judgment or change what was originally intended. Here, the amended judgment was consistent with the oral pronouncement of judgment and merely set forth the reasons for imposing the parole restriction. Further, 46-18-117 (now repealed) allows correction of a sentence following remand from an appellate court. The Sentence Review Division functions as part of the appellate process. Thus, when the Division remanded the matter to the District Court for clarification, the court had the express statutory authority to issue an order amending the written judgment to list its reasons for imposing the parole eligibility restriction. (See 2001 amendment to 46-18-116.) St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Heinous Nature of Crime Alone Justifying Parole Restriction: Defendant raised several contentions in arguing that the District Court improperly imposed a parole eligibility restriction as part of a sentence for the mitigated deliberate homicide of his 3-year-old daughter. The District Court commented at sentencing that it felt "somewhat as the representative of [the] now deceased child". Defendant alleged that the statement showed undue partisanship and indicated failure of the court to act as an objective judicial officer. However, when viewed in the context of the entire proceeding, the comment underscored the court's conclusion that the heinous, brutal nature of the crime was sufficient reason alone to withdraw the privilege of parole eligibility. Citing St. v. Heit, 242 M 488, 791 P2d 1379 (1990), the Supreme Court also noted that it had in the past upheld parole restrictions based upon the heinous nature of the offense. Imposition of the restriction was not an abuse of the court's broad sentencing discretion. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 141 in (1) at beginning of third sentence substituted "written judgment" for "judgment" and at end inserted "within 30 days after the oral pronouncement of the disposition of the case"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 74 in (1) inserted fourth and fifth sentences requiring service of a copy of the judgment on the defendant, including a statement of the rights set forth in subsection (2); inserted (2) concerning a request for modification of a written judgment and waiver of the request; inserted (3) allowing correction of a factually erroneous or illegal sentence; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 20, 2001.

New subsection (3), concerning correction of a factually erroneous sentence or judgment and how an illegal sentence is addressed, relates to the subject matter of former 46-18-117, which was repealed by Ch. 74, L. 2001.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 74, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies to all cases currently pending on direct review or that are not yet final".

DECISIONS GOVERNED BY LAW IN EFFECT AFTER
2001 AMENDMENT OF 46-18-116 AND REPEAL OF 46-18-117

Appeal Filed Within Sixty Days of Entry of Judgment Timely: Clark was convicted on March 23, and the written judgment was entered with the Clerk of Court on March 27. Clark filed an appeal on May 23 and an amended notice of appeal on May 25. The state contended that the appeal was untimely because it was not entered within 60 days of the conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. In criminal cases, an appeal must be entered within 60 days of entry of judgment, not conviction. Clark's appeal was filed 57 days after the written judgment was entered, and the amended notice was filed 59 days after entry of judgment. Thus, the appeal was timely. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 112, 342 M 461, 182 P3d 62 (2008).

Written Sentence Conforming to Oral Sentence — Sentence Modification Denied: At Garland's sentencing hearing on a mitigated deliberate homicide charge, the District Court sentenced Garland to 30 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with the sentences to run consecutively. The County Attorney then suggested the possibility of a 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended to address the ease of supervised probation. The court agreed to a 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended as long as it did not result in an earlier parole. However, after further consulting with the attorneys, the court issued the written judgment the following day stating the original sentence of 30 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon. Almost 12 years later, Garland submitted a motion to modify the written sentence to conform to the orally pronounced 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. It was clearly stated at the hearing that imposition of the 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended was contingent on the condition that it would not make Garland eligible for earlier parole. The subsequent discussion with attorneys revealed that the 40-year sentence with 10 years suspended would in fact result in earlier parole, so the written judgment reflected the original sentence. The contingent condition raised at the hearing did not occur, so there was no discrepancy between the oral and written sentence, and Garland's motion to modify the sentence was properly denied. St. v. Garland, 2007 MT 280, 339 M 433, 171 P3d 675 (2007).

Improper Nunc Pro Tunc Judgments Reducing Credit for Time Served Vacated: By nunc pro tunc judgment, the District Court reduced the number of days of credit that Megard received for prior incarceration after two suspended commitments to the Department of Corrections were revoked, and Megard appealed. The Supreme Court reviewed the sentence for legality, noting that once a valid sentence has been pronounced, a District Court has no authority to modify or change it except as provided by statute. Under subsection (3) of this section, a factually erroneous judgment can be corrected at any time, but the original judgments against Megard were not factually incorrect in that Megard was properly credited for time served at that time and the credit did not conflict with the oral pronouncement of Megard's sentence from the bench. Thus, the District Court's amended nunc pro tunc judgments were not within the purview of subsection (3) of this section and, being illegal, were vacated. The case was remanded for reinstatement of the original judgments. St. v. Megard, 2006 MT 84, 332 M 27, 134 P3d 90 (2006), following St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151 (1993), and St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004).

Motion to Dismiss Denied Despite Trial Court's Failure to Enter Written Judgment Within Statutory Time Limit: Despite Ferguson's request for expedited sentencing, the District Court still had not entered a written sentence or set a sentencing date more than a month after the oral sentence was pronounced. Ferguson moved for a new trial based on the requirement of this section that a trial court must enter a written sentence within 30 days after oral pronouncement of sentence and asserted that failure of the court to issue a written sentence within the statutory time limit divested the court of jurisdiction to impose a sentence. Neither the state nor the court responded to the motion, but a written sentence was finally rendered 48 days after oral sentencing. Ferguson appealed, citing St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522 (1998). The Supreme Court distinguished Winterrowd because that case dealt only with late sentencing by nunc pro tunc orders, and the court declined to extend it in a way that would allow convicted persons to escape sentencing altogether. Although the record did not disclose a legitimate justification for the plain violation of the statute in Ferguson's case, the Supreme Court noted that the statute contains no remedial provision to address a sentencing court's failure to issue a timely written sentence. However, loss of jurisdiction and dismissal of the case were held to be too extreme a remedy, given the relatively minor nature of the sentencing court's statutory infraction. Rather, the Supreme Court deferred to the sentencing court's discretion in rendering timely written judgments on the record and affirmed Ferguson's sentence. St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

District Court Retention of Criminal Jurisdiction — State's Appeal of Order Granting Driving Privileges Not Timely: A condition of Jivelekas's sentence for felony DUI and misdemeanor driving with a revoked or suspended license provided that Jivelekas could not drive unless approval was granted by the sentencing court or Jivelekas's supervising officer. Nearly 2 years after Jivelekas completed all terms of his sentence, he asked the District Court for approval to operate a motor vehicle in order to maintain full-time employment. The state contended that because 61-8-731 required that Jivelekas's probation officer authorize motor vehicle operation, the District Court did not have jurisdiction to consider Jivelekas's motion. The Supreme Court disagreed. Even if the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing the sentence condition, the court still retained jurisdiction to entertain Jivelekas's motion. Additionally, the Supreme Court was precluded from addressing the merits of the state's argument because the state failed to file a timely appeal pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), so the appeal was time-barred. St. v. Jivelekas, 2005 MT 277, 329 M 204, 122 P3d 1248 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender — Conditions in Written but Not Oral Judgment That Full Employment Be Maintained and Offender Not Have Contact With Victims: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. The written judgment, but not the oral pronouncement of sentence, required him to maintain full-time employment and to not have contact with the victims of his offense. The court could not say that the conditions would not substantively increase his loss of liberty or sacrifice of property, and accordingly, the court ordered those conditions to be vacated. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004).

Imposition of Stock Probation Requirements in Written Sentence When Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Not Error Absent Showing of Prejudice: When Kroll was sentenced orally for a felony bad check scheme, he received a 10-year prison sentence with all but 180 days suspended and was ordered to pay restitution, not possess or consume alcohol, obtain a chemical dependency evaluation, refrain from entering casinos and playing games of chance, and undergo a sexual risk assessment because many of the materials purchased with the bad checks included pornography. The subsequent written judgment deviated from the oral pronouncement in several respects, omitting the sexual risk assessment and including several conditions not addressed at the oral sentencing, including requirements that Kroll conduct himself in a law-abiding manner, submit to reasonable searches, not own or possess firearms or deadly weapons, maintain full-time legitimate employment, have no contact with the victims, and pay a supervision fee. Kroll contested the validity of the added conditions in the written sentence and the imposition of the sexual risk assessment. The Supreme Court affirmed. The added conditions were civil restrictions that were considered stock requirements for probationers and individuals subject to a suspended sentence and did not substantively increase Kroll's loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Given the standard nature of the sentencing conditions, Kroll suffered no actual prejudice by failure of the District Court to impose the conditions at oral sentencing, and they were therefore upheld as lawful. The state conceded that the alcohol restrictions and the chemical dependency conditions of the oral sentence were not related to the crime, and the Supreme Court ordered that those conditions be removed, leaving only the gambling and sexual risk assessment at issue. The Supreme Court affirmed those conditions because they were related to the bad check crimes and were a reasonable condition to assist Kroll's rehabilitation. St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), following St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000). See also St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), in which the imposition of significant restrictions and conditions not mentioned in the oral sentence, in addition to stock sentencing conditions authorized in Kroll, was considered prejudicial, reversible error.

No Continuing District Court Jurisdiction to Review Original Sentence and Resentence on Original Charge: Evert was sentenced to 65 years in prison with 15 years suspended for sexual assault. About 5 years into the sentence, Evert petitioned pro se for postconviction relief, alleging numerous claims related to his guilty plea and sentencing, but no hearing was held. Following appointment of two different public defenders, the District Court was notified that the parties had reached an agreement on Evert's petition. In exchange for a new sentence, Evert agreed to withdraw the petition, waive the right to appeal the amended sentence, and waive the right to file any further postconviction petitions based on the new sentence. The District Court agreed to the stipulation, noted Evert's criminal history and progress in prison, and resentenced Evert to 60 years with 20 years suspended, with credit for time served. Evert then appealed the new sentence on grounds that the District Court mistakenly described Evert's eligibility for parole and that because the court did not correctly advise him, he did not fully understand the consequences of waiving his postconviction claims. The Supreme Court reversed because the District Court did not have continuing jurisdiction to resentence Evert after final judgment. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court could modify or correct an erroneous sentence but had no authority to resentence Evert on the original charge. Therefore, Evert's original sentence was reinstated, the postconviction claims that Evert waived were also reinstated, and the case was remanded for consideration of the postconviction claims. St. v. Evert, 2004 MT 178, 322 M 105, 93 P3d 1254 (2004), following Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002), and Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

Remand for Consideration of Amendment of Judgment to Reflect Conviction of Assault With Weapon by Accountability Rather Than Assault With Weapon: Although McDanold's plea of guilty to assault with a weapon was premised entirely on the alternative charge that McDanold was guilty of assault with a weapon by accountability, neither the written nor the oral sentence included any mention of accountability. When McDanold arrived in prison, this fact affected his classification and treatment, so McDanold requested that the judgment be amended to clarify the accountability aspect of the conviction. Even though both the prosecution and defense counsel stipulated to amending the judgment, the District Court noted that the stipulation was not filed until more than 30 days after sentencing and that neither party claimed that the written judgment differed from the oral sentence, so the court declined to amend the judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that it was uncontested that the reason for including the accountability provision in the judgment did not present itself until McDanold was in prison and that a court may correct a factually incorrect sentence at any time. Therefore, under these unique circumstances, the case was remanded for further consideration of the sentencing issue. St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004).

Failure to Establish Conflict Between Oral and Written Sentences — Waiver of Right to Request Modification of Written Judgment: After receiving a written judgment, Legg moved to amend or correct the judgment to include a designation of offender status and consideration of mitigating factors. Legg made the motion pursuant to this section, which allows modification of a written sentence to conform with the legally effective oral sentence within 120 days of the written sentence, but Legg failed to establish or discuss the existence of any conflict between the oral and written sentences or to move that the written sentence be amended. By the time that the issue arose on appeal, the 120-day time limit had passed, so Legg waived the right to request modification of the written judgment, and the Supreme Court declined to remand for resentencing on the issue. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

DECISIONS GOVERNED BY LAW IN EFFECT PRIOR TO 2001 AMENDMENT OF 46-18-116 AND REPEAL OF 46-18-117

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Correction of Sentence for Imprisonment Not Erroneous: Kern was convicted of felony sexual assault against a minor. The District Court sentenced Kern to a 15-year commitment to the Department of Corrections, with all but 7 years suspended. However, 46-18-201 requires that a sentence to the Department include suspension of all but 5 years of the commitment. The District Court corrected its mistake and committed Kern to the state prison for 15 years, with all but 7 years suspended. Kern contended that the court erred in correcting the sentence. Under the version of 46-18-117 in effect at the time that the crime was committed (prior to repeal in 2001), the court was allowed to correct the erroneous sentence within 120 days of sentencing. Although Kern might have preferred commitment to the Department for 15 years with all but 5 years suspended, the District Court was not restricted from pursuing the option that it chose and did not err in timely correcting the sentence pursuant to former 46-18-117. (See 2001 amendment to this section.) St. v. Kern, 2003 MT 77, 315 M 22, 67 P3d 272 (2003).

Failure to Credit Inmate With Time Served Before Sentencing in Written Judgment After Allowing Credit in Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: At the sentencing hearing, Horton inquired as to whether he would get credit for time served between arrest and sentencing. The judge responded that credit would be granted automatically. However, in the written judgment entered 2 days later, the judge denied credit for time served because Horton was being held on a probation violation. Under 46-18-403, Horton was entitled to credit for each day of incarceration prior to or after sentencing, and pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the court's oral pronouncement controlled over the written judgment. Thus, the Supreme Court directed that the provision in the written judgment denying Horton credit for time served be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to 46-23-1031. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Authority to Amend Written Judgment to List Reasons for Parole Restriction: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to state its reasons for restricting parole eligibility in the court's original written judgment and that further error occurred when the court amended the written judgment, following remand from the Sentence Review Division, to list the reasons parole was restricted. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court may correct an erroneous sentence at any time to correct clerical errors and to make the record reflect what was actually decided, as long as the correction does not set aside the judgment or change what was originally intended. Here, the amended judgment was consistent with the oral pronouncement of judgment and merely set forth the reasons for imposing the parole restriction. Further, 46-18-117 (now repealed) allows correction of a sentence following remand from an appellate court. The Sentence Review Division functions as part of the appellate process. Thus, when the Division remanded the matter to the District Court for clarification, the court had the express statutory authority to issue an order amending the written judgment to list its reasons for imposing the parole eligibility restriction. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Heinous Nature of Crime Alone Justifying Parole Restriction: Defendant raised several contentions in arguing that the District Court improperly imposed a parole eligibility restriction as part of a sentence for the mitigated deliberate homicide of his 3-year-old daughter. The District Court commented at sentencing that it felt "somewhat as the representative of [the] now deceased child". Defendant alleged that the statement showed undue partisanship and indicated failure of the court to act as an objective judicial officer. However, when viewed in the context of the entire proceeding, the comment underscored the court's conclusion that the heinous, brutal nature of the crime was sufficient reason alone to withdraw the privilege of parole eligibility. Citing St. v. Heit, 242 M 488, 791 P2d 1379 (1990), the Supreme Court also noted that it had in the past upheld parole restrictions based upon the heinous nature of the offense. Imposition of the restriction was not an abuse of the court's broad sentencing discretion. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999). See also St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Oral Pronouncement as Legally Effective Sentence — Correction of Error in Written Judgment by Nunc Pro Tunc Order — Due Process and Double Jeopardy Rights Not Violated: The oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence. The written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. In the event of a conflict between the oral and written sentence, the oral controls. The sentencing court may correct an error in a written judgment and commitment by a nunc pro tunc order, pursuant to 46-18-117 (now repealed), to accurately reflect what was orally pronounced at the sentencing hearing. Absent evidence of a tangible detriment or concrete injury to defendant, a clarifying nunc pro tunc order does not jeopardize a defendant's due process rights or constitute double jeopardy. (See 2001 amendment.) St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), overruling St. v. Enfinger, 222 M 438, 722 P2d 1170 (1986), St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177 (1988), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058 (1992), and St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), to the extent that those cases held that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, was to be considered the final, valid order, and followed and applied retroactively in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). The Supreme Court amended former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to reflect the Lane decision in In re Amending Rule 5 of the Mont. Rules of Appellate Procedure, 55 St. Rep. 1267 (1998). The Lane rule was applied retroactively in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999). Lane was also followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). See also St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Abuse of Discretion for Court to Correct Failure to Sentence by Nunc Pro Tunc Order: The District Court failed to sentence Winterrowd, in either open court or by written judgment, on his misdemeanor theft conviction. Four months later, the court issued an order nunc pro tunc, sentencing Winterrowd to 6 months' imprisonment. It is within a District Court's power to enter an order nunc pro tunc modifying or amending a judgment in order to remedy certain types of clerical errors or to make the record reflect what was actually decided. However, in this case, not only was the sentence omitted from the written sentencing order, but the sentence was not even discussed at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court reversed and vacated the nunc pro tunc order and sentence. St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522, 55 St. Rep. 307 (1998).

No Jurisdiction to Modify Sentence as to Restitution: Defendant was ordered to pay the victim's future counseling costs. Later, on a motion of the state, the court ordered defendant to pay costs for inpatient psychiatric treatment received by the victim prior to the original court order. The Supreme Court held that the District Court was without jurisdiction to modify the sentence under 46-18-117 (now repealed) because the sentence was not erroneous or imposed in an illegal manner. St. v. Richards, 285 M 322, 948 P2d 240, 54 St. Rep. 1172 (1997), followed in St. v. Rennick, 1999 MT 155, 295 M 97, 983 P2d 907, 56 St. Rep. 611 (1999).

Appeal of Misdemeanor Conviction From Justice's Court to District Court — No Record of Oral Pronouncement of Sentence in Justice's Court — District Court Jurisdiction Upheld: Tweedy was convicted by a Justice's Court jury of misdemeanor assault and was scheduled for sentencing on April 18, 1989. On April 19, Tweedy filed a notice of appeal to the District Court. The Justice's Court filed its sentencing order on May 3. Later, in response to a motion by Tweedy to dismiss the underlying charge, the state contended that the District Court had not acquired jurisdiction over Tweedy. The Supreme Court held that since there was no evidence in the record that the sentencing hearing scheduled for April 18 did not, in fact, take place and since, under St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978), appeal may be taken within 10 days after sentence is orally pronounced in open court, Tweedy's notice of appeal was timely filed and the District Court had jurisdiction over the case. The Supreme Court also noted that the later enactment of this section, which applies to Justices' Courts by virtue of 46-1-103, requiring a signed judgment on the record, should eliminate confusion in the future regarding when the statutory time for appeal begins to run. St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Variance Between Oral and Written Sentence Held Harmless Error: Graveley was convicted of solicitation to commit deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court announced Graveley's sentence of 40 years in the custody of the Department of Corrections, with the first 10 years in a prison environment. The District Court's written judgment omitted the reference to the first 10 years. The Supreme Court held that a review of the oral record showed that the District Court intended the reference to 10 years to mean a minimum of 10 years and that because under the written judgment Graveley would be eligible for a supervised release program earlier than under the oral pronouncement, Graveley was not prejudiced by the written judgment. The Supreme Court held that absent a finding that a sentence is erroneous or illegal, the District Court could not alter its sentence. However, the difference in this case between the oral pronouncement and written judgment was harmless error. St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996).

No Error in Refusal to Modify Sentence to Run Concurrently With Federal Sentence: After Fertterers were each convicted and sentenced on state felony and misdemeanor counts involving poaching, they were convicted of federal violations arising out of the same acts. The federal District Court stated that the federal sentences "shall be served concurrent to state penalties dealing with the same criminal transaction". The state District Court, which announced its penalties before the federal District Court did, refused to amend its sentences to allow them to run concurrently with the penalties of the federal District Court. The Supreme Court held that the state District Court was correct in its refusal in that the state District Court did not have jurisdiction to amend a lawful sentence once the sentence was pronounced. St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151, 50 St. Rep. 1135 (1993), followed in St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996).

Form of Sentence

46-18-201. Sentences that may be imposed.

Source: New.

[Section 46-18-201(1)(a)] was principally constructed for the benefit of a young offender who has no previous criminal record. Thus, if the imposition of sentence is deferred, the fact an individual made one mistake will not plague him for the rest of his life.

Under [46-18-201(1)(b)] the judge may give a credit for elapsed time if he feels this to be an incentive for better behavior.

The conditions which may be imposed are left entirely to the imagination of the individual judge. It is contemplated that conditions will be imposed which are for the benefit of the individual, and which can be fairly met. An example would be jail-basing of the sentenced individual for a specified period of time, or some other limitations on his daily life which [are] in keeping with the individual's particular needs in adjusting to his environment.

Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Chapter 437 in (5) near beginning after "pursuant to" substituted "this section" for "subsection (1)" (amendment rendered void by Ch. 272 amendment); inserted (6) authorizing the sentencing judge to suspend a person's license or driving privilege and referencing the procedure for suspending a license or driving privilege; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 258, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to persons sentenced on or before [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 9, 2003.

Section 10, Ch. 272, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who have an unpaid restitution obligation on [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2003.

Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 437, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies to sentences imposed for offenses committed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2003.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 1, Ch. 152, L. 2001, amended sec. 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, to read: "Section 18. Retroactive applicability. The provisions of Title 46, chapter 23, part 5, and of [this act] relating to registration apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced by a state or federal court in any state on or after July 1, 1989, or who as a result of a sentence are under the supervision of a county, state, or federal agency in any state on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced by a state or federal court in any state on or after October 1, 1995, or who as a result of a sentence are under the supervision of a county, state, or federal agency in any state on or after October 1, 1995." Amendment effective March 29, 2001.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to sentencing judge for references to court; in (1)(a) substituted "except as otherwise specifically provided by statute, for a period" for "except as provided in 61-8-734 for sentences for driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs or as provided in 61-6-304, for a period, except as otherwise provided"; inserted (1)(a)(ii) allowing longer deferral period if financial obligation imposed; inserted (1)(b) disallowing deferral when offender has been convicted of prior felony; at end of former (1)(a) deleted former language that read: "The sentencing judge may impose upon the defendant any reasonable restrictions or conditions during the period of the deferred imposition. Reasonable restrictions or conditions may include:

(i) jail base release;

(ii) jail time not exceeding 180 days;

(iii) conditions for probation;

(iv) payment of the costs of confinement;

(v) payment of a fine as provided in 46-18-231;

(vi) payment of costs as provided in 46-18-232 and 46-18-233;

(vii) payment of costs of court-appointed counsel as provided in 46-8-113;

(viii) with the approval of the facility or program, an order that the offender be placed in a community corrections facility or program as provided in 53-30-321;

(ix) with the approval of the prerelease center or prerelease program and confirmation by the department of corrections that space is available, an order that the offender be placed in a prerelease center or prerelease program for a period not to exceed 1 year;

(x) community service;

(xi) home arrest as provided in Title 46, chapter 18, part 10;

(xii) any other reasonable conditions considered necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of society;

(xiii) payment of expenses for use of a judge pro tempore or special master as provided in 3-5-116; or

(xiv) any combination of the restrictions or conditions in subsections (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(xiii)"; in (2) at beginning inserted "Whenever a person has been found guilty of an offense upon a verdict or a plea of guilty, a sentencing judge may", after "execution of sentence" inserted "except as otherwise specifically provided by statute", and deleted former second and third sentences that read: "The sentencing judge may impose on the defendant any reasonable restrictions or conditions during the period of suspended sentence. Reasonable restrictions or conditions may include any of those listed in subsection (1)(a)"; in (3) at beginning of introductory clause inserted "Whenever a person has been found guilty of an offense upon a verdict or a plea of guilty, a sentencing judge may impose a sentence that may include"; in (3)(b) before first "payment" deleted "require"; in (3)(c) substituted "a term of incarceration at a" for "impose a" and after "state prison" deleted "sentence"; in (3)(d) substituted "commitment of the offender" for "commit the defendant" and after "5 years" inserted "with a recommendation"; inserted (3)(g) allowing chemical treatment of sex offenders; inserted (4) outlining restrictions or conditions allowed as part of a deferred or suspended sentence; deleted former (3) through (8) that read: "(3) If a financial obligation is imposed as a condition under subsection (1)(a), sentence may be deferred for a period not exceeding 2 years for a misdemeanor or for a period not exceeding 6 years for a felony, regardless of whether any other conditions are imposed.

(4) If any restrictions or conditions imposed under subsection (1)(a) or (1)(b) are violated, the court shall consider any elapsed time and either expressly allow part or all of it as a credit against the sentence or reject all or part as a credit. The court shall state its reasons in the order. Credit, however, must be allowed for jail or home arrest time already served.

(5) Except as provided in 45-9-202 and 46-18-222, the imposition or execution of the first 2 years of a sentence of imprisonment imposed under the following sections may not be deferred or suspended: 45-5-103, 45-5-202(3) relating to aggravated assault, 45-5-302(2), 45-5-303(2), 45-5-401(2), 45-5-502(3), 45-5-503(2) and (3), 45-9-101(2), (3), and (5)(d), 45-9-102(4), and 45-9-103(2).

(6) Except as provided in 46-18-222, the imposition or execution of the first 10 years of a sentence of imprisonment imposed under 45-5-102 may not be deferred or suspended.

(7) Except as provided in 46-18-222, imposition of sentence in a felony case may not be deferred in the case of a defendant who has been convicted of a felony on a prior occasion, whether or not the sentence was imposed, imposition of the sentence was deferred, or execution of the sentence was suspended.

(8) If the victim was less than 16 years old, the imposition or execution of the first 30 days of a sentence of imprisonment imposed under 45-5-503, 45-5-504, 45-5-505, or 45-5-507 may not be deferred or suspended. Section 46-18-222 does not apply to the first 30 days of the imprisonment"; in (6) after "sentence on" substituted "an offender" for "a defendant"; deleted former (10) and (11) that read: "(10) A person convicted of a sexual offense, as defined in 46-23-502, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison shall enroll in and complete the educational phase of the prison's sexual offender program. If the person is subject to the provisions of 45-5-512, the person shall also, as provided in 45-5-512, undergo medically safe medroxyprogesterone acetate treatment or its chemical equivalent or other medically safe drug treatment that reduces sexual fantasies, sex drive, or both, paid for by and for a period of time determined by the department of corrections. The period may not exceed the period of state supervision of the person.

(11) In sentencing a nonviolent felony offender, the court shall first consider alternatives to imprisonment of the offender in the state prison, including placement of the offender in a community corrections facility or program or a prerelease center or prerelease program. In considering alternatives to imprisonment, the court shall examine the sentencing criteria contained in 46-18-225. If the court subsequently sentences the offender to a state prison, the court shall state the reasons why it did not select an alternative to imprisonment, based on the criteria contained in 46-18-225"; in (7) after "supervise the" substituted "offender" for "defendant"; deleted former (13) that read: "(13) Except as provided in 46-18-222, a provision of this section that conflicts with 46-18-219 does not apply to a person sentenced under 46-18-219"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

The amendment to this section made by Ch. 390, L. 1999, was rendered void by sec. 2, Ch. 390, L. 1999, and sec. 11, Ch. 505, L. 1999, coordination sections.

Chapter 395 in (1)(a) near beginning after "verdict" inserted "of guilty" and after "plea of guilty" inserted "or nolo contendere". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

The amendment made by Ch. 395 inserting a reference to a plea of nolo contendere in (1)(a) has been repeated in (2) and (3) pursuant to sec. 14, Ch. 52, L. 1999, a codification instruction.

Chapter 432 in (5) (now 46-18-205(2)) after "45-5-202" deleted "(3) relating to aggravated assault". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

The amendment to (5) made by Ch. 432 was transferred to 46-18-205(2)(b) pursuant to sec. 14, Ch. 52, L. 1999, a codification instruction.

Chapter 505 in (3)(c) and (4)(a) substituted "detention center" for "jail"; in (3)(d)(i) substituted "commit:

(i) an offender not referred to in subsection (3)(d)(ii)" for "commit the defendant", after "corrections" deleted "for a period not to exceed 5 years", and after "program" inserted language requiring all but first 5 years of commitment to be suspended; inserted (3)(d)(ii) authorizing court to commit youth transferred to district court and found guilty of enumerated offense to department for placement in correctional facility or program; in third sentence in (4) (now 46-18-203(7)(b)) substituted "time served in a detention center" for "jail"; in (4)(b) substituted "incarceration in a detention center" for "jail time"; inserted (4)(m) authorizing restrictions or conditions to include order that offender complete boot camp incarceration program; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

The amendment to (4) made by Ch. 505 was transferred to 46-18-203(7)(b) pursuant to sec. 14, Ch. 52, L. 1999, a codification instruction.

A composite section was prepared by the code commissioner for (4)(a) because the changes to (4)(a) made by Ch. 505 were rendered void by the changes made by Ch. 52.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

Applicability: Section 13(1), Ch. 505, L. 1999, provided: "[Section 1] [46-18-201] applies to all persons sentenced on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 28, 1999.

1997 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 181 in (2), in first sentence before "restitution", inserted "full" and deleted second sentence that read: "If the court determines that the defendant is unable to pay restitution, then it may impose, in addition to any other sentence, community service under 46-18-241."

Chapter 189 in (1)(e), near end after "correctional", substituted "facility" for "institution"; and in (11), in third sentence after "sentenced to", substituted "a state prison" for "the state prison or the women's correctional system".

Chapter 322 inserted (1)(a)(ix) and (1)(g) allowing the court to order an offender to a prerelease center or prerelease program for up to a year with the approval of the center or program and with confirmation by the Department of Corrections that space is available; in (1)(e) inserted "for a period not to exceed 5 years"; in (11), at end of first sentence, inserted "or a prerelease center or prerelease program" and in third sentence substituted "a state prison" for "the state prison or the women's correctional system"; inserted (12) providing that felony probationers be supervised by the Department of Corrections unless the court specifies otherwise; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 341 in (10) inserted second and third sentences providing that if a person is also subject to 45-5-512, the person shall undergo certain chemical or drug treatment to reduce sexual fantasies or sex drive and that the period of treatment may not exceed the period the person is under state supervision.

Chapter 375 in (9), after "provided in", deleted "46-18-254, 46-18-255, and".

Chapter 525 in (1)(a) substituted "61-8-734" for "61-8-714 and 61-8-722".

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the most appropriate.

Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 341, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to offenses committed after October 1, 1997."

Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989;and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

Section 14, Ch. 525, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to offenses committed on or after October 1, 1997."

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 125 deleted former (1)(a)(iv) that read: "(iv) restitution"; inserted (2) requiring payment of restitution to victim or community service; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 394 inserted (1)(a)(xii) concerning payment of expenses for the use of a judge pro tempore or special master; at end of (1)(a)(xiii) substituted "restrictions or conditions in subsections (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(xii)" for "above"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

Chapter 407 in (9), after "sexual", inserted "or violent"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in (10), near middle after "enroll in", inserted "and complete"; inserted (12) reconciling sentencing conflicts between 46-18-201, 46-18-219, and 46-18-222; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 in (1)(e) substituted "department of corrections" for "department of corrections and human services"; in (11) substituted "women's correctional system" for "women's correctional center"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the most appropriate.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 43, Ch. 125, L. 1995, provided: "[Sections 10 [46-18-201], 13 [46-18-241], and 21 [46-18-302]] apply to trials for and sentences imposed for crimes that were committed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1995.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-201, enacted as sec. 13 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 10 in (10), in third sentence, substituted reference to the Women's Correctional Center for reference to a women's correctional facility.

Chapter 262 near beginning of (1)(b), after "sentence", inserted "for a period" and after "allowed" inserted "or for a period of 6 months, whichever is greater".

Chapter 365 in (1)(a), after "alcohol or drugs", inserted "or as provided in 61-6-304".

Chapter 579 substituted (1)(e) that read: "impose a county jail or state prison sentence, as provided in Title 45, for the offense or commit the defendant to the department of corrections and human services for placement in an appropriate correctional institution or program" for "commit the defendant to a correctional institution, with or without a fine as provided by law for the offense". Amendment effective April 28, 1993.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 42 in (4) changed subsection reference to 45-9-102; and made minor change in style.

Chapter 105 in (1)(a), in first sentence before "sentences", substituted "except as provided in 61-8-714 and 61-8-722 for" for "excepting"; inserted (1)(a)(xi) providing for home arrest; at end of (1)(b) deleted reference to subsections of (1)(a); in last sentence of (3), after "jail", inserted "or home arrest"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 554 inserted (1)(a)(ix) and (1)(f) allowing court to place an offender in a community corrections facility or program; and in (1)(b) and (1)(g) changed subsection reference. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 564 in (4) inserted reference to 45-5-502(3); and in (7) deleted reference to 45-5-502(3).

Chapter 794 inserted (1)(a)(ix) concerning approval for community corrections placement; in (1)(b), at end, extended reference to subsection (1)(a)(xii); inserted (1)(f) concerning approval for community corrections placement; in (1)(g) extended reference to subsection (1)(f); and inserted (10) concerning consideration of alternative sentencing for nonviolent offenders. Amendment effective July 1, 1991. The Code Commissioner has combined the amendments inserting (1)(a)(ix) and (1)(f) made by Ch. 554 and Ch. 794 to reflect the content of both chapters.

Chapter 802 in (4) inserted reference to 45-9-202.

Severability: Section 14, Ch. 105, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 15, Ch. 105, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies to sentences imposed after [the effective date of this act] [effective October 1, 1991]."

1989 Amendments: Chapter 293 inserted (8) regarding registration of sexual offenders; inserted (9) requiring enrollment in sexual offender program by convicted sexual offenders; and made minor changes in punctuation. Amendment effective July 1, 1989.

Chapter 575 in (4) inserted reference to 45-9-101(5)(d); and made minor changes in grammar. Amendment effective April 20, 1989.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 370 near middle of (4), after "45-5-103", substituted "45-5-202(3) relating to aggravated assault" for "45-5-202(2)".

Chapter 610 in (4) substituted reference to 45-5-103 for reference to 45-5-103(2); and in (5) substituted reference to 45-5-102 for reference to 45-5-102(2).

Chapter 626 in (3) substituted language stating that if subsection (1)(a) or (1)(b) restrictions or conditions are violated, the court may disallow all or part of elapsed time (except jail time already served) against the sentence for "If any restrictions or conditions imposed under subsection (1)(a) or (1)(b) are violated, any elapsed time, except jail time, is not a credit against the sentence unless the court orders otherwise."

1985 Amendments: Chapter 205 at end of (1)(a)(iv) deleted "as provided in subsection (2)"; and in (2) substituted "any financial obligation" for "restitution" and after "(1)(a)", deleted "or (1)(b)".

Chapter 524 inserted (7) requiring that a minimum of 30 days of any imprisonment sentence be served if the victim was less than 16 years old.

1983 Amendments: Chapter 189, in (1)(a), after "for a period" inserted "except as otherwise provided"; in (1)(a)(iv), inserted "as provided in subsection (2)"; in (1)(b), after "allowed for", substituted "each" for "the"; and inserted (2) allowing deferral of sentence if a financial restitution is imposed as a sentence condition.

Chapter 581, in (1)(a)(ii), changed "90 days" to "180 days"; and inserted (1)(a)(v) including the condition of payment of the costs of confinement.

1981 Amendments: Chapter 198 inserted (1)(a)(v), (1)(a)(vi), and (1)(a)(vii) relating to payment of fine, payment of costs, and community service, respectively; in (1)(b) inserted "or conditions" following "restrictions" in two places; inserted (1)(d) relating to requiring payment of costs; and revised subsection references to reflect inserted subsections.

Chapter 207 inserted (5) restricting deferral of imposition of sentence in a felony case.

Chapter 415 inserted (1)(a)(vii) relating to payment of costs; inserted "or conditions" after "restrictions" in the second and third sentence of (1)(b); changed "(1)(a)(vi)" to "(1)(a)(x)" in (1)(b); inserted (1)(d) relating to payment of costs; and changed "subsections (1)(b), (1)(c), and (1)(d)" to "subsections (1)(b) through (1)(e)" in (1)(f).

Applicability of Commission Comments: The applicability of commission comments should be evaluated with reference to numerous subsequent amendments.

Saving Clause: Section 4, Ch. 322, L. 1979, provided: "This act applies only to offenses committed after the effective date of this act." The effective date was July 1, 1979.

Authority of District Court to Sentence Youth to Department of Corrections for Fifteen Years With None Suspended: After Quesnel violated five conditions of a suspended sentence for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, Quesnel was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections with a recommendation for placement at the state prison and that parole eligibility be conditioned on completion of sexual offender treatment. Quesnel was a youth at the time of the offenses but was charged directly in District Court as an adult. Quesnel contended that the District Court lacked authority to impose a 15-year sentence because under the 2001 version of 46-18-201(3)(d)(i), all but the first 5 years of the sentence should be suspended. The state maintained that 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) should apply because Quesnel was a youth whose case was transferred to District Court, so the District Court was authorized to impose the longer sentence. Quesnel argued that because charges were filed directly in District Court, his case was never technically transferred. The Supreme Court examined the legislative history to reconcile the use of the term "transferred" and concluded that 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) applied not only to a youth whose case was transferred from Youth Court to District Court, but also to any youth who appears in District Court pursuant to 41-5-206. Quesnel appeared in District Court to answer charges of an offense enumerated in 41-5-206 and was found guilty, therefore the provisions of 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) applied, and the District Court was not required to suspend all but 5 years of Quesnel's sentence but in fact was authorized to impose the 15-year sentence. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Quesnel, 2009 MT 388, 353 M 317, 220 P3d 634 (2009).

Report Containing List of Victim's Medical Expenses Insufficient to Serve as Victim-Submitted Affidavit: A presentence investigation report set out the medical expenses paid by or on behalf of a crime victim, but no documentation or evidence of payment was included. The Supreme Court concluded that the report was not sufficient in form and substance to serve as the victim-submitted affidavit of medical expenses required under 46-18-242(1)(b) to form the basis for establishing the amount of restitution owed by defendant for the victim's medical expenses. St. v. Hunt, 2009 MT 265, 352 M 70, 214 P3d 1234 (2009). See also McDermott v. Carie, LLC, 2005 MT 293, 329 M 295, 124 P3d 168 (2005).

No Statutory Indication That Youth Received Illegal Sentence Following Transfer of Case to District Court: At the age of 17, Strong was charged with two counts of felony burglary, and the state moved to transfer the charges to District Court. The state also filed theft charges against Strong in Youth Court. Strong entered a guilty plea on the burglary charges in exchange for dismissal of the theft charges. The District Court sentenced Strong to the Department of Corrections for 8 years, with 2 years suspended on each count. While serving the prison term, Strong challenged the sentence as illegal because the District Court failed to suspend all but 5 years. The state countered that the 5-year limitation in 46-18-201(3)(d) did not apply to a youth who was transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. The District Court affirmed the original sentence and Strong appealed. Applying the criteria in St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), the Supreme Court addressed the facial challenge to the exemption in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) and affirmed. In order for an adult to receive the less onerous commitment to the Department of Corrections, the sentencing court must be willing to suspend all but 5 years of the commitment, but the statute imposes no similar impediment on a court's ability to commit to the Department a youth transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. This enhanced flexibility with regard to the treatment of youth offenders comports with the goals of the Youth Court Act to ensure rehabilitation of youth offenders rather than solely retribution. Therefore, nothing in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) established that Strong received an illegal sentence. St. v. Strong, 2009 MT 65, 349 M 417, 203 P3d 848 (2009). See also In re C.H., 210 M 184, 683 P2d 931 (1984).

Failure of Defendant to Admit Incest — Sentence Not Considered More Harsh Given Relevant Sentencing Factors: Bullman consistently maintained that he was not guilty of incest with his stepdaughter because he was never married to her mother. Because Bullman refused to admit guilt and was thus ineligible for community-based treatment, he asserted that he was sentenced more harshly by being sentenced to prison. The Supreme Court examined the record and disagreed. The sentencing court was aware of the prohibition against sentencing a defendant to prison because the defendant does not admit guilt, but the court also considered numerous other relevant factors in sentencing Bullman to prison in addition to the expert opinion that Bullman was not a candidate for community-based treatment, including: (1) the significant impact of the crime on the victim; (2) the need to protect society; (3) Bullman's need for appropriate treatment; (4) Bullman's criminal history; and (5) Bullman's long history of substance abuse. Given these sentencing factors, the Supreme Court could not conclude that Bullman was sentenced to prison for failure to admit guilt, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999).

Inability of District Court to Impose Sentence in Plea Agreement — Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Allowed: Deserly negotiated a plea agreement on a felony assault with a weapon charge wherein the state would recommend a 10-year sentence with the Department of Corrections and Deserly would be designated a persistent felony offender. However, after the plea was entered, the District Court and Deserly discovered that under 46-18-201, all but the first 5 years of a department commitment must be suspended, so the sentence in the plea agreement was not one that could be legally imposed. Deserly then moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds of good cause, but the District Court denied the motion, and Deserly appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), a defendant's plea is not voluntary if the court, the prosecutor, defense counsel, or some other party induced the plea, however slightly, by misrepresentation, including unfulfilled or unfulfillable promises. At the time Deserly entered the plea, it was reasonable for him to expect that the District Court could at least consider, if not actually impose, the recommended sentence, and Deserly was induced, at least in part, by the prospect of being able to receive the sentence that he and the prosecutor had negotiated and agreed to recommend. Because Deserly was induced by an unfulfillable promise of an illegal sentence, albeit unintentionally, his plea was not voluntary, and the case was remanded for further proceedings to allow Deserly to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008).

Court's Sua Sponte Withdrawal of Defendant's Guilty Plea Following Judgment Considered Mistake of Law: Friedt pleaded guilty to a stop sign violation and to a charge of failing to carry proof of insurance in the vehicle and was sentenced in Municipal Court. During sentencing, the County Attorney failed to raise any issues of restitution. After judgment was entered, the court was advised by a victim of a claim of damages associated with Friedt's offenses. The court, sua sponte, withdrew Friedt's guilty pleas, appointed counsel, and set an omnibus hearing. Friedt then petitioned the Supreme Court for supervisory control, asserting that the Municipal Court lacked jurisdiction to vacate or modify the sentence once a valid sentence was pronounced and thus proceeded under a mistake of law in withdrawing the guilty pleas, which would result in a gross injustice and unnecessary expense if Friedt was required to stand trial on charges to which she knowingly and voluntarily pleaded guilty and on which she had been sentenced. The County Attorney argued that the Municipal Court retained jurisdiction under 46-16-702 and that the interests of justice to the victim and the mandatory restitution provision in 46-18-201 required the Municipal Court to remedy the situation sua sponte. The Supreme Court noted that 46-16-702 allows a new trial, following judgment, for a defendant in the interests of justice, but that the statute does not authorize a new proceeding to benefit a victim or a prosecutor who fails to timely raise a sentencing matter. Further, although 46-16-105 allows a court for good cause to allow withdrawal of a guilty plea within 1 year after judgment if evidence supports a fundamental miscarriage of justice, nothing in the statute allows a court to forcibly withdraw a defendant's guilty plea sua sponte under any circumstances. Therefore, the Supreme Court agreed that the Municipal Court's action constituted a mistake of law. Friedt's petition for supervisory control was granted, and the Municipal Court was instructed to vacate the order withdrawing Friedt's guilty pleas. Friedt v. Billings Municipal Court, 2008 MT 174, 343 M 386, 184 P3d 1032 (2008).

Adoption of Herd Standard of Review of Challenges to Legality or Propriety of Probation Conditions: The appropriate standard of review for cases challenging the legality or propriety of probation conditions is the two-pronged standard set out in St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004). The sentencing condition is first reviewed for legality. Then, because sentencing statutes authorize the imposition of conditions on deferred or suspended sentences that constitute reasonable restrictions or conditions considered necessary for the rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society, the reasonableness of the conditions is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Revocation of Suspended Felony DUI Sentence — Erroneous Order to Serve Time at State Prison: After pleading guilty to a felony DUI committed in 2000, Oie was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 13 months, followed by 4 years of supervised release with conditions. Oie was subsequently apprehended on several occasions for violating probation conditions, and the state moved to revoke Oie's suspended sentence. The District Court gave Oie credit for time served and sentenced Oie to 4 years at the state prison. Oie appealed the sentence, arguing that under the 1999 version of 61-8-731 in effect at the time of the original offense, the District Court could not impose a sentence that was greater than the remainder of the probationary term. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The specific provisions of 61-8-731(5) (1999) governed the imposition of a sentence upon the revocation of Oie's suspended sentence and limited the District Court to either continuing the period of probation or requiring Oie to serve the remainder of the probation sentence. A 4-year prison sentence was outside statutory parameters, and the case was remanded for resentencing consistent with the applicable statute. St. v. Oie, 2007 MT 328, 340 M 205, 174 P3d 937 (2007), following St. v. Webb, 2005 MT 5, 325 M 317, 106 P3d 521 (2005).

Res Judicata Not Bar to Correction of Manifest Error in Prior Decision — Illegal Sentence Reversed: In 1998, when Southwick committed two felonies, this section limited commitment to the Department of Corrections (DOC) to 5 years. In 1999, the Legislature amended the statute to allow a longer DOC commitment up to the maximum time that a defendant could be sentenced for a particular offense, provided that all but the first 5 years of commitment are suspended. When Southwick's parole was subsequently revoked in 2003, the District Court revoked the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments to the DOC, even though Southwick had discharged his unsuspended commitments to the DOC, and ordered Southwick to be recommitted to the DOC for an additional 5 years in each case. Southwick petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the petition was denied on grounds of res judicata. Southwick also moved the District Court for resentencing on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the motion was denied, and Southwick appealed. The Supreme Court noted that res judicata generally precludes reviewing an issue already decided and that relitigation of issues in criminal cases is barred if: (1) the same ground presented in the subsequent application was determined adversely to the applicant on the prior application; (2) the prior determination was on the merits; and (3) the ends of justice would not be served by reaching the merits of the subsequent application. The court also noted that when a criminal defendant is potentially subject to a facially illegal sentence, the ends of justice suggest that res judicata should not bar rehearing the issues even if the first two criteria are met. In this case, the District Court applied a statute that was not in effect at the time that Southwick committed the crimes, which violated the prohibition on ex post facto laws. Because the District Court did not have authority to impose the sentence, the sentence was illegal and facially invalid. The 5-year DOC commitment for each offense was valid, but not the suspended portions following Southwick's commitment. Southwick had discharged the maximum time that he could have been committed to DOC before the petition to revoke was filed, and the District Court had no authority to revoke a suspended commitment that was illegally imposed. Therefore, the Supreme Court vacated the order revoking the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments. St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Failure to Base More Onerous Resentence on Objective Information Concerning Identifiable Conduct by Defendant or to Set Out Reasons for Longer Sentence Affirmatively in Record Violative of Due Process — Resentence Reversed: Following conviction for sexual intercourse without consent, Jackson was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 6 years and ordered to complete a sex offender treatment program before becoming eligible for parole. More than 2 years later, Jackson moved for resentencing, alleging that the sentence violated subsection (3)(d)(i) of this section, which requires that all but the first 5 years of commitment to the Department of Corrections must be suspended, but the motion was dismissed as untimely. Jackson then petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus. The state conceded that the sentence was illegal, but asserted that resentencing, rather than striking the illegal portion of the sentence, was the proper remedy. The District Court agreed and resentenced Jackson to a 6-year term at the state prison with the same program completion requirements, after determining that the new sentence was not more onerous. Jackson appealed. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Redfern, 2004 MT 277, 323 M 225, 99 P3d 223 (2004), in order to meet due process requirements and allow full appellate review of the constitutional legitimacy of the sentence, a longer sentence on resentencing after a new trial must be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of the defendant after the original sentencing and reasons for the longer sentence must affirmatively appear in the record. Additionally, a sentencing court denies a defendant's due process rights by imposing a heavier sentence as punishment for setting aside the original sentence. In this case, Jackson's resentence was considered more onerous, and the sentencing judge did not base the more burdensome sentence on objective information concerning identifiable conduct by Jackson after the original sentencing or set out the reasons for the longer sentence affirmatively in the record, thus violating Jackson's due process rights. St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007).

No Prejudice Shown in Incorporation of Tribal Court Juvenile Record Into Sentencing Procedure — Due Process Not Violated: Phillips sought postconviction relief on grounds that his tribal court juvenile record had been illegally requested by the state and incorporated into the presentence investigation report and sentencing proceedings in violation of due process. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed without addressing the issue of release of the record under tribal law. Phillips did not present any evidence that the juvenile record or any information in the presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate, that the tribal court record influenced placement with the Department of Corrections, or that he was prejudiced by the tribal court record in violation of due process, so dismissal of the petition for postconviction relief was not erroneous. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Sentence Based Upon Lack of Remorse Inferred From Silence Not Legal Sentence: Rennaker was found guilty of incest after defending against the charge by asserting consent and that the victim was 20 years old at the time of the offense. When Rennaker was found guilty and asked at his sentencing hearing if he had anything to say and he replied that he did not, the District Court found that silence indicated Rennaker's lack of remorse and sentenced Rennaker to a term in the state prison. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), and St. v. Cesnik, 2005 MT 257, 329 M 63, 122 P3d 456 (2005), held that because the District Court did not tie Rennaker's apparent lack of remorse to any evidence or statement by him, but rather inferred it from Rennaker's silence, the District Court violated Rennaker's right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court remanded the case for resentencing. St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Sufficient Accurate Information to Support Sentence for Distribution of Methamphetamine: Harper was sentenced to 20 years in prison with 10 years suspended and fined $12,000 after pleading guilty to possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute. Harper appealed on grounds that the sentencing court based the sentence on inaccurate and insufficient evidence that Harper was the center of the drug operation. Harper had a right to be sentenced based on correct evidence, but also had the affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that the alleged misinformation was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report. In this case, the sentencing court did nothing more than consider relevant information relating to the nature and circumstances of the possession of drugs found during the search of Harper's home, including unrefuted information that Harper was at the center of a methamphetamine distribution business conducted from the home. Information in the presentence investigation report simply underscored Harper's involvement in drug distribution and supported that charge to which Harper pleaded guilty. The information was properly before the sentencing court, and the court did not err in imposing a sentence within the statutory parameters. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Harper, 2006 MT 259, 334 M 138, 144 P3d 826 (2006), followed in St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007), with respect to defendant's affirmative duty to show, beyond mere unsupported contentions, that alleged misinformation in a presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate and to present information establishing inaccuracies in the presentence investigation report.

Punishment for Defendant's Refusal to Accept Responsibility or Show Remorse Not Considered Legal Sentence: Although steadfastly maintaining innocence, Cesnik was convicted of assaulting a fellow gun club member with a weapon. The sentencing court was dismayed at Cesnik's refusal to acknowledge the verdict and placed considerable weight on the fact that Cesnik refused to accept responsibility for the crime despite having been convicted. The court spent the bulk of the sentencing hearing commenting on the need to impose a sentence that would instill a sense of responsibility in Cesnik and then sentenced Cesnik to 10 years with 6 years suspended. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that a sentencing court may not punish a defendant for failing to accept responsibility for a crime when the defendant has expressly maintained innocence and has a right to appeal the conviction. St. v. Cesnik, 2005 MT 257, 329 M 63, 122 P3d 456 (2005), followed in St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Imposition of Restitution Only Upon Deferral or Suspension of Sentence Under 2001 Version of Statute: In addition to Honey's sentences for felony theft, the District Court also ordered Honey to pay restitution and ordered forfeiture of Honey's bond as partial payment of restitution. Honey contended that under the 2001 version of this section in effect at the time that the crimes were committed, the court exceeded its statutory authority by imposing restitution because the statute allowed imposition of a restitution obligation only if all or part of the sentence was deferred or suspended. The Supreme Court agreed. In the absence of a deferral or suspension of all or part of Honey's sentence, it was improper for the District Court to impose restitution on top of Honey's prison term. Because the restitution order was reversed, the order of forfeiture of Honey's bail for restitution was also reversed. St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under 41-5-206. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to 46-21-105, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under 46-21-102, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

No Standing to Raise Constitutionality of Restitution Statutes Absent Showing of Direct Personal Injury: The 2003 Legislature amended the state restitution statutes, and Thaut sought to challenge the constitutionality of the amendments on numerous grounds. However, Thaut was unable to show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the restitution laws. Pursuant to St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990), and Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), Thaut lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the restitution statutes, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004). See also St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), in which defendant established direct economic injury and thus standing to challenge the constitutionality of repayment conditions on equal protection grounds through the District Court's order to repay $2,398 in costs of appointed counsel.

Restitution Order Proper Given Defendant's Ability to Pay: The sentencing court ordered Thaut to pay $69,457 in restitution. Thaut appealed the award on grounds that the court failed to meet statutory requirements establishing Thaut's financial resources and future ability to pay and on grounds that due process rights were violated when the court failed to consider several factors in Thaut's ability to pay, including Thaut's age and short time to work following parole, minimum wage employment history, lack of assets and ability to acquire assets in the future, and mental health issues related to an alleged prior head injury. However, the presentence investigation and supplemental presentence investigation provided adequate documentation regarding Thaut's ability to pay restitution and to work hard to earn a living. Further, Thaut had no documented physical limitations and was unemployed only because he was incarcerated. The District Court's determination that Thaut had the ability to pay medical expenses, a grant from the Board of Crime Control, and property damages was amply supported by the record, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Right to Appeal Error in Length of Sentence Lost by Failing to File Petition Within Statutory Time Limit: Pena, who was 17 years of age at the time, was sentenced as an adult to 45 years in prison for deliberate homicide and aggravated burglary. Pena did not challenge the legality of his sentence on direct appeal, but more than a year after entering a guilty plea and being sentenced, Pena filed a petition alleging that his sentence was illegal because the Montana Youth Court Act provided that a youth could not be sentenced to the custody of the Department of Corrections for more than 5 years and therefore the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to impose a longer sentence. Pena argued that the lack of subject matter jurisdiction was not subject to any statutory postconviction time limits for filing appeals and could be raised at any time. The Supreme Court held that an error in sentencing does not divest a court of subject matter jurisdiction over the case before it. The Supreme Court further held that all postconviction claims, both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional, must be brought within the 1-year time limit provided by statute and that the time limit was jurisdictional and was not waived by the state's failure to raise the issue in District Court. Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004). Pena was overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Pena held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Increased Sentence Imposed on Resentencing After Original Sentence Vacated Not Due Process Violation: After Redfern's petition for postconviction relief was granted, Redfern's original sentence was vacated and the District Court resentenced him to a greater period of potential imprisonment and supervision than the original sentence. Redfern appealed the new sentence, contending that the greater sentence on resentencing violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under N.C. v. Pearce 395 US 711 (1969), neither double jeopardy nor equal protection bars imposition of a more severe sentence upon resentencing after an original conviction is set aside unless a heavier sentence is imposed to punish a defendant for successfully having the original conviction set aside. However, in order to meet due process requirements and allow full appellate review of the constitutional legitimacy of the sentence, a longer sentence on resentencing after a new trial must be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of the defendant after the original sentencing and reasons for the longer sentence must affirmatively appear on the record. Both conditions were met here, there was no showing that the more severe sentence was imposed as retaliatory motivation by the sentencing judge, and the new sentence was within statutory sentencing parameters. St. v. Redfern, 2004 MT 277, 323 M 225, 99 P3d 223 (2004), following St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363 (1988), and St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), and distinguishing St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Failure to Raise Question of District Court's Sentencing Authority on Direct Appeal — Issue Precluded in Postconviction Hearing: In a petition for postconviction relief, Thurston alleged that the District Court erred by imposing a prison sentence without considering the statutory nonviolent offender criteria. The claim was denied by the District Court on grounds that the issue should have been raised on direct appeal. The Supreme Court affirmed. Contrary to Thurston's contention, the issue was not a subject matter jurisdiction issue that could be raised at any time. The failure to consider nonviolent offender sentencing alternatives should have been raised on direct appeal, and failure to do so precluded consideration of the issue in postconviction proceedings. Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145 (1996).

Error in Sentencing to Department of Corrections — Remand Based on Partially Illegal Sentence: Upon conviction for sexual intercourse without consent, the District Court sentenced Heath to the Department of Corrections for 25 years with 5 years suspended and required Heath to complete a sex offender program and a criminal thinking course at the state prison. However, the court erred because under subsection (3)(d) of this section, commitment to the Department requires that all but the first 5 years of the sentence be suspended. The Supreme Court generally remands for resentencing if the illegal portion of a sentence affects the entire sentence or if the court is unable to discern what sentence the trial court would have imposed if it had correctly applied the law. Heath asserted that resentencing could impermissibly expose him to an increased sentence if the trial court was vindictive because Heath successfully attacked the conviction. Nevertheless, the illegal unsuspended portion of Heath's sentence affected the entire sentence, so the case was remanded with instructions that the sentencing court avoid vindictiveness in imposing a new sentence. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 58, 320 M 211, 89 P3d 947 (2004). On remand, the District Court sentenced Heath to prison for 25 years with 15 years suspended. Citing St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005), Heath appealed on grounds that commitment to prison instead of to the Department of Corrections was harsher than the original sentence, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Despite the more flexible nature of a commitment to the Department of Corrections, Heath could not seriously argue that he received a harsher sentence on remand because the sentence was changed to run concurrently rather than consecutively, actually reducing the sentence by 12 years. St. v. Heath, 2005 MT 280, 329 M 226, 123 P3d 228 (2005).

Consideration at Sentencing of Alleged Crimes Dismissed by Plea Bargain Not Violative of Due Process: At sentencing, the District Court considered allegations of other crimes for which Mason had been initially charged but that had been dismissed by plea agreement. Mason contended that consideration of statements related to unproved conduct violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court noted that due process protects a defendant from being sentenced based on misinformation and requires that a defendant be given an opportunity to rebut any information that may lead to deprivation of life, liberty, or property, but does not protect against all misinformation unless the sentence is premised on materially false misinformation. The court also noted that St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376 (1996), allows a sentencing court to consider any evidence that has probative force, including other acts that have been dismissed by plea agreement, as in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981). Nothing in Mason's plea agreement prevented the state from presenting the facts of the case during the sentencing hearing, and in fact, that inquiry is required as part of the presentence investigation report under 46-18-112. Mason failed to show that the sentencing court relied on misinformation and thus was not entitled to resentencing on due process grounds. Further, the plea agreement required relinquishment of Mason's parental rights, so the sentencing court properly considered evidence of the danger Mason posed to the other children in order to approve that portion of the agreement. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

Presumption of Punishment for Going to Trial Based on Difference Between Pretrial Offer and Actual Sentence — Remand: As set out in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), when a District Court becomes involved in plea negotiations and an offer is made, any difference in the sentencing after trial must point out the factors justifying an increased sentence, and failure to enumerate the factors leads to the presumption that a greater sentence has been imposed for a vindictive purpose. Here, when the District Court failed to justify having an 11-year sentence run consecutively rather than concurrently with another sentence, the Baldwin standard requiring an explanation for imposing a harsher sentence than that offered in plea negotiations was not met, constituting reversible error. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Error in Failing to Consider Street Time Credit at Time Sentence Revoked — Remand for Resentencing: Pursuant to the 1997 version of this section in effect at the time of Williams' sentencing, District Courts were required to either allow or reject street time, meaning time spent serving a suspended sentence, as credit against a term of incarceration imposed as a result of the revocation of an individual's sentence. Thus, the District Court erred by not considering and awarding or denying street time credit to Williams at the time that his suspended sentence was revoked. The only remaining question was whether the case should be remanded for resentencing or whether the remaining days that Williams had not already served on probation or in prison should be excused. The District Court's error resulted in the imposition of a revoked suspended sentence that was not reduced to account for some or all of the time already served. The error affected the entire sentence, and there was no discreet portion that could be identified or stricken. Because the Supreme Court was unable to surmise what the District Court would have done if it had followed the statutory directive, the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Williams, 2003 MT 136, 316 M 140, 69 P3d 222 (2003). See also Speldrich v. McCormick, 243 M 238, 794 P2d 339 (1990), and St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002).

Adequate Nexus Between Alcohol Consumption and Sexual Assault to Warrant Substance Monitoring as Sentencing Condition for Sex Crime: As a condition of probation for Flanagan's 10-year suspended sentence for felony sexual assault, the District Court required that Flanagan: (1) submit to alcohol and drug testing at the probation officer's request; (2) undergo a chemical dependency evaluation and, if recommended, chemical dependency treatment; and (3) not possess alcohol or drugs or frequent places where alcohol is the main item of sale. Citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), Flanagan protested the conditions on grounds that they had no nexus to the offense or the environment in which it was committed. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, noting that Flanagan himself connected the assault charge to his alcohol consumption in requesting a mental evaluation to determine whether his substance use rendered him capable of acting knowingly. There was a sufficient connection between the offense and Flanagan's chronic alcohol consumption to warrant imposition of the parole conditions, and the sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Prior DUI Convictions Properly Used to Enhance Sentence: The District Court used three prior DUI convictions to sentence Jackson for felony DUI. Jackson contended that use of two of the prior convictions was improper because he waived his right to counsel in one case and because he did not have an attorney in another case. However, when a defendant collaterally attacks a prior conviction, a presumption of regularity attaches to the conviction and failure to sign a waiver of rights does not constitute reversible error but is merely a factor to be considered in the totality of the circumstances. Here, the state provided sufficient proof for the court to rely on the prior convictions in sentencing, and the court did not err in doing so. St. v. Jackson, 2002 MT 212, 311 M 281, 54 P3d 990 (2002).

No Abuse of Discretion in Imposing Sentence Greater Than Sentence Suggested in Plea Agreement — Sentence Adequately Explained: Wells was charged with DUI, negligent vehicular assault, operation of a motor vehicle without insurance, and driving with a revoked license. Wells entered a plea agreement in which he pleaded guilty to negligent vehicular assault and driving with a revoked license and agreed to pay restitution, and the prosecution agreed to recommend a 5-year sentence with all but 18 months suspended. At the sentencing hearing, Wells' probation officer disagreed with the recommended sentence, stating that 18 months was an insufficient time for Wells to deal with his alcohol and drug problems and that restitution was unlikely given Wells' work and drug abuse history. The sentencing court considered the testimony and the evidence and imposed a 5-year sentence without any time suspended. Wells appealed on grounds that the sentence was not adequately explained and was erroneous. Under St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), the sentencing court has the discretion to impose the maximum sentence allowed by law but should provide any rationale for the sentence. Here, the court provided a rationale, explaining the nature of the offense and the degree of harm done by Wells and describing Wells' history of drug abuse and inability to pay restitution as well as a concern for future harm to society. Wells was informed that the judge was not bound by the terms of the plea agreement and retained the authority to impose a greater or lesser sentence than recommended, within the statutory limits for the offense. The sentence was adequately explained and within statutory limits and was thus affirmed. St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 112, 305 M 303, 27 P3d 47 (2001).

Suspending Less of Sentence After Retrial Than After First Trial — Court's Belief Time Needed to Complete Ordered Programs: If a judge imposes a more severe sentence upon a defendant after a new trial than that imposed in the former trial, the reasons for doing so must appear in the record and be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of defendant occurring after the time of the original sentencing. Otherwise, there is a presumption that the greater sentence was for a vindictive purpose, and the presumption must be rebutted. It was constitutionally legitimate for the court to reduce, after a second trial resulting in the same incarceration term, the amount of time that the sentence was suspended after the first trial. The court believed that defendant needed the time to complete rehabilitative programs that the court ordered him to complete in each sentence and suspended less time to ensure that there was sufficient time to complete the programs. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Four-Year Mandatory Minimum Sentence for Sexual Intercourse With Minor Properly Applied: By plea agreement, Fauque pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault against his 14-year-old daughter. The District Court concluded that the 4-year minimum sentence provided in 45-5-503 applied and that Fauque had failed to establish entitlement to any exceptions to the mandatory minimum sentence provided in 46-18-222. The court sentenced Fauque to 25 years on each count, with all but 4 years suspended and the sentences to run concurrently. Fauque appealed on grounds that a direct conflict existed between the mandatory minimum sentence for sexual intercourse without consent when the victim is less than 16 and the defendant is 3 or more years older contained in 45-5-503 and the 30-day mandatory minimum sentence for sexual intercourse without consent when the victim is less than 16 contained in this section (see 1999 amendment and enactment of 46-18-205). The Supreme Court examined the legislative intent of both sentencing provisions and found no conflict in this case. The 4-year mandatory minimum provided in 45-5-503 clearly applied to Fauque, who was 53 years old at the time that he assaulted his 14-year-old daughter and who did not argue any sentencing exception under 46-18-222. The mandatory minimum (now contained in 46-18-205) in this section simply disallowed suspension of the first 30 days of a sentence under 45-5-503 under any circumstances, even if an exception existed under 46-18-222. Because no exception existed here, this section did not come into play, so the Supreme Court affirmed Fauque's 4-year mandatory minimum sentence pursuant to 45-5-503. St. v. Fauque, 2000 MT 168, 300 M 307, 4 P3d 651, 57 St. Rep. 693 (2000).

Retroactive Applicability of Judicial Rule Regarding Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: Retroactivity is a threshold matter that compels the evenhanded application of a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions to all similarly situated cases that are pending on direct appeal or not yet final. Therefore, all defendants whose cases meet those criteria are entitled to the retroactive application of a new judicial rule of criminal procedure. This standard applies irrespective of whether the new judicial rule constitutes a clear break from existing precedent and without regard to whether the rule was available to the District Court at the time that it ruled. Thus in the present case, the rule in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), that oral pronouncement of sentence controls over the written sentence for purposes of finality applied retroactively to Waters' appeal, even though the District Court did not have the Lane rule at the time of sentencing. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), following St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), overruling St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), Peterson v. Mont. Bank of Bozeman, N.A., 212 M 37, 687 P2d 673 (1984), and their progeny, and followed in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). See also Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989).

Misdemeanor Offender Not Entitled to Consideration of Mandatory Sentencing Requirement Applicable to Nonviolent Felony Offenders: Renee was sentenced to incarceration for three misdemeanor violations. On appeal, Renee contended that because the misdemeanors were nonviolent offenses, the District Court erred in not complying with this section by considering alternatives to sentencing for Renee's nonviolent offenses. However, the plain language of 46-18-104(3) applies only to defendants who commit a particular kind of felony that is nonviolent. Therefore, a misdemeanor offender is not entitled to have a sentencing court consider the mandatory sentencing requirements of 46-18-225 and this section, which apply only to felony offenders. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999).

Nonviolent Felony Offenders Not Similarly Situated With Misdemeanor Offenders — No Equal Protection Violation in Different Felony and Misdemeanor Sentencing Schemes: Renee contended that Montana's nonviolent felony offender sentencing statutes violated his equal protection rights to physical liberty as a misdemeanor offender because both kinds of offenders may be subject to imprisonment, thus both felony and misdemeanor offenders are similarly situated classes dealt with unequally under the law. The Supreme Court disagreed. Relying on Tigner v. Tex., 310 US 141, 84 L Ed 1124, 60 S Ct 879 (1940), the court found that the constitution does not require that things that are different in fact or opinion be treated in law as though they were the same. Misdemeanor and felony offenders are not similarly situated because of differences in the quality and duration of punishment, as well as the long-term effects on an individual's liberty interest brought about by a felony conviction as compared to that for a misdemeanor conviction. Renee failed to make the necessary threshold showing that misdemeanor and nonviolent felony offenders are similarly situated, so the equal protection challenge failed. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999), distinguishing In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997).

No Error in Youth Court Conclusion That Incarceration Not Mandatory if Youth Convicted in District Court: In its transfer order, the Youth Court concluded that transferring Spina into the adult system neither mandated incarceration nor precluded rehabilitation and that although any commitment of the youth must necessarily be to the Department of Corrections, the Department was not necessarily bound to incarcerate Spina. The Supreme Court agreed. The sentencing guidelines in this section provide a District Court with a number of sentencing options, including imposition of a deferred or suspended sentence. The Youth Court was correct in concluding that Spina's conviction would not mandate incarceration. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Payment of Justice's Court Cost Imposed as Judgment of District Court Held Improper — Smith Reaffirmed: Morales was charged with assaulting a sports official, in violation of 45-5-211, after striking a basketball referee. Upon his conviction in Justice's Court, Morales appealed to District Court. Upon his conviction, the District Court ordered Morales to pay the costs of the trial in Justice's Court. The Supreme Court reaffirmed its holding in Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), and held that a trial de novo in District Court has the effect of erasing any debt for costs in Justice's Court incurred before the appeal to District Court. St. v. Morales, 284 M 238, 943 P2d 1286, 54 St. Rep. 862 (1997).

Recommendation of Prosecutor and Probation Officer Adequate Statement of Sentencing Reason — No Improper Reliance on Pending Charge in Sentencing: The District Court's statements both orally and in its written sentence that Goulet's sentence was imposed at the recommendation of the prosecutor and the probation officer, plus the court's consideration of Goulet's prior record and long history of contact with the legal system, were sufficient statements of sentencing reasons to comply with St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980). Further, in the present case, nothing in the record indicated that the sentencing court improperly relied on a pending deliberate homicide charge against Goulet in sentencing him for escape. St. v. Goulet, 277 M 308, 921 P2d 1245, 53 St. Rep. 739 (1996), following St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248 (1986), St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759 (1988), and St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990).

Sexual Abuse — Failure of District Court to Consider Sentencing Alternatives — No Objection — Sentence Not Illegal or Violation of Due Process: Swoboda pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of children, was classified as a nondangerous offender, and was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections. On appeal, she claimed as error the District Court's failure to consider alternatives to incarceration. The Supreme Court noted that she had not objected at sentencing to the District Court's failure and declined to review the judgment. The Supreme Court noted that in the past, it had made an exception and reviewed such a failure of the District Court when the state conceded the failure of the District Court or when the sentence was illegal. Here, however, the Supreme Court noted that the sentence was not beyond the District Court's jurisdiction. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep 310 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that the failure of the District Court was not a manifest miscarriage of justice and would not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or the proceedings. St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996).

Judgment as Including Sentence — Sentence Not Strictly Premised on Punishment: A defendant had 60 days under former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to appeal a final judgment. Although prior to the 1991 enactment of 46-1-202, "sentence" was interpreted as being the same as "punishment", 46-1-202 now defines a sentence as any judicial disposition of a criminal proceeding upon a plea, verdict, or finding of guilt. The judicial disposition is itself a sentence regardless of whether actual punishment is deferred or imposed immediately. This broader definition applies to deferment cases, but in double jeopardy cases, the narrower meaning premised on the punishment factor still applies. Therefore, a judgment that includes a deferred sentence is final for purposes of appeal, and an appeal filed more that 60 days after sentencing was dismissed as untimely. St. v. Rice, 275 M 81, 910 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 48 (1996), followed in Davis v. St., 2004 MT 112, 321 M 118, 88 P3d 1285 (2004).

Sentence of Imprisonment of Dangerous Offender — No Need to Consider Alternatives: After a conviction for kidnapping and assault, when the District Court clearly articulated numerous reasons for designating the defendant as a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) and its reasons were fully supported by the record, the court's reasons for designating the defendant a dangerous offender are sufficient to rule out alternatives to imprisonment. By its findings, the court, as a practical matter, satisfied the requirements of statutory criteria for sentencing. St. v. Eichenlaub, 272 M 332, 901 P2d 90, 52 St. Rep. 786 (1995).

Twenty-Five Year Sentence for Bank Robbery Not Improper: The Supreme Court upheld the lower court's sentencing of the defendant to 25 years for bank robbery on the basis that the lower court's sentence was within the statutory guidelines and therefore did not violate the constitution. St. v. Hembd, 254 M 407, 838 P2d 412, 49 St. Rep. 788 (1992).

Misinterpretation of Criminal Record Contained in Presentence Investigation Report — Conclusions Proper — Resentencing Inappropriate: The District Court misinterpreted defendant's criminal record as contained in the presentence investigation report, counting as a new felony the revocation of an earlier offense previously counted and counting criminal endangerment and criminal possession of dangerous drugs offenses as one felony instead of two. The court therefore arrived at the right conclusion as to the number of offenses even though it used the wrong means. This did not constitute an error that mandated resentencing. St. v. Willson, 250 M 241, 818 P2d 1199, 48 St. Rep. 907 (1991).

Sufficient Statement of Reasons for Sentence — Consistency With Presentence Report: It was a sufficient statement of reasons in sentencing for the District Court to cite defendant's entire and extensive criminal record and his threat to society, especially when the sentence was consistent with the presentence investigation report that recommended a lengthy sentence. St. v. Willson, 250 M 241, 818 P2d 1199, 48 St. Rep. 907 (1991).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Consider Time Served — Remand — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Petitioner was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison for aggravated assault, with all 5 years suspended upon certain conditions. He served 4 ½ years of the suspended sentence before violating probation. After an appropriate petition, the District Court revoked the suspended sentence and sentenced petitioner to 5 years in the state prison, with 2 years suspended upon certain conditions. Petitioner sought a writ of habeas corpus seeking restoration of his good time but not appealing his sentence or conviction. After review, the Supreme Court held that the District Court had jurisdiction to revoke the suspended sentence and impose the original sentence but remanded for compliance with 46-18-201, requiring the District Court to consider elapsed time and state its reasons for either expressly allowing or rejecting elapsed time as credit against the sentence. The petition for writ of habeas corpus was denied for failure to set forth any basis for granting the writ. Speldrich v. McCormick, 243 M 238, 794 P2d 339, 47 St. Rep. 1186 (1990), followed in St. v. Docken, 274 M 296, 908 P2d 213, 52 St. Rep. 1240 (1995).

Failure to Appear for Probation Officer-Ordered Urine Sample — Minimal Grounds Required to Order Testing: It was error for the District Court to dismiss a petition for revocation of suspended sentence based on the defendant's failure to appear for purposes of providing a urine sample because the probation officer did not have some articulable reasons for requesting the test. Under the standard established in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), the Supreme Court held that a probation officer's opinion that rehabilitation could not begin until the defendant was free of drugs and the fact that the defendant had not passed a drug test since his arrest constituted sufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds for requiring a urine sample. St. v. Sigler, 236 M 137, 769 P2d 703, 46 St. Rep. 244 (1989).

Different Sentencing Judge — No Presumption of Vindictiveness When Sentence Increased on Remand: Due process rights on resentencing create a presumption of vindictiveness when a sentence is increased on remand. However, when a different judge performs resentencing, there is no presumption of vindictiveness; rather, the defense must show actual vindictiveness. St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Rules of Evidence Inapplicable to Sentencing: Defendant contended that the court erred in adding 10 years to his sentence for being a persistent felony offender because the court relied on evidence improperly before it. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence because the rules of evidence do not apply to sentencing and because the evidence was competent. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988).

Supreme Court Review of Sentence — Legality Only: Defendant requested the Supreme Court remand for resentencing on the grounds that the District Court erred in believing a mandatory minimum sentence applied to the crime of attempt. The Supreme Court found no evidence of ineffective assistance of counsel or prejudice in sentencing. The Supreme Court will review sentences for legality only. Because the sentence was well within the legal limits, the request for remand was refused. St. v. Hurlbert, 232 M 115, 756 P2d 1110, 45 St. Rep. 923 (1988), followed in St. v. Cope, 250 M 387, 819 P2d 1280, 48 St. Rep. 949 (1991), St. v. Graves, 272 M 451, 901 P2d 549, 52 St. Rep. 755 (1995), St. v. Romannose, 279 M 58, 931 P2d 1394, 54 St. Rep. 72 (1997), and St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377, 56 St. Rep. 654 (1999).

Claim of Reliance on Incorrect Information in Sentencing — Sentencing Court Presumed Correct: Defendant contended the District Court wrongly assumed he had two prior probation violations and relied on this incorrect information in sentencing. Although a defendant has a right to a sentence based on substantially correct information, the Supreme Court will not strain at worst-case assumptions to find a mistake on review. Rather than finding two previous probation violations, the District Court correctly recognized defendant's two prior chances to avoid a more severe penalty. The sentencing court was presumed correct and judgment affirmed. St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759, 45 St. Rep. 833 (1988).

Judgment Containing Reasons for Sentence Sufficient — Oral and Written Reasoning Not Required: The rationale set out in St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), acknowledging a defendant's right to be informed of the reasons underlying punishment, does not impose a duty on a District Court to set forth its reasoning orally in open court and in writing. It was sufficient when the reasons underlying a sentence were clearly stated in the judgment. St. v. Petroff, 232 M 20, 757 P2d 759, 45 St. Rep. 833 (1988).

Use of Dismissed Charge in Sentencing: The District Court, during sentencing, improperly relied on a prior conviction that had been dismissed following defendant's successful completion of a deferred sentence. However, given defendant's course of criminal conduct, his criminal history, and his continuing disregard for the rights and safety of others, the error was harmless. St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177, 45 St. Rep. 596 (1988).

Disparity in Codefendants' Sentences — One by Trial, One by Plea Bargain: That defendant, after a trial, was sentenced to 35 years and a codefendant, after plea bargaining, was sentenced to 8 years does not, standing alone, establish that defendant was punished for exercising his right to a jury trial. The judge outlined his reasons for sentencing, which was well within the maximum authorized; the reasons support the severity of the sentence given, and there was no abuse of discretion. Therefore, the defendant was not denied his right to trial. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Failure to Include Reasons for Sentence — Abuse of Discretion: Failure of trial court to specify the reasons behind the determination of the defendant's sentence is an abuse of discretion. It is not enough that the sentence be within the statutory maximum. The defendant is entitled to know why the sentencing judge chose the particular sentence involved. St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), cited in St. v. Johnson, 221 M 503, 719 P2d 1248, 43 St. Rep. 1010 (1986).

Sentencing Guidelines: A criminal statute need not contain sentencing guidelines. St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980).

Appellate Review of Sentence — No Objection Necessary: The Supreme Court generally will not review an issue where there was no objection at trial. However, the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), contrasted in St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996), and followed in St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999), St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005), St. v. Hameline, 2008 MT 241, 344 M 461, 188 P3d 1052 (2008), and St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008).

Guilty Plea — Refusal to Allow Withdrawal — Discretion: It was not an error or an abuse of court's discretion to not allow defendant to withdraw his guilty plea after serving 2 months of a 20-year sentence because the judge has complete discretion to deny a change of plea. St. v. Sattler, 170 M 35, 549 P2d 1080 (1976).

Postconviction Relief: Time spent in jail under a suspended sentence must be credited to sentence for violation of probation. In re Hanson, 169 M 80, 544 P2d 816 (1976).

DEFERRAL

Portion of Sentence Imposed Beyond Sentencing Authority Illegal — Timely Petition to Revoke: The District Court sentenced DeShields to 4 years for sexual assault and deferred imposition of the sentence for 4 years subject to certain terms and conditions. The state twice petitioned to revoke DeShields' sentence for violation of the deferred sentence. Both petitions were filed within the 4-year period of deferral. DeShields filed for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court held that the initial 4-year sentence was illegally imposed because the maximum time that the sentence could be deferred was 3 years, but DeShields' argument that the entire sentence was void was mistaken. The mere fact that the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing an improper deferred sentence did not render the sentence void ab initio. Only the portion of the sentence beyond the court's authority was illegal. Additionally, the state filed its petitions within the allowable 3-year deferral period, so DeShields' deferred sentence was properly revoked. DeShields v. St., 2006 MT 58, 331 M 329, 132 P3d 540 (2006).

Authority to Defer Imposition of Sentence When Financial Condition Imposed — Failure to File Timely Appeal: Ingersoll filed for postconviction relief, arguing that the District Court lacked statutory authority to either impose consecutive deferred sentences or to defer imposition of his sentence in excess of 3 years. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had statutory authority at the time of sentencing under this section to impose a deferred sentence for up to 6 years for Ingersoll's felony conviction for criminal mischief. Therefore, pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), Ingersoll had 60 days after sentencing to appeal the court's authority to impose the sentence. Failure to file a timely appeal rendered Ingersoll's claim procedurally barred in a postconviction hearing. Ingersoll v. St., 1999 MT 215, 295 M 520, 986 P2d 403, 56 St. Rep. 843 (1999).

Limitation on Deferral of Sentence — Constitutionality: The provision of this section prohibiting a defendant from receiving a referred sentence if he has been convicted of a prior felony is not unconstitutional under the due process clause. Defendant who had received a deferred sentence in 1973 and had not attempted to have that conviction dismissed or expunged was not entitled to a deferred sentence after a 1988 conviction. Defendant's argument regarding constitutionality is moot because the 1987 amendment to 46-18-204 was repealed in 1989. St. v. Lorash, 238 M 345, 777 P2d 884, 46 St. Rep. 1321 (1989), distinguished in St. v. Bowles, 284 M 490, 947 P2d 52, 54 St. Rep. 962 (1997), as to the requirement for a motion for expungement.

Deferral or Suspension of Entire Sentence Proper: Defendant was sentenced to 5 years in prison, with all but 2 years suspended by a judge who mistakenly believed that suspension or deferral of the entire sentence was prohibited by this section. The Supreme Court vacated the sentence and remanded the case for resentencing, ruling the District Court's belief that the charge required imprisonment was prejudicial to defendant. St. v. Arbgast, 202 M 220, 656 P2d 828, 40 St. Rep. 45 (1983).

Deferring Sentence Imposition — Second Deferment: Contention that sentencing court had no jurisdiction to defer imposition of sentence a second time did not affect the court's power to subsequently revoke suspension of part of the sentence and was not validly raised on appeal from the revocation. The conviction and first deferment of imposition of sentence occurred on October 7, 1975. The sentence, part of which was suspended, was imposed on October 28, 1977, within the 3-year period set in October 1975, for deferment of the imposition of sentence. The court could not be held in error for ordering (at August 19, 1977, revocation hearing) deferment for an additional 3 years. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Revocation of Sentence Deferred or Suspended Longer Than Allowed by Statute:

Petitioner was convicted of felony theft. On May 22, 1978, he was given a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence on the condition that restitution be made. On August 20, 1979, this deferred sentence was continued and petitioner was ordered to complete restitution by November 5, 1980. This was not done, and a petition to revoke the deferred sentence was filed on January 16, 1981. A hearing on the petition was held May 27, 1981, 3 years and 5 days after the initial deferral. The court revoked the deferred sentence and sentenced petitioner to 3 ½ years in prison, over petitioner's objections that the District Court was without jurisdiction to do so. The District Court contended it retained jurisdiction when the petition to revoke is filed within the deferral time. On a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court held that this section grants jurisdiction to revoke suspended sentences or impose sentences following deferral only during the period of the suspended or deferred sentences. This jurisdiction extends only through the running of the suspended or deferred sentence, regardless of whether a petition for revocation has been filed prior to the termination of the suspended or deferred sentence. Felix v. Mohler, 195 M 391, 636 P2d 830, 38 St. Rep. 1881 (1981).

On October 24, 1977, the petitioner received a deferred imposition of sentence and was placed on probation for 1 year. On August 14, 1978, the deferred imposition of sentence was extended for an additional 2 years. On April 4, 1979, the deferred imposition of sentence was again extended for 2 years. On February 2, 1981, petitioner was found guilty of a misdemeanor in Justice's Court. Based on that conviction, the court revoked its order staying deferment of sentence and sentenced petitioner to 5 years in the state prison for the original crime. In granting his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court said that this section gives the District Judge the authority to defer imposition of sentence for a period not to exceed 3 years. The District Court can revoke a deferred imposition of sentence only during the 3-year period immediately following the initial sentence deferral. Gonzales v. Blodgett, 193 M 504, 632 P2d 1084, 38 St. Rep. 1159 (1981).

Restrictions During — Abuse of Discretion: When the trial court deferred imposition of sentence but required the defendants to serve 1 year in the county jail with release for working hours, it abused its discretion to impose reasonable restrictions or conditions during the period of the deferred imposition. St. v. Openshaw, 172 M 511, 565 P2d 319 (1977).

Presumption for Deferral: The trial judge's belief that a 19-year-old defendant lied to him when he asked where the defendant got marijuana is not the type of aggravated circumstances necessary to overcome the presumption of a deferred sentence, as the aggravating circumstances should be supported by substantial evidence over and above the simple facts of a prima facie crime. St. v. Burris, 168 M 195, 542 P2d 1223 (1975).

Revocation — Ground Not Formal Condition: The trial court could revoke the deferred imposition of sentence after the defendant refused to testify against another defendant even though his cooperation with the State was not made a formal condition of the judgment deferring sentence. St. v. Lintz, 162 M 102, 509 P2d 13 (1973).

SUSPENSION

Illegal Portion of Sentence Affecting Entirety of Sentence — Remand for Resentencing: For sexual intercourse without consent, Hicks was sentenced to 14 years with the Department of Corrections with no time suspended, and because of the seriousness of the offense, Hicks was also ordered to complete sexual offender treatment, undergo psychiatric evaluation to determine possible mental or personality disorders, and complete a chemical dependency evaluation, a cognitive and behavioral modification program, and an anger management course. Hicks appealed the legality of the sentence because it violated sentencing statutes. The Supreme Court noted that subsection (3)(d)(i) of this section provides that when a defendant is sentenced to the Department, all but the first 5 years of the sentence must be suspended, so the unsuspended sentence was illegal. However, the court could not determine whether the sentencing court would consider a 14-year sentence with 9 years suspended adequate to complete the recommended sentence conditions. Because the illegal portion of the sentence affected the entirety of the sentence, the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing under a correct application of the sentencing statutes. St. v. Hicks, 2006 MT 71, 331 M 471, 133 P3d 206 (2006).

Revocation of Juvenile Offender's Suspended Sentence and Commitment to Department Authorized: Following a dispositional hearing, the Youth Court entered an order declaring Lesmeister a delinquent youth and serious juvenile offender, transferred the 18 year old's case to District Court, and placed the youth on probation until age 25, with the entire commitment suspended upon certain conditions. One year later, on a petition filed by the Cascade County Attorney alleging numerous probation violations, the District Court revoked Lesmeister's suspended sentence and committed the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25. On appeal, Lesmeister challenged the legality of the court's commitment to the Department, arguing that 41-5-208 authorizes the District Court to impose only those conditions provided for in 46-18-201 through 46-18-203, which does not include a sentence to the Department of Corrections. In affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that state law authorizes a District Court to impose a sentence to commit an offender to the Department of Corrections when all but the first 5 years are suspended. St. v. Lesmeister, 2000 MT 318, 302 M 500, 15 P3d 392, 57 St. Rep. 1344 (2000).

Right to Jury Trial — Not Applicable to Suspended Sentence Revocation Proceedings: Since a trial by jury under the seventh amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont.

Const., is guaranteed only in "criminal prosecutions", it does not apply in proceedings for revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. Watts, 221 M 104, 717 P2d 24, 43 St. Rep. 670 (1986).

Deferral or Suspension of Entire Sentence Proper: Defendant was sentenced to 5 years in prison, with all but 2 years suspended by a judge who mistakenly believed that suspension or deferral of the entire sentence was prohibited by this section. The Supreme Court vacated the sentence and remanded the case for resentencing, ruling the District Court's belief that the charge required imprisonment was prejudicial to defendant. St. v. Arbgast, 202 M 220, 656 P2d 828, 40 St. Rep. 45 (1983).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence — No Double Jeopardy: The court rejected defendant's contention that revocation of a suspended sentence enhanced his punishment and thus subjected him to double jeopardy. Even though a defendant must live with the conditions of probation throughout the period of suspension and even though he must serve the entire sentence if the suspension is revoked, there is no double jeopardy. The prohibitions against double jeopardy do not preclude the State from filing a second petition for revocation of suspended sentence that alleges the same facts. St. v. Oppelt, 184 M 48, 601 P2d 394 (1979), followed in St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008).

Purpose of Suspension: A former statute providing for the suspension of sentences in criminal actions was designed to afford first offenders an opportunity for reformation, and the court held that it should be liberally construed. State ex rel. Bottomly v. District Court, 73 M 541, 237 P 525 (1925).

Time When Sentence May Be Suspended:

The defendant was convicted of a violation of the liquor laws and sentenced to serve 60 days in jail and pay a fine. He at once perfected an appeal, secured a certificate of probable cause, and was admitted to bail. Five months thereafter his appeal was dismissed and the trial court on the day the certificate of dismissal was received suspended his sentence. The court held on an application for a Writ of Supervisory Control that since the defendant had never been committed, the trial court could properly, after entry of judgment, suspend the sentence at the time it did. State ex rel. Bottomly v. District Court, 73 M 541, 237 P 525 (1925).

Assuming that the court had the power to suspend the execution of the accused's sentence and to place him upon probation, that power, too, must have been exercised at the time the sentence was pronounced. When an order suspending sentence is made, it is in effect a part of the judgment itself. It is the court's direction as to how the judgment shall be carried into effect. State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 68 M 309, 218 P 558 (1923).

FINE OR IMPRISONMENT

Plea Bargain Rejected — Imposition of State-Recommended Maximum Sentence Not Violative of Due Process: Killam was charged with felony aggravated assault with a weapon. The state entered into plea negotiations, but Killam rejected the proposed agreement. Killam ultimately pleaded guilty. At sentencing, the state recommended the maximum sentence, which was greater than the sentence offered in the plea agreement, and the sentencing court imposed the maximum statutory sentence. On appeal, Killam contended that the state acted vindictively and violated Killam's due process rights by recommending a more severe sentence than was offered in the plea negotiations, citing N.C. v. Pearce, 395 US 711 (1969), and Blackledge v. Perry, 417 US 21 (1974). The Supreme Court distinguished both federal cases because they dealt with vindictiveness based on harsher sentences imposed following retrial, while Killam argued vindictiveness during initial sentencing. The court noted that a defendant is free to accept or reject a plea offer, but if the offer is rejected, the prosecution may proceed with the case and make any legal sentencing recommendation because there is no agreement to the contrary. When Killam entered a guilty plea, the District Court informed him of the maximum sentence and the state was free to recommend the maximum statutory sentence. Thus, imposition of the maximum sentence did not violate Killam's due process rights. St. v. Killam, 2005 MT 255, 329 M 50, 122 P3d 439 (2005), following Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 US 357 (1978).

Correction of Sentence for Imprisonment Not Erroneous: Kern was convicted of felony sexual assault against a minor. The District Court sentenced Kern to a 15-year commitment to the Department of Corrections, with all but 7 years suspended. However, this section requires that a sentence to the Department include suspension of all but 5 years of the commitment. The District Court corrected its mistake and committed Kern to the state prison for 15 years, with all but 7 years suspended. Kern contended that the court erred in correcting the sentence. Under the version of 46-18-117 in effect at the time that the crime was committed (prior to repeal in 2001), the court was allowed to correct the erroneous sentence within 120 days of sentencing. Although Kern might have preferred commitment to the Department for 15 years with all but 5 years suspended, the District Court was not restricted from pursuing the option that it chose and did not err in timely correcting the sentence pursuant to former 46-18-117. St. v. Kern, 2003 MT 77, 315 M 22, 67 P3d 272 (2003).

Acquiescence in Assessment of Interest on Unpaid Portion of Criminal Fine — Waiver of Right to Appeal: As part of a plea agreement on a felony drug charge, Micklon was fined $55,000. After hearing testimony on Micklon's financial status, the sentencing court agreed to allow five annual payments of $11,000, but assessed interest at 10% a year on the unpaid balance. Micklon appealed the interest charges on grounds that there was no statutory authority for requiring interest on a criminal fine. The state responded that appeal was waived by Micklon's failure to object to the interest provisions at the time of sentencing. The Supreme Court recognized that a defendant often must remain silent even in the face of invalid conditions to guard against the possibility that the sentencing court may forego a more lenient sentence if the defendant objects to one of the conditions, and that in those circumstances a defendant's failure to object does not necessarily constitute a waiver of the right to appeal. However, during sentencing Micklon did not remain silent, but in fact affirmatively agreed to inclusion of the interest condition in the sentence. Without addressing the legality of interest charges, the Supreme Court concluded that Micklon waived the right to appeal the issue and affirmed the sentencing court's assessment of interest on the unpaid portion of Micklon's criminal fine. St. v. Micklon, 2003 MT 45, 314 M 291, 65 P3d 559 (2003), followed in St. v. Walker, 2007 MT 205, 338 M 529, 167 P3d 879 (2007).

Jail Sentence for DUI Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: The defendant, who has an extensive record of driving under the influence of alcohol, was convicted on three counts of driving under the influence (DUI) and sentenced to serve 10 months in the county jail. The defendant contends her sentence is cruel and unusual punishment and a denial of equal protection because it may be greater than would be served in the state prison for a more serious offense since county jail inmates are not entitled to statutory good time allowance or parole eligibility as are prison inmates. However, the sentence falls within the maximum authorized by statute and is not so disproportionate to the crime that it shocks the conscience and outrages the moral sense of the community or of justice. Therefore, the sentence imposed is not cruel and unusual punishment that would render it unconstitutional. St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817, 41 St. Rep. 2178 (1984).

Power of District Court:

A judgment under former law requiring a defendant who was convicted on three counts of an information charging violations of the liquor law to pay a fine of $200 and to serve 60 days in the county jail on each count and, if the fines were not paid, to serve them out at the rate of 1 day for each $2 of the fines was held not uncertain or ambiguous. It meant that he would be imprisoned for a total of 180 days and would serve 1 day for each $2 of the fines aggregating $600. In re Pyle, 72 M 494, 234 P 254 (1925).

The District Court had the power under a former statute to impose a sentence of imprisonment in the county jail for a certain number of days, the defendant in addition to pay a fine in a stated amount and, in default of payment, to stand committed 1 day for every $2 of the fine after expiration of the term of imprisonment, until the fine was paid. In re Londos, 54 M 418, 170 P 1045 (1918).

Sufficiently Definite and Certain: A judgment under former law in a case of misdemeanor, imposing a fine of $500 and providing that in default of payment the defendant be imprisoned "for the term of one day for each $2 of said fine", was sufficiently definite and certain. State ex rel. Poindexter v. District Court, 51 M 186, 149 P 958 (1915).

RESTRICTIONS OR CONDITIONS

Restriction on Financial Transactions as Condition for Suspended Sentence for Sexual Assault Affirmed: As a condition for a suspended sentence for sexual assault of a child, Hernandez was required to obtain permission from the probation officer before engaging in financial transactions to finance or purchase a vehicle, engage in business, or incur debt. Hernandez appealed on grounds that the condition was unrelated to the crime. The Supreme Court noted that the sentencing condition was authorized by statute and Department of Corrections rule, so the Ashby requirement of a nexus to the offender or the offense did not apply. The financial transaction restriction was considered a standard condition of the Department, and Hernandez offered nothing indicating that the condition would impose a hardship; because Hernandez's priority financial obligations while serving the suspended sentence would be restitution, child support, fines, and fees, the imposition of the condition was appropriate and not an abuse of discretion. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Hernandez, 2009 MT 341, 353 M 111, 220 P3d 25 (2009).

Prohibition Against Firearms as Condition of Deferred Sentence for Stalking Affirmed: As a condition of Essig's deferred sentence for stalking, the District Court prohibited Essig from owning, possessing, or being in control of firearms. Essig appealed the prohibition, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Several years earlier Essig was convicted of a concealed weapon violation, and considering the threatening nature of the stalking violation, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by restricting Essig's firearms use to obtain the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. St. v. Essig, 2009 MT 340, 353 M 99, 218 P3d 838 (2009).

Sufficient Nexus of Sentencing Condition to Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Brinson was sentenced to 20 years with 10 years suspended for sexual intercourse without consent, and the sentencing court also attached 56 terms and conditions to the sentence. Brinson challenged three conditions. The Supreme Court applied the nexus test in St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), to determine whether the conditions lacked a nexus either to the offense or to Brinson. In this case a sufficient nexus was established to affirm imposition of conditions: (1) that Brinson's contact with his daughter be supervised; (2) prohibiting Brinson from having a cell phone, with exceptions, or other technology or device with photo, video, or internet capabilities; and (3) prohibiting Brinson from viewing television or motion pictures that were geared toward Brinson's offending cycle or as a stimulus to arouse deviant thoughts or fantasies. St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009).

Restitution Proper for Felony Criminal Endangerment: As part of Perkins' plea agreement on a charge of felony criminal endangerment, the state was allowed to seek restitution, and the sentencing court assessed $5,947 in restitution. Perkins appealed. The state conceded that $78.44 was not supported by documentation, but the Supreme Court held that there was sufficient legal authority for the sentencing court to impose restitution as part of the sentence. Therefore, the restitution award was affirmed but was reduced by $78.44. St. v. Perkins, 2009 MT 150, 350 M 387, 208 P3d 386 (2009).

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Condition for Incest Conviction Affirmed: As sentencing conditions following conviction for felony incest, the sentencing court required Heddings to abstain from and be tested for alcohol and drugs. Heddings argued that the alcohol-related conditions should be stricken because they were unrelated to the crime or to Heddings himself. Citing St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), the Supreme Court noted that a sentencing condition is illegal if: (1) the sentencing court lacked statutory authority to impose it; (2) the condition falls outside the parameters of the applicable sentencing statutes; or (3) the sentencing court did not adhere to affirmative mandates of the applicable sentencing statutes. Here, the presentence investigation revealed that Heddings was a situational, opportunistic child molester and that allowing him to drink would give him more opportunities to fail and increase the likelihood of reoffending. Heddings maintained that the incest did not involve the use of alcohol, but he did not challenge the accuracy of the findings. Thus, there was a nexus between the alcohol-related conditions and Heddings as an offender. It was within the sentencing court's discretion to impose conditions that were reasonable and necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008).

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Conditions for Fraudulently Obtaining Dangerous Drugs Affirmed: Following conviction for fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs, Hunter challenged two sentencing conditions that prohibited the possession and consumption of alcohol and that required chemical testing for drugs and alcohol. The Supreme Court affirmed. Prohibiting and monitoring Hunter's consumption of both alcohol and drugs would help prevent Hunter from repeating the same criminal conduct that gave rise to the sentence. A sufficient nexus was established between the offense and the alcohol-related sentence conditions. St. v. Hunter, 2008 MT 395, 347 M 155, 197 P3d 998 (2008), following St. v. Winkel, 2008 MT 89, 342 M 267, 182 P3d 54 (2008). See also St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Alcohol-Related Conditions Unrelated to Felony Theft Stricken From Sentence: As a condition of Stiles' sentence for felony theft, the sentencing court prohibited Stiles from possessing or consuming intoxicants and entering places where intoxicants are sold and required Stiles to submit to drug and alcohol testing. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and its progeny, a nexus must exist between a sentencing condition and the offense and offender. Because there was no nexus between the sentencing condition and Stiles and the offense of felony theft, the alcohol-related condition was stricken from Stiles' sentence. St. v. Stiles, 2008 MT 390, 347 M 95, 197 P3d 966 (2008).

Sentencing Conditions May Not Restrict Medical Treatment Authorized by State Law: Nelson was charged with seven drug-related crimes. Nelson suffers from a degenerative disc disorder and has had four surgeries on his back. Nelson had applied with the state to be a qualified patient in Montana's medical marijuana program and to be entitled to the lawful use of medical marijuana. On December 8, 2006, subsequent to being charged with the drug-related crimes, Nelson was accepted into the medical marijuana program, placed on the confidential registry, and issued an identification card indicating his participation in the program. On February 7, 2007, Nelson entered into a plea agreement with the state. In exchange for pleading nolo contendere to criminal possession or manufacture of dangerous drugs, Nelson received a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence, and the state agreed to dismiss the remaining six counts. On February 26, 2007, Nelson appeared before the District Court and formally pleaded no contest to the charge. The District Court asked Nelson's attorney how Nelson participated in the medical marijuana program. The state offered that it had spoken to officials at the Department of Corrections, who opined that they would not allow Nelson to smoke marijuana while under their supervision but would allow him to use the pill form of marijuana, dronabinol, as prescribed by a physician. Nelson's attorney argued that such a restriction on Nelson's use of medical marijuana would be cost-prohibitive for him due to the expense of dronabinol and was thus contrary to the intent behind the passage of the Medical Marijuana Act, which was to allow individuals to obtain medical relief through the use of medical marijuana in a manner that was cost-effective. Nelson was ultimately given a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence subject to 20 conditions. Nelson appealed the conditions requiring him to comply with federal law and restricting his use and possession of marijuana to the pill form. Under the Medical Marijuana Act, "medical use" specifically contemplates "cultivation" and the use of "paraphernalia relating to the consumption of marijuana". The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing the condition limiting use to the pill form. The District Court unlawfully denied Nelson the right and privilege to use a lawful medical treatment for relief from a debilitating condition under the Medical Marijuana Act. The District Court also exceeded its authority in imposing the condition requiring compliance with federal law, insofar as it could be invoked to support a revocation of his deferred sentence in the face of contrary state law. It is an axiom of federalism under the U.S. Constitution that Congress does not have the authority to commandeer the processes of states by directly compelling them to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program. St. v. Nelson, 2008 MT 359, 346 M 366, 195 P3d 826 (2008).

District Court Lacked Power to Impose Conditions of Parole: The District Court imposed an illegal sentence when sentencing defendant on a petition to revoke and on a new charge because the court purported to impose many "parole and probation" conditions. St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008).

Requirement for Annual Polygraph Test as Condition of Suspended Sentence Not Unlawful — Use of Test Results in Punishment Prohibited: As a condition of Hameline's suspended sentence the District Court required Hameline to undergo an annual polygraph test. Hameline objected on grounds that the condition was illegal because polygraph results are not admissible in Montana court proceedings and on grounds that requiring the test violated the constitutional right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court reiterated the complete prohibition against the direct or indirect use of polygraph results in court proceedings, while noting that requiring a person to undergo a polygraph test is not in itself illegal, so requiring a polygraph test for other purposes is not prohibited. The court also held that the right against self-incrimination did not prevent the District Court from compelling Hameline to undergo a polygraph test, but the right did prevent the state from using information gleaned from the test to punish Hameline. St. v. Hameline, 2008 MT 241, 344 M 461, 188 P3d 1052 (2008), followed in St. v. Smart, 2009 MT 1, 348 M 274, 201 P3d 123 (2009). See also St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008).

Restrictions Against Gambling and Use of Alcohol Unrelated to Offense of Theft or to Defendant Stricken — Drug Testing Requirement Affirmed: As conditions of Lessard's conviction for the theft of carved bears from neighborhood lawns, the sentencing court required that Lessard not consume alcohol or drugs, submit to alcohol and drug testing, and refrain from entering casinos and gambling. Lessard contested the conditions as unrelated to the theft of carved bears and asserted that he had no problem with or criminal history related to substance abuse or gambling, even though a marijuana pipe was found in Lessard's bedroom during a search for the bears and Lessard admitted to smoking marijuana 2 days prior to the search. In deliberating whether the conditions had a nexus to the offense or to Lessard himself, the Supreme Court held that the alcohol and gambling conditions were too much, that requiring no conditions would be too little, but that the drug testing condition was just right. The case was remanded with instructions to strike the alcohol and gambling conditions and the alcohol testing requirement from Lessard's sentence, while leaving the drug testing requirement in effect. St. v. Lessard, 2008 MT 192, 344 M 26, 185 P3d 1013 (2008).

Sentencing Conditions for Theft Conviction, Except Requirement for Mental Health Evaluation, Affirmed: As conditions of Greensweight's sentence for theft, the sentencing court required Greensweight to obtain a chemical dependency evaluation and to attend either Alcoholics Anonymous or Narcotics Anonymous, prohibited Greensweight from possessing, using, or drinking intoxicants and from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale, and required Greensweight to participate in counseling, including mental health counseling. Greensweight contested the conditions as unrelated to the crime, and the Supreme Court considered each condition for legality and reasonableness and considered whether the conditions were related either to the crime or to Greensweight's unique background and characteristics. In light of Greensweight's history of chronic drug use, the chemical dependency evaluation and attendance at group meetings were reasonable and were affirmed. Citing St. v. Brotherton, 2008 MT 119, 342 M 511, 182 P3d 88 (2008), the court also affirmed the "no intoxicants" condition as legal because of the history of chronic drug use and as necessary for Greensweight's rehabilitation, including a requirement for drug and alcohol testing. The court also affirmed the counseling requirement, but absent any history of mental health issues or nexus to the theft crime, the requirement for mental health counseling was ordered stricken. St. v. Greensweight, 2008 MT 185, 343 M 474, 187 P3d 613 (2008).

Appropriate Conditions on Probation of Delinquent and Serious Youth Sex Offender: As a youth, D.A.S. was convicted of sexual assault and placed in a youth correctional facility. When D.A.S. turned 18, jurisdiction and supervisory responsibility were transferred from Youth Court to District Court until age 25, and numerous supervisory conditions were attached, including prohibitions on the use of drugs and alcohol, a curfew, and a requirement that D.A.S. obtain a GED 1 year prior to expiration of the sentence. D.A.S. objected to these conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the crime of sexual assault, but the Supreme Court affirmed, applying St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342, M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), which allows imposition of conditions that have a nexus either to the offense or to the offender. In this case, both alcohol and drug prohibitions were reasonably related to D.A.S.'s rehabilitation and placement in a sexual offender program. A curfew was reasonable to ensure development of a consistent and healthy routine and was reasonable given legislative intent to provide youth offenders with additional supervision. Completion of the high school equivalency test was not an abuse of discretion because it was consistent with legislative intent to rehabilitate youth offenders through competency development, especially given D.A.S.'s expressed desire to further his education. In re D.A.S., 2008 MT 168, 343 M 360, 184 P3d 349 (2008).

Defendant Not Involved in Initial Vehicle Theft or Damage — Restitution Not Owing: Seghetti stole a vehicle and picked up Breeding and another friend for a ride, during which the vehicle was damaged while Seghetti was driving. Seghetti then revealed that the vehicle was stolen, and Breeding suggested driving the vehicle to California. During the trip, Breeding and Seghetti shared the driving. California police stopped the vehicle for a broken turn signal, and Breeding and Seghetti were subsequently charged with and convicted of felony theft. At sentencing, the District Court ordered that Breeding pay restitution for damage to the vehicle. Asserting that he was not driving when the damage occurred and thus was not responsible for the damage, Breeding appealed the restitution order. The Supreme Court reversed. Without a causal connection between Breeding's commission of theft and the damage inflicted earlier by Seghetti, there was no basis for requiring Breeding to pay restitution for that damage, so the District Court was ordered to strike the restitution requirement from Breeding's sentence. St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 M 323, 184 P3d 313 (2008).

Partial Parole Restrictions Affirmed: Rickman was sentenced to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. Rickman appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court had no authority to restrict parole eligibility for only part of the sentence. Noting that challenges to partial parole restriction have been upheld since at least 1988, the Supreme Court disagreed with Rickman's assertion. A sentencing court has discretion to impose parole restrictions, and if a sentencing court has discretion to impose a restriction of no parole eligibility, then a sentencing court can likewise impose a restriction of limited parole eligibility. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008), and St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Sentence Restriction Prohibiting Alcohol Use Sufficiently Related to Defendant's History of Substance Abuse to Warrant Affirmation — Unrelated Casino Restriction Stricken: As conditions of Brotherton's sentence for criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute, the District Court prohibited Brotherton's use of alcohol, prohibited him from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale, and also prohibited him from entering casinos or playing games of chance. Brotherton appealed the conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the offense, given that his criminal history involved only drugs and not alcohol. The Supreme Court agreed that the casino restriction was improper and remanded with directions that the condition be stricken. However, the court affirmed the alcohol use restriction, given Brotherton's significant history of chemical dependency and the reasonable possibility that Brotherton might substitute alcohol for drugs and thus impede his rehabilitation. St. v. Brotherton, 2008 MT 119, 342 M 511, 182 P3d 88 (2008).

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), and St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), regarding authority of sentencing court.

Conditions Including Restrictions on Alcohol Consumption and Entering Casinos Related to Drug Possession — Affirmed: As conditions of Winkel's suspended sentence for felony possession of dangerous drugs, the sentencing court prohibited Winkel from consuming alcohol and from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale and prohibited Winkel from entering casinos or playing games of chance. Winkel contended that the conditions should be stricken because alcohol and gambling were not related to the drug offense. The Supreme Court noted that sentencing conditions must be reasonably connected to the underlying offense and to the offender and concluded that in this case, that connection existed. The alcohol prohibition was connected to the drug-related nature of Winkel's drug offense and was called for, given Winkel's recent and chronic history of substance abuse and chemical dependency. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in finding that Winkel's rehabilitation would be jeopardized if Winkel had access to intoxicants like alcohol. Additionally, because alcohol is inseparable from gambling in Montana casinos, the prohibition against entering casinos achieved the same objectives of rehabilitation and protection and was also warranted. The conditions of Winkel's suspended sentence were affirmed. St. v. Winkel, 2008 MT 89, 342 M 267, 182 P3d 54 (2008), followed in St. v. Teets, 2008 MT 130, 343 M 73, 183 P3d 45 (2008), St. v. Deshazo, 2008 MT 131, 343 M 77, 183 P3d 47 (2008), St. v. Corbin, 2008 MT 146, 343 M 211, 184 P3d 287 (2008), and St. v. Sadowsky, 2008 MT 405, 347 M 192, 197 P3d 1018 (2008). See also St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Probation Condition Banning Alcohol Consumption Unrelated to Crime of Issuing Bad Check Reversed — Condition Prohibiting Gambling Related to Fiscal Irresponsibility Affirmed: Probation conditions on Ashby's bad check conviction included a restriction that Ashby not gamble or consume alcohol or drugs. Ashby contested the conditions under the rule in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), that there must be a nexus between probation conditions and the offense. The District Court denied Ashby's assertion and imposed the conditions as "stock" or standard. On appeal, the Supreme Court expanded the Ommundson nexus rule to include a nexus either to the offense or to the offender, rather than to the offense alone. In this case, there was no evidence that the bad check offense was related in any way to alcohol or drugs, that Ashby had a drinking or drug problem, or that an alcohol and drug prohibition would protect Ashby from another bout of writing bad checks. Thus, the alcohol and drug restriction was stricken from the sentence. Likewise, there was no evidence that Ashby had a gambling problem. However, citing St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), the court found that because of considerable previous fiscal irresponsibility on Ashby's part, it was reasonable for the sentencing court to conclude that a prohibition on gambling was appropriate to rehabilitate Ashby's ability to manage his finances, so the gambling restriction was affirmed. The court also warned against the imposition of alcohol and gambling restrictions as standard or universal because they are not mandated by law. St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), followed in St. v. Corbin, 2008 MT 146, 343 M 211, 184 P3d 287 (2008), St. v. Krueger, 2008 MT 265, 345 M 147, 190 P3d 318 (2008), St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), and, with regard to imposition of a gambling restriction in light of defendant's financial irresponsibility, in St. v. Simpson, 2009 MT 43, 349 M 275, 203 P3d 791 (2009). Kruger was followed in St. v. Smart, 2009 MT 1, 348 M 274, 201 P3d 123 (2009).

Repayment of Costs and Fees of Court-Appointed Counsel as Condition of Deferred Sentence: As a condition of Holland's deferred sentence, the District Court ordered Holland to repay $2,922 in costs and fees expended in his defense by court-appointed counsel. Holland appealed on grounds that the court was not authorized to impose such a condition on a deferred sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that because 46-8-113(1) included all costs related to a criminal defense and because the statute contained no limitation on which defense costs a judge may require a defendant to pay, the District Court did not err in requiring Holland to repay costs and fees of court-appointed counsel as a condition of the deferred sentence. (Note: A 2005 amendment provided that costs must be limited to costs incurred by the Office of State Public Defender.) St. v. Holland, 2008 MT 26, 341 M 237, 177 P3d 482 (2008).

Parenting Interference Conviction — Imposition of Conditions Restricting Alcohol Consumption and Gambling Reversed — Requirement for Mental Health Evaluation Affirmed: As a sentencing condition for conviction of parenting interference, a mother was required to refrain from consuming alcohol and frequenting casinos and was ordered to undergo a mental health evaluation. The mother appealed the imposition of the conditions. The Supreme Court noted that a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, and in this case there was no nexus between alcohol consumption or gambling and parenting interference, so those conditions were stricken. However, the mother's past actions and the conduct forming the basis for the underlying offense revealed a correlation between the evaluation ordered and the conviction for parenting interference, so the sentencing court did not err in requiring a mental health evaluation as a sentencing condition in this case, and that requirement was affirmed. St. v. Young, 2007 MT 323, 340 M 153, 174 P3d 460 (2007), following St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999).

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under this section. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

No Prosecution for Breach of Suspended Sentence Only: As a condition of Letasky's suspended sentence for partner or family member assault, he was directed to have no contact with the victim. When contact allegedly occurred, Letasky was charged with criminal contempt. Letasky moved to dismiss the charge, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. A condition of a suspended sentence, unlike a court order, is not an independent mandate of the court, but instead represents a requirement that Montana law allows the court to place upon an order suspending an offender's sentence. An offender may be prosecuted for a crime if the facts that establish the offender's noncompliance with a condition of the suspended sentence also establish the elements of a crime, but an offender may not be prosecuted based only on breach of the condition itself. St. v. Letasky, 2007 MT 51, 336 M 178, 152 P3d 1288 (2007).

Home Visit of Probationer's Residence by Supervising Officer Not Considered Search — Diminished Expectation of Privacy — When Reasonable Cause Required to Search Probationer's Residence: As part of Moody's conditions of probation, the sentencing court required that Moody's home be open and available for the probation and parole officer to visit as required by state policy. Moody objected to the condition on grounds that it obviated the reasonable cause requirement for searches of probationers' homes and thus violated the constitutional rights of privacy and protection from unreasonable search and seizure. The Supreme Court noted that in Montana, a probation officer may search a probationer's residence without a warrant if the officer has reasonable cause for the search. The reasonable cause standard is substantially less than the probable cause standard required for searches of other citizens' homes because probationers do not enjoy the absolute liberty and heightened expectations of privacy afforded every Montana citizen. Rather, probationers are subject to conditional liberty that is properly dependent upon special restrictions. A convicted felon who is unambiguously aware of the clearly expressed condition that the residence be open and available for home visits does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy that precludes home visits, and because there is no reasonable expectation of privacy, there is no search. Therefore, home visits conducted as a routine and reasonable element of supervising a convicted person are not searches and are not subject to the reasonable cause standard. Although a home visit has the potential to turn into a search pursuant to an officer's plain view observations, it must remain within the parameters of a home visit unless and until reasonable cause exists for the officer to engage in a search. A probationer's diminished expectation of privacy during supervision nevertheless provides that the enclosed areas of the probationer's residence, such as closets, cabinets, and drawers, cannot be searched without reasonable cause. Thus, Moody's constitutional rights to privacy and to be free from unreasonable searches were not violated by the home visit probation condition. St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006), followed in St. v. Greeson, 2007 MT 23, 336 M 1, 152 P3d 695 (2007).

Restriction of Travel as Probation Condition Related to Rehabilitation and Protection of Society Affirmed: As part of Moody's conditions of probation, the sentencing court required that Moody obtain written permission from the probation officer before traveling outside Moody's assigned district. Moody objected to the restriction, arguing that it improperly placed Moody's rights at the mercy of the supervising officer. The Supreme Court noted that a probation condition must be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society and have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense. In this case, the offense resulted from Moody's admitted problem with alcohol. The deferred sentence allowed Moody to address the problem under the supervision of the probation officer and properly included a travel restriction to allow the officer to effectively keep track of Moody and ensure that Moody remained on course with treatment. Imposition of the travel restriction was affirmed. St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006).

Sentencing Condition Unrelated to Underlying Offense Stricken: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. As a condition of a suspended sentence, the trial court prohibited Holt from possessing or consuming alcohol and from establishing a checking or credit card account. Holt appealed both sentencing conditions. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation to the underlying offense in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society. In this case, there was no evidence that alcohol contributed to the offenses in question, so the Supreme Court struck that condition from the judgment. However, there was a correlation between Holt being allowed to establish a checking or credit card account and the crime of theft of clients' funds, so imposition of that condition was not improper and was affirmed. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), followed in St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006), and St. v. Greeson, 2007 MT 23, 336 M 1, 152 P3d 695 (2007).

Restitution Proper for Insurance Fraud: Borsberry was convicted of insurance fraud and ordered to pay restitution of $22,997.52 to the insurer in repayment of the fraudulently obtained amount. Borsberry appealed on grounds that restitution was not proper because the insurer was not a victim who suffered a pecuniary loss. The Supreme Court disagreed. Borsberry's policy contained a provision that his policy would be voided if a fraudulent claim was filed. The insurer paid the fraudulent claim under a reservation of rights and suffered a pecuniary loss based on Borsberry's criminal activity. Under Tyler v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 255 M 174, 841 P2d 538 (1992), insurance payments made under fraudulent claims entitle the insurer to restitution in the amount of the payments. The restitution fell within statutory parameters and was affirmed. St. v. Borsberry, 2006 MT 126, 332 M 271, 136 P3d 993 (2006).

Restitution Properly Imposed Without Suspension or Deferral of Sentence: Citing St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005), Vernes contended that the sentencing court had no authority under this section to impose restitution costs without suspending or deferring part of Vernes' sentence. The Supreme Court noted that an alternative sentencing authority for the imposition of restitution costs, not addressed in Honey, exists in 46-18-202 that allows any limitation reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of society, as long as the restriction or condition has some connection to the underlying offense, and does not require suspension or deferral of a portion of a defendant's sentence. Thus, the sentencing court had authority to impose restitution for costs directly connected to the pecuniary loss of the victim, and restitution in this case was affirmed St. v. Vernes, 2006 MT 32, 331 M 129, 130 P3d 169 (2006).

Improper Order to Pay Child Support as Condition of Sentence for Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Erickson entered a plea agreement on drug charges, and although it was not part of the agreement, the sentencing court ordered that Erickson also forfeit one-third of his prison earnings as restitution to be paid toward Erickson's delinquent child support. Erickson never invited or acquiesced to the child support order. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that possession of dangerous drugs is a victimless crime for which restitution cannot be owed and also noted that the amount of restitution must be determined and fixed. The court agreed with Erickson that there was no connection between drug crimes and the failure to pay child support, so ordering payment of child support arrearages as restitution was not an appropriate condition of sentencing for a drug crime. However, in this case, the sentencing court made it clear that the order to pay child support was in lieu of requiring Erickson to pay cleanup costs associated with a clandestine drug lab, attorney costs, or jury costs. The sentencing court could have imposed both costs and restitution if not for the imposition of the illegal child support obligation, so the Supreme Court was unable to determine what sentence would have been imposed if the law had been correctly applied. The case was remanded for resentencing on whether Erickson must pay restitution and costs. St. v. Erickson, 2005 MT 276, 329 M 192, 124 P3d 119 (2005).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Conditioning Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender on No Contact With Persons Under 18 and No Possession of Pornographic Material: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. He appealed conditions on his suspended sentence that prohibited contact with persons under 18 years of age and access to or possession of pornographic or other material tending to arouse deviant thoughts or fantasies, claiming that the conditions were not reasonably related to the offense, as required by case law interpretation of the provision under this section allowing "reasonable restrictions or conditions considered necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society". The Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act was adopted to protect the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevent victimization of vulnerable children, and assist law enforcement in keeping track of sex offenders. Malloy had two prior sex offense convictions and failed to complete two different sex offender programs. He had a history of inability to conform his conduct to the demands of the state's sex offender laws and exhibited behavior placing society in danger because of his recidivism. The conditions were reasonably related to the goal of protecting society, including children. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004).

Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender — Conditions in Written but Not Oral Judgment That Full Employment Be Maintained and Offender Not Have Contact With Victims: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. The written judgment, but not the oral pronouncement of sentence, required him to maintain full-time employment and to not have contact with the victims of his offense. The court could not say that the conditions would not substantively increase his loss of liberty or sacrifice of property, and accordingly, the court ordered those conditions to be vacated. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Deferred Sentence, Community Service, and Restitution Properly Imposed for Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Following Grindheim's conviction for sexual intercourse without consent, the District Court deferred Grindheim's sentence for 6 years, subject to 6 months in the county jail, 2,000 hours of community service, and fines and restitution totaling about $6,496.60. Grindheim appealed on grounds that the combination of the conditions rendered the sentence unreasonable and impossible to perform and constituted punishment instead of rehabilitation. The Supreme Court held that the conditions and community service were within the parameters of the sentencing statute and were reasonably related to the circumstances of the offense and that the restitution calculations were reasonable considering the victim's long-term counseling needs. Therefore, the District Court did not err in imposing the sentence, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Grindheim, 2004 MT 311, 323 M 519, 101 P3d 267 (2004).

Improper Inclusion of Social Security Benefits When Determining Income for Purposes of Restitution: An order that Social Security benefits be included in appellant's net income for purposes of determining the amount of net income to be paid as restitution improperly burdened appellant's Social Security benefits. Including Social Security benefits in income conflicts with 42 U.S.C. 407(a), which provides that the benefits cannot be subjected to execution, levy, attachment, garnishment, or other legal process. The order was an improper attempt to subject the benefits to "other legal process". St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004).

Ordering Restitution When Section Required It for Deferred Sentence and Did Not Mention Suspended Sentence — Allowable When Failure to Mention Suspended Sentence Was Due to Error: Under a 1999 amendment, this section mandated restitution when a deferred sentence was imposed. Defendant was given a suspended sentence and ordered to pay restitution. An error was made in the 1999 amendments to this section, under which only a deferred sentence was referred to. The amendments were not intended to make any change in the substance or effect of the section, which required mandatory restitution when either a deferred or a suspended sentence was imposed. Therefore, it was not error to order appellant to pay restitution. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004).

Review of Legality of Imposing Restitution — Failure to Raise Issue Below: If a defendant appeals a sentence in a criminal case on the grounds that it is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, the issue may be reviewed even if no objection was made at the time of sentencing. Therefore, defendant's claim that an order to pay restitution as a condition to a suspended sentence was illegal was not waived by his failure to raise the issue below and would be reviewed on appeal. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004), followed in St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 381, 325 M 92, 103 P3d 1068 (2004).

Restitution Properly Ordered When Dismissed Charges Related to Charge for Which Defendant Convicted: McIntire was charged with felony burglary, misdemeanor theft, and misdemeanor forgery. Pursuant to a plea agreement, McIntire pleaded guilty to the burglary charge and the other charges were dismissed. The trial court ordered McIntire to pay restitution, but McIntire contended that because the forgery charges were dismissed, restitution could not be ordered to compensate for the forged checks and that the court lacked authority to impose restitution when there was no longer a victim with respect to the dismissed forgery charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The victim was the same for both crimes, and the burglary was directly connected to the forgery, constituting an ongoing criminal transaction, so dismissal of the forgery charges did not deprive the court of authority to impose a restitution obligation on McIntire for the checks stolen from the victim during the burglary and for the pecuniary loss from the subsequent forgery of those checks. St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Imposition of Stock Probation Requirements in Written Sentence When Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Not Error Absent Showing of Prejudice: When Kroll was sentenced orally for a felony bad check scheme, he received a 10-year prison sentence with all but 180 days suspended and was ordered to pay restitution, not possess or consume alcohol, obtain a chemical dependency evaluation, refrain from entering casinos and playing games of chance, and undergo a sexual risk assessment because many of the materials purchased with the bad checks included pornography. The subsequent written judgment deviated from the oral pronouncement in several respects, omitting the sexual risk assessment and including several conditions not addressed at the oral sentencing, including requirements that Kroll conduct himself in a law-abiding manner, submit to reasonable searches, not own or possess firearms or deadly weapons, maintain full-time legitimate employment, have no contact with the victims, and pay a supervision fee. Kroll contested the validity of the added conditions in the written sentence and the imposition of the sexual risk assessment. The Supreme Court affirmed. The added conditions were civil restrictions that were considered stock requirements for probationers and individuals subject to a suspended sentence and did not substantively increase Kroll's loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Given the standard nature of the sentencing conditions, Kroll suffered no actual prejudice by failure of the District Court to impose the conditions at oral sentencing, and they were therefore upheld as lawful. The state conceded that the alcohol restrictions and the chemical dependency conditions of the oral sentence were not related to the crime, and the Supreme Court ordered that those conditions be removed, leaving only the gambling and sexual risk assessment at issue. The Supreme Court affirmed those conditions because they were related to the bad check crimes and were a reasonable condition to assist Kroll's rehabilitation. St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), following St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000). See also St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), in which the imposition of significant restrictions and conditions not mentioned in the oral sentence, in addition to stock sentencing conditions authorized in Kroll, was considered prejudicial, reversible error.

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to this section no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in subsection (5) of this section was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of this section, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and 46-18-251(2) meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and 46-18-244(2), and created a potentially absurd application of subsection (1) of this section. Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of this section. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in subsection (5) of this section was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004), and St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Restitution Adequately Documented in PSI Report and Information Submitted by Victim: Heath contended that the presentence investigation report (PSI) contained insufficient information to document his ability to pay restitution and the victim's pecuniary loss, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished Brown, Hilgers, and Pritchett on grounds that the PSI report deficiencies in those cases were not present in Heath's case. Rather, the court followed St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003), and St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003), finding that the PSI report adequately addressed Heath's employability, assets and debts, and capability of paying restitution. The valuation of the victim's pecuniary loss was adequately provided in documentation submitted by the victim and, coupled with expert testimony on the value of recovered items, provided substantial credible evidence upon which to base the restitution amount. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 381, 325 M 92, 103 P3d 1068 (2004).

Lack of Remorse Not Sole Sentence Enhancement Factor — Incest Sentence Affirmed: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in augmenting a sentence for incest simply because defendant did not show remorse or admit guilt. The Supreme Court noted that St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), prohibits enhancement of a sentence solely because a defendant is not remorseful or refuses to be accountable for the defendant's conduct. However, in this case, the sentencing court did not rely solely on defendant's attitude in enhancing the incest sentence but also considered defendant's risk of reoffending, risk to society, prospects for rehabilitation, character, background, history, and mental and physical functioning. Thus, Shreves was distinguishable, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Restitution as Condition of Suspended Sentence Proper Under 1997 Version of Sentencing Statute: The District Court suspended Flanagan's 10-year sentence for felony assault and required that Flanagan pay restitution. Flanagan asserted that St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), precluded restitution as a condition of the suspended sentence. However, Horton was decided under the 1999 version of this section, while Flanagan was sentenced under the 1997 version in effect when the assault was committed, and the 1997 version expressly authorized payment of restitution as a condition of a suspended sentence. Thus, the District Court was affirmed on the issue. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Sentence Based on Refusal to Admit Guilt Violative of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Shreves was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison, with no parole for 60 years. At trial, Shreves chose to testify on his own behalf and assert his innocence, and at sentencing, Shreves chose not to testify, but his counsel indicated that Shreves maintained his innocence. The District Court imposed the sentence based in significant part on Shreves' failure to show remorse or responsibility. Shreves appealed on grounds that it was improper to hold his refusal to admit to the crime against him in determining the sentence. The state contended that the sentencing court properly considered the lack of remorse as a factor relevant to Shreves' rehabilitation and the danger presented to the community and argued that the lack of remorse was based on trial testimony and evidence. The Supreme Court considered whether Shreves adequately invoked the right to maintain silence, the scope of the oral sentence that controlled over the subsequent written sentence as it related to the entire sentence, and the District Court's decision to base its sentence in large part on Shreves' refusal to admit to the crime. Although lack of remorse can be considered as a sentencing factor, a sentence that is based on a refusal to admit guilt cannot be upheld. Here, the Supreme Court was unable to find a sentencing distinction between punishing Shreves for remaining silent and the proper consideration of Shreves' failure to show remorse. A sentencing court may not draw a negative inference of lack of remorse from a defendant's silence at sentencing when the defendant has maintained innocence throughout the proceedings. Shreves was improperly penalized for maintaining his innocence pursuant to the constitutional right to remain silent. The sentence was therefore illegal. Shreves' conviction was reversed, and the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), distinguished in St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004), and St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), St. v. Kelly, 265 M 298, 876 P2d 641 (1994), St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Conditioning Suspended Portion of Incarceration Sentence Upon Entering Into Plan to Pay Fine in Installments: The court conditioned suspension of half the incarceration term upon defendant's entering into a plan for payment of a fine in installments. The court did not impose the fine as a condition on the suspended portion of the incarceration term. Thus, the Sentence Review Board's elimination of the suspended portion of the incarceration term did not eliminate the obligation to pay the fine. St. v. George, 2002 MT 300, 313 M 11, 59 P3d 1151 (2002).

Deferral of Sentence to Allow Payment of Restitution Not Violative of Due Process Rights: Benoit was charged with felony theft and entered a nonbinding plea agreement to plead guilty in exchange for a recommendation for a 2-year deferred sentence, based on the possible imposition of various conditions, including the payment of restitution. Benoit was then convicted and ordered to repay $15,933.90 in restitution. At the restitution hearing, Benoit admitted that with her current take-home salary and expenses, the restitution could not be repaid in 2 years, so the sentencing court sentenced Benoit to a 6-year deferred sentence to allow time to pay the restitution, but gave Benoit the opportunity to withdraw the guilty plea after 2 years if restitution was paid within that time. Benoit appealed on grounds that increasing the deferred sentence was a violation of due process, citing St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and asserted that the sentence should be remanded for determination of a length of sentence consistent with the charge and Benoit's history instead of the ability to pay restitution. The Supreme Court distinguished Farrell and Pritchett, noting that Benoit's sentence was not based on indigency, and coupled with the fact that Benoit was given the opportunity to withdraw the guilty plea prior to the termination of the 6-year deferred sentence, Benoit's due process rights were not violated through imposition of the conditional 6-year deferred sentence. St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002).

Failure to Document Victim's Pecuniary Loss and Offender's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution — Restitution Condition Vacated: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was a requirement that Muhammad pay $5,000 in restitution. Under this section, a sentencing judge shall require a defendant to pay full restitution to a victim if the judge finds that the victim has sustained a pecuniary loss. Imposition of restitution is subject to detailed statutory procedures and qualifications, which include documented evidence of the victim's loss and the offender's ability to pay. The sentencing court is required to specify the amount, method, and time of each payment to the victim. Here, the presentence investigation did not document the victim's pecuniary loss or Muhammad's future ability to pay restitution, nor did the sentencing court consider Muhammad's future ability to pay because the relevant evidence was not presented to the court. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the restitution condition of the sentence was illegal, and that condition was vacated. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002), following St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and followed in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Question Whether Parole Denied for Failure to Satisfy Additional Treatment Conditions — Remand: Ringewold pleaded guilty to two counts of felony assault and was sentenced to a total of 14 years' commitment to the Department of Corrections. The next day, Ringewold was placed in the state hospital. The placement order allowed Ringewold to petition for a conditional release from the hospital, but did not specify any conditions. About 17 months later, Ringewold petitioned for release from the hospital. The state agreed that a hearing on the petition was proper, but argued that if it was found that Ringewold no longer suffered from a mental disease or defect that presented a risk to Ringewold or others, it was appropriate to remand Ringewold to the Department. The District Court ordered an independent mental evaluation, but it was never performed. Ringewold then filed another petition for release, but about the same time, the hospital staff determined that Ringewold would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment and transferred him to the state prison pursuant to 46-14-312. At the request of counsel, Ringewold was transferred back to the state hospital, with the state conceding that hospital placement was proper and that Ringewold should be allowed to petition for release pursuant to 46-14-312. About 4 months later, the Department Director sought an order transferring Ringewold back to the prison on grounds that Ringewold continued to suffer from a dangerous mental disorder but would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment for the disorder. At a conditional release hearing about 9 months later, the District Court orally resentenced Ringewold to 8 years in prison. The court specified that the total sentence not exceed more than the original sentence, but the court also conditioned Ringewold's parole on completion of an anger management course, moral reconation therapy, and chemical dependence treatment. In a written amended judgment about 1 month later, the District Court reimposed the original 14-year sentence and restated the parole conditions. Ringewold appealed. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence was legally effective and constituted final judgment. However, it was not possible to determine from the record whether the additional conditions added to the sentence improperly lengthened Ringewold's sentence, so the case was remanded for supplementation of the factual record to determine if Ringewold was being denied consideration for parole because of failure to satisfy the additional treatment conditions and, if so, to strike the conditions from the amended judgment, because under those circumstances, the practical effect of the conditions would be to lengthen the sentence in violation of 46-14-312. St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Failure to Complete Prison Sex Offender Program Not Because of Defendant's Willful Conduct — Consideration of Incarceration Alternatives Constitutionally Required: Lee was sentenced to two concurrent 40-year terms in prison for sexual intercourse without consent and attempted sexual intercourse without consent and was ineligible for parole during the first 10 years of the sentence unless a sex offender treatment plan was successfully completed. Lee entered prison in 1995 and immediately requested enrollment in Phase I of the two-phase program. Lee was finally enrolled in Phase I after a 3-year wait, successfully completed that phase, and was placed on a waiting list for enrollment in Phase II. Because of a sitdown strike, Lee was unable to complete Phase II by his scheduled release date. The state petitioned to revoke Lee's suspended sentence because the program was not completed, and Lee moved to dismiss on grounds that the failure to complete treatment was not his fault. The District Court found that Lee's failure to complete the program was not due to any volitional conduct on Lee's part, but the court nevertheless determined that the failure constituted a violation of the terms of the suspended sentence and ordered Lee to serve the remaining 30 years on each count, declaring Lee ineligible for parole until both phases of treatment were completed. Lee appealed on grounds that the court violated his right to due process because it was impossible to complete the program during incarceration because of prison waiting periods and the length of the program. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Williams, 1999 MT 240, 296 M 258, 993 P2d 1 (1999), it was held that a court could revoke a suspended sentence even though a probationer's failure to comply with the terms of the sentence was not willful, and the court in this case affirmed Williams to the extent that violations of nonfinancial probationary conditions need not necessarily be willful in order to justify revocation. However, the probationer in Williams was unable to gain acceptance into sex offender programs because of a lack of social skills, immaturity, and "acting out" behavior, whereas Lee was unable to access the programs because of actions of the state. Due process required the trial court to consider whether there were alternatives to incarceration that would further the purpose of Lee's suspended sentence. The Supreme Court remanded for a determination of whether there were any reasonable alternative measures other than continued incarceration because to do otherwise would deprive Lee of his conditional freedom simply because the state prevented him from completing the sex offender program while imprisoned. St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 M 173, 31 P3d 998 (2001), and distinguished in St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Order Not to Socialize With Females Under Age 19 Improperly Imposed as Condition of Sentence for Assault of Police Officer: Watson was sentenced to 50 years with 40 suspended for assaulting a police officer. As a condition of the suspended sentence, Watson was ordered not to socialize with females under the age of 19. Watson objected to the condition, and the Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. Watson's crime did not involve young girls, and he was never charged with any offense in which the victim was a young girl. The fact that the District Court sincerely believed in the speculation that Watson would sooner or later victimize a young girl did not provide a legal basis for imposing a sentencing condition that was unconnected to the underlying offense. St. v. Watson, 2001 MT 143, 306 M 33, 29 P3d 1026 (2001).

Attendance at Parenting Classes Improperly Imposed as Condition of Sentence for Parole Violation: Smith violated parole, and in addition to a sentence for new jail time, Smith was required to attend parenting classes and to pay the costs of incarceration as a condition of sentencing. Smith argued on appeal that the sentencing court exceeded its authority by imposing the new conditions. The Supreme Court agreed that requiring attendance at parenting classes was improper. Applying St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), the court found no nexus between the underlying charged offenses of felony theft, burglary, and unauthorized control of a motor vehicle and a requirement of participation in parenting classes. Although the classes may have been beneficial to Smith and his family, they could not be made a condition of the sentence when they bore no relation to the conduct for which Smith was convicted. The court reversed on that issue. However, because Smith did not object to the payment of incarceration costs at the revocation hearing, that issue could not be raised for the first time on appeal, so that portion of the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001).

Payment of Child Support Improper Condition of Sentence for Felony DUI — Victim and Correlation to Underlying Offense Necessary for Imposition of Restitution: Horton was arrested for DUI, and a search of his driving record revealed nine prior DUI convictions. A further search showed that Horton also owed more than $47,000 in back child support. Horton was charged with felony DUI, with driving with a suspended or revoked license, as a habitual traffic offender operating a motor vehicle, and with felony nonsupport. By plea agreement, Horton agreed to plead guilty to the traffic offenses in exchange for dismissal of the nonsupport charge. The plea agreement stated that the state would recommend a 13-month sentence to be served in prerelease, followed by 4 years of probation, and, as a condition of the probationary sentence, provided that Horton would also make regular child support payments plus an additional sum monthly toward the support arrearage. As set out in the agreement, Horton pleaded guilty to the traffic offenses, and the nonsupport charge was dismissed. At sentencing, the habitual traffic offender charge was subsequently dismissed for failure of the state to prove that a valid habitual offender designation was in place at the time of the offense, and in addition, Horton's counsel objected to the court ordering payment of any child support arrearage, arguing that because the nonsupport charge had been dismissed, Horton would be paying restitution on a count for which he had not been convicted. Nevertheless, the court ordered Horton to pay support and promised to revoke his probation and sentence him to 4 years in prison with no parole if support was not paid. On appeal, Horton argued that the District Court abused its discretion and exceeded statutory mandates when it required him to pay restitution for an offense that was dismissed, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), for the position that restitution is statutorily limited to the victim of the crime and that because there was no victim who sustained pecuniary or economic loss as a result of the felony DUI or driving with a suspended or revoked license, restitution was inappropriate. The state argued that Horton was attempting to receive the benefit of the plea agreement—having the felony nonsupport charge dismissed—without holding up his end of the bargain by paying child support. The Supreme Court noted that a plea agreement is subject to contract law and that the court will not assist a defendant in escaping the obligations of a plea agreement once its benefits are received. However, the court also pointed out that a District Court's authority to impose sentences in criminal cases is defined and constrained by statute. The statutory authority for payment of restitution is in this section, which limits payment of restitution to the victim of a crime for which a defendant is convicted, and because Horton was not convicted of nonsupport, there was no victim to whom Horton could be ordered to pay restitution. The state also contended that ordering Horton to pay child support was proper because under 46-18-202(1), a sentencing court may impose any condition reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, but there was no correlation or connection between Horton's conviction for DUI and ordering him to pay child support. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered that the portion of Horton's sentence requiring payment of child support be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), followed in St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001).

Revocation of Juvenile Offender's Suspended Sentence and Commitment to Department Authorized: Following a dispositional hearing, the Youth Court entered an order declaring Lesmeister a delinquent youth and serious juvenile offender, transferred the 18 year old's case to District Court, and placed the youth on probation until age 25, with the entire commitment suspended upon certain conditions. One year later, on a petition filed by the Cascade County Attorney alleging numerous probation violations, the District Court revoked Lesmeister's suspended sentence and committed the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25. On appeal, Lesmeister challenged the legality of the court's commitment to the Department, arguing that 41-5-208 authorizes the District Court to impose only those conditions provided for in 46-18-201 through 46-18-203, which does not include a sentence to the Department of Corrections. In affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that state law authorizes a District Court to impose a sentence to commit an offender to the Department of Corrections when all but the first 5 years are suspended. St. v. Lesmeister, 2000 MT 318, 302 M 500, 15 P3d 392, 57 St. Rep. 1344 (2000).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Failure to Document Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution and Victim's Pecuniary Loss — Restitution Sentence Improper: The general mandate to sentencing courts is that a sentence must include full restitution whenever it is found that the victim of an offense has sustained a pecuniary loss, subject to mandatory detailed statutory procedures and qualifications. Here, although the District Court received some evidence of these amounts during the sentencing hearing, the failure of the presentence investigation report to document the victim's pecuniary loss, as well as the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, provided the court no authority to impose a sentence of restitution and rendered its judgment illegal. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), following St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), and St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Failure to Specify Amount, Method, and Time of Payment — Restitution Order Invalid: The District Court ordered defendant to make restitution payments according to a schedule to be determined by defendant's probation officer. However, 46-18-244 requires the court to specify the amount, method, and time of payments, after considering the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay. Thus, the court failed to comply with the statutory requirements by leaving that determination to the discretion of the probation officer, invalidating the restitution order. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Sentence of Restitution Based on Defendant's Indigency Constituting Due Process Violation: Pritchett entered the garage of a former employer in an effort to return two hunting rifles that he had stolen and pawned to support his gambling habit. Pritchett dropped his flashlight and, unable to find it in the dark, lit a cigarette lighter, which ignited a leaking propane bottle and caused an explosion that destroyed the garage and its contents. Pritchett was convicted of burglary and ordered to pay restitution of $63,569.25. Noting that the amount of restitution was "enormous", the probation officer who prepared the presentence investigation report stated that Pritchett should receive a 20-year suspended sentence to allow adequate time to pay off the restitution. The District Court adopted the sentencing recommendation exactly as proposed. Although the court did not expressly state that it was sentencing Pritchett to the maximum term to provide sufficient time to pay the ordered restitution, there was sufficient evidence in the record to show that the length of the sentence was based on Pritchett's indigency because, given Pritchett's limited financial resources, no shorter time would allow payment of restitution. Under St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), basing a prison term on a defendant's indigency is a violation of the right to due process. Thus, the Supreme Court vacated the sentence and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Failure to Complete Sexual Offender Treatment Sufficient to Warrant Suspended Sentence Revocation and Continued Incarceration: Vallier received 5 years for felony assault and 20 years for felony sexual assault of an 11-year-old child, with 10 years suspended if Vallier completed the prison sexual offender program. Vallier failed to complete the program by the time of scheduled discharge of the active sentence, so the District Court revoked the suspended portion of the sentence, further classifying Vallier as a level 3 sexual offender at a high risk to reoffend. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding Vallier's failure to complete the sexual offender program of such a nature as to require Vallier's continued incarceration. Sufficient evidence was offered to prove that Vallier continued to be a serious community threat until the treatment was received, and Vallier did not meet the burden of showing that the District Court abused its discretion in revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Vallier, 2000 MT 225, 301 M 228, 8 P3d 112, 57 St. Rep. 928 (2000).

Defendant Not Responsible for Restitution in Excess of Damages Caused by Criminal Conduct: During the course of a drug investigation, Beavers admitted accepting stolen property in exchange for illegal drugs. The District Court ordered Beavers to pay restitution to the victims of the thefts, even though Beavers did not actually steal the property. Under St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180 (1995), an accused is liable for restitution for offenses to which the accused has admitted guilt, been found guilty, or has agreed to pay restitution, so Beavers was not responsible for restitution for offenses she did not commit. Beavers' admission of the offense of receiving stolen property was sufficient to satisfy the causal standard of 46-18-241, that the victim suffered loss as a result of Beavers' offense, so the court did not abuse its discretion in ordering restitution; however, Beavers was required to pay restitution only for the property that formed the basis of the offense, not for property that was stolen by others but not received and possessed by Beavers. When stolen property is recovered, the amount of restitution owed is the difference between the value of the property taken and the salvage value of the property returned, and the state has the burden of establishing those values. The case was remanded for calculation of the amount of restitution owed. St. v. Beavers, 2000 MT 145, 300 M 49, 3 P3d 614, 57 St. Rep. 567 (2000).

New Sentence Restriction Added Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence Stricken: If a District Court finds that a defendant has violated the terms or conditions of a suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspended sentence and require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence, but nothing in 46-18-203 authorizes a court to impose additional restrictions when revoking a suspended sentence. (See 2001 amendment to this section, which allows it.) In this case, the District Court originally sentenced Richardson to 20 years in prison for felony sexual assault against a child, with all but 70 days suspended, conditioned in part upon completion of a sex offender treatment program. Richardson failed treatment and admitted violating other conditions of the suspended sentence, so the sentence was revoked, and Richardson was sentenced to prison for the remainder of the 20-year sentence. Additionally, the court conditioned Richardson's parole eligibility upon successful completion of the first two phases of sexual offender treatment in prison. The additional restriction on the sentence was error, and the case was remanded for the limited purpose of striking that condition from the sentence. St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000), following St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

When Restitution Owing: Under this section, the sentencing court is required to provide for full restitution by a defendant to the victim of a criminal offense who sustains a pecuniary loss. Here, Hilgers' issuance of more than 50 bad checks and stealing cash and diverting checks and money orders from his employer in an amount exceeding $33,500 clearly qualified as a pecuniary loss. The court found the state's witnesses more credible than Hilgers, providing adequate support in the record as to the amount owing. The restitution amount was not clearly erroneous and was affirmed on appeal. However, the Supreme Court remanded for lack of documentation, as required under 46-18-242, regarding Hilgers' financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, finding the information in the presentence report regarding Hilgers' age, education, assets and obligations, and marital and employment status inadequate in addressing Hilgers' resources and ability to pay the amount in question. St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), following St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Suspension of Sentence and Imposition of Sentence Conditions Within Discretion of Sentencing Court: Both the suspension of sentence and the imposition of conditions on a suspended sentence are discretionary with the sentencing court. Although it may be uncommon for a court to suspend part or all of a sentence without attaching conditions, it is within the court's discretion to do so. Here, the sentencing court orally sentenced Simpson to 30 years in prison with 10 years suspended, recommending that Simpson be required to complete a chemical dependency program before being eligible for parole and that appropriate measures be taken to prevent Simpson from assaulting prison staff. When the court issued its written sentence, it imposed 20 additional conditions that were not articulated in the oral pronouncement. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls, so the additional conditions in the written sentence were held invalid and the case was reversed to conform the written sentence with the oral pronouncement. St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999), following St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to 46-23-1031. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Sentencing Condition Required to Have Correlation or Connection to Underlying Offense: Ommundson pleaded guilty to felony DUI. In imposing sentence, the District Court considered a presentence investigation that documented Ommundson's criminal history, which included more than 10 convictions for indecent exposure. The court also considered a sex offender evaluation, which determined that Ommundson qualified for community-based treatment. The court committed Ommundson to the Department of Corrections for 54 months, with all but 6 months suspended on condition that Ommundson participate in a sex offender treatment program and not have any contact with children without adult supervision. Ommundson did not object to the condition prohibiting contact with children, so that issue was not cognizable on appeal. However, on the issue of whether the District Court had authority to impose a condition of participation in a sex offender program as a penalty for DUI, the Supreme Court held that 46-18-202 allows only the imposition of sentencing limitations reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. That authority is broad, but not without limit. In order to be reasonably related, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. In the present case, the requirement that Ommundson participate in a sex offender program was not reasonably related to the rehabilitation of a DUI offender or to the protection of society from drunk drivers. The Supreme Court reversed the part of Ommundson's sentence requiring that he participate in a sex offender program. St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999), following St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), and St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), distinguishing Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985), St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988), and St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180, 52 St. Rep. 54 (1995), and followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001), St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), St. v. Watson, 2001 MT 143, 306 M 33, 29 P3d 1026 (2001), and St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006). In St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), the Ommundson nexus rule was expanded to allow a sentencing judge to impose a particular condition of probation as long as the condition has a nexus either to the offense for which the offender is being sentenced or to the offender. However, offender-related conditions may be imposed only in cases in which the history or pattern of conduct to be restricted is recent and significant or chronic. A passing, isolated, or stale instance of behavior or conduct is insufficient to support a restrictive probation condition imposed in the name of offender rehabilitation. Ashby was followed in St. v. Stiles, 2008 MT 390, 347 M 95, 197 P3d 966 (2008), St. v. Sadowsky, 2008 MT 405, 347 M 192, 197 P3d 1018 (2008), and St. v. Park, 2008 MT 429, 347 M 462, 198 P3d 321 (2008). Stiles was followed in St. v. Russette, 2008 MT 413, 347 M 285, 198 P3d 791 (2008).

Discovery of Shotgun Case During Routine Walk-Through of Probationer's Residence Constituting Reasonable Grounds for Further Warrantless Search: Probationer Stucker allowed a voluntary tour of his residence by probation officers, who discovered two weapons cases in plain view in the master bedroom. One case contained a bow, which Stucker was allowed to possess under the terms of his probation; the other contained a semiautomatic shotgun, which constituted contraband under the probation conditions. The discovery of the shotgun case in plain view constituted reasonable grounds for the officers to conduct a warrantless search of the residence to determine if additional weapons were present. The District Court did not err in denying Stucker's motion to suppress the fruits of the search. St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999).

Oral Pronouncement as Legally Effective Sentence — Correction of Error in Written Judgment by Nunc Pro Tunc Order — Due Process and Double Jeopardy Rights Not Violated: The oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence. The written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. In the event of a conflict between the oral and written sentence, the oral controls. The sentencing court may correct an error in a written judgment and commitment by a nunc pro tunc order, pursuant to 46-18-117 (now repealed), to accurately reflect what was orally pronounced at the sentencing hearing. Absent evidence of a tangible detriment or concrete injury to defendant, a clarifying nunc pro tunc order does not jeopardize a defendant's due process rights or constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), overruling St. v. Enfinger, 222 M 438, 722 P2d 1170 (1986), St. v. Wirtala, 231 M 264, 752 P2d 177 (1988), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058 (1992), and St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), to the extent that those cases held that the written judgment and commitment, rather than the oral pronouncement of sentence, was to be considered the final, valid order, and followed and applied retroactively in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). The Supreme Court amended former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to reflect the Lane decision in In re Amending Rule 5 of the Mont. Rules of Appellate Procedure, 55 St. Rep. 1267 (1998). The Lane rule was applied retroactively in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999). Lane was also followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001). See also St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Abuse of Discretion for Court to Correct Failure to Sentence by Nunc Pro Tunc Order: The District Court failed to sentence Winterrowd, in either open court or by written judgment, on his misdemeanor theft conviction. Four months later, the court issued an order nunc pro tunc, sentencing Winterrowd to 6 months' imprisonment. It is within a District Court's power to enter an order nunc pro tunc modifying or amending a judgment in order to remedy certain types of clerical errors or to make the record reflect what was actually decided. However, in this case, not only was the sentence omitted from the written sentencing order, but the sentence was not even discussed at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court reversed and vacated the nunc pro tunc order and sentence. St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522, 55 St. Rep. 307 (1998).

Reservation of Right to Specify Ineligibility for Parole Upon Subsequent Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Lack of Authority in District Court: When Lindeman was sentenced for sexual assault and incest, the District Court reserved the right, in the event that Lindeman ever violated a condition of probation and his suspended sentence was imposed, to specify that Lindeman would be ineligible for parole until he completed a sex offender treatment program. When Lindeman failed to complete the program and the state requested that Lindeman's probation be revoked and the suspended sentence imposed, Lindeman objected to the District Court's imposition of the condition preventing parole. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), the only punishment that the District Court could impose was the suspended sentence or a lesser penalty and that the District Court was without authority to impose the additional condition. The Supreme Court noted that 46-18-202, the statutory provision relied upon by the District Court when it reserved the right to impose the condition, applies only to the original sentence under this section and that the District Court had no authority to impose the condition upon subsequently revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), followed, with regard to the impropriety of new sentence restrictions added upon revocation, in St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000).

Improper to Reserve Right, at Time of Sentencing, to Impose Additional Restrictions on Probation: The District Court, which sentenced defendant to an imprisonment term and suspended the sentence, had no authority to reserve the right to impose additional restrictions during the term of probation. St. v. Wilson, 279 M 34, 926 P2d 712, 53 St. Rep. 1034 (1996).

"Street Time" While on Out-of-State Probation Properly Denied: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision, supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that the District Court improperly denied credit for his "street time" while on probation in Utah when it failed to sufficiently set forth reasons for the denial in the record. The denial of credit for Hardy's street time was an express provision of his sentence. The reasons for the sentence included the reasons for the denial of credit. The District Court adequately considered this section and sufficiently stated its reasons for denying the credit. Therefore, Hardy was not arbitrarily denied credit for his street time. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Racial Bias of Judge Who Illegally Made Deportation Condition of Parole Not Shown by Mere Unsupported Speculation: Upon an aggravated kidnapping and assault conviction of a native of Bangladesh, the court ordered deportation as a condition of parole. This was an illegal condition but did not alone show the judge was racially biased against defendant. A claim of bias was not upheld when it was supported by mere speculation or conjecture by defendant. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Restitution Not Conditioned on Suspended or Deferred Sentence — Restitution Upheld as Additional Restrictions on Sentence: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged the District Court's recommendation that she be required to make restitution if she was released on parole or supervised release. The Supreme Court noted that it had previously held in St. v. Bourne, 259 M 274, 856 P2d 222 (1993), that a District Court has the power under 46-18-202 to recommend restitution and payment of supervision fees as a condition of parole. St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Illegal Search of Person but Lawful Search of Vehicle — Vehicle Search Upheld as Probation Search and Not "Fruit of Poisonous Tree": Deputy Turner watched New make several turns in his vehicle without signaling and, after determining by his vehicle license plate that New was on probation, stopped the vehicle and searched New. Upon discovering drugs in New's pocket, Turner impounded the vehicle. Detective Jacobs questioned New, and New gave Jacobs approval to search the vehicle. Then Jacobs talked to Forsyth, New's probation officer, who conducted the search of New's vehicle with Jacobs. Turner's search of New's pockets was subsequently held illegal but the District Court refused to quash evidence taken from the vehicle as a result of Forsyth's search. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the search of the vehicle was not the "fruit of the poisonous tree", the illegal personal search of New, but was justified upon the independent grounds that Forsyth had previously determined that he wanted to search New's vehicle because of pending charges of violations of the conditions of New's probation. St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996).

Revocation of Suspension of Part of Sentence While Nonsuspended Part Being Served: The District Court had authority to revoke suspension of part of a sentence when, prior to having begun to serve the suspended part, the prisoner was released on parole before serving the whole of the nonsuspended part of the sentence and violated conditions of probation relating to the suspended part. Christofferson v. St., 272 M 518, 901 P2d 588, 52 St. Rep. 909 (1995).

Error to Impose Prosecution Legal Fees as Condition of Suspended Sentence: Henry was convicted of driving under the influence, first in City Court and then in District Court. As part of Henry's suspended sentence, the District Court imposed certain conditions, including payment of $10,550 to the town of Darby for legal fees incurred in prosecuting the case and for additional legal fees incurred in defending the appeal. The Supreme Court held that the imposition of prosecution legal fees is neither expressly nor implicitly authorized by statute and that the District Court abused its discretion in imposing the payment of prosecution legal fees as a condition of Henry's suspended sentence. St. v. Henry, 271 M 491, 898 P2d 1195, 52 St. Rep. 516 (1995).

Requiring Defendant to Pay Restitution for Admitted Offenses for Which Defendant Is Not Charged or Convicted: Blanchard argued that the lower court erred in requiring him, as part of the plea bargain, to pay restitution for offenses that he admitted committing but for which he was never charged or convicted. The Supreme Court held that the issue is one of first impression in Montana but that other jurisdictions have held that an accused is liable for restitution for offenses admitted to even if the accused is not charged or convicted of the crimes and especially in cases in which the accused has agreed to pay the restitution as part of a plea bargain. The Supreme Court also held that the lower court had not erred in ordering the restitution when it was intended to serve a rehabilitative purpose. St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180, 52 St. Rep. 54 (1995), followed in St. v. Beavers, 2000 MT 145, 300 M 49, 3 P3d 614, 57 St. Rep. 567 (2000).

Completion of Sexual Offender Treatment Program Proper Condition of Sentence for Sex Crime: The District Court did not err in requiring the completion of a sex offender treatment program as a condition of sentence upon conviction for sexual assault when the condition related to defendant's need for rehabilitation and to the protection of society. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994).

Restitution Order for Present Asset Forfeiture Reversed — Condition of Present Sentence Void: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court sentenced Brown to a 30-year prison term, with 10 years suspended, and ordered Brown to make restitution. As part of the order for restitution, the District Court ordered that several of Brown's assets be sold and that the proceeds be turned over to his victims. The Supreme Court held that the statutory provisions relied on by the District Court to impose forfeiture were improperly relied on in that they limited the District Court only to conditions that could be imposed during the suspended portion of Brown's sentence. Because Brown was required to first serve a prison term, forfeiture could not be immediately ordered. St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994).

180 Days Maximum Total Jail Time Allowed — No Power to Impose Sentence in Absence of Specific Statutory Authority: The District Court erred when it ordered a suspended sentence that included 30 days in jail plus a possible additional 180 days in jail to be served at the discretion of the supervising probation officer. Maximum jail time allowed under this section is 180 days. Further, 46-18-202, which allows additional restrictions on sentence, does not authorize a District Court to delegate sentencing discretion to a probation officer. St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025, 50 St. Rep. 101 (1993), followed in St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945, 52 St. Rep. 1204 (1995), and St. v. Phelps, 2000 MT 18, 298 M 135, 995 P2d 963, 57 St. Rep. 105 (2000).

Warrantless Search by Probation Officer Lawful if Based on Reasonable Suspicion of Probation Violation: Defendant's deferred sentence was revoked after a warrantless search initiated by her probation officer pursuant to the terms of her probation revealed that defendant possessed dangerous drugs in violation of the terms of her probation. Search by a probation officer of his probationer's car, premises, or other belongings is lawful if it is based on the probation officer's reasonable suspicion of a probation violation. St. v. Small, 235 M 309, 767 P2d 316, 46 St. Rep. 9 (1989), followed in St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996), and St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998).

Warrantless Police Search of Probationers' Car and Residence Allowed — Reasonable Grounds Standard — Fogarty Overruled: A police officer's warrantless search of the probationers' car and residence based on the officer's observations and with permission of the probation officer, in compliance with probationary conditions, did not violate the fourth amendment. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), is specifically overruled and the "reasonable grounds" standard of Griffin v. Wis., 483 US 868, 97 L Ed 2d 709, 107 S Ct 3164 (1987), is adopted. Police cooperation with probation officers is to be encouraged as an important aid to effective administration of the probation system. To impose a warrant requirement for residential searches, on the basis of rights enjoyed by persons not on probation, would artificially raise a probationer's privacy interest to a level inconsistent with conditional liberty status. St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), clarified, regarding the fact that probation officers, other than the one assigned to a probationer, are not precluded from authorizing a probationary search, in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), and followed in St. v. Boston, 269 M 300, 889 P2d 814, 51 St. Rep. 1142 (1994), St. v. Burchett, 277 M 192, 921 P2d 854, 53 St. Rep. 590 (1996), St. v. Beaudry, 282 M 225, 937 P2d 459, 54 St. Rep. 324 (1997), St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999), and St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006).

Child Support as Restitution and Condition of Probation: Child support violations were noted in the presentence investigation. Defendant should have known that they might be considered by the court, so there was no due process violation. The District Court properly ordered payment of child support as a form of restitution and rehabilitation and as a legitimate condition of parole. St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Order to Complete Sex Offender Program Not Abuse of Discretion: It was not an abuse of discretion for the sentencing judge to order defendant to complete a sex offender program despite expert testimony that defendant was not likely to benefit from the program. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

Error in Sentencing Order — Correction "Nunc Pro Tunc" Two Years Later Upheld: The District Court, as a condition of sentence, ordered defendant to pay certain medical expenses and called the required payment "restitution" in the order. The payment was not restitution, but the court did have statutory authority to require payment. The court's effort to correct nunc pro tunc the original order 2 years after it was entered was proper. The error was clerical in nature. Every court has the inherent right to correct clerical errors. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985).

Medical Expenses for Self-Inflicted Injuries — Payment by Defendant Reasonable Condition of Sentence: A sentencing court acted properly in ordering a defendant to reimburse a local government for medical expenses incurred for injuries defendant inflicted upon himself while in jail after his arrest. This section permits the imposition of reasonable conditions on sentences for rehabilitation purposes. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985).

Valid Condition of Sentence — Incorrect Basis Given in Order — Condition Upheld: When there was statutory authority to require defendant, as part of his sentence, to pay the medical expenses incurred for injuries he inflicted upon himself while in jail after his arrest, but neither the District Court's original order nor corrected order cited the proper authority, the Supreme Court held defendant liable for the medical expenses. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985).

Restitution — Persons Not Direct Victims of Specified Crime: To be eligible for restitution by one convicted of a crime, one must be within the class of persons injured by the crime. This section's provision for restitution does not define the class or state its breadth, but the Crime Victims Compensation Act of Montana defines a victim as, among other things, one who suffers bodily injury or death as a result of criminally injurious conduct, without the necessity of a direct relationship to a crime for which a conviction was obtained. That is a persuasive approach, and where defendant driver was convicted of negligent homicide, killing two persons in the other auto, it was proper to order him to make restitution to three girls who were also in the other auto and were injured but not killed. St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177, 39 St. Rep. 1072 (1982).

Restitution — Standards — Findings to Be Stated: Restitution under this section may be allowed by payment of money equivalent to the loss resulting from property taken, destroyed, broken, or otherwise harmed, and of out-of-pocket losses such as medical expenses. Where the District Court ordered restitution but did not state what it was for or determine the amount of the losses, Supreme Court could not determine the propriety of the restitution order and vacated that part of the sentence and remanded for resentencing on this matter. The District Court on remand should set forth written findings, stating its basis for the restitution ordered and whether appellant will be able to pay it; the appellant may petition the District Court for remission of all or part of the payments upon a showing to the satisfaction of the court that the payments impose manifest hardship on appellant or his immediate family. St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177, 39 St. Rep. 1072 (1982).

Alcoholics — Refraining as Valid Condition of Suspended Sentence: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Parole Conditions — Application to Suspended Portion of Sentence: Parole conditions set by Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) also applied to period of suspended sentence where court passing sentence did not set conditions upon suspended portion of sentence, particularly where that court expressly directed that when defendant was not in prison he was to be under the supervision of the Board and court could revoke the suspended sentence for violation of those conditions. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Unlimited Search and Polygraph Provisions on Probation Unconstitutional: As conditions for imposition of a suspended sentence, defendant was required to submit to an unlimited search provision by any lawful authorities and to submit to a polygraph examination upon the request of any law enforcement officer. The Supreme Court when reviewing the revocation of defendant's suspended sentence held that the unlimited polygraph examination condition was overly broad and thus an invalid condition of probation and that the unlimited warrantless search provision is an unconstitutional condition of probation. The Supreme Court said that a sentencing court cannot inject prosecuting attorneys or law enforcement officials into the probation process by granting them direct rights to search the probationer, his home, or vehicle. A type of probable cause or some identifiable reason is required before a search clause may be exercised to search the probationer or his vehicle. The legal interests of innocent third persons living with a probationer are to be protected by requiring a search warrant before searching the probationer's home. Polygraph examinations as a condition of probation can be effectively contained within constitutional parameters by confining the right to demand a polygraph examination to the probation officer. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), overruled in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988).

Suspended Sentence Conditioned on Restitution Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Conditioning the suspension of the last 30 years of a 56-year sentence on restitution [in 1983 an amendment provided for a maximum 6-year deferral for a felony if restitution is imposed], which included restitution for three counts for which the defendant was acquitted, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment or an excessive fine considering the defendant's indigent status. Restitution, particularly in theft-type convictions, is a proper condition for suspension on probation. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Deferred Sentence Conditioned on Repayment of Attorney's Fees: Lenihan pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary and received a deferred sentence [prior to 1981 amendment adding provisions allowing court to require defendant to pay costs and fines]. One of the conditions of his deferred sentence was that he pay the county $250 as reimbursement for his court-appointed attorney. The Supreme Court found that the repayment of attorney's fees is not permitted when no consideration was given to the defendant's ability to pay or to the consequences in the event of default. This repayment condition revives the fears espoused by the court in St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978), and must be vacated. St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979).

Other Charges: Subsection (2) does not apply to incarceration for other charges. In re Davis, 179 M 196, 587 P2d 30 (1979).

Fine Imposed Unreasonable — Possession of Drugs: The fine provision in 45-9-102, in itself, does not allow the sentencing court to make payment of a fine a condition to suspended execution of a sentence. Additionally, the Supreme Court found no reasonable association between the fines imposed and the offenses committed, nor did it find the fines to be reasonable or necessary conditions of probation or for the protection of the public. St. v. Cripps, 177 M 410, 582 P2d 312 (1978).

Improper Condition of Probation — Fine:

The Supreme Court held the imposition of a $500 fine or payment as a condition of probation after deferred imposition of sentence to be a nullity and of no force or effect and that the same be vacated and set aside to conform with St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978). St. v. Petko, 177 M 229, 581 P2d 425 (1978). [But see 1981 amendment allowing payment of a fine as a condition of probation.]

The imposition of a condition of probation that requires the payment of a fine having no reasonable association to the crime committed or to public protection is a nullity and of no force or effect. St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978). [But see 1981 amendment allowing payment of a fine as a condition of probation.]

Probationer Search Clause: Execution of a probationer search clause by law enforcement personnel, being instrumental in achieving the objectives of probation, is a proper condition of probation. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Condition of Probation: Under former law, provisions in a probation order permitting the petitioner to have employment outside the county jail, absolving the Sheriff from liability in permitting the petitioner to be absent from his custody without bail, and requiring that the petitioner pay his own board at the jail from his earnings, while similar to some former provisions relating to convicted misdemeanants serving county jail sentences, did not convert a condition of probation into a term of imprisonment. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

Subsequent Imprisonment: When the order placing the petitioner on probation provided that he would be "jailbased" and referred to him as a "prisoner", the substance of the order and not its form or descriptive terminology determined its effect and meaning so that his subsequent imprisonment did not place the petitioner in double jeopardy in violation of the federal constitution or Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

Improper Condition of Probation — Sentence to Leave County: Suspending a sentence on the condition that the defendant leave and remain out of the county has no force or effect other than to suspend the sentence; the court has no power to pronounce a sentence in the absence of specific statutory authority. The prisoner is by law subject only to the rules and regulations of the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole), and floating is void as an attempted exercise of pardoning power. Ex parte Sheehan, 100 M 244, 49 P2d 438 (1935).

NONVIOLENT OFFENDER PRISON ALTERNATIVES

District Court Required to Consider Alternatives — Alternative Sentences Allowed to Be Imposed: Alden pleaded guilty to several offenses, and at the sentencing hearing, the District Court considered but rejected alternatives to terms of imprisonment. The District Court's rejection was based upon testimony and written documents. Because there was testimony supporting Alden's contention that he should not have been sentenced to prison, Alden appealed the sentence. The Supreme Court held that the standard applicable to the exercise of the District Court's discretion is whether the law was incorrectly applied or whether the District Court's findings are clearly erroneous. The Supreme Court noted that the applicable statutes require the District Court to consider an alternative to imprisonment but only allow and do not require the District Court to impose that alternative. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had considered the alternatives but that the presentence investigation, Alden's admission, the absence of a reason or excuse for the offenses, the risk that Alden would reoffend, the need to protect society, the seriousness of the crime charged, and the ineffective nature of prior treatment all supported the District Court's view that imprisonment was necessary notwithstanding testimony supporting an opposite view. For these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. St. v. Alden, 282 M 45, 934 P2d 210, 54 St. Rep. 234 (1997).

Sentence Within Maximum for Crime — Failure to Object at Trial as Precluding Consideration on Appeal: Montana law requires a sentencing court to consider alternatives to incarceration when sentencing nonviolent offenders. In this case, Goulet's own counsel recommended a prison term and did not object to a 10-year sentence for felony escape or move for reconsideration of the sentence. The sentence did not exceed the maximum allowed for the crime, and failure to object precluded consideration of the issue on appeal. St. v. Goulet, 277 M 308, 921 P2d 1245, 53 St. Rep. 739 (1996), following St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663 (1995).

Requirements for Sentencing Nonviolent Felony Offenders Mandatory: Savaria was convicted in District Court on seven counts of felony theft and was sentenced to 10 years in the state prison. Savaria appealed, claiming that the District Court had failed to consider the obligations imposed upon a District Court by 46-18-225 and this section in sentencing a nonviolent felony offender. The Supreme Court held that those considerations are mandatory and that under the circumstances, the District Court failed to properly sentence Savaria. St. v. Savaria, 274 M 197, 906 P2d 215, 52 St. Rep. 1153 (1995).

Failure to State Reasons for Not Selecting Alternatives to Imprisonment Must Be Objected to if Sentence Not Illegal: Nelson argued that the lower court failed to consider alternatives to imprisonment for a nonviolent offender as required by statute. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had failed to consider alternatives as required but that the sentence imposed by the lower court was not in excess of the maximum allowed by law and therefore was not illegal. The Supreme Court further held that since the sentence was not illegal, Nelson could not raise the consideration of alternatives on appeal when he had failed to object to the sentence when it was entered. St. v. Nelson, 274 M 349, 906 P2d 663, 52 St. Rep. 1069 (1995), distinguishing St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), and St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025 (1993), and following St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307 (1994). Nelson was followed, with respect to the District Court's failure to consider alternatives being raised for the first time on appeal, in St. v. Harper, 284 M 185, 943 P2d 1255, 54 St. Rep. 837 (1997). Nelson was followed, with respect to the exception arising when a defendant alleges that a sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing, in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999). See also St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001).

Procedure for Considering Alternatives to Prison for Nonviolent Offender: Because the District Court did not consider alternatives to prison as required by this section, did not take into account the criteria contained in 46-18-225 and this section that require examination of alternatives to prison, and did not, as required by this section, state its reasons why alternatives to imprisonment were not selected, the prison sentence was vacated and the case remanded. St. v. Pence, 273 M 223, 902 P2d 41, 52 St. Rep. 937 (1995).

Failure to Consider Sentencing Alternatives to Incarceration for Nonviolent Felony Offense — Remand: Criminal sentencing alternatives are strictly matters of statute in Montana. This section requires a trial court to consider alternatives to imprisonment when sentencing a nonviolent felony offender, and 46-18-225 sets out 10 criteria that the court must consider. The court has no discretion in making these considerations. Therefore, when the court in this case considered pertinent facts concerning defendant's background but did not specifically consider any alternatives to incarceration, failure to consider the sentencing alternatives warranted remand for resentencing. St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926, 52 St. Rep. 828 (1995), following St. v. Stevens, 259 M 114, 854 P2d 336 (1993).

Failure to State Reasons for Not Selecting Alternatives to Imprisonment as Error: The Supreme Court reversed a lower court's sentence for a nonviolent felony offender because the lower court had failed to state its reasons for not selecting alternatives to imprisonment and failed to indicate that it had examined the statutory sentencing criteria. St. v. Stevens, 259 M 114, 854 P2d 336, 50 St. Rep. 707 (1993).

Attorney General's Opinions

Restitution Not to Be Made From Forfeited Appearance Bond: A judge is without the authority to order restitution to be made from a forfeited appearance bond. Restitution is not a "cost" of the case that may be defrayed. Section 46-18-603 refers specifically to costs incurred by the county, not by the victim. The money from the forfeited bond is to be paid to the County Treasurer. 38 A.G. Op. 96 (1980).

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 deleted former (3) that read: "(3) An offender convicted of a sexual offense, as defined in 46-23-502, except an offense under 45-5-301 through 45-5-303, and sentenced to imprisonment in a state prison shall enroll in and complete the educational phase of the prison's sexual offender program." Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 22 in (3) near middle inserted "except an offense under 45-5-301 through 45-5-303". Amendment effective August 21, 2002.

Applicability: Section 9, Ch. 22, Sp. L. August 2002, provided: "[This act] applies to convictions on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective August 21, 2002.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to sentencing judge for references to district court and substituted references to offender for references to defendant; inserted (3) requiring enrollment in the prison sexual offender program; deleted former (3) and (4) that read: "(3) When the court imposes a sentence of probation, as defined in 46-23-1001, any probation agreement signed by the defendant may contain a clause waiving extradition.

(4) Whenever the district court imposes a sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a violation of 45-5-502(3), 45-5-503, 45-5-504(2)(c), 45-5-507 (unless the act occurred between two consenting persons 16 years of age or older), or 45-5-625, the court may also impose the restriction that the defendant be ineligible for a good time allowance while serving that term. If such a restriction is to be imposed, the court shall state the reasons for it in writing. If the court finds that the restriction is necessary for the protection of society, it shall impose the restriction as part of the sentence and the judgment must contain a statement of the reasons for the restriction"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 147 inserted (1)(e) concerning requirement for biological sample as part of plea bargain; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 23, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 125 near end of (1) and (1)(e) substituted "protection of the victim and society" for "protection of society"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 350 in (1) and (3), at beginning before "court", deleted "district"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) The judge in a justice's, city, or municipal court does not have the authority to restrict an individual's rights as enumerated in subsection (1)(a)"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 550 inserted (4) allowing imposition of a restriction on eligibility for a good time allowance.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Section 31, Ch. 350, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 at end of (3) substituted "subsection (1)(a)" for "subsections (1) and (2)"; and made minor changes in style.

1987 Amendment: Inserted (4) providing that a probation agreement may waive extradition.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "supervised release program" for "prisoner furlough program" in the middle of (2).

Case Notes

Restriction on Financial Transactions as Condition for Suspended Sentence for Sexual Assault Affirmed: As a condition for a suspended sentence for sexual assault of a child, Hernandez was required to obtain permission from the probation officer before engaging in financial transactions to finance or purchase a vehicle, engage in business, or incur debt. Hernandez appealed on grounds that the condition was unrelated to the crime. The Supreme Court noted that the sentencing condition was authorized by statute and Department of Corrections rule, so the Ashby requirement of a nexus to the offender or the offense did not apply. The financial transaction restriction was considered a standard condition of the Department, and Hernandez offered nothing indicating that the condition would impose a hardship; because Hernandez's priority financial obligations while serving the suspended sentence would be restitution, child support, fines, and fees, the imposition of the condition was appropriate and not an abuse of discretion. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Hernandez, 2009 MT 341, 353 M 111, 220 P3d 25 (2009).

Prohibition Against Firearms as Condition of Deferred Sentence for Stalking Affirmed: As a condition of Essig's deferred sentence for stalking, the District Court prohibited Essig from owning, possessing, or being in control of firearms. Essig appealed the prohibition, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Several years earlier Essig was convicted of a concealed weapon violation, and considering the threatening nature of the stalking violation, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by restricting Essig's firearms use to obtain the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. St. v. Essig, 2009 MT 340, 353 M 99, 218 P3d 838 (2009).

Defendant's Fathering of Own Child Following Assault of Child — Sentencing Condition That Defendant Not Engage in Contact With Children Under 15 Years of Age Affirmed: Rowe was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and misdemeanor negligent endangerment after assaulting a 2-year-old child whom Rowe was babysitting. As a condition of sentence, the District Court prohibited Rowe from having contact with any child under 15 years of age unless supervised by an approved adult. Rowe appealed the sentencing condition on grounds that because he married and fathered a child following conviction, the sentencing condition effectively precluded him from contact with his own child and violated his fundamental right to parent. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed. Citing In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001), the court noted that the child abuse and neglect statutes reflect the tension between the need to protect family unity whenever possible and the need to provide for the protection of children whose health and welfare are or may be adversely affected and further threatened by the conduct of those responsible for their care and protection, including a parent. Undisputedly, Rowe had an anger problem, and he participated in anger management for several years before the assault but voluntarily stopped taking his medications 2 to 3 weeks prior to the assault. Rowe also committed other incidents of violence in addition to the assault and posed a substantial risk of harm to his own child, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion by imposing a sentencing condition precluding Rowe's contact with his own child. St. v. Rowe, 2009 MT 225, 351 M 334, 217 P3d 471 (2009).

Sufficient Nexus of Sentencing Condition to Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Brinson was sentenced to 20 years with 10 years suspended for sexual intercourse without consent, and the sentencing court also attached 56 terms and conditions to the sentence. Brinson challenged three conditions. The Supreme Court applied the nexus test in St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), to determine whether the conditions lacked a nexus either to the offense or to Brinson. In this case a sufficient nexus was established to affirm imposition of conditions: (1) that Brinson's contact with his daughter be supervised; (2) prohibiting Brinson from having a cell phone, with exceptions, or other technology or device with photo, video, or internet capabilities; and (3) prohibiting Brinson from viewing television or motion pictures that were geared toward Brinson's offending cycle or as a stimulus to arouse deviant thoughts or fantasies. St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009).

Failure of Defendant to Admit Incest — Sentence Not Considered More Harsh Given Relevant Sentencing Factors: Bullman consistently maintained that he was not guilty of incest with his stepdaughter because he was never married to her mother. Because Bullman refused to admit guilt and was thus ineligible for community-based treatment, he asserted that he was sentenced more harshly by being sentenced to prison. The Supreme Court examined the record and disagreed. The sentencing court was aware of the prohibition against sentencing a defendant to prison because the defendant does not admit guilt, but the court also considered numerous other relevant factors in sentencing Bullman to prison in addition to the expert opinion that Bullman was not a candidate for community-based treatment, including: (1) the significant impact of the crime on the victim; (2) the need to protect society; (3) Bullman's need for appropriate treatment; (4) Bullman's criminal history; and (5) Bullman's long history of substance abuse. Given these sentencing factors, the Supreme Court could not conclude that Bullman was sentenced to prison for failure to admit guilt, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Parole Restriction Based on Defendant's Danger to Society Warranted: Following conviction for kidnapping and sexual assault, Dunning was sentenced to 10 years in prison and designated as ineligible for parole. Dunning argued on appeal that the parole restriction was unwarranted, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Two psychosexual evaluations confirmed Dunning's high risk to reoffend equivalent to a level 3 offender, and Dunning remained an untreated sexual offender who was considered a danger to society based on a 30-year history of sexually related offenses. The factual evidence presented to the sentencing court provided a sufficient basis to support the court's conclusion that the parole restriction was proper. St. v. Dunning, 2008 MT 427, 347 M 443, 198 P3d 828 (2008).

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Condition for Incest Conviction Affirmed: As sentencing conditions following conviction for felony incest, the sentencing court required Heddings to abstain from and be tested for alcohol and drugs. Heddings argued that the alcohol-related conditions should be stricken because they were unrelated to the crime or to Heddings himself. Citing St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), the Supreme Court noted that a sentencing condition is illegal if: (1) the sentencing court lacked statutory authority to impose it; (2) the condition falls outside the parameters of the applicable sentencing statutes; or (3) the sentencing court did not adhere to affirmative mandates of the applicable sentencing statutes. Here, the presentence investigation revealed that Heddings was a situational, opportunistic child molester and that allowing him to drink would give him more opportunities to fail and increase the likelihood of reoffending. Heddings maintained that the incest did not involve the use of alcohol, but he did not challenge the accuracy of the findings. Thus, there was a nexus between the alcohol-related conditions and Heddings as an offender. It was within the sentencing court's discretion to impose conditions that were reasonable and necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Heddings, 2008 MT 402, 347 M 169, 198 P3d 242 (2008).

Alcohol-Related Sentencing Conditions for Fraudulently Obtaining Dangerous Drugs Affirmed: Following conviction for fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs, Hunter challenged two sentencing conditions that prohibited the possession and consumption of alcohol and that required chemical testing for drugs and alcohol. The Supreme Court affirmed. Prohibiting and monitoring Hunter's consumption of both alcohol and drugs would help prevent Hunter from repeating the same criminal conduct that gave rise to the sentence. A sufficient nexus was established between the offense and the alcohol-related sentence conditions. St. v. Hunter, 2008 MT 395, 347 M 155, 197 P3d 998 (2008), following St. v. Winkel, 2008 MT 89, 342 M 267, 182 P3d 54 (2008). See also St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Alcohol-Related Conditions Unrelated to Felony Theft Stricken From Sentence: As a condition of Stiles' sentence for felony theft, the sentencing court prohibited Stiles from possessing or consuming intoxicants and entering places where intoxicants are sold and required Stiles to submit to drug and alcohol testing. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and its progeny, a nexus must exist between a sentencing condition and the offense and offender. Because there was no nexus between the sentencing condition and Stiles and the offense of felony theft, the alcohol-related condition was stricken from Stiles' sentence. St. v. Stiles, 2008 MT 390, 347 M 95, 197 P3d 966 (2008).

Revocation of Youth Court Probation and Imposition of Suspended Sentence Proper: When Hinkle was 17 years old, he pleaded true to the charge of negligent homicide. The case was tried in District Court, and Hinkle was committed to the Youth Court for suspended placement in a treatment facility until age 18, placed on formal juvenile probation until age 25, and given a stayed adult sentence of 20 years with the Department of Corrections, pursuant to 22 probation conditions, including requirements that Hinkle not violate the dispositional order, possess or consume alcohol, or commit a new offense. Twelve days after the sentencing hearing, Hinkle was cited for being a minor in possession of alcohol. The Youth Court revoked Hinkle's probation and transferred the case back to District Court for further proceedings. After considering numerous balancing factors, the District Court imposed the 20-year adult sentence that had been stayed, but suspended the sentence subject to 19 conditions, including prohibiting Hinkle from entering casinos and gambling. Hinkle appealed on grounds that his probation was improperly revoked, that the 20-year sentence was improperly imposed, and that the casino and gambling restriction was illegal. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The District Court did not err in concluding that simply continuing Hinkle's youth probation for the probation violations would be no more than a slap on the wrist and would be inappropriate given the seriousness of the underlying homicide offense. Imposing a suspended adult sentence was in fact a further act of grace, in light of the fact that the court could have imposed a 20-year sentence of confinement, but Hinkle ignored the act of grace in asserting that the suspended sentence was unduly harsh. Additionally, Hinkle's personal characteristics made him particularly vulnerable to the pitfalls of irresponsible gambling, so the casino and gambling restriction was appropriate. Thus, the District Court's order was "neither arbitrary nor without conscientious judgment or exceeding the bounds of reason and was an appropriate exercise of discretion". St. v. Hinkle, 2008 MT 217, 344 M 236, 186 P3d 1279 (2008).

Restrictions Against Gambling and Use of Alcohol Unrelated to Offense of Theft or to Defendant Stricken — Drug Testing Requirement Affirmed: As conditions of Lessard's conviction for the theft of carved bears from neighborhood lawns, the sentencing court required that Lessard not consume alcohol or drugs, submit to alcohol and drug testing, and refrain from entering casinos and gambling. Lessard contested the conditions as unrelated to the theft of carved bears and asserted that he had no problem with or criminal history related to substance abuse or gambling, even though a marijuana pipe was found in Lessard's bedroom during a search for the bears and Lessard admitted to smoking marijuana 2 days prior to the search. In deliberating whether the conditions had a nexus to the offense or to Lessard himself, the Supreme Court held that the alcohol and gambling conditions were too much, that requiring no conditions would be too little, but that the drug testing condition was just right. The case was remanded with instructions to strike the alcohol and gambling conditions and the alcohol testing requirement from Lessard's sentence, while leaving the drug testing requirement in effect. St. v. Lessard, 2008 MT 192, 344 M 26, 185 P3d 1013 (2008).

Sentencing Conditions for Theft Conviction, Except Requirement for Mental Health Evaluation, Affirmed: As conditions of Greensweight's sentence for theft, the sentencing court required Greensweight to obtain a chemical dependency evaluation and to attend either Alcoholics Anonymous or Narcotics Anonymous, prohibited Greensweight from possessing, using, or drinking intoxicants and from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale, and required Greensweight to participate in counseling, including mental health counseling. Greensweight contested the conditions as unrelated to the crime, and the Supreme Court considered each condition for legality and reasonableness and considered whether the conditions were related either to the crime or to Greensweight's unique background and characteristics. In light of Greensweight's history of chronic drug use, the chemical dependency evaluation and attendance at group meetings were reasonable and were affirmed. Citing St. v. Brotherton, 2008 MT 119, 342 M 511, 182 P3d 88 (2008), the court also affirmed the "no intoxicants" condition as legal because of the history of chronic drug use and as necessary for Greensweight's rehabilitation, including a requirement for drug and alcohol testing. The court also affirmed the counseling requirement, but absent any history of mental health issues or nexus to the theft crime, the requirement for mental health counseling was ordered stricken. St. v. Greensweight, 2008 MT 185, 343 M 474, 187 P3d 613 (2008).

Partial Parole Restrictions Affirmed: Rickman was sentenced to life with no parole eligibility for 55 years for deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule. Rickman appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court had no authority to restrict parole eligibility for only part of the sentence. Noting that challenges to partial parole restriction have been upheld since at least 1988, the Supreme Court disagreed with Rickman's assertion. A sentencing court has discretion to impose parole restrictions, and if a sentencing court has discretion to impose a restriction of no parole eligibility, then a sentencing court can likewise impose a restriction of limited parole eligibility. St. v. Rickman, 2008 MT 142, 343 M 120, 183 P3d 49 (2008). See also St. v. Kirkbride, 2008 MT 178, 343 M 409, 185 P3d 340 (2008), and St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

Sentence Restriction Prohibiting Alcohol Use Sufficiently Related to Defendant's History of Substance Abuse to Warrant Affirmation — Unrelated Casino Restriction Stricken: As conditions of Brotherton's sentence for criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute, the District Court prohibited Brotherton's use of alcohol, prohibited him from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale, and also prohibited him from entering casinos or playing games of chance. Brotherton appealed the conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the offense, given that his criminal history involved only drugs and not alcohol. The Supreme Court agreed that the casino restriction was improper and remanded with directions that the condition be stricken. However, the court affirmed the alcohol use restriction, given Brotherton's significant history of chemical dependency and the reasonable possibility that Brotherton might substitute alcohol for drugs and thus impede his rehabilitation. St. v. Brotherton, 2008 MT 119, 342 M 511, 182 P3d 88 (2008).

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), and St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), regarding authority of sentencing court.

Conditions Including Restrictions on Alcohol Consumption and Entering Casinos Related to Drug Possession — Affirmed: As conditions of Winkel's suspended sentence for felony possession of dangerous drugs, the sentencing court prohibited Winkel from consuming alcohol and from entering any place where intoxicants were the chief item of sale and prohibited Winkel from entering casinos or playing games of chance. Winkel contended that the conditions should be stricken because alcohol and gambling were not related to the drug offense. The Supreme Court noted that sentencing conditions must be reasonably connected to the underlying offense and to the offender and concluded that in this case, that connection existed. The alcohol prohibition was connected to the drug-related nature of Winkel's drug offense and was called for, given Winkel's recent and chronic history of substance abuse and chemical dependency. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in finding that Winkel's rehabilitation would be jeopardized if Winkel had access to intoxicants like alcohol. Additionally, because alcohol is inseparable from gambling in Montana casinos, the prohibition against entering casinos achieved the same objectives of rehabilitation and protection and was also warranted. The conditions of Winkel's suspended sentence were affirmed. St. v. Winkel, 2008 MT 89, 342 M 267, 182 P3d 54 (2008), followed in St. v. Teets, 2008 MT 130, 343 M 73, 183 P3d 45 (2008), St. v. Deshazo, 2008 MT 131, 343 M 77, 183 P3d 47 (2008), St. v. Corbin, 2008 MT 146, 343 M 211, 184 P3d 287 (2008), and St. v. Sadowsky, 2008 MT 405, 347 M 192, 197 P3d 1018 (2008). See also St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Adoption of Herd Standard of Review of Challenges to Legality or Propriety of Probation Conditions: The appropriate standard of review for cases challenging the legality or propriety of probation conditions is the two-pronged standard set out in St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004). The sentencing condition is first reviewed for legality. Then, because sentencing statutes authorize the imposition of conditions on deferred or suspended sentences that constitute reasonable restrictions or conditions considered necessary for the rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society, the reasonableness of the conditions is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008).

Probation Condition Banning Alcohol Consumption Unrelated to Crime of Issuing Bad Check Reversed — Condition Prohibiting Gambling Related to Fiscal Irresponsibility Affirmed: Probation conditions on Ashby's bad check conviction included a restriction that Ashby not gamble or consume alcohol or drugs. Ashby contested the conditions under the rule in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), that there must be a nexus between probation conditions and the offense. The District Court denied Ashby's assertion and imposed the conditions as "stock" or standard. On appeal, the Supreme Court expanded the Ommundson nexus rule to include a nexus either to the offense or to the offender, rather than to the offense alone. In this case, there was no evidence that the bad check offense was related in any way to alcohol or drugs, that Ashby had a drinking or drug problem, or that an alcohol and drug prohibition would protect Ashby from another bout of writing bad checks. Thus, the alcohol and drug restriction was stricken from the sentence. Likewise, there was no evidence that Ashby had a gambling problem. However, citing St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), the court found that because of considerable previous fiscal irresponsibility on Ashby's part, it was reasonable for the sentencing court to conclude that a prohibition on gambling was appropriate to rehabilitate Ashby's ability to manage his finances, so the gambling restriction was affirmed. The court also warned against the imposition of alcohol and gambling restrictions as standard or universal because they are not mandated by law. St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), followed in St. v. Corbin, 2008 MT 146, 343 M 211, 184 P3d 287 (2008), St. v. Krueger, 2008 MT 265, 345 M 147, 190 P3d 318 (2008), St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), and St. v. Simpson, 2009 MT 43, 349 M 275, 203 P3d 791 (2009), with regard to imposition of a gambling restriction in light of defendant's financial irresponsibility. Kruger was followed in St. v. Smart, 2009 MT 1, 348 M 274, 201 P3d 123 (2009).

Open-Ended Restitution Condition Reversed: As a condition of Meyers' sentence for assaulting his child, it was ordered that Meyers pay restitution to all the victims in an amount to remain open until the victims received any help that they needed. However, 46-18-244 requires that the sentencing court specify the total amount of restitution that the offender shall pay. Thus, it was reversible error for the sentencing court to leave the amount of restitution open, and the Supreme Court remanded for reimposition of the restitution requirement in a specified amount. St. v. Meyers, 2007 MT 230, 339 M 160, 168 P3d 645 (2007).

Residency Restriction in Sentence Affirmed: As a condition of Meyers' sentence for assaulting his child, it was ordered that Meyers not reside in Broadwater County unless he was employed in that county. Meyers appealed the residency restriction, likening the sentencing condition to the banishment condition addressed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). However, the Supreme Court distinguished Muhammad because Meyers was not banished from Broadwater County, but could in fact live there if he was employed in the county. The residency restriction was designed to protect the victims and yet allow Meyers limited ability to be in the county. Because the residency restriction was an appropriately tailored condition satisfying the requirement to be reasonably related to the protection of the victims and society, the sentencing condition was affirmed. St. v. Meyers, 2007 MT 230, 339 M 160, 168 P3d 645 (2007).

Order That Defendant Pay "Assessments" to Community Entities as Part of Sentence for Sexual Assault Illegal: As part of Krum's sentence for two counts of felony sexual assault, the District Court ordered Krum to pay a $5,000 assessment to the Park County Court Automation Fund, $2,500 to the Tri-County Network for Domestic Violence, and $2,500 to the Park County Big Brothers and Sisters in order to give back to society and to those who assist victims of these types of crimes. Krum appealed the assessments, and the Supreme Court reversed. Although the sentencing court had authority to fine Krum up to $50,000 for each conviction, the court did not include a fine per se in Krum's sentence, but instead ordered the payment of assessments to the community entities. However, 46-18-235 provides that all fines and costs collected from a criminal defendant be paid to the Department of Revenue for deposit in the general fund, and a District Court may not redirect money collected from a defendant simply by labeling the money as an assessment instead of a fine. The state argued that the assessments were authorized as a condition of sentencing pursuant to this section because the assessments were reasonably related to the underlying crimes, but the Supreme Court held that this section does not provide the necessary authority for imposing assessments in the first place. The assessments were not limitations on Krum's conduct and could not be considered restitution because the money was not payable to the victims. Thus, the assessment portion of the sentence was unauthorized and illegal. The remainder of the sentence was affirmed, but the case was remanded with instructions to strike the illegal assessments from the sentence. St. v. Krum, 2007 MT 229, 339 M 154, 168 P3d 658 (2007), followed in St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), to the extent that a fine or surcharge payable to the community service program that is imposed without statutory authority is illegal. Stephenson was followed in St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Restriction of Travel as Probation Condition Related to Rehabilitation and Protection of Society Affirmed: As part of Moody's conditions of probation, the sentencing court required that Moody obtain written permission from the probation officer before traveling outside Moody's assigned district. Moody objected to the restriction, arguing that it improperly placed Moody's rights at the mercy of the supervising officer. The Supreme Court noted that a probation condition must be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society and have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense. In this case, the offense resulted from Moody's admitted problem with alcohol. The deferred sentence allowed Moody to address the problem under the supervision of the probation officer and properly included a travel restriction to allow the officer to effectively keep track of Moody and ensure that Moody remained on course with treatment. Imposition of the travel restriction was affirmed. St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006).

Dangerous Offender Designation as Part of Life Sentence Without Parole — No Error: Gratzer was sentenced to life without parole and contended that the sentencing court erred by also designating him a dangerous offender for all purposes. Gratzer argued that the designation cannot be applied to a life sentence because the only purpose for a dangerous offender designation is to affect a prisoner's parole eligibility. The Supreme Court held that the designation in this case had no effect on the time that Gratzer had to serve before becoming parole eligible because Gratzer's life sentence and ineligibility for parole precluded Gratzer from ever becoming eligible for parole, so no rights were violated by designating Gratzer as a dangerous offender for all purposes. Gratzer v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Federal Prohibition Against Penalty Beyond Statutory Maximum Not Retroactively Applicable: Following Gratzer's 1982 conviction for deliberate homicide, the District Court sentenced Gratzer to a consecutive 10-year term for using a weapon in committing the crime. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently decided Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000) (followed in Ring v. Ariz., 536 US 584 (2002), and Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004)), holding that other than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases a penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Gratzer later petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the consecutive sentence for use of a weapon was a violation of Gratzer's constitutional rights. Gratzer's sentence enhancement was not submitted to the jury, so Apprendi was potentially applicable. Notwithstanding that Gratzer's conviction became final in 1984, long before Apprendi and its progeny were decided, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered Gratzer's claim pursuant to Teague v. Lane, 498 US 288 (1989), on grounds of whether Apprendi and its progeny applied retroactively. Under Teague, a new constitutional rule of criminal procedure does not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review unless the rule: (1) places certain kinds of primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal lawmaking authority to proscribe; or (2) qualifies as a watershed rule of criminal procedure. Noting that the U.S. Supreme Court held that Ring (and by implication Apprendi and Blakely) did not apply retroactively in Schriro v. Summerlin, 542 US 348 (2004), the court applied the Schriro rationale to Gratzer's case, holding that Apprendi failed to satisfy the first Teague exception for retroactivity because Apprendi announced a rule that did not inhibit the state's ability to substantively proscribe and punish a defendant for using a weapon in the commission of an offense, but merely established procedures that the state must follow in doing so, nor did the Apprendi rule qualify as a watershed rule of criminal procedure without which the likelihood of an accurate conviction would be seriously diminished. Federal courts of appeals nearly unanimously agree that the Apprendi line of cases do not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review, and the Supreme Court concurred. Gratzer's petition was denied. Gratzer v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Life Sentence Without Parole Not Violative of Constitutional Rights: Gratzer asserted that the sentencing court exceeded its authority and violated the constitutional right to habeas corpus when the court sentenced Gratzer to life without the possibility of parole. Gratzer's argument was that use of the word "term" implied that there was a distinction between sentences imposed for a specific time and indeterminate life sentences and that the statutory sentencing scheme does not authorize a court to remove a prisoner's eligibility for parole if the prisoner is serving a life sentence. The Supreme Court declined to recognize the distinction. "Term" is used throughout the criminal code to refer to the duration of a sentence without any indication that it is meant to refer exclusively to determinate time sentences, and the language in this section that allows a court to impose the parole eligibility exception applies equally to time sentences and life sentences. A sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year refers to all felonies, including those punishable by a life sentence, rather than a cryptic means of limiting a sentencing court's ability to restrict the parole eligibility of prisoners serving life sentences. The District Court did not violate Gratzer's rights, and the sentence of life without parole was affirmed. Gratzer v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Maximum Statutory Sentence for Deliberate Homicide When Death Penalty Not Sought: Because subsection (2) of this section does not remove from the jury a determination of facts necessary to restrict parole, the statutory maximum for deliberate homicide when the death penalty is not sought is life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009).

No Implied Presumption of Parole Eligibility — Federal Constitutional Protections Not Violated by Sentence of Life Imprisonment Without Parole — Montana Constitutional Protections Not Addressed: Garrymore was sentenced to life in prison without parole for the deliberate homicide of his adopted infant child. Garrymore appealed the parole restriction and sought to have the sentence vacated on grounds that 45-5-102(2) contains an implicit presumption of parole eligibility. Garrymore contended that under the statute, standing alone and without the operation of this section, he was entitled to a parole-eligible sentence, subject to 46-23-201, that was taken away by the sentencing judge in violation of due process and a trial by jury. The Supreme Court found nothing in sentencing statutes that creates a presumption in favor of parole eligibility that must be overcome in order for a sentencing judge to impose a parole restriction. Rather, sentencing courts have broad discretion under this section to impose parole eligibility restrictions on felony sentences, and the Legislature has placed no limitation on the exercise of that authority. A parole-eligible sentence was not taken away from Garrymore because he was not entitled to such a sentence to begin with. Additionally, although the judge must state the reasons for a parole eligibility restriction when one is imposed, no particular finding of fact need be included among those reasons. Therefore, because the statutory maximum for violating 45-5-102(1)(a) is life in prison without parole, restricting Garrymore's parole eligibility did not violate any federal constitutional rights. The Supreme Court also declined to address Garrymore's undeveloped argument that the parole eligibility restriction violated the Montana Constitution's greater jury trial right absent a compelling reason why Montana's greater jury trial right dictated a different result. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006), followed in St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Sentencing Court Neither Allowed nor Required to Increase Punishment for Charged Offense: Garrymore contended that this section allowed or required the sentencing court to add on to the sentence imposed by 45-5-102(2), in violation of 46-1-401. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 45-5-102, a District Court may impose both life imprisonment and life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. Thus, subsection (2) of this section does not, vis-a-vis an act, omission, or fact, allow or require a sentencing court to increase punishment for a charged offense. St. v. Garrymore, 2006 MT 245, 334 M 1, 145 P3d 946 (2006).

Sentencing Condition Unrelated to Underlying Offense Stricken: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. As a condition of a suspended sentence, the trial court prohibited Holt from possessing or consuming alcohol and from establishing a checking or credit card account. Holt appealed both sentencing conditions. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation to the underlying offense in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and protection of the victim and society. In this case, there was no evidence that alcohol contributed to the offenses in question, so the Supreme Court struck that condition from the judgment. However, there was a correlation between Holt being allowed to establish a checking or credit card account and the crime of theft of clients' funds, so imposition of that condition was not improper and was affirmed. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), followed in St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006), and St. v. Greeson, 2007 MT 23, 336 M 1, 152 P3d 695 (2007).

Restitution Properly Imposed Without Suspension or Deferral of Sentence: Citing St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005), Vernes contended that the sentencing court had no authority under 46-18-201 to impose restitution costs without suspending or deferring part of Vernes' sentence. The Supreme Court noted that an alternative sentencing authority for the imposition of restitution costs, not addressed in Honey, exists in this section that allows any limitation reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of society, as long as the restriction or condition has some connection to the underlying offense, and does not require suspension or deferral of a portion of a defendant's sentence. Thus, the sentencing court had authority to impose restitution for costs directly connected to the pecuniary loss of the victim, and restitution in this case was affirmed St. v. Vernes, 2006 MT 32, 331 M 129, 130 P3d 169 (2006).

Requirement That Any Correctional Placement Be Outside Area Where Aggravated Assault Occurred Not Error: As a restriction on Dunfee's correctional placement, the sentencing court ordered that any correctional placement of Dunfee be outside the area where Dunfee's aggravated assault occurred. Dunfee argued that the correctional placement condition was error because it was not reasonably related to the goals of rehabilitation. However, the record amply supported the condition for purposes of rehabilitation and for the protection of the victim and society. The condition fell within the parameters set by this section and was not erroneous, and Dunfee's commitment was affirmed. St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005).

Adoption of Sentence Recommended in Presentence Investigation Report, With Variations — No Error in Disparity Between Oral and Written Sentence: As set out in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence is the legally effective sentence, and the written judgment and commitment serves as evidence of the sentence orally pronounced. Wiedrich contended that because his written sentence contained terms and conditions that were not orally pronounced, the extra conditions were invalid and should be removed from the sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The transcript revealed that the sentencing court clearly adopted the sentence recommended in the presentence investigation report, with some variations—a fact that Wiedrich and his counsel were fully aware of—and the Supreme Court therefore declined to remand for resentencing. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

Ten-Year Suspension of Accompaniment and Nongame Hunting Privileges Affirmed: Ruiz was convicted on numerous counts related to hunting, fishing, and outfitting. The District Court suspended Ruiz's privileges to accompany others and partake in nongame hunting for 10 years. Ruiz appealed on grounds that the 10-year suspension of privileges had little connection to and were not statutorily authorized for the underlying charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 87-1-102, a long suspension period is authorized when warranted, and this section also allows imposition of sentencing conditions that are reasonably related to the rehabilitation of the offender and the protection of the victim and society. The sentencing court was influenced by the fact that Ruiz attended college and majored in forestry, resource conservation, and wildlife biology and yet deliberately disregarded the hunting laws and regulations, in which he was well-versed, for money and personal benefit. In order to protect wildlife and slow down Ruiz's behavior, the significant restrictions of Ruiz's ability to engage in hunting were warranted. The 10-year suspension of privileges was legal and was affirmed. St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Restitution Properly Ordered When Dismissed Charges Related to Charge for Which Defendant Convicted: McIntire was charged with felony burglary, misdemeanor theft, and misdemeanor forgery. Pursuant to a plea agreement, McIntire pleaded guilty to the burglary charge and the other charges were dismissed. The trial court ordered McIntire to pay restitution, but McIntire contended that because the forgery charges were dismissed, restitution could not be ordered to compensate for the forged checks and that the court lacked authority to impose restitution when there was no longer a victim with respect to the dismissed forgery charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The victim was the same for both crimes, and the burglary was directly connected to the forgery, constituting an ongoing criminal transaction, so dismissal of the forgery charges did not deprive the court of authority to impose a restitution obligation on McIntire for the checks stolen from the victim during the burglary and for the pecuniary loss from the subsequent forgery of those checks. St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Imposition of Stock Probation Requirements in Written Sentence When Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Not Error Absent Showing of Prejudice: When Kroll was sentenced orally for a felony bad check scheme, he received a 10-year prison sentence with all but 180 days suspended and was ordered to pay restitution, not possess or consume alcohol, obtain a chemical dependency evaluation, refrain from entering casinos and playing games of chance, and undergo a sexual risk assessment because many of the materials purchased with the bad checks included pornography. The subsequent written judgment deviated from the oral pronouncement in several respects, omitting the sexual risk assessment and including several conditions not addressed at the oral sentencing, including requirements that Kroll conduct himself in a law-abiding manner, submit to reasonable searches, not own or possess firearms or deadly weapons, maintain full-time legitimate employment, have no contact with the victims, and pay a supervision fee. Kroll contested the validity of the added conditions in the written sentence and the imposition of the sexual risk assessment. The Supreme Court affirmed. The added conditions were civil restrictions that were considered stock requirements for probationers and individuals subject to a suspended sentence and did not substantively increase Kroll's loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Given the standard nature of the sentencing conditions, Kroll suffered no actual prejudice by failure of the District Court to impose the conditions at oral sentencing, and they were therefore upheld as lawful. The state conceded that the alcohol restrictions and the chemical dependency conditions of the oral sentence were not related to the crime, and the Supreme Court ordered that those conditions be removed, leaving only the gambling and sexual risk assessment at issue. The Supreme Court affirmed those conditions because they were related to the bad check crimes and were a reasonable condition to assist Kroll's rehabilitation. St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004), following St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000). See also St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004), in which the imposition of significant restrictions and conditions not mentioned in the oral sentence, in addition to stock sentencing conditions authorized in Kroll, was considered prejudicial, reversible error.

Forty-Year Driving Ban for Multiple Negligent Vehicular Homicides Reversed: Following conviction on four counts of negligent vehicular homicide, Herd was sentenced to: (1) two concurrent 20-year sentences, all suspended; (2) enter and successfully complete a prerelease program; (3) remain under the jurisdiction of the Probation and Parole Bureau for the 40-year term; (4) pay $200 a month in restitution for 20 years; (5) not own or be in control of firearms for 40 years; (6) not enter any bars or casinos for 40 years; (7) not drink or possess alcoholic beverages for 40 years; (8) obtain any counseling requested by Herd's probation officer; (9) submit to drug and alcohol testing at any time that the probation officer had reasonable grounds to suspect that testing would reveal a probation violation; and (10) not drive during the entire 40-year sentence. Herd appealed the length of the driving restriction, and the Supreme Court reversed on grounds that the prohibition was unnecessary to protect a victim or society as a whole; and drastically inhibited Herd's ability to make a living, serve the needs of her family, and pay restitution; and impaired the prospects of rehabilitation. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004).

Lack of Remorse Not Sole Sentence Enhancement Factor — Incest Sentence Affirmed: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in augmenting a sentence for incest simply because defendant did not show remorse or admit guilt. The Supreme Court noted that St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), prohibits enhancement of a sentence solely because a defendant is not remorseful or refuses to be accountable for the defendant's conduct. However, in this case, the sentencing court did not rely solely on defendant's attitude in enhancing the incest sentence but also considered defendant's risk of reoffending, risk to society, prospects for rehabilitation, character, background, history, and mental and physical functioning. Thus, Shreves was distinguishable, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Driver's License Suspension Limited to One Year When Original Sentence and Suspension Discharged: Following his involvement in a fatal car accident in 1994, Parpart was sentenced to a 2-year prison sentence followed by an 8-year placement in an appropriate program, and Parpart's driver's license was suspended for the entire 10-year period. In 1999, Parpart's sentence was discharged, and he requested reinstatement of his driver's license in 2000, but the request was denied. During the following year, Parpart was twice convicted of driving with a suspended license. The Department of Justice, Motor Vehicle Division, assumed that Parpart's 1994 suspension extended through 2004 and that any subsequent violations required continuation for a like period under 61-5-212, so two additional 10-year suspension periods were added for each violation, extending the suspension to 2024. Parpart challenged the constitutionality of the initial license suspension and the two subsequent license suspensions. The District Court granted summary judgment for the Department, and Parpart appealed. Without addressing the constitutional issues, the Supreme Court held that the sentencing court had the authority to impose the initial license suspension as a condition of the sentence, but once the sentence was discharged in 1999, the suspension was discharged as well. Parpart should have appealed the denial of his request for reinstatement rather than disregarding it and driving without a license, but because the 1994 sentence was discharged, the Department's authority to suspend Parpart's license for each of the subsequent violations was limited to 1 year, pursuant to 61-5-208. Thus, because Parpart's two 1-year suspensions would have ended in 2002, Parpart was entitled to reinstatement of driving privileges upon compliance with 61-5-218. Parpart v. Dept. of Justice, 2004 MT 4, 319 M 182, 84 P3d 1 (2004).

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Adequate Nexus Between Alcohol Consumption and Sexual Assault to Warrant Substance Monitoring as Sentencing Condition for Sex Crime: As a condition of probation for Flanagan's 10-year suspended sentence for felony sexual assault, the District Court required that Flanagan: (1) submit to alcohol and drug testing at the probation officer's request; (2) undergo a chemical dependency evaluation and, if recommended, chemical dependency treatment; and (3) not possess alcohol or drugs or frequent places where alcohol is the main item of sale. Citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), Flanagan protested the conditions on grounds that they had no nexus to the offense or the environment in which it was committed. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, noting that Flanagan himself connected the assault charge to his alcohol consumption in requesting a mental evaluation to determine whether his substance use rendered him capable of acting knowingly. There was a sufficient connection between the offense and Flanagan's chronic alcohol consumption to warrant imposition of the parole conditions, and the sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Sentence Based on Refusal to Admit Guilt Violative of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Shreves was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison, with no parole for 60 years. At trial, Shreves chose to testify on his own behalf and assert his innocence, and at sentencing, Shreves chose not to testify, but his counsel indicated that Shreves maintained his innocence. The District Court imposed the sentence based in significant part on Shreves' failure to show remorse or responsibility. Shreves appealed on grounds that it was improper to hold his refusal to admit to the crime against him in determining the sentence. The state contended that the sentencing court properly considered the lack of remorse as a factor relevant to Shreves' rehabilitation and the danger presented to the community and argued that the lack of remorse was based on trial testimony and evidence. The Supreme Court considered whether Shreves adequately invoked the right to maintain silence, the scope of the oral sentence that controlled over the subsequent written sentence as it related to the entire sentence, and the District Court's decision to base its sentence in large part on Shreves' refusal to admit to the crime. Although lack of remorse can be considered as a sentencing factor, a sentence that is based on a refusal to admit guilt cannot be upheld. Here, the Supreme Court was unable to find a sentencing distinction between punishing Shreves for remaining silent and the proper consideration of Shreves' failure to show remorse. A sentencing court may not draw a negative inference of lack of remorse from a defendant's silence at sentencing when the defendant has maintained innocence throughout the proceedings. Shreves was improperly penalized for maintaining his innocence pursuant to the constitutional right to remain silent. The sentence was therefore illegal. Shreves' conviction was reversed, and the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002), distinguished in St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004), and St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), St. v. Kelly, 265 M 298, 876 P2d 641 (1994), St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

District Court Error in Sentence Providing for No Parole and Setting Out Conditions for Parole: The District Court sentenced Gilbert to serve 5 years without the possibility of parole because of his extensive criminal history. The District Court also stipulated that upon complying with certain conditions Gilbert could be eligible for parole. The Supreme Court held that absent statutory authority, the District Court could not retain jurisdiction to alter Gilbert's sentence. The Supreme Court also held that it would not attempt to determine the District Court's intent with respect to the contradictory sentence provisions and remanded the case for the District Court to clarify its sentence. Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002).

Repeal of Dangerous Offender Statute Retroactively Applied: In 1995, the Legislature repealed 46-18-404, which required sentencing judges to determine whether an offender was dangerous or nondangerous for parole eligibility purposes. Parker was designated a dangerous offender for parole eligibility when initially sentenced in 1986, and when the District Court resentenced Parker in 1999 after his suspended sentence was revoked, he was again designated a dangerous offender, even though 46-18-404 had been repealed. The state conceded that the District Court had no authority to impose a dangerous offender designation in 1999 when the designation was repealed in 1995, but contended that the error was harmless because the District Court had the authority to provide the same result by restricting parole eligibility pursuant to this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. The proper remedy was to strike the portion of the sentence that was illegal and amend the judgment to that limited extent. Thus, the portion of the sentence designating Parker as a dangerous offender was vacated. St. v. Parker, 2002 MT 162, 310 M 418, 51 P3d 484 (2002).

No Requirement That Defendant Be Informed of Federal Firearms Prohibitions Resulting From State Conviction of Partner Assault — Direct Versus Collateral Consequences of Plea — Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Affirmed: Liefert pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to charges of partner assault and was subsequently charged under federal law 18 U.S.C. 922 with unlawfully possessing a firearm, following a hunting investigation. After federal charges were filed, Liefert moved to withdraw the guilty plea, contending that good cause existed because the Justice's Court did not inform him of the federal prohibition on possessing a firearm as a result of the plea under Montana law. The motion was denied in Justice's Court and in District Court, which cited St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153 (1992), and held that Liefert did not need to be informed of the federal prohibition because it was a collateral consequence of Liefert's sentence. Liefert appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed. Although the Supreme Court has previously held that there is no appeal to District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea in Justice's Court, in this case, Liefert's appeal was treated as a motion for postconviction relief, and the Supreme Court proceeded to determine whether Liefert had good cause to withdraw the plea. The court determined whether the District Court erred in disallowing withdrawal of the plea by applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997). The only applicable Bowley factor was the adequacy of the plea colloquy. Liefert did not assert that a judge must inform every defendant of the effect of a guilty plea on gun possession, but presented only the issue of whether a defendant must be informed when charged with partner assault and contended that state sentencing statutes require a judge to inform a defendant of the punishment that can result from a violation. Although never explicitly adopted, the Supreme Court has previously applied the prevailing rule in Torrey v. Estelle, 842 F2d 234 (9th Cir. 1988), that because it is impossible for a judge to inform a defendant of every possible consequence of a guilty plea, judges are required to inform defendants of direct consequences, but are not required to inform of collateral consequences. A consequence is considered direct if it has a definite, immediate, and largely automatic effect and is considered collateral if a defendant has control over whether or not the consequence occurs, if it is not under the control of the sentencing judge, or if it is a procedure under the control of a different sovereign or agency. Notwithstanding Liefert's due process, federal preemption, and negative implication arguments, Liefert had discretionary control over whether he would be in violation of federal law upon entry of a guilty plea for partner assault, and the consequence in this case was under the control of the federal government and thus collateral. Further, the guilty plea was not involuntary simply because it may have been entered to avoid the possibility of a greater punishment at trial or because Liefert may have viewed punishment under the guilty plea as lesser than his immediate personal consequences. Therefore, the District Court did not err in denying Liefert's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002), followed in Duffy v. St., 2005 MT 228, 328 M 369, 120 P3d 398 (2005).

Sentencing Condition Imposing Banishment From County Not Reasonably Related to Objectives of Rehabilitation and Protection: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was banishment from Cascade County. Muhammad contested the condition as violations of his constitutional right to freedom of travel, association, and assembly. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court declined to address the constitutional arguments, but concluded that the banishment condition was not reasonably related to the goals of rehabilitation and was broader than necessary to protect the victim and society, in violation of the 1997 version of this section, and vacated the banishment condition. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002).

Sentencing Condition Requiring Posting of Warning Signs at Entrances to Sex Offender's Residence Not Reasonably Related to Objectives of Rehabilitation and Protection: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was that Muhammad post a prominent sign at every entrance to his residence stating that children under age 18 were not allowed by court order. Muhammad argued that the sentencing condition violated his constitutional right to privacy and exceeded the statutory parameters regarding the dissemination of information concerning sexual offenders. The state contended that even if the signs revealed confidential criminal justice information, the District Court was allowed to disseminate the information if necessary under 44-5-302 or after finding that the demands of individual privacy did not clearly exceed the merits of public disclosure under 44-5-303. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court declined to address the constitutional argument, but concluded that the posting requirement was not reasonably related to the goals of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society, as required in this section. The condition was unduly severe and punitive to the point of being unrelated to rehabilitation, such a scarlet letter condition tending to overshadow any rehabilitative potential that it might generate. Thus, the posting condition was vacated. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002).

Order Not to Socialize With Females Under Age 19 Improperly Imposed as Condition of Sentence for Assault of Police Officer: Watson was sentenced to 50 years with 40 suspended for assaulting a police officer. As a condition of the suspended sentence, Watson was ordered not to socialize with females under the age of 19. Watson objected to the condition, and the Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), in order to be reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. Watson's crime did not involve young girls, and he was never charged with any offense in which the victim was a young girl. The fact that the District Court sincerely believed in the speculation that Watson would sooner or later victimize a young girl did not provide a legal basis for imposing a sentencing condition that was unconnected to the underlying offense. St. v. Watson, 2001 MT 143, 306 M 33, 29 P3d 1026 (2001).

Attendance at Parenting Classes Improperly Imposed as Condition of Sentence for Parole Violation: Smith violated parole, and in addition to a sentence for new jail time, Smith was required to attend parenting classes and to pay the costs of incarceration as a condition of sentencing. Smith argued on appeal that the sentencing court exceeded its authority by imposing the new conditions. The Supreme Court agreed that requiring attendance at parenting classes was improper. Applying St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), the court found no nexus between the underlying charged offenses of felony theft, burglary, and unauthorized control of a motor vehicle and a requirement of participation in parenting classes. Although the classes may have been beneficial to Smith and his family, they could not be made a condition of the sentence when they bore no relation to the conduct for which Smith was convicted. The court reversed on that issue. However, because Smith did not object to the payment of incarceration costs at the revocation hearing, that issue could not be raised for the first time on appeal, so that portion of the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001).

Payment of Child Support Improper Condition of Sentence for Felony DUI — Victim and Correlation to Underlying Offense Necessary for Imposition of Restitution: Horton was arrested for DUI, and a search of his driving record revealed nine prior DUI convictions. A further search showed that Horton also owed more than $47,000 in back child support. Horton was charged with felony DUI, with driving with a suspended or revoked license, as a habitual traffic offender operating a motor vehicle, and with felony nonsupport. By plea agreement, Horton agreed to plead guilty to the traffic offenses in exchange for dismissal of the nonsupport charge. The plea agreement stated that the state would recommend a 13-month sentence to be served in prerelease, followed by 4 years of probation, and, as a condition of the probationary sentence, provided that Horton would also make regular child support payments plus an additional sum monthly toward the support arrearage. As set out in the agreement, Horton pleaded guilty to the traffic offenses, and the nonsupport charge was dismissed. At sentencing, the habitual traffic offender charge was subsequently dismissed for failure of the state to prove that a valid habitual offender designation was in place at the time of the offense, and in addition, Horton's counsel objected to the court ordering payment of any child support arrearage, arguing that because the nonsupport charge had been dismissed, Horton would be paying restitution on a count for which he had not been convicted. Nevertheless, the court ordered Horton to pay support and promised to revoke his probation and sentence him to 4 years in prison with no parole if support was not paid. On appeal, Horton argued that the District Court abused its discretion and exceeded statutory mandates when it required him to pay restitution for an offense that was dismissed, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), for the position that restitution is statutorily limited to the victim of the crime and that because there was no victim who sustained pecuniary or economic loss as a result of the felony DUI or driving with a suspended or revoked license, restitution was inappropriate. The state argued that Horton was attempting to receive the benefit of the plea agreement—having the felony nonsupport charge dismissed—without holding up his end of the bargain by paying child support. The Supreme Court noted that a plea agreement is subject to contract law and that the court will not assist a defendant in escaping the obligations of a plea agreement once its benefits are received. However, the court also pointed out that a District Court's authority to impose sentences in criminal cases is defined and constrained by statute. The statutory authority for payment of restitution is in 46-18-201, which limits payment of restitution to the victim of a crime for which a defendant is convicted, and because Horton was not convicted of nonsupport, there was no victim to whom Horton could be ordered to pay restitution. The state also contended that ordering Horton to pay child support was proper because under subsection (1) of this section, a sentencing court may impose any condition reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, but there was no correlation or connection between Horton's conviction for DUI and ordering him to pay child support. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered that the portion of Horton's sentence requiring payment of child support be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), followed in St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001).

Denial of Eligibility for Parole for Aggravated Kidnapping — Designation as Dangerous Offender Upheld: When the court found and petitioner did not contest the fact that petitioner participated in a brutal criminal episode, that petitioner is an alcoholic, that alcohol played a role in the offenses, and that there is no guarantee of continued sobriety, the District Court did not err in designating petitioner as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility. When petitioner's conduct in connection with the crime of aggravated kidnapping was an integral part of the events leading to the victim's death and because petitioner had the opportunity to take action to terminate the kidnapping and thereby prevent the victim's brutal and needless death, the District Court did not err when it denied petitioner eligibility for parole with respect to the conviction for aggravated kidnapping. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

No Departmental Authority to Modify Sentence During Term of Sentence Through Special Probationary Conditions: Field was sentenced to 16 years in prison with 8 years suspended for felony deviate sexual conduct. After serving a portion of the sentence, Field was placed on probation. The sentencing judge attempted to incorporate conditions that might be imposed on probation by providing that any agent of the Montana Probation and Parole Bureau (now Department of Corrections) was authorized to arrange and establish rules necessary for Field's probation and to modify, increase, or reduce the requirements of the rules. Based on that authority, 4 years after the sentence, a Department probation officer added a handwritten special parole condition that Field not be alone with minor children. When Field violated the special condition, the probationary sentence was revoked. As amended in 1995, 46-18-801 allows a sentencing judge to incorporate by reference conditions of parole established by the Department at the time that the sentence is imposed, but does not authorize a judge to grant to the Department the power to modify a sentence by imposing subsequent constitutional infringements, such as a restriction on the freedom of association, after the judgment and sentence have been signed. Here, no evidence was offered that the special condition imposed on Field was a standard Department rule at the time of sentencing, and nothing in the sentence allowed for the special condition that Field not be alone with a minor; therefore, Field's incarceration for parole violation was premised on a violation of a special condition that was never imposed by a court. Reversing, the Supreme Court held that sentencing of a defendant to an abridgment of a constitutionally protected interest must be performed by the District Court and articulated at the time of sentencing, not modified by a probation officer 4 years after a sentence is imposed. St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203, 57 St. Rep. 1123 (2000).

New Sentence Restriction Added Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence Stricken: If a District Court finds that a defendant has violated the terms or conditions of a suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspended sentence and require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence, but nothing in 46-18-203 authorizes a court to impose additional restrictions when revoking a suspended sentence. (See 2001 amendment to this section, which allows it.) In this case, the District Court originally sentenced Richardson to 20 years in prison for felony sexual assault against a child, with all but 70 days suspended, conditioned in part upon completion of a sex offender treatment program. Richardson failed treatment and admitted violating other conditions of the suspended sentence, so the sentence was revoked, and Richardson was sentenced to prison for the remainder of the 20-year sentence. Additionally, the court conditioned Richardson's parole eligibility upon successful completion of the first two phases of sexual offender treatment in prison. The additional restriction on the sentence was error, and the case was remanded for the limited purpose of striking that condition from the sentence. St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000), following St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

No Sentence Enhancement for Use of Weapon in Assault on Police Officer: Because a conviction for assault on a police officer requires proof of use of a weapon, an additional sentence for use of a weapon under 46-18-221 violates the double jeopardy provision of the Montana Constitution. St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000), following St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999).

Authority to Amend Written Judgment to List Reasons for Parole Restriction: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to state its reasons for restricting parole eligibility in the court's original written judgment and that further error occurred when the court amended the written judgment, following remand from the Sentence Review Division, to list the reasons parole was restricted. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court may correct an erroneous sentence at any time to correct clerical errors and to make the record reflect what was actually decided, as long as the correction does not set aside the judgment or change what was originally intended. Here, the amended judgment was consistent with the oral pronouncement of judgment and merely set forth the reasons for imposing the parole restriction. Further, 46-18-117 (now repealed) allows correction of a sentence following remand from an appellate court. The Sentence Review Division functions as part of the appellate process. Thus, when the Division remanded the matter to the District Court for clarification, the court had the express statutory authority to issue an order amending the written judgment to list its reasons for imposing the parole eligibility restriction. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Heinous Nature of Crime Alone Justifying Parole Restriction: Defendant raised several contentions in arguing that the District Court improperly imposed a parole eligibility restriction as part of a sentence for the mitigated deliberate homicide of his 3-year-old daughter. The District Court commented at sentencing that it felt "somewhat as the representative of [the] now deceased child". Defendant alleged that the statement showed undue partisanship and indicated failure of the court to act as an objective judicial officer. However, when viewed in the context of the entire proceeding, the comment underscored the court's conclusion that the heinous, brutal nature of the crime was sufficient reason alone to withdraw the privilege of parole eligibility. Citing St. v. Heit, 242 M 488, 791 P2d 1379 (1990), the Supreme Court also noted that it had in the past upheld parole restrictions based upon the heinous nature of the offense. Imposition of the restriction was not an abuse of the court's broad sentencing discretion. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999). See also St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Parole Period Not to Be Reduced by Good Time Credit — Good Time Allowance Properly Limited: The sentencing court restricted Wilson's right to earn any good time against a 30-year term during which Wilson was ordered ineligible for parole. Wilson maintained that this section contained no language that would allow the District Court to restrict a defendant's right to earn a good time allowance. Good time allowances were authorized by 53-30-105 (now repealed) and operated as a credit on a prisoner's sentence. Upon review of the sentencing order, the Supreme Court concluded that Wilson was not limited in earning good time against the sentence, but rather that the 30-year period of ineligibility for parole was not to be reduced by any good time credits that Wilson received toward the total sentence. The restriction was within the sentencing court's authority, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Felony Conviction When Underlying Offense Requires Proof of Weapon Use Unconstitutional Under Montana Double Jeopardy Provision: When presented with the question of whether the weapon enhancement statute, 46-18-221, violates the double jeopardy provisions of Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., the Supreme Court held that the Montana Constitution affords greater protection against multiple punishment than the federal constitution and that application of the weapon enhancement statute to felony convictions when the underlying offense requires proof of the use of a weapon violates Montana's constitutional double jeopardy provision. In the instant case, the only factor raising Guillaume's charge from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) was the use of a weapon. The distinction between the two offenses and the different penalties imposed by each offense is the Legislature's way of punishing a criminal defendant for the use of a weapon in committing an assault. Thus, when the weapon enhancement statute was applied to the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) conviction, Guillaume was subjected to double punishment—once when the charge was elevated from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and again when the weapon enhancement statute was applied. This is exactly what double jeopardy was intended to prevent. The state's argument, that double jeopardy did not protect against multiple punishments for the same offense because that protection is not explicit in the constitutional language, failed because the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution has been held in N.C. v. Pearce, 393 US 711, 23 L Ed 2d 656, 89 S Ct 2072 (1969), to protect against multiple punishments for the same offense, and the Montana Constitution provides at least the same protection or greater. Further, the fact that legislative modification of the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) statute could achieve the same result as the present sentencing scheme did not mean that double jeopardy did not apply in this case. St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), and St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), followed in St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 31, 293 M 268, 975 P2d 321, 56 St. Rep. 139 (1999), St. v. Roullier, 1999 MT 37, 293 M 304, 977 P2d 970, 56 St. Rep. 157 (1999), St. v. Aguilar, 1999 MT 159, 295 M 133, 983 P2d 345, 56 St. Rep. 629 (1999), St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Park, 2001 MT 157, 306 M 98, 30 P3d 1062 (2001). Aguilar was followed in St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000). Guillaume will not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). Nichols was overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that the Supreme Court refused to retroactively apply Guillaume.

Sentencing Condition Required to Have Correlation or Connection to Underlying Offense: Ommundson pleaded guilty to felony DUI. In imposing sentence, the District Court considered a presentence investigation that documented Ommundson's criminal history, which included more than 10 convictions for indecent exposure. The court also considered a sex offender evaluation, which determined that Ommundson qualified for community-based treatment. The court committed Ommundson to the Department of Corrections for 54 months, with all but 6 months suspended on condition that Ommundson participate in a sex offender treatment program and not have any contact with children without adult supervision. Ommundson did not object to the condition prohibiting contact with children, so that issue was not cognizable on appeal. However, on the issue of whether the District Court had authority to impose a condition of participation in a sex offender program as a penalty for DUI, the Supreme Court held that this section allows only the imposition of sentencing limitations reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. That authority is broad, but not without limit. In order to be reasonably related, a sentencing limitation or condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense for which the defendant is being sentenced. In the present case, the requirement that Ommundson participate in a sex offender program was not reasonably related to the rehabilitation of a DUI offender or to the protection of society from drunk drivers. The Supreme Court reversed the part of Ommundson's sentence requiring that he participate in a sex offender program. St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999), following St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), and St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), distinguishing Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985), St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988), and St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180, 52 St. Rep. 54 (1995), and followed in St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001), St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), and St. v. Watson, 2001 MT 143, 306 M 33, 29 P3d 1026 (2001), and St. v. Armstrong, 2006 MT 334, 335 M 131, 151 P3d 46 (2006). In St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342 M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), the Ommundson nexus rule was expanded to allow a sentencing judge to impose a particular condition of probation as long as the condition has a nexus either to the offense for which the offender is being sentenced or to the offender. However, offender-related conditions may be imposed only in cases in which the history or pattern of conduct to be restricted is recent and significant or chronic. A passing, isolated, or stale instance of behavior or conduct is insufficient to support a restrictive probation condition imposed in the name of offender rehabilitation. Ashby was followed in St. v. Stiles, 2008 MT 390, 347 M 95, 197 P3d 966 (2008), St. v. Sadowsky, 2008 MT 405, 347 M 192, 197 P3d 1018 (2008), and St. v. Park, 2008 MT 429, 347 M 462, 198 P3d 321 (2008). Stiles was followed in St. v. Russette, 2008 MT 413, 347 M 285, 198 P3d 791 (2008).

Discovery of Shotgun Case During Routine Walk-Through of Probationer's Residence Constituting Reasonable Grounds for Further Warrantless Search: Probationer Stucker allowed a voluntary tour of his residence by probation officers, who discovered two weapons cases in plain view in the master bedroom. One case contained a bow, which Stucker was allowed to possess under the terms of his probation; the other contained a semiautomatic shotgun, which constituted contraband under the probation conditions. The discovery of the shotgun case in plain view constituted reasonable grounds for the officers to conduct a warrantless search of the residence to determine if additional weapons were present. The District Court did not err in denying Stucker's motion to suppress the fruits of the search. St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999).

Reservation of Right to Specify Ineligibility for Parole Upon Subsequent Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Lack of Authority in District Court: When Lindeman was sentenced for sexual assault and incest, the District Court reserved the right, in the event that Lindeman ever violated a condition of probation and his suspended sentence was imposed, to specify that Lindeman would be ineligible for parole until he completed a sex offender treatment program. When Lindeman failed to complete the program and the state requested that Lindeman's probation be revoked and the suspended sentence imposed, Lindeman objected to the District Court's imposition of the condition preventing parole. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), the only punishment that the District Court could impose was the suspended sentence or a lesser penalty and that the District Court was without authority to impose the additional condition. The Supreme Court noted that this section, the statutory provision relied upon by the District Court when it reserved the right to impose the condition, applies only to the original sentence under 46-18-201 and that the District Court had no authority to impose the condition upon subsequently revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), followed, with regard to the impropriety of new sentence restrictions added upon revocation, in St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000).

Improper to Reserve Right, at Time of Sentencing, to Impose Additional Restrictions on Probation: The District Court, which sentenced defendant to an imprisonment term and suspended the sentence, had no authority to reserve the right to impose additional restrictions during the term of probation. St. v. Wilson, 279 M 34, 926 P2d 712, 53 St. Rep. 1034 (1996).

Restitution Not Conditioned on Suspended or Deferred Sentence — Restitution Upheld as Additional Restrictions on Sentence: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged the District Court's recommendation that she be required to make restitution if she was released on parole or supervised release. The Supreme Court noted that it had previously held in St. v. Bourne, 259 M 274, 856 P2d 222 (1993), that a District Court has the power under this section to recommend restitution and payment of supervision fees as a condition of parole. St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Illegal Search of Person but Lawful Search of Vehicle — Vehicle Search Upheld as Probation Search and Not "Fruit of Poisonous Tree": Deputy Turner watched New make several turns in his vehicle without signaling and, after determining by his vehicle license plate that New was on probation, stopped the vehicle and searched New. Upon discovering drugs in New's pocket, Turner impounded the vehicle. Detective Jacobs questioned New, and New gave Jacobs approval to search the vehicle. Then Jacobs talked to Forsyth, New's probation officer, who conducted the search of New's vehicle with Jacobs. Turner's search of New's pockets was subsequently held illegal but the District Court refused to quash evidence taken from the vehicle as a result of Forsyth's search. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the search of the vehicle was not the "fruit of the poisonous tree", the illegal personal search of New, but was justified upon the independent grounds that Forsyth had previously determined that he wanted to search New's vehicle because of pending charges of violations of the conditions of New's probation. St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996).

Lack of Authority to Determine Parole Eligibility — Reversible Error: When the District Court lacked the statutory authority to reserve the right to determine a defendant's parole eligibility but did so anyway, reversible error was committed. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), and followed in St. v. Rennick, 1999 MT 155, 295 M 97, 983 P2d 907, 56 St. Rep. 611 (1999).

Eligibility for Parole or Supervised Release Properly Denied — Danger to Society: The District Court properly denied Blake eligibility for parole or participation in a supervised release program based on evidence that in committing murder, Blake acted unpredictably and without motivation, showed no true remorse for the crime, and, if released, would be a further danger to society. St. v. Blake, 274 M 349, 908 P2d 676, 52 St. Rep. 1269 (1995).

Completion of Sexual Offender Treatment Program Proper Condition of Sentence for Sex Crime: The District Court did not err in requiring the completion of a sex offender treatment program as a condition of sentence upon conviction for sexual assault when the condition related to defendant's need for rehabilitation and to the protection of society. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994).

Restitution Order for Present Asset Forfeiture Reversed — Condition of Present Sentence Void: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court sentenced Brown to a 30-year prison term, with 10 years suspended, and ordered Brown to make restitution. As part of the order for restitution, the District Court ordered that several of Brown's assets be sold and that the proceeds be turned over to his victims. The Supreme Court held that the statutory provisions relied on by the District Court to impose forfeiture were improperly relied on in that they limited the District Court only to conditions that could be imposed during the suspended portion of Brown's sentence. Because Brown was required to first serve a prison term, forfeiture could not be immediately ordered. St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994).

Delegation of Sentencing and Incarceration Power to Probation Officer — No Power to Impose Sentence in Absence of Specific Statutory Authority: The District Court erred when it ordered a suspended sentence that included 30 days in jail plus a possible additional 180 days in jail to be served at the discretion of the supervising probation officer. Maximum jail time allowed under 46-18-201 is 180 days. Further, this section, which allows additional restrictions on sentence, does not authorize a District Court to delegate sentencing discretion to a probation officer. The Supreme Court refused to expand statutory authority for a District Court to impose conditions that it considers necessary for rehabilitation to allow delegation of the actual and direct power and discretion to incarcerate for extended periods of time from the court to a probation officer. St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025, 50 St. Rep. 101 (1993).

Designation as Extremely Dangerous Person — Limitation of Eligibility of Parole: In its reasons for sentence, the District Court characterized defendant as "shrewd, self-serving, deceitful, extremely dangerous, a high risk for escape and for future crimes". This designation was sufficient to take defendant out of the category of nondangerous offender (designation under 46-18-404, repealed in 1995) and to warrant limiting his eligibility for parole for 25 years. St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991), followed in St. v. Peck, 263 M 1, 865 P2d 304, 50 St. Rep. 1692 (1993).

Sexual Offender's Course Proper Additional Limitation for Sexual Assault: In imposing additional limitations and sentence, there must be a correlation between the limitations and either the rehabilitation of the offender or the protection of society. The nature of a sexual assault constituted a significant connection between the crime and the need for defendant to attend a sexual offenders program. Therefore, imposition of attendance at the course as a condition of sentence was proper. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991), and St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Factual Basis of Brutality of Crime Not Specified as Rationale for Parole Denial — No Error in Case of Heinous Crime: In its findings of fact, the trial court thoroughly laid out the events constituting the perpetuation of a homicide, clearly demonstrating the pointless and brutal nature of the act. While the court failed to articulate that the brutality of the crime distinguished the defendant from others convicted of deliberate homicide, it did state that the defendant possessed violent tendencies and felt no remorse and that the sentence was imposed because of the obvious importance of protecting society. Although the factual basis for this conclusion was not precisely specified as the rationale for parole denial, the heinous nature of the crime made the rationale for the denial obvious. St. v. Heit, 242 M 488, 791 P2d 1379, 47 St. Rep. 919 (1990).

Setting Parole Conditions When Imposing Maximum Sentence: In an embezzlement case, the judge imposed the maximum sentence without suspending or deferring any portion of it. The court also ordered restitution and that an auto parts store owned by the defendant be sold with the proceeds going towards restitution. The defendant argued that the court could not order the sale of his business or restitution because it had imposed the maximum sentence. The Supreme Court ruled that the judge could impose the restitution conditions but that the conditions could only take effect at the time, if ever, the defendant was paroled. St. v. Klippenstein, 239 M 42, 778 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1498 (1989), followed in St. v. Todd, 257 M 321, 849 P2d 175, 50 St. Rep. 288 (1993), and in St. v. Bourne, 259 M 274, 855 P2d 222, 50 St. Rep. 791 (1993).

Failure to Appear for Probation Officer-Ordered Urine Sample — Minimal Grounds Required to Order Testing: It was error for the District Court to dismiss a petition for revocation of suspended sentence based on the defendant's failure to appear for purposes of providing a urine sample because the probation officer did not have some articulable reasons for requesting the test. Under the standard established in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), the Supreme Court held that a probation officer's opinion that rehabilitation could not begin until the defendant was free of drugs and the fact that the defendant had not passed a drug test since his arrest constituted sufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds for requiring a urine sample. St. v. Sigler, 236 M 137, 769 P2d 703, 46 St. Rep. 244 (1989).

Warrantless Search by Probation Officer Lawful if Based on Reasonable Suspicion of Probation Violation: Defendant's deferred sentence was revoked after a warrantless search initiated by her probation officer pursuant to the terms of her probation revealed that defendant possessed dangerous drugs in violation of the terms of her probation. Search by a probation officer of his probationer's car, premises, or other belongings is lawful if it is based on the probation officer's reasonable suspicion of a probation violation. St. v. Small, 235 M 309, 767 P2d 316, 46 St. Rep. 9 (1989), followed in St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996), and St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998).

Warrantless Police Search of Probationers' Car and Residence Allowed — Reasonable Grounds Standard — Fogarty Overruled: A police officer's warrantless search of the probationers' car and residence based on the officer's observations and with permission of the probation officer, in compliance with probationary conditions, did not violate the fourth amendment. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), is specifically overruled and the "reasonable grounds" standard of Griffin v. Wis., 483 US 868, 97 L Ed 2d 709, 107 S Ct 3164 (1987), is adopted. Police cooperation with probation officers is to be encouraged as an important aid to effective administration of the probation system. To impose a warrant requirement for residential searches, on the basis of rights enjoyed by persons not on probation, would artificially raise a probationer's privacy interest to a level inconsistent with conditional liberty status. St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), clarified, regarding the fact that probation officers, other than the one assigned to a probationer, are not precluded from authorizing a probationary search, in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55

St. Rep. 1235 (1998), and followed in St. v. Boston, 269 M 300, 889 P2d 814, 51 St. Rep. 1142 (1994), St. v. Burchett, 277 M 192, 921 P2d 854, 53 St. Rep. 590 (1996), St. v. Beaudry, 282 M 225, 937 P2d 459, 54 St. Rep. 324 (1997), St. v. Stucker, 1999 MT 14, 293 M 123, 973 P2d 835, 56 St. Rep. 65 (1999), and St. v. Moody, 2006 MT 305, 334 M 517, 148 P3d 662 (2006).

Ineligibility for Parole Not in Conflict With Rehabilitation: Defendant asserted that his designation as ineligible for parole conflicted with society's desire to rehabilitate him because serving a minimum 40-year term would make him a permanent public charge, discourage his pursuit of education and development of skills, and whither his religious faith. However, it was within the discretion of the District Court, in light of the violence associated with defendant's crimes and the frequency of their commission, to restrict defendant's opportunity for parole in order to protect society. In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988).

Three Hundred-Year Prison Sentence of Mentally Ill Defendant Upheld: Sentencing defendant, who was found mentally ill but criminally culpable, to the Montana State Prison for a term of 300 years without the possibility of parole or furlough was not cruel and unusual punishment. The District Court had stated, among other things, that defendant was very dangerous and there was no treatment program that would alter his behavior. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Alcoholics — Refraining as Valid Condition of Suspended Sentence: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Parole Conditions — Application to Suspended Portion of Sentence: Parole conditions set by Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) also applied to period of suspended sentence where court passing sentence did not set conditions upon suspended portion of sentence, particularly where that court expressly directed that when defendant was not in prison he was to be under the supervision of the Board and court could revoke the suspended sentence for violation of those conditions. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Parole Eligibility — Ex Post Facto Application: Defendant committed a crime in 1975 for which he was tried and convicted in 1979. In sentencing defendant, the trial court declared him a dangerous offender under 46-18-404 (now repealed), and declared him ineligible for parole under 46-18-202. Both of these statutes became effective July 1, 1977. Application of a law which eliminates or delays a defendant's parole eligibility after the criminal offense has been committed is ex post facto as applied to that defendant and is therefore unconstitutional. St. v. Beachman, 189 M 400, 616 P2d 337 (1980).

Sentencing — Ineligibility for Parole or Supervised Release — Vagueness: Petitioners contend that this section's provision allowing a judge who imposes a sentence of more than 1 year in prison to add a restriction barring parole and supervised release is invalid because it is too vague in defining the supposed offense. This section does not define an offense. It does not create a new offense, nor does it forbid or require the doing of an act. Its sole purpose is to permit a District Judge, in the course of ordinary sentencing, to determine that a defendant should serve his full sentence for the protection of society. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890 (1980).

Sentencing — Not Delegation of Legislative Authority: Petitioners contend that 46-18-202(2) unlawfully delegates legislative authority to the judicial and executive branches of government. The thrust of this argument appears to be that the section vests too much discretion in District Judges and prosecuting attorneys. A District Judge is particularly well positioned to predict whether the restriction (ineligibility for parole or supervised release) is necessary for the protection of society. The determination of whether to impose the restriction is manifestly with the District Judge alone. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890 (1980).

Sentencing — Restrictions on Parole and Supervised Release Permissible: Section 46-18-202 provides that whenever a sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year is given, the court may impose the restriction that the defendant be ineligible for parole and participation in the supervised release program while serving his term. If the court finds the restriction necessary, it shall impose the restriction as part of the sentence and set forth its reasons for imposing the restrictions in writing. This statute is not a sentence enhancement statute. It does not permit District Judges to add any time beyond the statutory maximum underlying the offense. Petitioners, who both pleaded guilty, were represented by counsel and were given presentence hearings. Parole and participation in the supervised release program are privileges, not rights. Petitioners were not denied due process or equal protection in being sentenced under 46-18-202. Cavanaugh v. Crist, 189 M 274, 615 P2d 890 (1980).

Review of Reversed Convictions: The defendant argued that his 10-year sentence without an opportunity for parole or participation in the supervised release program is improper because the District Court relied on a presentence investigation report that contained false and misleading information. The defendant asserts that the court relied on a felony conviction in Washington that was reversed, an Oregon felony conviction that was reversed, and a Wyoming felony conviction that was constitutionally infirm. The defendant also contends that his "rap" sheet with 45 entries was prejudicial because only 16 of the entries reflect convictions. On review, the Supreme Court held that in light of the defendant's extensive criminal background he experienced no material prejudice or substantial interference with his rights because of the trial court's consideration of convictions that were later reversed. St. v. Olsen, 189 M 43, 614 P2d 1061 (1980).

Unlimited Search and Polygraph Provisions on Probation Unconstitutional: As conditions for imposition of a suspended sentence, defendant was required to submit to an unlimited search provision by any lawful authorities and to submit to a polygraph examination upon the request of any law enforcement officer. The Supreme Court, when reviewing the revocation of defendant's suspended sentence, held that the unlimited polygraph examination condition was overly broad and thus an invalid condition of probation and that the unlimited warrantless search provision is an unconstitutional condition of probation. The Supreme Court said that a sentencing court cannot inject prosecuting attorneys or law enforcement officials into the probation process by granting them direct rights to search the probationer, his home, or his vehicle. A type of probable cause or some identifiable reason is required before a search clause may be exercised to search the probationer or his vehicle. The legal interests of innocent third persons living with a probationer are to be protected by requiring a search warrant before searching the probationer's home. Polygraph examinations as a condition of probation can be effectively contained within constitutional parameters by confining the right to demand a polygraph examination to the probation officer. St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980), overruled in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988).

Improper Sentencings — Excess of Maximum — Failure to Prove Essential Element: Where the District Court sentenced defendant to 20 years for burglary and the maximum possible sentence was 10 years, the Supreme Court reduced the sentence to 10 years. The Supreme Court also reversed the 10-year sentence the defendant received upon his conviction for felony theft, as the State failed to prove the essential element that the value of the property taken exceeded $150. All other sentences received by the defendant, as well as the provision of the sentence for no parole or supervised release, were within the maximum allowed by law and as such were within the discretion of the sentencing judge and were not overturned. St. v. Sunday, 187 M 292, 609 P2d 1188 (1980).

Persistent Felony Offender Sentence — Presumption of Constitutionality: Following a conviction for attempted deliberate homicide, the defendant was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to 30 years in prison without parole. While the defendant claims the sentence to be unconstitutional, it was held in St. v. Karathanos, 158 M 461, 493 P2d 326 (1972), that a sentence within statutory limits is presumed to be constitutional. The defendant has the burden of overcoming the presumption and has not done so. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Ex Post Facto Application of Sentencing Statute: The provision in the sentence rendering the defendant ineligible for parole or supervised release until one-half of his sentence was served was improper since the law authorizing such a provision did not become effective until after the commission of the crime of which the defendant was convicted. St. v. Azure, 179 M 281, 587 P2d 1297 (1978); St. v. Gone, 179 M 271, 587 P2d 1291 (1978).

Improper Condition of Probation — Fine:

The Supreme Court held the imposition of $500 fine or payment as a condition of probation after deferred imposition of sentence to be a nullity and of no force or effect and that the same be vacated and set aside to conform with St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978). St. v. Petko, 177 M 229, 581 P2d 425 (1978). [But see 1981 amendment to 46-18-201 allowing payment of a fine as a condition of probation.]

The imposition of a condition of probation that requires the payment of a fine having no reasonable association to the crime committed or to public protection is a nullity and of no force or effect. St. v. Babbit, 175 M 433, 574 P2d 998 (1978). [But see 1981 amendment to 46-18-201 allowing payment of a fine as a condition of probation.]

Probationer Search Clause: Execution of a probationer search clause by law enforcement personnel, being instrumental in achieving the objectives of probation, is a proper condition of probation. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Improper Condition of Probation — Sentence to Leave County: Suspending a sentence on the condition that the defendant leave and remain out of the county has no force or effect other than to suspend the sentence; the court has no power to pronounce a sentence in the absence of specific statutory authority. The prisoner is by law subject only to the rules and regulations of the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole), and floating is void as an attempted exercise of pardoning power. Ex parte Sheehan, 100 M 244, 49 P2d 438 (1935).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an attempt to clarify the provisions and procedures for the revocation of a probationary sentence.

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 in (1) near middle of first sentence after "sentence" inserted "or any condition of supervision after release from imprisonment imposed pursuant to 45-5-503(4), 45-5-507(5), 45-5-601(3), 45-5-602(3), 45-5-603(2)(c), or 45-5-625(4)"; inserted (6)(a)(ii) allowing alternative proof of a violation of a condition of supervision after release from imprisonment imposed pursuant to certain statutes; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 345 inserted (9) providing that the provisions of this section apply to any offender whose suspended or deferred sentence is subject to revocation regardless of the date of the offender's conviction and regardless of the terms and conditions of the offender's original sentence. Amendment effective April 15, 2003.

Chapter 386 in (7)(a)(iii) at end after "any" substituted "sentence that could have been imposed that does not include a longer imprisonment or commitment term than the original sentence" for "lesser sentence"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 17, 2003.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 345, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders in the custody of or under the supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 15, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 493 in (1) in last sentence near middle after "or a probation" inserted "and parole"; inserted (7)(c) authorizing judge to set, modify, or add conditions of probation; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 493, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who are under the custody or supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment — Code Commissioner Correction: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to sentencing judge for references to district court and substituted references to offender for references to defendant; inserted (7)(b) regarding consideration of elapsed time as credit against the sentence; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

In last sentence of (7)(b) the Code Commissioner substituted "time served in a detention center" for "jail" pursuant to the authority contained in sec. 14, Ch. 52, L. 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 near beginning of (1), after "revocation", deleted "accompanied by an affidavit".

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services" (deleted by Ch. 800), pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 800 substituted (1) concerning petition for revocation, order for revocation, and issuance of warrant for former text that read: "A judge, magistrate, or justice of the peace who has suspended the execution of a sentence or deferred the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment under 46-18-201 or his successor is authorized in his discretion to revoke the suspension or impose sentence and order the person committed. He may also, in his discretion, order the prisoner placed under the jurisdiction of the department of institutions as provided by law or retain such jurisdiction with his court"; in (2), after "revocation", deleted "of a suspended sentence or imposition of a sentence previously deferred"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) Prior to the revocation of an order suspending or deferring the imposition of sentence, the person affected shall be given a hearing"; inserted (3) concerning applicability of bail provisions; inserted (4) concerning advising defendant of certain rights; inserted (5) concerning when hearing is not required; inserted (6) requiring proof of terms and conditions of suspended or deferred sentence other than failure to pay restitution; inserted (7) concerning authority of court; inserted (8) concerning release of defendant; and made minor changes in style.

1983 Amendment: Near middle of (1), after "successor is authorized" deleted "during the period of the suspended sentence or deferred imposition of sentence"; and inserted (2) relating to filing of and jurisdiction over a petition to revoke.

Applicability of 1983 Amendment: Section 2, Ch. 204, L. 1983, provided that "Section 1 applies to any petition filed after the effective date of this act." The act was effective March 23, 1983, and section 1 amended this section.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "department of institutions (now department of corrections)" for "board of pardons" after "under the jurisdiction of the" in the second sentence.

GENERAL

Illegal Revocation of Sentence — Habeas Corpus Relief Warranted: The state petitioned to revoke Borgen's suspended sentence, and the District Court granted the petition and resentenced Borgen to incarceration for an additional 14 years. Borgen petitioned for habeas corpus relief. The Supreme Court determined that after an illegal weapon enhancement sentence was subtracted from Borgen's original sentence, the total time remaining on Borgen's suspended sentence was about 9 years, 1 month. However, the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was not filed until 9 years, 8 months after sentencing. Because the legal portion of Borgen's sentence had expired before the petition to revoke was filed, revocation of Borgen's sentence was facially illegal, and Borgen's incarceration constituted a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice warranting habeas corpus relief. Therefore, the Supreme Court granted Borgen's petition, vacated the sentence revocation, and ordered that Borgen be released from custody. Borgen v. Sorrell, 2009 MT 143, 350 M 339, 217 P3d 1022 (2009). See also Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006).

Due Process in Sentence Revocation Proceeding: Triplett entered into a plea agreement with the state and pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse without consent in exchange for the state dismissing the other two counts. The District Court sentenced Triplett to the state prison for 12 years with 4 years suspended. Triplett was made ineligible for parole until he completed phases I and II of the sex offender treatment program. The court also imposed other conditions upon his suspended sentence. Triplett then petitioned the Sentence Review Division for review of the District Court's sentence. After a hearing, the Sentence Review Division amended Triplett's sentence, imposing a 40-year sentence, all of which was suspended upon specific conditions. The District Court issued an amended judgment and commitment reflecting the Sentence Review Division's action and Triplett was released. On September 28, 2006, the state filed a petition for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court issued a bench warrant and Triplett was arrested on October 2, 2006. On October 17, 2006, Triplett made an initial appearance and the court informed Triplett of the allegations in the petition and of his rights. On October 24, 2006, the court conducted an answer hearing, and Triplett denied each allegation of the petition. Triplett's counsel requested at least 3 to 4 weeks in which to prepare for an evidentiary hearing. Based on the parties' schedules and the court's calendar, the court then set an evidentiary hearing for December 22, 2006. After several delays, the parties advised the court they had reached an agreement for adjudication and recommended disposition. Pursuant to the agreement, Triplett answered "true" to some of the alleged violations of his sentence conditions in exchange for the state's agreement to request dismissal of other allegations and to recommend the court impose the sentence it originally imposed, which was 12 years with 4 suspended. Based on his admissions, the court found Triplett did violate the terms of the suspended portion of his previously imposed sentence. The District Court indicated it had not decided whether it would follow the terms of the plea agreement and scheduled a dispositional hearing for May 1, 2007. Stating that it saw nothing in the statutes giving it authority to overturn the amended judgment and commitment of the Sentence Review Division, the court sentenced Triplett to 40 years in the state prison with 20 years suspended. Triplett received credit for 595 days prior time served in prison and in jail during the revocation proceedings. Triplett appealed. The due process rights of a probationer in a revocation proceeding are different from those afforded a defendant in a criminal proceeding. Due process protections for a revocation hearing are codified in 46-18-203. Triplett argued he was denied due process because the state failed to bring him before the judge for his final revocation hearing without unnecessary delay, which he asserted is required by 46-18-203(4). The state argued, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the "without unnecessary delay" language plainly referred to the first court appearance after an offender is arrested pursuant to a revocation petition. Triplett also argued that even if the "without unnecessary delay" language of 46-18-203(4) does not apply to the revocation hearing, minimum due process requirements require that a revocation hearing take place within a reasonable time. The delays at issue in this case arose out of the parties' scheduling needs, particularly Triplett's. Triplett also made multiple requests for change of counsel. Triplett was not in a position to claim the delays were unfair when his counsel procured many of them, either by seeking a continuance or by delaying efforts to schedule a hearing date, and when Triplett's requests for new counsel added to the uncertainty of the schedule. The Supreme Court held that the scheduling of the revocation hearing was fundamentally fair and Triplett's due process rights were not violated. St. v. Triplett, 2008 MT 360, 346 M 383, 195 P3d 819 (2008).

Original Sentence — Sentence Review Decision as Final: Triplett entered into a plea agreement with the state and pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse without consent in exchange for the state dismissing the other two counts. The District Court sentenced Triplett to the state prison for 12 years with 4 years suspended. Triplett was made ineligible for parole until he completed phases I and II of the sex offender treatment program. The court also imposed other conditions upon his suspended sentence. Triplett then petitioned the Sentence Review Division for review of the District Court's sentence. After a hearing, the Sentence Review Division amended Triplett's sentence, imposing a 40-year sentence, all of which was suspended upon specific conditions. The District Court issued an amended judgment and commitment reflecting the Sentence Review Division's action and Triplett was released. On September 28, 2006, the State filed a petition for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court issued a bench warrant and Triplett was arrested on October 2, 2006. On October 17, 2006, Triplett made an initial appearance and the court informed Triplett of the allegations in the petition and of his rights. On October 24, 2006, the court conducted an answer hearing, and Triplett denied each allegation of the petition. Triplett's counsel requested at least 3 to 4 weeks in which to prepare for an evidentiary hearing. Based on the parties' schedules and the court's calendar, the court then set an evidentiary hearing for December 22, 2006. After several delays, the parties advised the court they had reached an agreement for adjudication and recommended disposition. Pursuant to the agreement, Triplett answered "true" to some of the alleged violations of his sentence conditions in exchange for the state's agreement to request dismissal of other allegations and to recommend the court impose the sentence it originally imposed, which was 12 years with 4 suspended. Based on his admissions, the court found Triplett did violate the terms of the suspended portion of his previously imposed sentence. The District Court indicated it had not decided whether it would follow the terms of the plea agreement and scheduled a dispositional hearing for May 1, 2007. Stating that it saw nothing in the statutes giving it authority to overturn the amended judgment and commitment of the Sentence Review Division, the court sentenced Triplett to 40 years in the state prison with 20 years suspended. Triplett received credit for 595 days prior time served in prison and in jail during the revocation proceedings. Triplett appealed, contending that he should have received the original sentence imposed by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that the only logical interpretation of 46-18-203 in light of the authority of the Sentence Review Division is that a sentence imposed by the Division steps into the stead of the previous District Court sentence and, in effect, becomes the "original" sentence for purposes of revocation. The statute says that Division sentences are "final." Only this interpretation can give meaning and purpose to the sentence review process as a "critical stage" of the criminal proceeding. St. v. Triplett, 2008 MT 360, 346 M 383, 195 P3d 819 (2008).

Due Process in Probation Revocation Process Considered Constitutionally Adequate: The following procedures in 46-23-1012 provide adequate due process to an alleged probation violator: (1) the probation officer must file a report of violation within 10 days of the probationer's arrest; (2) the state must bring the probationer before a judge for a hearing on the charges without unnecessary delay after the report of violation is filed; and (3) the state must notify the probationer at the hearing of the alleged probation violations. St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008). See also St. v. Swan, 220 M 162, 713 P2d 1003 (1986).

No Prosecution for Breach of Suspended Sentence Only: As a condition of Letasky's suspended sentence for partner or family member assault, he was directed to have no contact with the victim. When contact allegedly occurred, Letasky was charged with criminal contempt. Letasky moved to dismiss the charge, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. A condition of a suspended sentence, unlike a court order, is not an independent mandate of the court, but instead represents a requirement that Montana law allows the court to place upon an order suspending an offender's sentence. An offender may be prosecuted for a crime if the facts that establish the offender's noncompliance with a condition of the suspended sentence also establish the elements of a crime, but an offender may not be prosecuted based only on breach of the condition itself. St. v. Letasky, 2007 MT 51, 336 M 178, 152 P3d 1288 (2007).

Inapplicability of Mental Disease or Defect Sentencing Provisions to Probation Revocation Proceedings: Boulton asserted that because her probation violations were the result of a mental illness, she should have been sentenced to continued probation with intense supervision pursuant to 46-14-311 and 46-14-312, rather than committed to the Department of Corrections. The state argued that sentencing provisions related to a defendant with a mental disease or defect apply only to original sentencing and not to sentence revocation proceedings. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. It is generally irrelevant whether a probation violation may have been committed while a probationer was suffering a mental disease or defect. Rather, the question is whether the purposes of rehabilitation are being achieved and whether, by virtue of subsequent criminal conduct or evidence that a probationer's behavior was not in compliance with the rules and objectives of the probation, the objectives of probation are best served by continued liberty or by incarceration. The alternative sentencing provisions of 46-14-311 and 46-14-312 do not apply in sentence revocation proceedings, although the revoking court may consider evidence of a mental disease or defect during the proceedings. In the present case, after Boulton pleaded true to multiple probation violations, the revoking court concluded that evidence of Boulton's mental disorders did not warrant placement in the state hospital, consistent with the testimony of Boulton's psychiatrist, and that placement with the Department better served the purposes of probation. Revocation of Boulton's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006), following St. v. Averill, 2001 MT 161, 306 M 106, 30 P3d 1059 (2001).

Improper Nunc Pro Tunc Judgments Reducing Credit for Time Served Vacated: By nunc pro tunc judgment, the District Court reduced the number of days of credit that Megard received for prior incarceration after two suspended commitments to the Department of Corrections were revoked, and Megard appealed. The Supreme Court reviewed the sentence for legality, noting that once a valid sentence has been pronounced, a District Court has no authority to modify or change it except as provided by statute. Under 46-18-116(3), a factually erroneous judgment can be corrected at any time, but the original judgments against Megard were not factually incorrect in that Megard was properly credited for time served at that time and the credit did not conflict with the oral pronouncement of Megard's sentence from the bench. Thus, the District Court's amended nunc pro tunc judgments were not within the purview of 46-18-116(3) and, being illegal, were vacated. The case was remanded for reinstatement of the original judgments. St. v. Megard, 2006 MT 84, 332 M 27, 134 P3d 90 (2006), following St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151 (1993), and St. v. Kroll, 2004 MT 203, 322 M 294, 95 P3d 717 (2004).

Probation Violation — Standard of Review: When a probation violation has occurred, the District Court must exercise its discretion in determining an appropriate action in response to the violation, and the Supreme Court will not intervene absent an abuse of that discretion. St. v. Burke, 2005 MT 250, 329 M 1, 122 P3d 427 (2005), following St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003).

Oral and Written Versions of Original Sentence Requiring Outpatient Sexual Offender Treatment — Violation of Suspended Sentence: The District Court revoked Van Haele's suspended sentence on grounds that he failed to qualify for outpatient sexual offender treatment. Van Haele contended that the sentencing condition was improperly added by amendment and that he was entitled to a hearing on the added condition because it was not part of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The requirement could not have been added to the original sentence because it was part of the original oral and written sentence, so no hearing was required. The basis for revoking Van Haele's suspended sentence was therefore not invalid, and suspension was affirmed. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Credit Allowed for Time Served Concurrently With Other Sentences: Tracy's original sentence in Cascade County was for 10 years suspended with the Department of Corrections, to run concurrently with two other sentences that Tracy received in Yellowstone County. When Tracy violated his release conditions, the District Court in Cascade County revoked the original 10-year sentence but declined to give Tracy credit for the time served in detention pursuant to the Yellowstone County sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, when read together, 46-18-401 and this section require that Tracy be given credit for time spent in a detention center or on home arrest on all the sentences that were being served concurrently. The case was remanded to calculate and grant appropriate credit. St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Imposition of More Burdensome Prison Sentence in Place of Placement With Department of Corrections — Illegal Ex Post Facto Application of Former Sentencing Statute: Tracy's original sentence in Cascade County was for 10 years suspended with the Department of Corrections, to run concurrently with two other sentences that Tracy received in Yellowstone County. Tracy eventually discharged the incarceration portions of both Yellowstone County sentences. When Tracy violated his release conditions, the District Court in Cascade County revoked the original 10-year sentence to the Department of Corrections and resentenced Tracy to 10 years at the state prison. Tracy appealed the imposition of the prison sentence. Under the version of this section in effect at the time of Tracy's original offense in 1996, if Tracy violated the terms of his suspended sentence, the District Court could revoke the sentence and require Tracy to serve either the sentence imposed or a lesser sentence. The statute was later amended to require an offender to serve either the sentence imposed or any sentence that could have been imposed as long as the sentence is not longer than the original sentence. The Supreme Court held that a prison sentence was not the same or less than the original sentence with the Department of Corrections in an appropriate facility or program. Rather, the new sentence imposed an additional, more burdensome condition requiring Tracy to go to prison. Although the new sentence was appropriate under the amended 2003 version of this section, application of the 2003 version to a crime committed in 1996 was an ex post facto application that could not pass constitutional muster, so the Supreme Court vacated the prison sentence and remanded for resentencing under the version of this section in effect at the time of the original judgment. St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

No Standing to Raise Constitutionality of Restitution Statutes Absent Showing of Direct Personal Injury: The 2003 Legislature amended the state restitution statutes, and Thaut sought to challenge the constitutionality of the amendments on numerous grounds. However, Thaut was unable to show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the restitution laws. Pursuant to St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990), and Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), Thaut lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the restitution statutes, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004). See also St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), in which defendant established direct economic injury and thus standing to challenge the constitutionality of repayment conditions on equal protection grounds through the District Court's order to repay $2,398 in costs of appointed counsel.

Misdemeanor Contempt Not Enforceable More Than One Year After Sentence Expired: On April 9, 1998, Dexter was sentenced in Justice's Court to 1 year in jail for third offense DUI. The sentence was suspended on condition that Dexter serve 90 days in jail and pay a $770 fine, but Dexter did neither. Sentence revocation proceedings could have been instituted under this section during the time of Dexter's sentence, but were not. About 3 years later, Dexter was arrested on an outstanding warrant after the suspended sentence had expired, and the Justice's Court invoked its contempt powers to sentence Dexter to jail time for failing to fulfill the conditions of the suspended sentence. The Justice of the Peace contended that under 3-10-401, contempt proceedings could be brought at any time, and the District Court concluded that the Justice's Court had the authority to enforce compliance with the lawful sentencing order, but on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Under the penalties in 3-1-519 in effect at the time (repealed in 2001), contempt of court constituted a misdemeanor crime, which was required under 45-1-205(2)(b) to be prosecuted within 1 year of commission. The last day on which Dexter could have committed contempt was April 9, 1999, so prosecution was required to be commenced by April 9, 2000. Because the contempt prosecution did not commence until Dexter was arrested on January 23, 2002, the Justice's Court lacked jurisdiction to hold Dexter in contempt for failure to comply with the terms of a sentence that expired in April 1999. Dexter v. Shields, 2004 MT 159, 322 M 6, 92 P3d 1208 (2004). See also Milanovich v. Milanovich, 200 M 83, 655 P2d 959 (1982).

No Constitutional Violation in Admission of Telephonic Testimony at Revocation Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion Upon Good Cause: To accommodate counsel, the state moved to allow the admission of telephonic testimony from two law enforcement officers who could not attend Megard's sentence revocation hearing in person. Megard objected, relying on Rule 611, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and In re Marriage of Bonamarte, 263 M 170, 866 P2d 1132 (1994). The District Court held that neither the rule nor Bonamarte applied and that Megard's fundamental rights would be adequately protected, so the motion was granted. On appeal, Megard also contended that allowing the telephonic testimony violated his due process right and the right to confront witnesses. The Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court was familiar with the witnesses. Allowing telephonic testimony did not impede the ability to judge a witness's credibility in relation to other witnesses, who corroborated the testimony, because knowledge of a witness's identity and credentials may constitute a special circumstance under which telephonic testimony is allowed. Although telephonic testimony is generally not allowed in trials absent special circumstances or the parties' consent, evidentiary rules do not apply to revocation proceedings. Because a revocation hearing is not a criminal trial, Megard had no constitutional right to confront witnesses at the hearing. Further, Megard's due process rights were not violated because his counsel actually cross-examined the witnesses, and good cause existed for the District Court to admit the telephonic testimony to address scheduling conflicts. Even if error occurred, it was harmless, given Megard's failure to establish prejudice pursuant to St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003). St. v. Megard, 2004 MT 67, 320 M 323, 87 P3d 448 (2004).

No Requirement to Bifurcate Revocation Hearing Into Evidentiary and Dispositional Phases: Pedersen contended that he was entitled to a bifurcated sentence revocation hearing, with the evidentiary and dispositional phases separated into two distinct hearings, and that the only proper time for introducing and rebutting evidence was during the evidentiary phase of the hearing. However, Pedersen cited no authority for the bifurcation proposition, and the Supreme Court declined to adopt it. The District Court has wide latitude to control courtroom proceedings, and it was not an abuse of the court's discretion to allow the state to present evidence during the dispositional phase, rather than divide the hearing into distinct proceedings for evidentiary purposes. St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003).

Probation Revocation Based on Statements of Defense Counsel Without Waiver of Right to Hearing by Defendant Violative of Due Process: At Finley's rerevocation hearing, his attorney told the court that Finley had decided to admit violating the terms of his probation. The court accepted the admission, revoked probation, and sentenced Finley to 10 years in prison. Finley immediately asked to withdraw the admission, but the request was denied. On appeal, Finley contended that his due process rights were violated because he never personally admitted any alleged violations or waived the right to a revocation hearing. The state countered that Finley did not refute counsel's statement, so the court was correct to accept counsel's statement as true and revoke Finley's suspended sentence. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court agreed with Finley. Under this section, a probationer is guaranteed a hearing before the sentencing court. Alternatively, a probationer may waive the right to a full revocation hearing and admit the alleged violation or accept favorable relief granted by the court, but for a waiver of a fundamental right to be recognized by the courts, the waiver must be informed, intelligent, and voluntary, and this applies to waiver of a revocation hearing as well. Courts may not presume waiver based on the representations of counsel. Here, in accepting counsel's statement, the District Court committed reversible error when it: (1) failed to admonish Finley regarding his constitutional rights; (2) neglected to ascertain that Finley knew the consequences of admitting a parole violation; (3) failed to determine that Finley voluntarily waived the right to a revocation hearing; (4) accepted a waiver of the right to a hearing based on presumption only; and (5) failed to establish a factual basis for the alleged violation. The state's argument that Finley admitted the violations at a prior initial revocation hearing also failed. The District Court took no notice of the entry of Finley's admission at the prior voided hearing, nor was testimony at the earlier voided proceeding admissible as evidence during the later proceeding. Because Finley's alleged waiver was not informed, intelligent, and voluntary, his due process rights were violated, and the case was remanded. St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003). See also Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 US 778 (1973), and People v. Hall, 760 NE 2d 971 (Ill. 2001).

No Credit for Time Served on Informal House Arrest: The District Court conditioned Gulbranson's release on bond with informal house arrest. Gulbranson contended that the house arrest restricted his liberty in a manner sufficiently similar to incarceration, as provided in 46-18-403, to require that he be given credit for time served. However, Gulbranson did not cite any legal authority to support the contention, and the Supreme Court declined to consider the unsupported argument. Instead, the Supreme Court held that the informal house arrest in this case was not house arrest as provided for in Title 46, ch. 18, part 10, so this section did not require that Gulbranson's sentences be credited with time served for that period. Gulbranson failed to show that the District Court was statutorily required to credit him for time served while released on bond, so it was within the District Court's discretion whether to allow credit. Absent an abuse of discretion, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gulbranson, 2003 MT 139, 316 M 163, 69 P3d 1187 (2003), followed in St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 112, 342 M 461, 182 P3d 62 (2008), and in St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009).

Probationer Not Entitled to Good Time Credit for Time Served on Original Sentence: Williams' suspended sentence for felony assault was revoked after Williams violated the terms of the suspension. Williams requested that he be credited for good time that he served on the suspended sentence. The District Court concluded that Williams was a probationer, not a parolee, and declined to grant good time credit. Williams appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Williams' original sentence did not provide that Williams be treated as a parolee, so as a probationer, Williams was not entitled to credit for good time under McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001). St. v. Williams, 2003 MT 136, 316 M 140, 69 P3d 222 (2003).

Dual Statutory Revocation Proceedings — Formal Revocation Proceedings Not Subject to Time and Procedural Requirements of Probation Violator Prison Diversion Program: Section 46-23-1012 authorizes two distinct methods of commencing revocation. One method is the formal proceeding outlined in 46-23-1012(1) and this section. The other method is an abbreviated proceeding initiated by detention by the probation and parole office, known as the probation violator prison diversion program, set forth in 46-23-1012(3) through (5), and the abbreviated proceeding may be converted to a formal revocation pursuant to 46-23-1012(5). The time and procedural requirements of the probation violator prison diversion program, as provided in 46-23-1012(3) through (5), do not apply to the formal proceeding initiated pursuant to 46-23-1012(1) and this section, which requires that an offender be brought before the court without unnecessary delay. Gonzales v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 259, 307 M 228, 37 P3d 653 (2001), followed in St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003).

No Credit Allowed for Time Served While on Probation: Gundrum was placed on probation but was later arrested on a probation violation. Gundrum contended that he should receive credit for the time that he was on probation under 46-18-402, even though he was not incarcerated. The Supreme Court disagreed. Section 46-18-402 applies to credit for time served while incarcerated and thus does not apply to Gundrum. Further, under this section and McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001), a judge has complete discretion to consider elapsed time that an offender is on probation and may expressly allow or reject the time as credit on the offender's sentence. Here, the District Court considered the nature of Gundrum's violations and the magnitude of his financial obligations before denying credit for time served on probation. Gundrum did not assert that the District Court failed to follow the mandates of this section, and the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of credit for time that Gundrum served on probation. Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001).

No Power of State to Refile Petition to Revoke Suspended or Deferred Sentence Once Original Sentence Expires: Vance claimed that because a probable cause hearing was not held within 36 hours of arrest under a bench warrant for probation revocation, the provisions of St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001), should apply and the revocation proceedings should be rendered void. The state agreed that Giddings applied, but indicated that a petition for revocation of deferred sentence would be refiled pursuant to 46-23-1012. Vance pointed out that the original deferred sentence had expired, and argued that the refiling of a petition for revocation of an expired sentence was prohibited under this section. The state contended that the reasoning in St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), implied that the original sentence was tolled during the period of the void proceedings for purposes of refiling a petition to revoke. The Supreme Court agreed with Vance. The fact that the previous revocation proceedings were defective and therefore void ab initio did not mean that time stood still during the defective proceedings, nor do Giddings and Goebel suspend the provisions of this section, which clearly state that the petition for revocation must be filed with the sentencing court during the period of suspension or deferral. Nothing in law allows the state to refile a revocation petition to relate back to the date of the probation violation, and once the term of the sentence expires, the state has no more power to refile to revoke the suspended or deferred sentence than it would have to file an original proceeding to revoke under those circumstances. Vance v. Acton, 2001 MT 243, 307 M 71, 36 P3d 881 (2001).

Discretionary Sentencing Authority Including Reassignment of Original Consecutive Terms as Concurrent Terms: Frazier was sentenced in Cascade County to 55 years with 25 suspended on four felony counts. The first three sentences were ordered to run consecutively, and the sentence for the fourth count was ordered to run concurrently with the sentence for the third count. After serving 7 years, and 2 weeks before his scheduled release from a prerelease center, Frazier was convicted in Silver Bow County of two counts of felony drug violations and was sentenced to concurrent prison terms of 8 years and 5 years, to run concurrently with the outstanding Cascade County sentences. About 2 months later, the Cascade County Attorney petitioned to revoke the suspended portions of the Cascade County sentences on grounds that Frazier had violated the terms of the suspensions. The Cascade County District Court revoked the suspended sentences and recommended Frazier's participation in a boot camp program, ordering that if the program was successfully completed, the court would consider reimposing a probationary sentence for the remaining term of the sentences. Frazier appealed on grounds that the court made several mistakes and believed that it lacked authority upon revocation to assign Frazier's three consecutive terms to run concurrently. The Supreme Court agreed with Frazier and remanded for resentencing. When the District Court determined to retain jurisdiction after sentence revocation, the court had statutory authority to alter the terms and conditions of the original sentences, as long as the new sentence remained within the parameters set forth by the original sentencing court and imposed no new restrictions, and that discretionary authority included the power to reassign Frazier's terms to run concurrently when they were originally designated to run consecutively. St. v. Frazier, 2001 MT 210, 306 M 358, 34 P3d 96 (2001). See also St. v. Docken, 274 M 296, 908 P2d 213 (1995), and St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377 (1999).

Failure to Complete Prison Sex Offender Program Not Because of Defendant's Willful Conduct — Consideration of Incarceration Alternatives Constitutionally Required: Lee was sentenced to two concurrent 40-year terms in prison for sexual intercourse without consent and attempted sexual intercourse without consent and was ineligible for parole during the first 10 years of the sentence unless a sex offender treatment plan was successfully completed. Lee entered prison in 1995 and immediately requested enrollment in Phase I of the two-phase program. Lee was finally enrolled in Phase I after a 3-year wait, successfully completed that phase, and was placed on a waiting list for enrollment in Phase II. Because of a sitdown strike, Lee was unable to complete Phase II by his scheduled release date. The state petitioned to revoke Lee's suspended sentence because the program was not completed, and Lee moved to dismiss on grounds that the failure to complete treatment was not his fault. The District Court found that Lee's failure to complete the program was not due to any volitional conduct on Lee's part, but the court nevertheless determined that the failure constituted a violation of the terms of the suspended sentence and ordered Lee to serve the remaining 30 years on each count, declaring Lee ineligible for parole until both phases of treatment were completed. Lee appealed on grounds that the court violated his right to due process because it was impossible to complete the program during incarceration because of prison waiting periods and the length of the program. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Williams, 1999 MT 240, 296 M 258, 993 P2d 1 (1999), it was held that a court could revoke a suspended sentence even though a probationer's failure to comply with the terms of the sentence was not willful, and the court in this case affirmed Williams to the extent that violations of nonfinancial probationary conditions need not necessarily be willful in order to justify revocation. However, the probationer in Williams was unable to gain acceptance into sex offender programs because of a lack of social skills, immaturity, and "acting out" behavior, whereas Lee was unable to access the programs because of actions of the state. Due process required the trial court to consider whether there were alternatives to incarceration that would further the purpose of Lee's suspended sentence. The Supreme Court remanded for a determination of whether there were any reasonable alternative measures other than continued incarceration because to do otherwise would deprive Lee of his conditional freedom simply because the state prevented him from completing the sex offender program while imprisoned. St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 M 173, 31 P3d 998 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Imprisonment for Probation Violation Not Considered Double Jeopardy: Walker was convicted of felony DUI, sentenced to 6 months in prison followed by 2 years of supervised probation, and fined $1,000. Following 6 months' confinement, Walker was released and began serving the probationary sentence but violated the terms of probation about 1 year later. During revocation hearings, Walker contended that additional incarceration pursuant to 61-8-731 for probation violations would constitute double jeopardy because the entirety of the 6 months' prison term had already been served. The District Court disagreed, revoked probation, and committed Walker to the Department of Corrections for the time remaining on the original 2-year probation. Walker appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The court found no distinction between the revocation of a suspended sentence and the revocation of a probationary sentence. In either case, the subsequent conduct, not the original offense, forms the basis for revocation, and the sentencing court retains jurisdiction over the defendant during the period of probation. Walker conceded that 61-8-731 provides by its terms for revocation of probation and for incarceration upon violation of probation. The revocation is not new punishment for the criminal offense of felony DUI, but rather constitutes the consequence of violating probationary conditions. Walker failed to bear the burden of proving 61-8-731 unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt on double jeopardy grounds. St. v. Walker, 2001 MT 170, 306 M 159, 30 P3d 1099 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999).

Proof of Constructive Possession of Firearm Sufficient to Show Possession in Violation of Probationary Condition: Caekaert, who had been earlier placed on probation subject to the condition that he "not own, possess, or be in control of any firearms . . . as defined by State or Federal law", was found to have firearms in an outbuilding on real property that he owned. Caekaert possessed a key to the building in which the firearms were found but claimed that the firearms belonged to friends or relatives and that he did not exercise control over the firearms because the owners had not given him permission to do so. The District Court found Caekaert to have violated the terms of his probation and revoked the probation. Citing St. v. Meader, 184 M 32, 601 P2d 386 (1979), the Supreme Court found that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in revoking the probation because there was sufficient evidence that Caekaert was in possession of the weapons because he exercised constructive possession over the weapons. St. v. Caekaert, 1999 MT 147, 295 M 42, 983 P2d 332, 56 St. Rep. 583 (1999).

Finding of Violation of Suspended Sentence Predicate to Continuation of Sentence With Modifications or Additional Conditions: As part of the sentencing order, the original sentencing court provided that Nelson not be considered for parole until successfully completing the sexual offender program at Montana State Prison. Nelson was never paroled from the prison. Instead, he was discharged from the prison and began the suspended portion of his sentence in Big Horn County. The Big Horn County Attorney filed for revocation of Nelson's suspended sentence, alleging that Nelson violated and disregarded the rules of probation by failing to successfully complete a sexual offender program. The court denied the petition for revocation but imposed additional conditions to the original suspended sentence. When Nelson violated one of the new conditions, his suspended sentence was revoked. The clear language of this section requires that the trial court find that the defendant violated the terms and conditions of the suspended sentence as a predicate to exercising its authority to continue the suspended sentence with modified or additional terms and conditions. A District Court has no power to impose a sentence in the absence of specific statutory authority. Having failed to make the statutorily required predicate finding that Nelson violated the terms of the suspended sentence, the court was without authority to continue the suspended sentence with modified or additional terms and conditions and thus without authority to revoke Nelson's suspended sentence for violation of the added condition. St. v. Nelson, 1998 MT 227, 291 M 15, 966 P2d 133, 55 St. Rep. 949 (1998), followed, with regard to the Supreme Court's plenary review of a question of law concerning whether a District Court had authority to take a specific action, in St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Modification of Original Sentence as Dangerous Offender Not Allowed: At the time of Moorman's original sentencing in 1982, 46-18-404 (now repealed) did not allow a District Court in a revocation proceeding to add new terms or conditions to a defendant's original sentence. The court could not impose a dangerous offender designation upon revocation of a suspended sentence when the original sentence was silent on the issue or designated the defendant as nondangerous. However, Moorman was designated a dangerous offender when originally sentenced. Under the version of this section in effect at the time of sentencing, the court could revoke the suspension or impose sentence and order Moorman committed but could not modify the sentence. Therefore, Moorman's original dangerous offender designation remained a part of his sentence upon the subsequent revocation of his suspended sentence. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

Privilege Against Self-Incrimination as Self-Executing Under Threat of Penalty: Citing numerous federal cases, the Supreme Court held that a person claiming protection against self-incrimination generally must affirmatively invoke it, even when the government is unquestionably attempting to compel an answer. If a witness under compulsion to answer makes disclosures instead of claiming the privilege, the witness cannot be said to have been compelled to self-incriminate. A defendant's ignorance of the right against self-incrimination generally does not excuse the failure to claim the privilege, and if the defendant fails to assert the privilege, it is considered waived. However, failure to invoke the privilege does not preclude the benefit if the defendant is placed in a situation in which the defendant is not free to admit, deny, or refuse to answer. In that case, the privilege is said to be self-executing. One such case is when the government prevents a voluntary invocation of the privilege by threatening to penalize the individual if the privilege is invoked. A command to speak, under threat of loss of liberty, implicitly forecloses the option of remaining silent. In the present case, Fuller was convicted of rape and sexual assault and was required to enter sexual offender treatment. As part of the treatment, he was required to disclose his offense history and was told that failure to do so would result in revocation of probation and subsequent imprisonment. Fuller complied, admitting prior offenses, which were reported and for which he was then charged and arrested. Fuller was essentially ordered to incriminate himself to avoid punishment, and despite the holding in St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), that a sentencing court lacks authority to revoke probation solely on grounds that a defendant refuses to admit guilt, the threat of punishment was credible and Fuller's reliance on the belief that the court could carry out the threat was reasonable. Because the state improperly compelled Fuller to disclose past criminal acts in violation of his right against compelled self-incrimination and his right to remain silent, the state was prohibited from using any of the elicited information as the basis for a later, separate criminal prosecution. St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809, 53 St. Rep. 325 (1996), discussed in St. v. Woods, 283 M 359, 942 P2d 88, 54 St. Rep. 617 (1997), and followed in St. v. Woods, 2005 MT 186, 328 M 54, 117 P3d 152 (2005). See also Minn. v. Murphy, 465 US 420, 79 L Ed 2d 409, 104 S Ct 1136 (1984), and In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427, 57 St. Rep. 155 (2000).

Increase in Restitution Based on Revised Sentencing Provisions Barred as Ex Post Facto: At a sentence revocation hearing, the District Court considered Leistiko's motion to reduce his monthly restitution payments based on his financial situation. The court reduced payments for 3 months but increased the total restitution by $10,000. Leistiko relied on the 1983 version of this section that was in effect at the time of the crime and the initial sentencing, contending that the court did not have authority to apply the 1991 revised version of this section to increase restitution. Under Weaver v. Graham, 450 US 24, 67 L Ed 2d 17, 101 S Ct 960 (1981), an increase in the severity of a criminal punishment compared with that authorized at the time the act was committed is a criminal conduct measure coming within the ban on ex post facto laws. The Supreme Court applied the test set out in Miller v. Fla., 482 US 423, 96 L Ed 2d 351, 107 S Ct 2446 (1987), in determining whether the constitutional ban on ex post facto laws was violated: (1) the law must be retrospective; and (2) it must disadvantage the offender affected by it. The revised version of this section changed the legal consequences of Leistiko's crime by allowing the District Court to change the sentence, placing a more onerous burden on Leistiko than he could have foreseen at the time he committed the crime and entered into the original plea agreement. The portion of the order imposing additional restitution was vacated under Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const. St. v. Leistiko, 255 M 458, 844 P2d 97, 49 St. Rep. 1104 (1992), followed in In re Young, 1999 MT 195, 295 M 394, 983 P2d 985, 56 St. Rep. 759 (1999), St. v. Shockley, 2001 MT 180, 306 M 196, 31 P3d 350 (2001), and St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002).

Abuse of Discretion in Probation Revocation for Failure to Complete Sexual Offender Program — Standard of Review: Applying the standard set out in St. v. Robinson, 190 M 145, 619 P2d 813 (1980), that revocation of probation is appropriate if the judge is reasonably satisfied that the conduct of probationer was not what he agreed it would be if liberty was granted, the District Court revoked the probation of defendant who failed to complete a sexual offender program even though defendant had a 100% record in attending 76 group therapy and 13 individual therapy sessions, each session requiring a 150-mile round trip, and had paid $2,450 in counseling fees but still owed $1,260. The standard of review applied by the Supreme Court is whether the District Court abused its discretion. An abuse occurred in this case because revocation was based on defendant's failure to pay the full fees and his expression of religious beliefs at the therapy sessions, rather than a willingness to participate in the written portions of the program. The District Court could have required defendant to establish a payment plan or enter another program, but the terms of probation did not require him to give up his religious beliefs or take food from the family table to pay for counseling. St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204, 49 St. Rep. 65 (1992), distinguished in St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997). The standard of review was also applied in St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Refusal to Admit Guilt Following Conviction — Augmentation of Sentence Prohibited: Defendant's sentence for sexual assault was suspended on the condition that he complete a sex offender treatment course. Despite attempts to seek enrollment in two separate courses, he was not accepted for treatment because he consistently denied committing a sexual offense. Upon evidence of his failure to complete a course, his suspended sentence was revoked and he was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison. The Supreme Court, following the decision in Thomas v. U.S., 368 F2d 941 (5th Cir. 1966), found that even though defendant had already been convicted of the crime he now denies, the criminal justice system still provides opportunities to challenge that conviction. These legally guaranteed rights would be rendered meaningless if defendant could be compelled to admit guilt as a condition to his continued freedom. While defendant would be foreclosed from invoking the protection of such procedures to establish his innocence, the reliability of an admission of guilt would be highly suspect. Additionally, because defendant testified in his own defense at trial and denied committing a sexual crime, by admitting his guilt, he would have abandoned his right against self-incrimination, not only as to the crime for which he was charged but also as to the crime of perjury. Therefore, absent any grant of immunity, when a defendant has consistently denied guilt, his right against self-incrimination should be protected and augmenting a defendant's sentence because he refuses to confess to a crime or invokes his privilege against self-incrimination is prohibited. St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), overruling any holding to the contrary in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), and distinguished in St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995), and St. v. Osborne, 2007 MT 217, 339 M 45, 167 P3d 405 (2007).

"Fundamental Fairness" Standard: At a probation revocation hearing, the standard required is "fundamental fairness". The hearing is not a criminal trial. The defendant has already been convicted of a crime, and the hearing is for the purpose of establishing violations of the prisoner's probation. The process must be flexible enough to allow the court to consider documentary evidence that may not meet usual evidentiary requirements. Therefore, the admission into evidence of police officers' hearsay statements was not error, and defendant's constitutional right to due process was not violated. St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Probation Revocation — Due Process Requirements: In a probation revocation hearing, the due process requirements are: (1) written notice of the violations; (2) disclosure of evidence against the probationer; (3) opportunity to be heard in person and to present witnesses and evidence; (4) a neutral tribunal; (5) a written statement by the fact finder of the evidence relied on and the reasons for the revocation; (6) the right to cross-examine witnesses unless the hearing body finds good cause for disallowing confrontation; and (7) the right to counsel in some circumstances. The record in this case establishes that all of these requirements were met and that defendant's constitutional rights were upheld. St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Closure of Probation Revocation Hearing — Interruption a Contempt — Prior Notice of Closure Not Required: The public and the press have the right, with limited exceptions, to attend and observe probation revocation hearings. In a proper case, a District Court may close such a hearing. When a hearing is properly closed, no member of the public or representative of the press may interrupt the due course of the hearing in a manner that might defeat the reason for closure. Such an interruption constitutes a contempt of court. A District Court may proceed on an ad hoc basis, without giving prior notice, to make a closure decision in accordance with the facts and circumstances facing it at the time. State ex rel. Great Falls Tribune Co., Inc. v. District Court, 238 M 310, 777 P2d 345, 46 St. Rep. 1292 (1989).

No Preliminary or Probable Cause Hearing — Due Process: Defendant was not denied due process for the state's failure to provide an appearance denominated as a preliminary or probable cause hearing prior to a probation revocation hearing. After a defendant is arrested for violation of probation, he is brought before the court without unnecessary delay for a hearing on the violations charged. No two-stage hearing process is necessary under this statutory system because the reasons for having a preliminary hearing are absent. The revocation hearing is held promptly, before a defendant is returned to prison. The defendant receives notice of the hearing and alleged violations, and the hearing is held before a judge, rather than an administrative body. Section 46-23-1013 (now repealed) sets forth the procedure to follow after the arrest of a probationer for violation of probation. Because the scheme affords due process, the statute is not an unconstitutional violation of due process. St. v. Swan, 220 M 162, 713 P2d 1003, 43 St. Rep. 259 (1986). See also St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Credibility of Probationer — Weak Alibi Testimony: Defendant's assertion that admission in probation revocation hearing of inadmissible probation violations had a detrimental impact on his credibility was pure fantasy. The record on appeal disclosed that if anything affected his credibility, it was his own testimony and that of his alibi witnesses that he was not present at the time and place of the alleged assault on his mother-in-law (one of the bases for petition for probation revocation) in the face of her positive identification of him as her assailant. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Evidence of Offenses Not Charged — Harmless Error: Admission in evidence, in probation revocation hearing, of alleged probation violations not contained in the petition to revoke was error but did not affect defendant's substantial rights and must be disregarded where two of the alleged violations were not made a basis of revocation of probation and, although the third was, the State introduced no evidence on the matter and all evidence on it was introduced by defendant. Defendant could not predicate reversible error on testimony he himself introduced. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Offenses Not Charged — Elimination From Consideration: The District Court, sitting without a jury in probation revocation hearing, is presumed to be able to properly evaluate evidence and determine the credibility of witnesses without regard to incompetent evidence, and that ability was demonstrated where the judge eliminated from consideration all alleged probation violations not charged by petition and affidavit for revocation and therefore erroneously admitted at hearing. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Scope of Court's Authority: The sentencing alternatives provided in the predecessor to this section were mutually exclusive, and a District Court lacked authority, upon revocation of a suspended sentence, to require the defendant to serve 60 days in the county jail followed by 34 months on a suspended sentence. St. v. Downing, 181 M 242, 593 P2d 43 (1979), overruled in St. v. Docken, 274 M 296, 908 P2d 213, 52 St. Rep. 1240 (1995).

Revocation — Correct Information: Rigorous standards are important when the trial court is passing upon the State's motion to revoke a deferred or suspended sentence. The trial judge must have, and the record must reflect that he has, substantially correct information concerning the defendant before he can affect a defendant's substantial rights by entering an order of revocation. St. v. Knapp, 174 M 373, 570 P2d 1138 (1977).

Preliminary Hearing Not Required to Establish Probable Cause: Where probation was revoked by original sentencing judge, petitioner was not denied minimum standards of due process as petitioner was not arrested until a bench warrant was issued pursuant to the final order of revocation after a hearing at which petitioner was represented at every step by counsel. Where no detention is involved, a preliminary hearing to establish probable cause for filing a petition for imposition of final judgment and sentence is not necessary as no rights of the probationer have been violated. In re Meidinger, 168 M 7, 539 P2d 1185 (1975).

Subsequent Arrest for Violation: When petitioner was placed on probation for 1 year on conditions aimed at rehabilitating him, subsequent imposition of judgment after he violated his probation did not put him in jeopardy in violation of the federal or Montana Constitution. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

REVOCATION OF DEFERRAL

Possession of Adult Magazine in Violation of Probation — Deferred Sentence Properly Revoked: A condition of Belanger's deferred sentence prohibited Belanger from using, viewing, or possessing erotica, X-rated videos, or adult books or magazines. At a revocation hearing, Belanger's landlord testified about finding an adult sex magazine in Belanger's room, which Belanger's probation officer described as an adult book or magazine. Belanger did not challenge that opinion but argued on appeal that the District Court could not have determined whether the magazine qualified as pornography or erotica without actually seeing the magazine, which was not introduced into evidence. The Supreme Court dismissed Belanger's argument as irrelevant. The District Court determined that the magazine qualified as an adult magazine, and the evidence was sufficient to support that determination. Revocation of Belanger's probation was affirmed. St. v. Belanger, 2008 MT 383, 347 M 61, 196 P3d 1248 (2008).

Due Process Requirements of Written Statement for Revoking Deferred Sentence — Record of Factfinding and Basis of Review Adequate: The District Court revoked Baird's deferred sentence, but Baird asserted that his due process rights were violated because the court failed to advise him of the reasons for the revocation in a written statement as required in 46-18-102 and Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 US 778 (1973). The Supreme Court found Baird's reliance of 46-18-102 and Gagnon to be misplaced. Rather, the sentencing court's memorandum combined with the hearing transcript may provide the necessary written statement explaining the evidence relied on and the reason for the revocation decision. Due process is achieved when the oral and written record support accurate factfinding and appellate review. In Baird's case, when read as a whole, the oral and written records provided an adequate basis for review and were adequate to determine that the District Court's decision to revoke the sentence was based on permissible grounds supported by the evidence. Thus, Gagnon and its progeny were adequately addressed, and Baird's sentence revocation was affirmed. St. v. Baird, 2006 MT 266, 334 M 185, 145 P3d 995 (2006). See also Black v. Romano, 471 US 606 (1985), and St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786 (2000).

Sufficient Evidence of Violation of Deferred Sentence Conditions to Warrant Revocation — No Minor Violation of Probation Agreements: As a condition of Baird's sentence for felony stalking, Baird was to obey all laws, not use alcohol or drugs, and have no contact with his ex-wife other than while exchanging their child at the County Sheriff's office. The state subsequently petitioned to revoke Baird's deferred sentence because of alleged probation violations. The District Court considered the evidence and revoked the sentence, and Baird appealed. Baird asserted that any violations were minor and that there was insufficient information to warrant revocation. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that under St. v. Aune, 2003 MT 3, 314 M 1, 61 P3d 785 (2003), there are no minor violations of probation agreements and that even one violation may be sufficient for revocation. In this case, Baird admitted to using marijuana, and he loitered around the Sheriff's office after the visitation exchanges in order to have contact with his ex-wife and declare his love. These probation violations were sufficient for the District Court to determine that Baird violated probation, and revocation of the deferred sentence was affirmed. St. v. Baird, 2006 MT 266, 334 M 185, 145 P3d 995 (2006).

Proof of Inability to Pay Restitution — Deferment of Sentence Extended to Allow Payment — Error: A probationer sufficiently proved that her failure to continue restitution payments was not caused by lack of a good faith effort to pay and that her income was insufficient to make even the $10 monthly payment that her probation officer was apparently willing to accept. The state's argument that she might soon receive a workers' compensation lump-sum settlement that she could use to pay the remaining restitution and would receive a "windfall" if her deferred sentence and probation were not extended for 2 years for failure to pay so that she could make further payments had no merit. Disability benefits are not a windfall; they are partial compensation for the loss of earning capacity. In addition, the duty to pay restitution remains until it is fully paid, and restitution may be collected in a civil proceeding at any time, including after the conclusion of state supervision under a sentence. Therefore, the District Court abused its discretion when it did not excuse the probationer's failure to pay, and the order extending the deferred sentence and probation for 2 years was reversed. St. v. Welling, 2002 MT 308, 313 M 67, 59 P3d 1146 (2002).

Stipulation That Witness's Testimony Unnecessary — Due Process Not Violated: When defendant stipulated that the presence and testimony of an out-of-state chemist was not necessary and that a report submitted regarding tests made on defendant could be received in evidence without foundation, defendant could not later complain that his right to confront and cross-examine the chemist at the revocation hearing was denied. St. v. Lange, 237 M 486, 775 P2d 213, 46 St. Rep. 991 (1989).

Failure to Appear for Probation Officer-Ordered Urine Sample — Minimal Grounds Required to Order Testing: It was error for the District Court to dismiss a petition for revocation of suspended sentence based on the defendant's failure to appear for purposes of providing a urine sample because the probation officer did not have some articulable reasons for requesting the test. Under the standard established in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), the Supreme Court held that a probation officer's opinion that rehabilitation could not begin until the defendant was free of drugs and the fact that the defendant had not passed a drug test since his arrest constituted sufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds for requiring a urine sample. St. v. Sigler, 236 M 137, 769 P2d 703, 46 St. Rep. 244 (1989).

State Immune From Suit for Illegal Imprisonment When Imprisonment Later Declared Contrary to Statute: In 1979, petitioner was convicted of issuing a bad check. Her sentence was deferred, and she was placed on probation for 3 years. In 1982, petitioner's deferral was revoked because she was convicted of another crime. As a result of the revocation, she was sentenced to serve 5 years in prison. Later in 1982, the Supreme Court, relying on its interpretation of 53-30-105 (as it read prior to its amendment in 1981) (now repealed) in Crist v. Segna, 191 M 210, 622 P2d 1028, 38 St. Rep. 150 (1981), ordered petitioner's release because at the time of her imprisonment she had accumulated sufficient good time credit on probation that her deferred sentence would have been fully served. Petitioner then sued for damages for illegal imprisonment. The Supreme Court held that the State was immune from suit under 2-9-112 because the sentence imposed on petitioner for her violation of probation was a judicial act. Knutson v. St., 211 M 126, 683 P2d 488, 41 St. Rep. 1258 (1984).

Petition to Revoke — Notice of Violations: One is entitled to prior notice of alleged violations that form the basis of a petition to revoke probation and deferred imposition of sentence. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981), followed in St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 181 (1987).

Revocation of Sentence Deferred or Suspended Longer Than Allowed by Statute — Pre-1983 Law:

Petitioner was convicted of felony theft. On May 22, 1978, he was given a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence on the condition that restitution be made. On August 20, 1979, this deferred sentence was continued and petitioner was ordered to complete restitution by November 5, 1980. This was not done, and a petition to revoke the deferred sentence was filed on January 16, 1981. A hearing on the petition was held May 27, 1981, 3 years and 5 days after the initial deferral. The court revoked the deferred sentence and sentenced petitioner to 3 ½ years in prison, over petitioner's objections that the District Court was without jurisdiction to do so. The District Court contended it retained jurisdiction when the petition to revoke is filed within the deferral time. On a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court held that this section [as it read prior to the 1983 amendment] grants jurisdiction to revoke suspended sentences or impose sentences following deferral only during the period of the suspended or deferred sentences. This jurisdiction extends only through the running of the suspended or deferred sentence, regardless of whether a petition for revocation has been filed prior to the termination of the suspended or deferred sentence. Felix v. Mohler, 195 M 391, 636 P2d 830, 38 St. Rep. 1881 (1981).

On October 24, 1977, the petitioner received a deferred imposition of sentence and was placed on probation for 1 year. On August 14, 1978, the deferred imposition of sentence was extended for an additional 2 years. On April 4, 1979, the deferred imposition of sentence was again extended for 2 years. On February 2, 1981, petitioner was found guilty of a misdemeanor in Justice's

Court. Based on that conviction, the court revoked its order staying deferment of sentence and sentenced petitioner to 5 years in the state prison for the original crime. In granting his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court said that 46-18-201 gives the District Judge the authority to defer imposition of sentence for a period not to exceed 3 years. The District Court [under this section as it read prior to the 1983 amendment] can revoke a deferred imposition of sentence only during the 3-year period immediately following the initial sentence deferral. Gonzales v. Blodgett, 193 M 504, 632 P2d 1084, 38 St. Rep. 1159 (1981).

Authority to Revoke: The court has the authority to revoke a deferred sentence and impose a penal sentence upon a showing of sufficient evidence proving a violation of conditions. St. v. Emmett, 171 M 194, 557 P2d 289 (1976).

Constitutionality — Hearing: When a hearing on the revocation of a deferred sentence was conducted prior to the trial on the charges constituting the grounds for revocation, there was no denial of due process by being compelled to elect between exercising the right to remain silent or waiving the right against self-incrimination. St. v. Ryan, 166 M 419, 533 P2d 1076 (1975).

Ground Not Formal Condition: The trial court could revoke the deferred imposition of sentence after the defendant refused to testify against another defendant, even though his cooperation with the State was not made a formal condition of the judgment deferring sentence. St. v. Lintz, 162 M 1080, 509 P2d 13 (1973).

Credit for Time Served:

When the defendant had been confined under the county jail work release program as a condition of the continuation of a deferred sentence, he was entitled to credit for time in such jail upon revocation of deferment and imposition of sentence. Maldonado v. Crist, 162 M 240, 510 P2d 887 (1973).

Prison time previously served as a condition of deferment of sentence must be credited against the prison term imposed upon revocation of the petitioner's deferred imposition of sentence. State ex rel. Bovee v. District Court, 162 M 98, 508 P2d 1056 (1973).

REVOCATION OF SUSPENSION

Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence Before Suspended Sentence Served: A District Court has the statutory authority to revoke a suspended sentence before a defendant actually begins serving the suspended sentence. St. v. LeDeau, 2009 MT 276, 352 M 140, 215 P3d 672 (2009). See also St. v. Morrison, 2008 MT 16, 341 M 147, 176 P3d 1027 (2008).

Double Jeopardy Not Applicable to Revocation of Parole or Suspended Sentence: LeDeau was released on parole a few months before the unsuspended portion of a sentence for sexual assault was served. Shortly thereafter LeDeau admitted violating the terms of parole, so parole and the suspended sentence were revoked. LeDeau appealed on grounds of double jeopardy, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Parole is a privilege, not a right, and revocation of parole does not constitute punishment for purposes of double jeopardy. When a suspended sentence is imposed, the sentencing court may revoke the suspended sentence upon a showing that any sentencing condition has been violated. A revocation proceeding is not a criminal adjudication, does not require proof of a criminal offense, does not impose punishment for any new offense, and is an act in the performance of the duty of supervision of the offender. Thus, double jeopardy is not applicable to revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. LeDeau, 2009 MT 276, 352 M 140, 215 P3d 672 (2009).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence Based on Failure to Pay Restitution — Additional Sentence Unauthorized: Striplin was convicted of deceptive credit card practices and was given a suspended sentence conditioned upon payment of restitution and maintaining employment. About 3 years after sentencing, Striplin was charged with violating the terms of the suspended sentence because no restitution payments had been made to the Department of Corrections as ordered and because Striplin did not ever contact the credit card companies to see if the debts had been paid or seek and maintain employment. The District Court revoked Striplin's sentence, and because Striplin did not have the means to pay restitution, the court did not reimpose restitution but instead sentenced Striplin to 30 days in the county jail. Striplin appealed. The Supreme Court agreed that Striplin's sentence should be revoked because of the violations of the sentencing terms. However, the court reversed the 30-day jail sentence on grounds that the sentence was an additional, more burdensome condition that the District Court was without authority to impose pursuant to the version of 46-18-203(7)(a)(ii) that was in effect at the time of sentencing. St. v. Striplin, 2009 MT 76, 349 M 466, 204 P3d 687 (2009), following St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Incarceration of Mentally Ill Defendant — No Plain Error Review for Alleged Due Process Violation: Following Rovin's parole violations, the District Court revoked Rovin's suspended sentence and imposed a sentence in the state prison, despite the fact that Rovin suffered from mental illness. Rovin argued for the first time on appeal that incarceration would fail to achieve rehabilitation and thus violated due process, that the Supreme Court should invoke plain error review to address the constitutional violation, and that failure to do so would be a manifest miscarriage of justice. The Supreme Court declined. Rovin failed to demonstrate that the due process claim met the elements for plain error review. The District Court considered sentencing alternatives but rejected community-based treatment over concerns for the safety of Rovin and the public. Rovin was represented at every stage of the proceedings, knowingly and voluntarily admitted the parole violations, and waived the right to appeal by failing to object at trial. Further, a mere assertion that failure to review a claimed error might result in a manifest miscarriage of justice is not sufficient to implicate plain error review. St. v. Rovin, 2009 MT 16, 349 M 57, 201 P3d 780 (2009), following St. v. Mackrill, 2008 MT 297, 345 M 469, 191 P3d 451 (2008).

Improper Reimposition of Illegal Conditions Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Remand to Strike Illegal Conditions: White pleaded guilty to felony theft in February 1994, but imposition of sentence was deferred for 3 years, subject to a number of conditions, one of which prohibited White from possessing and consuming alcohol and patronizing businesses where alcohol was the chief item of sale. In August 1994, White's deferred sentence was revoked for alcohol consumption. The sentencing court imposed a 10-year sentence with all but 30 days suspended, subject to the same conditions imposed with the deferred sentence, plus a fine and additional conditions. In May 1997, White's suspended sentence was revoked for alcohol consumption. White was sentenced to 10 years, all suspended, subject to the same conditions previously imposed, plus White was required to attend Alcoholics Anonymous meetings and to participate in counseling. In October 2006, and again in February 2007, the state filed petitions to revoke White's suspended sentence for alcohol consumption. White moved to dismiss the petitions on grounds that the sentencing court in 1997 had added conditions to the sentence that had the legal effect of continuing the sentence imposed in 1994 that had actually expired in 2004, so the court lacked jurisdiction to consider and rule on the 2006 and 2007 petitions. The court denied the motion to dismiss and sentenced White to 10 years in prison with 5 years suspended, with credit for 5 years served, leaving a balance of 5 years suspended, subject to all conditions previously imposed. White appealed. The Supreme Court noted that under this section, when a court revokes a suspended sentence the court may require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence. Thus, the court was not authorized in 1997 to add new conditions to the newly imposed suspended sentence, nor was the court authorized to reimpose those illegal conditions upon revocation of the sentence in 2007. Therefore, the Supreme Court reversed with instructions to strike all conditions on White's current sentence that were not contained in judgments rendered prior to the 1997 judgment. St. v. White, 2008 MT 464, 348 M 196, 199 P3d 274 (2008).

Delay in Bringing Defendant Before District Court on Petition to Revoke Suspended Sentence Implicated Due Process Rights: Defendant made a threshold showing that plain error review of his claim was appropriate for a delay of 26 months in bringing him before the court on a petition to revoke a suspended sentence. However, delay was only one of several factors for the court to consider in the totality of circumstances approach to unreasonableness of delay, and thus the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing. St. v. West, 2008 MT 338, 346 M 244, 194 P3d 683, (2008).

Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Admissions to Allegations in Revocation Petition: Defendant's admissions to a petition to revoke were held to be involuntary in the county that declined to follow a global plea bargain negotiated in another county where defendant had earlier entered a plea of guilty to a new felony because the Supreme Court held he had done so on the basis of an unenforceable and eventually unfilled promise. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 331, 346 M 173, 194 P3d 86 (2008).

Correct Finding of No Mental Illness During Revocation Proceeding: During Price's sentence revocation proceedings, the District Court found that Price did not suffer from a mental illness. Noting that under St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006), the revoking court may consider evidence of a mental disease or defect, the Supreme Court considered the District Court's conclusion and affirmed based on the record that there was no evidence that Price suffered from a mental illness. Several experts testified that Price was personality-disordered but did not suffer from a psychosis, and Price's own actions showed that he wanted to intimidate people and have them believe he was violent. St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

District Court Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence for Parole Violation for Which Defendant Not Sanctioned or Punished: Martinez was given a 7-year suspended sentence for felony criminal endangerment, subject to 25 conditions, including a requirement that Martinez notify the probation officer upon a change of residence. Following numerous probation violations, three separate intervention hearings were held to address the violations. One of the probation officers subsequently recommended that Martinez be brought before the District Court for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court heard testimony from two probation officers regarding the repeated violations and revoked Martinez's suspended sentence. Martinez appealed on grounds that the probation officer lacked the statutory authority to seek sentence revocation for conduct addressed by the revocation hearings and contended that the revocation violated double jeopardy because it amounted to double punishment for violations addressed by the revocation hearings. The Supreme Court agreed that once a probation officer elects to pursue an intervention hearing under 46-23-1012(3), the officer cannot then also pursue a revocation hearing before the District Court for the same violation. However, Martinez's violation of the requirement to notify the probation officer upon a change of residence occurred after the third intervention hearing, and Martinez was not sanctioned or punished for that violation. That violation in itself was sufficient to support revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence, and even if the District Court considered the history of Martinez's violations in reaching its decision, the court did not abuse its discretion or exceed its statutory authority in revoking the sentence based on that violation alone. Additionally, no double jeopardy violation occurred when the sentence was revoked based on a violation for which Martinez was not previously sanctioned or punished. Thus, revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 M 394, 188 P3d 1034 (2008).

Violation of Single Condition of Probation Sufficient to Warrant Revocation of Suspended Sentence: As conditions of Gillingham's suspended sentence for four counts of sexual assault and one count of assault of a minor, Gillingham was required not to have unsupervised contact with children under the age of 16 or to use any other name. The state sought to revoke Gillingham's suspended sentence based on three violations, including unsupervised contact with children when teaching Sunday school, contact with children when teaching woodworking at a fair, and seeking to establish a different identity under the assumed name of a deceased person. The District Court found sufficient evidence to prove that Gillingham violated all three conditions and revoked his suspended sentence. On appeal, Gillingham argued that the state did not present sufficient evidence of two of the violations and that revocation of his sentence was therefore error. The Supreme Court disagreed. A single violation of the conditions of a suspended sentence is sufficient to support revocation, and evidence that Gillingham taught a church school class to young children in a room separate from other classes was sufficient to warrant revocation. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gillingham, 2008 MT 38, 341 M 325, 176 P3d 1075 (2008).

Credit Properly Given for Time Served While Incarcerated Prior to Revocation: In 2001, Damon was sentenced on a felony conviction to the Department of Corrections (DOC) for 10 years with 5 years suspended with conditions and on a misdemeanor conviction to the county detention center for 6 months, with the sentences to run concurrently. Damon began serving the suspended portion of the sentence on June 8, 2005, and several weeks later, he was arrested and charged under a separate cause number with several offenses. Damon pleaded guilty to one count of felony obstruction of justice and received a 10-year suspended sentence with credit for the time served in the detention center following the arrest. In November 2005, Damon was arrested for violating probation conditions in the original case, and the state petitioned to revoke the 5-year suspended sentence in the original case. The District Court revoked the 5-year suspended sentence based on the probation violations and sentenced Damon to 5 years with the DOC with credit for 98 days served in the detention center following arrest for the probation violations, but the court refused to credit Damon for street time served during the probation period following June 8, 2005, or for the time served following the second arrest. Damon challenged the time credited, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had the District Court credited the 5-year revoked sentence with the time following the second arrest, Damon would have received double credit for those days. Nothing in subsection (7)(b) of this section entitles a defendant to additional credit against a revoked sentence for time served relating solely to a separate offense for which the defendant received a consecutive sentence credited with the same period of time served. Thus, the District Court did not err in crediting Damon's sentence with only a portion of the time served while incarcerated prior to the sentence revocation. St. v. Damon, 2007 MT 276, 339 M 413, 170 P3d 490 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Sufficient Statement of Reasons for Granting or Denying Credit for Time Served Prior to Revocation of Sentence: Damon contended that the sentencing court erred by failing to sufficiently state in its written disposition order its reasons for granting or denying credit against Damon's sentence for time that elapsed prior to revocation of Damon's sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The disposition order stated that Damon was to receive credit for time incarcerated as a result of an arrest for probation violations, but the court treated the remaining elapsed time, including time that Damon was incarcerated on separate charges unrelated to the suspended sentence, as street time and denied credit against the revoked sentence for the street time because of the early probation violation. The statement was a sufficient explanation of the reasons for allowing and rejecting credit against Damon's sentence for time elapsed prior to the revocation, and the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Damon, 2007 MT 276, 339 M 413, 170 P3d 490 (2007).

Res Judicata Not Bar to Correction of Manifest Error in Prior Decision — Illegal Sentence Reversed: In 1998, when Southwick committed two felonies, 46-18-201 limited commitment to the Department of Corrections (DOC) to 5 years. In 1999, the Legislature amended the statute to allow a longer DOC commitment up to the maximum time that a defendant could be sentenced for a particular offense, provided that all but the first 5 years of commitment are suspended. When Southwick's parole was subsequently revoked in 2003, the District Court revoked the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments to the DOC, even though Southwick had discharged his unsuspended commitments to the DOC, and ordered Southwick to be recommitted to the DOC for an additional 5 years in each case. Southwick petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the petition was denied on grounds of res judicata. Southwick also moved the District Court for resentencing on grounds that the sentence was illegal, but the motion was denied, and Southwick appealed. The Supreme Court noted that res judicata generally precludes reviewing an issue already decided and that relitigation of issues in criminal cases is barred if: (1) the same ground presented in the subsequent application was determined adversely to the applicant on the prior application; (2) the prior determination was on the merits; and (3) the ends of justice would not be served by reaching the merits of the subsequent application. The court also noted that when a criminal defendant is potentially subject to a facially illegal sentence, the ends of justice suggest that res judicata should not bar rehearing the issues even if the first two criteria are met. In this case, the District Court applied a statute that was not in effect at the time that Southwick committed the crimes, which violated the prohibition on ex post facto laws. Because the District Court did not have authority to impose the sentence, the sentence was illegal and facially invalid. The 5-year DOC commitment for each offense was valid, but not the suspended portions following Southwick's commitment. Southwick had discharged the maximum time that he could have been committed to DOC before the petition to revoke was filed, and the District Court had no authority to revoke a suspended commitment that was illegally imposed. Therefore, the Supreme Court vacated the order revoking the suspended portion of Southwick's commitments. St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Right Against Self-Incrimination Not Violated When Admitting Guilt Not Requirement of Sexual Offender Course: Osborne's suspended sentence was revoked for failure to complete a sexual offender course following imprisonment for sexual intercourse without consent. Citing St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), Osborne asserted that the course violated his right against self-incrimination because the course required him to admit guilt of sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court distinguished Imlay and disagreed. Imlay's sexual offender course required Imlay to admit guilt, while Osborne's course was specifically tailored for offenders who did not admit guilt. In addition, Imlay followed all the other conditions of parole, but Osborne did not. Thus, Osborne's right against self-incrimination was not violated, and revocation of Osborne's suspended sentence for failure to complete the sexual offender course was affirmed. St. v. Osborne, 2007 MT 217, 339 M 45, 167 P3d 405 (2007).

Illegal Sentence Challenged During Revocation Proceeding — Court Limited to Lawful Elements of Original Sentence: Seals was convicted of three felony and two misdemeanor drug possessions and was committed to the Department of Corrections for 15 years, with 10 years suspended, to run concurrently. At the time of his arrest, the law in effect limited Seals' imprisonment to 5 years for each count. Upon recognition that the 15-year sentences were outside the parameters of the sentencing statute, the District Court amended Seals' sentence for one count to impose a legal sentence of 5 years, but again imposed sentences of 10 years each, all suspended, to run concurrently with each other and consecutive to the first count. After Seals served the 5 years for count one and was discharged to his suspended sentences, the state moved for revocation for probation violations and recommended that the court revoke Seals' suspended sentences and commit him to prison for 10 years, 5 suspended, for each count. Seals objected, arguing that the commitment and the consecutive nature of the sentences constituted an illegal increase of his original commitment to the Department of Corrections and was beyond the court's statutory sentencing authority. The state argued that 46-18-401 gave the court discretion to run the sentences imposed upon revocation consecutively or concurrently. In response, the District Court revised the sentences from 10 years to 5 years but retained the consecutive nature of the sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that this section and not 46-18-401 governed sentencing upon revocation. Under this section, the District Court could have required that Seals serve either the originally imposed sentence or a lesser sentence. However, because the originally imposed sentence was illegal, the court ruled that ordering Seals to serve sentences consecutively rather than concurrently resulted in sentences that did not qualify as lesser sentences. St. v. Seals, 2007 MT 71, 336 M 416, 156 P3d 15 (2007).

Suspension of Sentence Following Probation Violation Not Violative of Double Jeopardy — Credit for Time Served Properly Allowed: DeWitt was convicted of two counts of aggravated burglary, found to be a persistent felony offender, and sentenced to three consecutive 10-year sentences. DeWitt appealed, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to dismiss one count. While awaiting resentencing, DeWitt was incarcerated for 1,275 days. The District Court then resentenced DeWitt to one 10-year sentence for aggravated burglary and a consecutive 10-year sentence as a persistent felony offender, suspended all but 1,275 days of the 20-year sentence, and gave DeWitt credit for 1,275 days served. Without prison time to serve, DeWitt was immediately released on probation. DeWitt subsequently violated probation, the suspended sentence was revoked, and DeWitt was sentenced to 10 years with 5 years suspended, with credit for 160 days served while awaiting revocation proceedings. DeWitt appealed on grounds that the sentencing court failed to allow credit for the 1,275 days served when the suspended sentence was revoked and the new 10-year sentence was imposed and asserted that his double jeopardy rights were violated by reinstatement of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. When the sentencing court sentenced DeWitt following the probation violation, the court had a 16.5-year suspended sentence to work with, which was more than sufficient to account for the 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended that was imposed. Although a sentencing court must give credit for time served, revocation of a suspended sentence based on a probation violation and reinstatement of the original sentence does not constitute double jeopardy as long as the sentence is within the parameters of the sentence imposed in the initial suspended sentence and credit is allowed for time served. Further, a persistent felony offender designation is not a separate crime carrying a separate sentence, but rather is a statutorily required sentence enhancement that is part of the initial sentence, so the sentencing court could not have "dropped" the persistent felony offender count and sentenced DeWitt only under the aggravated burglary count, thereby limiting the available time on resentencing to 6.5 years. The sentence was not violative of double jeopardy, was within statutory parameters, and was affirmed. St. v. DeWitt, 2006 MT 302, 334 M 474, 149 P3d 549 (2006).

Rejection of Credit for Elapsed Time Served While on Probation: While serving a suspended sentence for a crime in Montana, Miller was convicted of a crime in Indiana and served a 2-year sentence there. Upon release on parole in Indiana, Miller returned to Montana and subsequently violated the terms of the Montana suspension. The suspension was revoked, and Miller was ordered to serve the remainder of the sentence at the state prison. Miller argued that he was entitled to credit for the time served in Indiana against the Montana commitment, but the District Court declined to allow credit for the Indiana time served, and Miller appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Montana law does not provide that a defendant is to receive credit on a suspended commitment in Montana for time spent in prison in another state on a separate conviction. The District Court did not order that the Montana and Indiana convictions be merged, so the Montana commitment continued to run while Miller was in prison in Indiana. It was only when Miller violated the terms of the suspended sentence after returning to Montana that the suspension was revoked, and upon revocation, the District Court had the discretion to allow or reject part or all of the time that had elapsed as a credit against the commitment. St. v. Miller, 2006 MT 159, 332 M 472, 139 P3d 839 (2006).

Consideration of Defendant's Mental State During Revocation Proceedings — Commitment to Department of Corrections Affirmed: After Burke admitted violating five probation conditions, the District Court considered several sentencing alternatives during revocation proceedings. In doing so, the court considered Burke's mental condition, allowing a confidential mental health evaluation. The psychologist determined that Burke suffered from several mental conditions requiring medication, but found no indication of organic impairment, mental retardation, or psychoses, and could not say with medical certainty that the mental condition caused Burke to violate parole. The psychologist opined that Burke understood his legal situation and had the capacity to plan a legal strategy with counsel and recommended placement at the state hospital. The District Court acknowledged Burke's mental condition, but found that the condition did not render Burke unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform his behavior to the requirements of the law, so Burke's suspended sentence was revoked, and Burke was committed to the Department of Corrections for the remainder of the original sentence. Burke appealed on grounds that he should instead have been sentenced to the Department of Public Health and Human Services, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court had wide latitude in sentencing Burke, and absent a showing that the District Court acted arbitrarily without the employment of conscientious judgment or exceeded the bounds of reason, resulting in substantial injustice, the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Burke, 2005 MT 250, 329 M 1, 122 P3d 427 (2005).

Lack of Participation in Sexual Offender Programs Warranting Revocation of Suspended Sentence: Van Haele contended that because he was not adequately advised by the District Court that one consequence of a guilty plea was that failure to complete a sexual offender program would be denial of probation status, he should be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and that the District Court erroneously denied his motion to withdraw the plea. Reviewing the case to determine whether the District Court's findings were erroneous, the Supreme Court disagreed with the factual predicate of Van Haele's argument. It was not Van Haele's failure to complete the prison sex offender program that resulted in Van Haele's denial of admission to an outpatient treatment program, but rather it was Van Haele's recantation of his admission of guilt and his various behavioral problems that placed insurmountable obstacles in the way of acceptance into an outpatient program, although Van Haele's refusal to participate in the prison program contributed to the problem. The District Court had adequate evidence at Van Haele's revocation hearing to determine that the lack of participation in sexual offender programs was adequate to warrant revocation of Van Haele's suspended sentence. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Refusal to Admit Guilt During Treatment for Sexual Offense to Which Defendant Pleaded Guilty — No Deprivation of Right Against Self-Incrimination: Van Haele was incarcerated for sex crimes to which he pleaded guilty, and part of the sentence required Van Haele to follow a treatment plan. However, Van Haele refused to participate in sex offender treatment on grounds that to do so would require him to admit guilt in violation of the constitutional right against self-incrimination. However, there was no question either of compelling Van Haele to disclose the commission of sexual offenses for which he was not charged or of using any compelled disclosures against him. Rather, Van Haele persisted in refusing to admit guilt during treatment for offenses to which he previously pleaded guilty, so he was not deprived of the right against self-incrimination. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979 (1991), and St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996).

No Authority to Add Additional Conditions When Suspended Sentence Revoked: Because Rudolph violated several conditions of a suspended sentence, the court revoked the sentence and added several new conditions. Pursuant to the 1997 version of this section in effect when the offense was committed, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in revoking the sentence; however, once the sentence was revoked, the court could require Rudolph to serve only the sentence imposed or a lesser sentence, but had no authority to add conditions to the newly imposed sentence. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Rudolph, 2005 MT 41, 326 M 132, 107 P3d 496 (2005).

Statutory Conditions for Probation Revocation: When the state files a petition showing probable cause that an offender has violated a condition of a suspended sentence, a District Court may issue an order for a hearing on revocation and an arrest warrant. At the offender's initial appearance, the court must advise the offender of the petition's allegations, the opportunity to appear and present evidence, the opportunity to question adverse witnesses, and the right to counsel. If after a hearing on the petition the court determines that the state has proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the offender violated a condition of the suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspension. St. v. Megard, 2004 MT 67, 320 M 323, 87 P3d 448 (2004).

Failure to Notify Defendant of State's Intent to Use Evidence of Alleged Violations at Probation Revocation Hearing Considered Due Process Violation — Harmless Error: At a hearing on the revocation of Pedersen's suspended sentence, the District Court allowed the state to introduce drug test results, even though drug use was not alleged prior to the hearing. Pedersen asserted that the failure to notify him that the drug test results would be used was a due process violation. The Supreme Court agreed. Even though a revocation hearing is not subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence, the hearing must be fundamentally fair, and minimum due process rights, including notice, extend to a revocation hearing. Thus, because Pedersen was not notified in advance, the District Court erred in admitting the drug test results. However, the error was harmless. The District Court's findings did not reference the drug test results, nor did the court rely on the results in revoking the suspended sentence, relying instead on the abundant evidence of Pedersen's violation of four other probation conditions. Therefore, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence revocation. St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003). See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299 (1987).

Failure to Fulfill Terms of Suspended Sentence by Completing Sex Offender Treatment Program — Revocation of Sentence Proper: A condition of Drube's suspended sentence required enrollment in and completion of a sex offender treatment program. Drube was terminated from the program on numerous grounds, and the District Court revoked the suspended sentence. Drube appealed, asserting that his termination from the program in which he was participating did not give the District Court immediate cause to suspend the sentence and that he should have been given the opportunity to enroll in another program. The Supreme Court disagreed. At the time that the state filed the revocation petition, Drube had not successfully completed a sex offender program, nor was he enrolled in one. Because Drube was in violation of the conditions of the suspended sentence and because the evidence showed that Drube required a more secure or structured setting in which to complete a program because he was unwilling to cooperate with the program that he was in, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in revoking Drube's suspended sentence. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Alleged Inadequate Supervision of Parolee No Excuse for Probation Violation: Senn's parole supervision was transferred to Washington state, and after several years the Missoula County Attorney filed a petition to revoke Senn's suspended sentences based on several alleged probation violations. Senn admitted violating some of the probation conditions, but contended that the violations should be excused because of health problems, poverty, arrests in Washington that precluded contact with Montana, a good faith assumption that matters in Montana could be resolved after the criminal issues in Washington were addressed, and the Montana parole officer's failure to provide adequate supervision. The Supreme Court disagreed. Senn's own conduct resulted in the probation violations, and although there was a period when Senn was unsupervised, even when supervised Senn failed to comply with the probation officer's requests. The District Court did not err in revoking Senn's suspended sentences. St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

Reasons for Denial of Credit for Time Elapsed Properly Stated in Written Order, Rather Than at Revocation Hearing: Senn contended that the District Court erred in failing to expressly consider at a revocation hearing whether to give Senn credit for time elapsed during Senn's parole. However, pursuant to this section, the District Court is required to state the reasons for allowing or rejecting credit in its order, not at a revocation hearing. In this case, in its written order the District Court listed 10 reasons for denying credit for elapsed time, satisfying the statutory requirements. St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

Unauthorized Contact With Minors and Failure to Follow Through With Sexual Offender Treatment Sufficient to Warrant Revocation of Suspended Sentence: Aune's sentences for felony sexual assault were suspended on condition that Aune complete sexual offender treatment and not have contact with minors. Aune moved to North Dakota to be closer to his parents and enrolled in sexual offender treatment there. However, his participation was terminated because he was dishonest with staff and because his wife failed to participate in treatment, which was a condition of participation in the North Dakota program. Further, Aune admitted that he had contact with two minor girls who lived at the farm where Aune worked. Following a hearing and consideration of conflicting evidence, Aune's suspended sentence was revoked by the District Court, and he appealed. The standard for revocation of probation is whether the judge is reasonably satisfied that the conduct of the petitioner has not been what was agreed to if the petitioner was given liberty. The Supreme Court noted that Aune's original sentence did not contain a requirement that Aune complete phases I and II of sexual offender treatment, so to the extent that the revocation was based on Aune's failure to complete phase II, revocation was not supported by the evidence. However, the District Court did not err when it found that Aune violated the condition that he complete and follow through with treatment, which by its terms also required the participation of Aune's wife, and that Aune violated the condition that he not have unauthorized contact with minors. The District Court's revocation of Aune's suspended sentence and sentence to two concurrent terms of 15 years and 259 days in prison for each count of sexual assault were affirmed. St. v. Aune, 2003 MT 3, 314 M 1, 61 P3d 785 (2003), distinguishing St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204 (1992).

Suspended Sentence Properly Revoked — Remand for Entry of Findings to Support Resentence: The District Court revoked Anderson's suspended sentence and resentenced him to 10 years with 6 years suspended. Anderson appealed on grounds that his failure to comply with sentencing conditions requiring him to maintain employment and perform community service did not rise to a level to support revocation, and that the sentencing judge failed to clearly state the reasons for the sentence. The Supreme Court noted that a single violation of the terms of a suspended sentence is sufficient to support revocation of a suspended sentence. Anderson admitted that he had performed only 4 hours of the required 100 hours of community service since the original sentence was imposed, and had paid only $275 of a total of $1,805 due in restitution. Anderson also had a significant criminal history, was convicted of three additional felonies since beginning probation, and failed to comply with a number of terms and conditions of the suspended sentence. Thus, revocation of Anderson's suspended sentence was not an abuse of discretion. However, the sentencing court's stated reason for resentencing Anderson, namely that it was the state's recommendation, neither informed Anderson of the reasons underlying the sentence nor provided guidance for review. Therefore, the case was remanded for resentencing, and the entry of findings was to be sufficient to support the sentence. St. v. Anderson, 2002 MT 92, 309 M 352, 46 P3d 625 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204 (1992).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Reinstatement of Suspended Sentence With New Conditions Improper: About 6 years into a suspended sentence for felony sexual assault, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Under the 1983 version of this section, in effect at the time that Brister committed the offense, the District Court had two options upon revocation: (1) revoke the suspended sentence and order Brister to serve the remainder of the prison term; or (2) continue the suspended sentence under the original terms. Instead, the court reimposed the suspended sentence conditioned upon multiple new conditions and terms not contained in the original sentence, which was not allowed under the revocation statute. The court had no authority to impose new conditions upon the continuation of Brister's suspended sentence. The Supreme Court remanded for a new disposition hearing to allow the District Court to decide which of the two options to implement. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002).

Finding of Mental State Not Necessary in Revocation of Suspended Sentence Proceedings: Averill's suspended sentence was revoked after he admitted that he had violated numerous conditions of his probation agreement and after the District Court found that he had also violated several other conditions for which no charges were brought. Averill argued that the District Court erred in finding that he had committed the unadmitted violations because under 45-2-103, he was lacking the requisite mental state to establish guilt and that without having committed the acts either knowingly, purposefully, or negligently, he did not violate parole. However, this section sets forth the requirements applicable to revocation of suspended sentences and makes no reference to intent, mental state, or 45-2-103, so it was not necessary for the court to find that Averill acted knowingly, purposefully, or negligently in order to revoke the suspended sentence. A revocation proceeding is not equivalent to a trial. The burden of proof in a revocation hearing is only a preponderance of the evidence, and the issue is not one of guilt or innocence, but rather whether a condition of a suspended sentence has been violated. Here, the court was reasonably satisfied that Averill's conduct was not what was agreed it would be if Averill was given his liberty, so revocation of the sentence was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Averill, 2001 MT 161, 306 M 106, 30 P3d 1059 (2001), followed in St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006).

Probable Cause Hearing Required When Offender Arrested Pursuant to Warrant — Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction When Timely Hearing Not Held: Giddings was arrested August 1 on a probation violation warrant issued by his probation officer. The next day while he was still detained, the District Court issued a warrant for his arrest based on the earlier petition to revoke his suspended sentence. A hearing on the petition was held on November 10, Giddings' suspended sentence was subsequently revoked, and he was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 4 years. Giddings argued on appeal that pursuant to 46-23-1012 as it read prior to the 2001 amendments, the Probation and Parole Bureau was required to hold a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of his arrest and that because no such hearing was held, the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing 3 months later regarding the technical violations of probation alleged in the probation violation report. The state contended that a probable cause hearing is required only when the probationer is dealt with administratively through the probation violator prison diversion program described in 46-23-1012(4) as it read prior to the 2001 amendments and that an administrative probable cause hearing is not required when a probationer is arrested on a bench warrant and is processed through the judicial system. The Supreme Court reversed, applying St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), in holding that a hearing by the Probation and Parole Bureau under 46-23-1012(4) as it read prior to the 2001 amendments is mandatory within 36 hours when an offender has been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Because the probable cause hearing was never held, the District Court lacked jurisdiction to hold its revocation hearing later. St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001), clarified in Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001), in which it was held that the 36-hour requirement for a probable cause hearing applies only to probation revocation proceedings under 46-23-1012 and not to parole revocation proceedings under 46-23-1023.

Erroneous Dismissal of Petition to Revoke Sentence Based on Failure to Hold Timely Hearing: Under 46-23-1012, there are two ways that an offender can come into custody for allegations of a probation violation. The first is when a judge issues a warrant for the offender's arrest, and the second is when the offender is arrested by a probation or parole officer or when a probation or parole officer authorizes a law enforcement officer to make the arrest. In this case, Goebel was arrested by a probation and parole officer. Prior to the 2001 amendments, the second sentence of 46-23-1012(4) read: "After the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection, a hearings officer for the probation and parole bureau shall hold a hearing within 36 hours of the defendant's arrest" (emphasis added). Goebel contended before the District Court that the petition to revoke his suspended sentence should be dismissed because the state did not hold a hearing within 36 hours of his arrest. The court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the state argued that the 1999 amendments to 46-23-1012(4) mandated a hearing only in the case of violators who are arrested pursuant to a warrant and that the Legislature left to the discretion of the Probation and Parole Bureau the decision of whether to hold a hearing for every other violator, while Goebel maintained that the phrase "pursuant to this subsection" required the Bureau to hold a hearing in every case of alleged parole violation before proceeding under 46-23-1013 (now repealed). The Supreme Court found the statutory language in subsection (4) to be clear and unambiguous and contrary to the assertions of both parties. Because a defendant may be arrested only under the provisions of subsections (1) and (2), the phrase "after the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection" could not refer to the entirety of 46-23-1012, as Goebel contended, nor could it refer only to subsection (4), as the state contended. Rather, the court held that "this subsection" related back to the reference in the previous sentence to subsection (1), which allows a judge to issue a warrant or notice to appear, so a probable cause hearing by the Probation and Parole Bureau is mandatory only when an offender has been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Because Goebel was not arrested pursuant to a warrant, the 36-hour rule did not apply. Despite the fact that the Supreme Court found the statute clear and unambiguous, it pointed out that this interpretation rendered the statute illogical because probable cause must be shown before a warrant is issued. It makes little sense to require a second probable cause hearing, while common sense would dictate that there should be a reasonably prompt probable cause hearing when an arrest is made without a warrant. Rather than examine the legislative history to discern the Legislature's intent in using the particular language, the court ascribed the confusion to a legislative drafting error and left correction of the language to the Legislature. St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), clarified in Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001), in which it was held that the 36-hour requirement for a probable cause hearing applies only to probation revocation proceedings under 46-23-1012 and not to parole revocation proceedings under 46-23-1023, and followed in St. v. Johnson, 2001 MT 277, 307 M 317, 37 P3d 701 (2001).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence Based on Violation of Good Citizenship Probation Standard: A condition of Therriault's probation was that he "conduct himself as a good citizen at all times". When the District Court revoked Therriault's suspended sentence for violating this good citizenship standard, Therriault complained that the standard was too vague to sufficiently warn him of what would constitute a violation of his probation conditions, in violation of his due process rights. The Supreme Court was essentially called upon to determine if Therriault was acting as a good citizen at all times. The court affirmed the sentence revocation, noting that under any reasonable definition of the term, any "good citizen" who was truly concerned about the welfare of a 14-year-old girl from a troubled home would not suggest that, for her own safety, she should take up residence at the home of a convicted sex offender who was on probation and subject to random searches and that this should be accomplished without the supervising probation officer's knowledge and without entertaining the possibility of more suitable living arrangements. St. v. Therriault, 2000 MT 286, 302 M 189, 14 P3d 444, 57 St. Rep. 1185 (2000).

Failure to Complete Sexual Offender Treatment Sufficient to Warrant Suspended Sentence Revocation and Continued Incarceration: Vallier received 5 years for felony assault and 20 years for felony sexual assault of an 11-year-old child, with 10 years suspended if Vallier completed the prison sexual offender program. Vallier failed to complete the program by the time of scheduled discharge of the active sentence, so the District Court revoked the suspended portion of the sentence, further classifying Vallier as a level 3 sexual offender at a high risk to reoffend. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding Vallier's failure to complete the sexual offender program of such a nature as to require Vallier's continued incarceration. Sufficient evidence was offered to prove that Vallier continued to be a serious community threat until the treatment was received, and Vallier did not meet the burden of showing that the District Court abused its discretion in revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Vallier, 2000 MT 225, 301 M 228, 8 P3d 112, 57 St. Rep. 928 (2000).

New Sentence Restriction Added Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence Stricken: If a District Court finds that a defendant has violated the terms or conditions of a suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspended sentence and require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence, but nothing in this section authorizes a court to impose additional restrictions when revoking a suspended sentence. (See 2001 amendment to this section, which allows it.) In this case, the District Court originally sentenced Richardson to 20 years in prison for felony sexual assault against a child, with all but 70 days suspended, conditioned in part upon completion of a sex offender treatment program. Richardson failed treatment and admitted violating other conditions of the suspended sentence, so the sentence was revoked, and Richardson was sentenced to prison for the remainder of the 20-year sentence. Additionally, the court conditioned Richardson's parole eligibility upon successful completion of the first two phases of sexual offender treatment in prison. The additional restriction on the sentence was error, and the case was remanded for the limited purpose of striking that condition from the sentence. St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000), following St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Standard for Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Standard for Review of Revocation: The standard for revoking a suspended sentence requires that the District Court be reasonably satisfied that the conduct of the probationer has not been what the probationer agreed that it would be if liberty were granted. The Supreme Court will review a sentence revocation to determine whether the District Court abused its discretion and whether the court's decision was supported by a preponderance of the evidence in favor of the state. However, this section does not expressly require the court to determine whether the probationer willfully violated the terms of the suspended sentence before the sentence may be revoked. Here, Williams argued that the District Court improperly revoked his suspended sentence because the state's petition did not allege a violation of the conditions of the suspension. However, Williams' inability to secure sexual offender treatment while on probation frustrated the purpose of probation, which was Williams' rehabilitation. Thus, the District Court did not err in revoking the suspended sentence and requiring Williams to participate in the sexual offender treatment at the state prison to avoid continued frustration of the purpose of the suspension. St. v. Williams, 1999 MT 240, 296 M 258, 993 P2d 1, 56 St. Rep. 943 (1999), following St. v. Kochvi, 671 A2d 115 (N.H. 1996), and St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), distinguishing Lopez v. Crist, 176 M 352, 578 P2d 312 (1978), and followed in St. v. Averill, 2001 MT 161, 306 M 106, 30 P3d 1059 (2001). However, see St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 M 173, 31 P3d 998 (2001), which affirmed Williams to the extent that violations of nonfinancial probationary conditions need not necessarily be willful in order to justify revocation, but reversed the revocation of a suspended sentence when the failure to fulfill the conditions of a suspended sentence was not the fault of the probationer but rather the state.

Suspended Sentence Properly Revoked — No Supreme Court Review of Disparate Sentences: Baisch's sentence was suspended on condition that, among other things, he remain law-abiding, undergo a psychological examination, and complete his graduate equivalency diploma within 1 year. When Baisch's probation officer called Baisch in to inquire as to why he was not meeting appointments in fulfilling his diploma requirements, Baisch became belligerent and was arrested for assault and criminal mischief. The charges were dismissed because of a defect in language, but the state petitioned to revoke the suspended sentence anyway. The state met its burden of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that Baisch violated the terms of probation, and the District Court did not err in reinstating Baisch's 7-year prison term. Baisch's argument that the sentence was too harsh was not appropriate for consideration by the Supreme Court because arguments of that nature are reserved for consideration by the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Baisch, 1998 MT 12, 287 M 191, 953 P2d 1070, 55 St. Rep. 41 (1998), followed in St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

"Finding" in Probation Modification Order Not Res Judicata as to Issue of Compliance With Terms of Probation: Lindeman pleaded guilty to charges of sexual abuse and incest and, as a condition of probation, was required to complete a sex offender treatment program and to have no unsupervised contact with minors. After some efforts at treatment, for which the treatment provider issued a letter saying that Lindeman had "graduated" from the program, Lindeman petitioned the District Court for a modification of the previous order in order to allow him to have contact with his minor daughter. In issuing the order, the District Court found that Lindeman had completed the sex offender treatment program. However, Lindeman had not in fact completed a treatment program meeting the standards required in his original probation order, and the treatment provider was not qualified to treat Lindeman because the provider lacked credentials required by the original probation order. Later, when the state sought to revoke Lindeman's probation and impose the suspended sentence based upon Lindeman's failure to complete the treatment program, Lindeman argued that the issue of completion of the program was res judicata under the probation modification order of the District Court. Citing Hollister v. Forsythe, 277 M 23, 918 P2d 665 (1996), the Supreme Court held that the issue of Lindeman's completion of the treatment program was not res judicata because the issues in the probation modification proceeding and the later revocation proceeding were not the same. The Supreme Court pointed out that at the probation modification hearing: (1) the issue of completion of the treatment program was not before the District Court; (2) the hearing was requested by Lindeman to change a condition concerning contact with minors, not completion of the treatment program; (3) the District Court did not remove the condition that Lindeman complete the treatment program; and (4) the "finding" was unnecessary to the District Court's decision to modify the condition of probation. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988), and St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530 (1990), and noted that the only way that the issue of completion of the treatment program could have been determined by the District Court was through a petition filed pursuant to this section, which did not occur. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the "finding" by the District Court was not a conclusive, litigated finding and therefore was not res judicata as to whether Lindeman had completed treatment as required in his probation order. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Reservation of Right to Specify Ineligibility for Parole Upon Subsequent Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Lack of Authority in District Court: When Lindeman was sentenced for sexual assault and incest, the District Court reserved the right, in the event that Lindeman ever violated a condition of probation and his suspended sentence was imposed, to specify that Lindeman would be ineligible for parole until he completed a sex offender treatment program.

When Lindeman failed to complete the program and the state requested that Lindeman's probation be revoked and the suspended sentence imposed, Lindeman objected to the District Court's imposition of the condition preventing parole. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), the only punishment that the District Court could impose was the suspended sentence or a lesser penalty and that the District Court was without authority to impose the additional condition. The Supreme Court noted that 46-18-202, the statutory provision relied upon by the District Court when it reserved the right to impose the condition, applies only to the original sentence under 46-18-201 and that the District Court had no authority to impose the condition upon subsequently revoking the suspended sentence. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997), followed, with regard to the impropriety of new sentence restrictions added upon revocation, in St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000).

"Unique Factors" Alleged by Defendant, Including Long Delay in Filing Petition to Revoke Suspended Sentence — No Abuse of Discretion: Lindeman pleaded guilty to charges of sexual abuse and incest and, as a condition of probation, was required to complete a sex offender treatment program and to have no unsupervised contact with minors. Because Lindeman moved frequently, he changed probation officers several times, and it was not discovered for some time that he had not completed the required treatment program. When the state petitioned the District Court to revoke Lindeman's probation and to impose the suspended sentence, Lindeman argued that the District Court failed to consider "unique factors" of his case and thereby abused its discretion. The Supreme Court held that: (1) notwithstanding Lindeman's argument that his completion of the treatment program was a factor that should have been considered by the District Court, the evidence showed that Lindeman did not complete the treatment program; (2) Lindeman's inability to pay for treatment was not a factor in revocation of his probation because the evidence showed that he failed to complete treatment for other reasons; (3) there was no evidence that Lindeman's alleged terminal illness prevented him from completing treatment; (4) Lindeman's membership in a prayer group did not excuse his having to complete treatment; (5) although the evidence showed that Lindeman's case "fell through the cracks" due at least in part to the many probation officers assigned to Lindeman's case and the failure of those officers to verify Lindeman's completion of the sex offender program, the fact remained that Lindeman was an untreated sex offender who did not follow the conditions of his probation; and (6) whether or not Lindeman followed the other conditions of his probation did not change the fact that he did not follow the treatment condition. In regard to the sixth unique factor, the Supreme Court stated that Lindeman's case was distinguishable on its facts from St. v. Lundquist, 251 M 329, 825 P2d 204 (1992), in which the Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion in revoking the probation of a sex offender who did not complete treatment. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Reservation of Authority to Attach Additional Conditions to Suspended Sentence Held Error — St. v. Wilson Followed: At the sentencing of Savaria on multiple thefts involving bad checks, the District Court reserved the right to attach additional conditions upon Savaria's suspended sentence. Although Savaria was sentenced before the decision in St. v. Wilson, 279 M 34, 926 P2d 712 (1996), holding that a District Court may not sentence a defendant to a term of imprisonment and reserve the right to impose additional restrictions during the defendant's probation, the state conceded and the Supreme Court agreed that Wilson was applicable to Savaria's case. The Supreme Court therefore struck the reservation from the District Court's judgment. St. v. Savaria, 824 M 216, 945 P2d 24, 54 St. Rep. 852 (1997).

Revocation of Suspension of Part of Sentence While Nonsuspended Part Being Served: The District Court had authority to revoke suspension of part of a sentence when, prior to having begun to serve the suspended part, the prisoner was released on parole before serving the whole of the nonsuspended part of the sentence and violated conditions of probation relating to the suspended part. Christofferson v. St., 272 M 518, 901 P2d 588, 52 St. Rep. 909 (1995), followed in St. v. Morrison, 2008 MT 16, 341 M 147, 176 P3d 1027 (2008).

Alford Plea in Sexual Assault Case — Revocation of Suspended Sentence: In a sexual assault case, the defendant sufficiently raised the issue of the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination to warrant review on appeal. The defendant entered an Alford plea, and sexual offender evaluation and treatment were conditions of the suspended sentence. The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it revoked the defendant's suspended sentence for violations of the conditions of the suspended sentence, including sexual offender evaluation and treatment. St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995).

No Court Assistance in Escaping Plea Bargain Obligations: As a condition of defendant's plea bargain, it was required that he remain a law-abiding citizen, but it was not specifically advised that he could not possess a firearm. When found to be in possession of a firearm, defendant's suspended sentence was revoked, which defendant appealed. It is impossible for a District Court to inform a defendant of every illegal action that could affect defendant upon entering a guilty plea, nor will the Supreme Court assist an accused criminal in escaping the obligations of a plea bargain after accepting its benefits. St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153, 49 St. Rep. 463 (1992), followed in St. v. Milinovich, 269 M 68, 887 P2d 214, 51 St. Rep. 1433 (1994). See also St. v. Koepplin, 213 M 55, 689 P2d 921 (1984), and St. v. Radi, 250 M 155, 818 P2d 1203, 48 St. Rep. 903 (1991).

Ex Parte Communication Between Witness and Judge Not Affecting Revocation of Suspended Sentence: Defendant claimed that his due process rights were violated by the District Court's decision to revoke his suspended sentence based on improper ex parte communication between the probation officer and the District Court Judge. However, absent objective evidence that the private communication was intended to or did influence the revocation decision and because the record was replete with evidence in support of revocation, the defendant's rights were not violated and the suspended sentence was properly revoked. St. v. Champagne, 245 M 147, 800 P2d 154, 47 St. Rep. 1932 (1990).

Petition to Revoke Filed After Period of Suspension — Question of Jurisdiction Properly Raised and Sentence Voided: The County Attorney's office petitioned for revocation of Voegele's suspended sentence 2 days after the term of the suspended sentence had expired. While Voegele rightfully asserted that allowing the tardy revocation petition was prejudicial to his punishment, he acknowledged that he was precluded from challenging the District Court's jurisdiction under 46-20-701(2). However, the Supreme Court found that until Voegele obtained new counsel on appeal, no one was aware that the suspended sentence had expired. Under the plain error doctrine, the power of discretionary review was applied to address the arithmetic jurisdictional error and prevent manifest injustice. Voegele was therefore not barred from raising the jurisdictional issue, and the Supreme Court held that the imposition of sentence was void for lack of jurisdiction because the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was filed after the sentence had expired. St. v. Voegele, 243 M 222, 793 P2d 832, 47 St. Rep. 1183 (1990), following St. v. Wilkins, 229 M 78, 746 P2d 588 (1987).

Fleeing Jurisdiction to Avoid Forced Sexual Relationship: The defendant left the state in violation of her parole and argued that the action was justified because she fled to avoid a forced sexual relationship with her foster parent. The Supreme Court ruled that in addition to meeting the requirements of the compulsion statute, the defendant also had to meet the requirements of the complementary doctrine of necessity, which included the duty to turn herself over to the proper authorities upon reaching a place of safety. Since the defendant failed to report to anyone after arriving in California, the lower court was justified in revoking her suspended sentence. The court also held that there were other steps short of fleeing the jurisdiction that the defendant could have taken; therefore, her actions were not justified. St. v. Ottwell, 240 M 376, 784 P2d 402, 46 St. Rep. 2207 (1989).

Revocation Cancels Prior Act of Grace: A District Court's decision to revoke a suspended sentence cancels a prior act of grace and is within the court's discretion. St. v. Rogers, 239 M 327, 779 P2d 927, 46 St. Rep. 1721 (1989); St. v. Kern, 212 M 385, 695 P2d 1300 (1984), followed in St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Clause: Because the revocation proceeding is not a criminal adjudication, does not require proof of a criminal offense, does not impose punishment for any new offense, and is an act in the performance of the duty of judicial supervision of probationary liberty, the double jeopardy clause is inapplicable. St. v. Lange, 237 M 486, 775 P2d 213, 46 St. Rep. 991 (1989), citing St. v. Eckley, 579 P2d 291, 34 Oreg. App. 563 (1978).

Jurisdiction to Revoke Suspended Sentence — DUI Conviction and Failure to Complete Sexual Offender Program: The District Court had jurisdiction to revoke a suspended sentence for sexual assault and to order defendant committed to the state prison after finding that defendant violated the terms and conditions of his suspended sentence by failing to complete a sexual offender program and by his conviction of DUI. St. v. Stangeland, 233 M 230, 758 P2d 776, 45 St. Rep. 1446 (1988).

Revocation of Suspended Portion of Sentence — No Due Process Violation: Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault and sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to a term of 40 years in the Montana State Prison. The sentence review board modified the sentence to 40 years with 20 years suspended provided that the defendant successfully complete a sex treatment program. Upon defendant's failure to complete the program, the District Court, following four hearings, ordered the original 40-year sentence to be reinstated. Defendant appealed, alleging due process violations for failure to follow parole and probation revocation procedures. The Supreme Court, in affirming the revocation, ruled that the right to a speedy trial, while guaranteed in criminal prosecutions, is not applicable in revocation of probation proceedings and that no preliminary hearing is required before a revocation proceeding when detention is not involved. St. v. Friedman, 225 M 373, 732 P2d 1322, 44 St. Rep. 313 (1987). See also St. v. Stangeland, 233 M 230, 758 P2d 776, 45 St. Rep. 1446 (1988), and St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Right to Jury Trial — Not Applicable to Suspended Sentence Revocation Proceedings: Since a trial by jury under the seventh amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., is guaranteed only in "criminal prosecutions", it does not apply in proceedings for revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. Watts, 221 M 104, 717 P2d 24, 43 St. Rep. 670 (1986).

Five-Year Suspension Revoked for Failure to Enter Inpatient Alcohol Program: There was substantial evidence to support the revocation of probation and imposition of the original 5-year sentence since defendant failed to comply with a condition that required immediate entry into an inpatient alcohol counseling program. The probation officer fulfilled his duty to advise probationer of the conditions and consequences of a violation. The District Court revoked the suspension pursuant to the discretion granted in 46-18-203 in accordance with the minimum requirements for invoking such discretion. There was no abuse of discretion in the court's consideration of the factors in the original sentencing, except for the sentencing judge's determination that defendant was a dangerous offender. (See 1995 repeal of 46-18-404.) No findings appeared in support of such designation. St. v. Ford, 218 M 215, 707 P2d 16, 42 St. Rep. 1530 (1985).

Proof of Violation of Conditions of Probation Sufficient to Revoke Probation: When defendant, an alcoholic, violated conditions of probation that included a prohibition against drinking, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by the revocation of probation. The Supreme Court held that under Montana statutes, proof of violation of probation conditions is all that is required to support revocation and a court is not required to find that continuation of probationary status would be at odds with the need to protect society and society's interest in defendant's rehabilitation. St. v. Kern, 212 M 385, 695 P2d 1300, 41 St. Rep. 1810 (1984). See also St. v. Lange, 237 M 486, 775 P2d 213, 46 St. Rep. 991 (1989).

Failure to State Reasons for Sentence — Challenge to Revocation of Suspended Sentence: After the defendant was given a suspended prison sentence and ordered to pay restitution, the State moved to revoke the suspension because the defendant failed to make restitution. The defendant opposed the motion to revoke by arguing that the original sentence was invalid because the sentencing court failed to state the reason for the sentence, in violation of the requirements established in St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298, 37 St. Rep. 673 (1980). [A 1983 amendment required the judge to state reasons for the sentence.] On appeal, the Supreme Court held: (1) that despite the failure of the sentencing court to state its reasons, the sentencing court imposed exactly the sentence requested by the defendant; (2) that the reason for the sentence was apparent from the record; (3) that no prejudice resulted from the court's failure to state its reasons; and (4) that no purpose would be served in vacating the sentence or denying the petition to revoke. St. v. Carson, 208 M 320, 677 P2d 587, 41 St. Rep. 369 (1984).

Deferring Sentence Imposition — Second Deferment: Contention that sentencing court had no jurisdiction to defer imposition of sentence a second time did not affect the court's power to subsequently revoke suspension of part of the sentence and was not validly raised on appeal from the revocation. The conviction and first deferment of imposition of sentence occurred on October 7, 1975. The sentence, part of which was suspended, was imposed on October 28, 1977, within the 3-year period set in October 1975, for deferment of the imposition of sentence. The court could not be held in error for ordering (at August 19, 1977, revocation hearing) deferment for an additional 3 years. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Evidence — Witness Called by Judge: There was no merit to contention that due process was denied at suspended sentence revocation hearing when the judge called a witness to the stand to resolve a conflict in pertinent testimony, for a court may on its own motion call witnesses, and the asserted error was waived because it had not been objected to below. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Inquiry as to Time Served — Letter to Warden From Judge: Letter written by judge who revoked suspended sentence to warden of penitentiary, inquiring as to prison time to be credited against sentence, was not prejudicial. The evidence indicated the letter was written at defendant's instigation and that defendant complimented the judge on judge's efforts in defendant's behalf. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Parolees — Revocation by Court of Suspended Portion of Sentence: This section's provision that a judge who has suspended a sentence may, during the period of the suspended sentence, revoke the suspension does not prohibit revocation prior to the time defendant begins to serve the suspended part of the sentence. Where defendant was sentenced to 10 years with 5 suspended and was paroled less than 5 years later, his 5-year suspension could be revoked even though he was technically on parole and not yet serving the 5 suspended years. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed in St. v. Morrison, 2008 MT 16, 341 M 147, 176 P3d 1027 (2008).

Resisting Police Interference With Fight — Suspension Revoked: In an appeal from a revocation of a suspended sentence, the defendant's conduct in resisting police interference in a barroom fight was inexcusable and his actions gave the District Court ample reason to revoke his suspended sentence. Thus, the Supreme Court refused to overturn the revocation without a showing that the District Court abused its discretion. No such showing was made. St. v. Robinson, 190 M 145, 619 P2d 813, 37 St. Rep. 1830 (1980), followed in St. v. Rogers, 239 M 327, 779 P2d 927, 46 St. Rep. 1721 (1989).

Jurisdiction to Designate Dangerous Offenders: At a previous hearing on the State's petition to revoke defendant's probation, the trial court not only revoked his probation but erroneously designated him as a dangerous offender for purposes of parole eligibility, which function is reserved to the sentencing court. Neither 46-18-404 (now repealed) nor 46-18-203 gave the District Court authority to determine at the revocation hearing that the defendant was a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. In fact, when the sentencing court placed defendant on probation and suspended the 10-year sentence, the effect was to determine that defendant did not represent a substantial danger to society. Smith v. St., 186 M 52, 606 P2d 153 (1980). See also In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988).

Jurisdiction Over Proceedings: For violation of parole conditions imposed by the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections), the original sentencing court has the implied power and jurisdiction to revoke a suspension of sentence granted by the Sentence Review Division without violating the double jeopardy protection. In fact, the Sentence Review Division lacks jurisdiction over a revocation proceeding initiated by the state. In re Ratzlaff, 172 M 439, 564 P2d 1312 (1977).

Credit for Time:

A person receiving a suspended sentence upon the condition that he serve 9 months in jail is entitled to credit for the time spent in jail upon revocation of the suspended sentence. In re LeDesma, 171 M 54, 554 P2d 751 (1976).

Crediting of elapsed time upon the revocation of a suspended sentence is within the discretion of the trial court. Petition of Doney, 164 M 330, 522 P2d 92 (1974).

Credit for Time in Jail: Time spent in jail under a suspended sentence must be credited to a sentence for violation of probation. In re Hanson, 169 M 80, 544 P2d 816 (1976).

Preliminary Hearing Not Required to Establish Probable Cause: When probation was revoked by the original sentencing judge, the petitioner was not denied minimum standards of due process as the petitioner was not arrested until a bench warrant was issued pursuant to the final order of revocation after a hearing at which the petitioner was represented at every step by counsel. When no detention is involved, a preliminary hearing to establish probable cause for filing a petition for imposition of final judgment and sentence is not necessary as no rights of the probationer have been violated. In re Meidinger, 168 M 7, 539 P2d 1185 (1975).

Commencement of Sentence: When relator was sentenced to 4 years' confinement and the execution of the sentence was then suspended, which suspension was later revoked, the sentence commenced to run for all purposes on the date when judgment of conviction was entered. Any time between the imposition of the suspended sentence and its revocation should have been credited to the relator and failure to do so resulted in his illegal confinement. State ex rel. Wetzel v. Ellsworth, 143 M 54, 387 P2d 442 (1963).

Credit for Time After Judgment: When the relator was sentenced to 4 years' confinement and the execution of the sentence was then suspended, which suspension was later revoked, the sentence commenced to run for all purposes on the date when the judgment of conviction was entered. Any time between the imposition of the suspended sentence and its revocation should have been credited to the relator and failure to do so resulted in his illegal confinement. State ex rel. Wetzel v. Ellsworth, 143 M 54, 387 P2d 442 (1963).

Attorney General's Opinions

Consecutive Suspended or Deferred Sentences — Probationary Period: When a sentencing court imposes a suspended or deferred sentence on more than one count and orders the periods of suspension or deferral to run consecutively, for purposes of probation revocation, the probationary period for the first count is considered to run before the period on the second and successive counts. 42 A.G. Op. 116 (1988).

Petition to Revoke Suspension or Deferral — May Apply to More Than One Sentence: Conditions of release are a part of the judgment in a case, and there is no prohibition against revoking the uncompleted sentences in a single proceeding where the terms of the judgment have been violated. Thus, if suspended or deferred sentences are to be served consecutively and time remains on more than one period of suspension or deferral, then more than one suspension or deferral may be revoked in the same proceeding. 42 A.G. Op. 116 (1988).

46-18-204. Dismissal after deferred imposition.

Commission Comments

Source: New.

This provision merely codifies the practice which presently exists and provides explicit authorization for withdrawal of a plea of guilty when there has been a deferred imposition of sentence.

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 515 in first sentence near middle inserted reference to termination of time remaining on deferred sentence under 46-18-208; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 16, 2007.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 in first sentence near middle after "plea of guilty" inserted "or nolo contendere"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1989 Amendment: Substituted second and third sentences relating to treatment of order of dismissal as confidential criminal justice information for former second and third sentences that read: "Upon dismissal of the charges, the court shall send an order directing the department of justice to expunge the defendant's record. The order must adequately identify the defendant, such as by sex, race, date of birth, and the current status of the charges to be expunged." Amendment effective April 6, 1989.

1987 Amendment: Inserted last two sentences relating to order to expunge defendant's record.

Case Notes

Dismissal of Previous Deferred Drug Possession Charge — Subsequent Felony Possession Not Chargeable: Tomaskie was convicted of misdemeanor marijuana possession in 1995. Imposition of sentence was deferred, and Tomaskie subsequently fulfilled the conditions of the sentence. In 2003, Tomaskie was arrested again for possession of less than 60 grams of marijuana, but Tomaskie was charged with felony possession based on the prior 1995 conviction. Prior to sentencing on the 2003 charge, Tomaskie notified the court that sentenced him for the 1995 charge, and because the deferred sentence conditions were fulfilled, the court dismissed the 1995 charge. Tomaskie then moved to reduce the 2003 charge to a misdemeanor, but the motion was denied. Tomaskie pleaded guilty but reserved the right to appeal. Tomaskie asserted that because the 1995 conviction was dismissed before he was convicted of the 2003 charge, the 2003 charge should have been reduced to a misdemeanor. The state argued that because the 1995 conviction existed at the time that Tomaskie pleaded guilty to the 2003 charge, the District Court correctly concluded that Tomaskie was convicted at that point and properly denied the motion to amend the charge to a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court agreed with Tomaskie and reversed. In order for there to be a conviction, a sentence must be imposed. The District Court incorrectly determined that when Tomaskie pleaded guilty, he had been convicted. A conviction does not occur until sentence is imposed. Tomaskie was not convicted of a second or subsequent offense under 45-9-102(2) because before the 2003 charge resulted in a conviction, the 1995 conviction was dismissed, and Tomaskie should not have been sentenced as a felon. When the information was charged in the 2003 offense, Tomaskie's prior conviction had not been dismissed, so Tomaskie was properly charged with felony possession, but when the prior conviction was dismissed, the authority to impose a felony sentence was lost. St. v. Tomaskie, 2007 MT 103, 337 M 130, 157 P3d 691 (2007), following St. v. Shults, 169 M 33, 544 P2d 817 (1976), and St. v. Gladue, 209 M 235, 679 P2d 1256 (1984), and distinguishing St. v. Lorash, 238 M 345, 777 P2d 884 (1989), and St. v. Wheeler, 285 M 400, 948 P2d 698 (1997).

No Authority of Courts to Expunge Criminal Records Absent Statutory Authorization: Montana courts have jurisdiction to expunge criminal records pursuant to statute, but absent explicit legislative authorization, courts have no inherent power to expunge criminal records. St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

Sheriff Entitled to Consider Confidential Criminal Justice Information in Deciding Whether to Grant Permit for Concealed Weapon: Smith was involved in an incident in 1993 resulting in charges for a number of felonies to which he pleaded guilty. Smith received a deferred imposition of sentence, and after satisfying the conditions of the sentence, the charges were dismissed. In 1995 and 1997, Smith applied for a permit to carry a concealed weapon, but each request was denied by the County Sheriff because of the 1993 incident and because of Smith's criminal history. Smith contended that the Sheriff improperly relied on evidence from Smith's criminal file to establish reasonable cause to deny the applications, because the District Court had dismissed the 1993 charges and ordered the records expunged. However, this section does not provide for record expungement when a charge is dismissed, but rather provides that the record be considered confidential criminal justice information. Pursuant to 44-5-303, the Sheriff was entitled to receive the information and to consider it when exercising the discretion in 45-8-321 regarding whether or not to grant a concealed weapon permit. Smith v. Missoula County, 1999 MT 330, 297 M 368, 992 P2d 834, 56 St. Rep. 1318 (1999).

Previous DUI Conviction Not to Be Considered for Purposes of Felony DUI — Former Requirement for Expungement of Record Held Self-Executing — Lorash Distinguished — Expungement Applicable to Local Records: Bowles was convicted of DUI in 1977 and did not receive another DUI for 5 years but was convicted of two other DUI offenses after 1982. When Bowles was arrested for DUI in Park County in 1996, Park County charged Bowles with felony DUI, fourth offense, counting the 1977 conviction as one of three prior convictions. Bowles moved for dismissal of the felony charge, contending that the 1977 record should have been expunged pursuant to the 1981 version of 61-8-714(5), and the District Court granted the motion. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly dismissed the felony charge because the expungement provision in effect at the time, unlike the expungement provision in this section that was litigated in St. v. Lorash, 238 M 345, 777 P2d 884 (1989), was self-executing and did not require the defendant to move the court to have the record of conviction expunged. The requirement for expungement applied to the 1977 conviction, despite the change in the law in 1989 requiring that the record be held as confidential criminal justice information, because the requirement for expungement was self-executing. The Supreme Court also noted that the expungement requirement applied to records of conviction notwithstanding the requirement in 61-11-102 that the Department of Justice maintain records of convictions of licensees. Further, the Supreme Court also held, relying upon St. v. Brander, 280 M 148, 930 P2d 31 (1996), that because "expungement" means to destroy and was without limitation, all traces of the conviction record should have been destroyed, that the record of the 1977 conviction was maintained by the Park County Sheriff in violation of the law, and that the 1977 county conviction record should not have been used as the basis for the felony charge. In response to the state's argument that the expungement requirement, enacted in 1981, applied prospectively only to convictions occurring after the requirement's effective date, the Supreme Court noted that it had rejected that argument in St. v. Reams, 284 M 448, 945 P2d 52, 54 St. Rep. 972 (1997). St. v. Bowles, 284 M 490, 947 P2d 52, 54 St. Rep. 962 (1997).

Limitation on Deferral of Sentence — Constitutionality: The provision of 46-18-201 prohibiting a defendant from receiving a deferred sentence if he has been convicted of a prior felony is not unconstitutional under the due process clause. Defendant who had received a deferred sentence in 1973 and had not attempted to have that conviction dismissed or expunged was not entitled to a deferred sentence after a 1988 conviction. Defendant's argument regarding constitutionality is moot because the 1987 amendment to this section was repealed in 1989. St. v. Lorash, 238 M 345, 777 P2d 884, 46 St. Rep. 1321 (1989), distinguished in St. v. Bowles, 284 M 490, 947 P2d 52, 54 St. Rep. 962 (1997), as to the requirement for a motion for expungement.

Deferred Imposition of Sentence Not Dismissed — "Conviction" for Purposes of Persistent Felony Offender Status: On appeal following conviction for criminal mischief and attempted burglary for which the defendant was sentenced as a persistent felony offender, the defendant argued that a prior conviction and deferred imposition of sentence should not have been considered a "conviction" under the persistent felony offender statutes because he successfully completed probation, even if the record of his prior conviction was not expunged or the sentence dismissed. The Supreme Court held, consistent with the rationale of St. v. Drew, 158 M 214, 490 P2d 230 (1971), that the case should be remanded to District Court to determine whether the prior unrevoked deferred sentence should be dismissed, and directed that if the sentence is dismissed then it should not be considered in determining whether the defendant is a persistent felony offender. St. v. Gladue, 209 M 235, 679 P2d 1256, 41 St. Rep. 669 (1984).

Intent of Legislature: The passage of this section demonstrates the intent of the Legislature in regard to deferred imposition of sentences; if sentence were imposed or executed in any part, then the end advantage to the entire concept of the deferred sentence could not be attained and this section would become inoperative. St. v. Drew, 158 M 214, 490 P2d 230 (1971).

Attorney General's Opinions

Documentation of Offense to Be Destroyed Upon Expungement: When a deferred imposition of sentence results in a dismissal of charges, expungement of defendant's record mandated by this section requires that all documentation and physical or automated entries concerning the expunged offense be physically destroyed or obliterated. 42 A.G. Op. 100 (1988).

Case Notes

Mandatory Minimum Sentence for Incest Properly Applied — Victims Under Age Sixteen: Bailey was convicted of incest with two victims under 16 years old, and Bailey was more than 3 years older than both victims. The District Court determined that 45-5-507(4) required the imposition of a mandatory minimum sentence of 4 years and sentenced Bailey to 10 years with the Department of Corrections, with 6 years suspended, on each count. Bailey asserted error, but the Supreme Court examined the sentence for legality and affirmed. The 4-year mandatory minimum sentence in 45-5-507(4) clearly applied, and this section did not come into play because none of the exceptions in 46-18-222 to the mandatory minimum sentence for incest existed, so the District Court did not err in sentencing Bailey. St. v. Bailey, 2004 MT 87, 320 M 501, 87 P3d 1032 (2004), following St. v. Fauque, 2000 MT 168, 300 M 307, 4 P3d 651 (2000).

Sentence Allegedly Based on False Information Affirmed if Information Not Material: Allen contended that his due process rights were violated because he was sentenced based on false and prejudicial information regarding the number of his prior felony convictions and because a witness at his trial later recanted testimony that related directly to Allen's crime. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant is protected from being sentenced based on misinformation about the defendant's criminal history; however, due process does not protect against all misinformation, but rather against materially false information. Allen contended that a prior California conviction for car theft was actually a misdemeanor, rather than a felony, and was thus misapplied to his criminal history and that the actual case files and dockets had been destroyed. The court noted that grand theft auto in California was in fact a felony at the time that Allen was convicted, but that the sentencing court had not relied on the California conviction in sentencing anyway. There was other prior conviction information in Allen's record upon which to base the felony offender sentence, so even if the California information was incorrect, it was not material to Allen's sentence. As for the recanted witness testimony, the Supreme Court noted that the witness ultimately took back the recantation after revealing to law enforcement officers that the recantation was made when the witness was in the same cell block as Allen and was made as a result of intimidation and duress. The recanted testimony was not material to Allen's testimony, and his conviction was affirmed. St. v. Allen, 2001 MT 266, 307 M 253, 37 P3d 655 (2001).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 360, L. 2005, provided: "WHEREAS, the United States Department of Justice has published confirmed statistics that over 60% of serious and violent offenders in state prisons have a history of prior convictions and that the number of prisoners convicted for violent sexual assault has increased by an annual rate of 15% each year since 1980; and

WHEREAS, criminals who commit sexual and violent crimes have shown unusually high recidivism rates, thereby posing an unacceptable level of risk to the community; and

WHEREAS, intensive supervision of sexual or violent offenders is a crucial element to both the rehabilitation of the released convicts and the safety of the surrounding community; and

WHEREAS, mature technological solutions now exist to provide improved supervision and behavioral control of sexual or violent offenders following their release; and

WHEREAS, these solutions can now also provide law enforcement and correctional professionals with significant new tools for electronic correlation of the constantly updated geographical location of supervised sexual or violent offenders following their release with the geographic location of reported crimes, both to possibly link released offenders to crimes or to possibly exclude released offenders from ongoing criminal investigations; and

WHEREAS, continuous 24-hour-a-day, 7-day-a-week electronic monitoring of those convicted of sexual offenses is a valuable and reasonable requirement for those convicts who are placed on probation, who failed to register as sexual or violent offenders as required by law, or who have been released from incarceration while they remain under the active supervision of the state."

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), and St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), regarding authority of sentencing court.

Defendant Unable to Complete Residential Treatment Program Not Yet Established — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: In 1996, Johnson was sentenced to 10 years for felony aggravated kidnapping and 40 years for felony sexual intercourse without consent, with the terms to run concurrently. In 2007, 46-18-207 was enacted, which provided in part for the suspension of sentences for inmates who successfully completed the residential sexual offender treatment program established by the legislation. Johnson filed a writ of habeas corpus, asserting that his sentence for sexual intercourse without consent should be suspended because he had completed sex offender treatment programs in Arizona and Montana and further arguing that he was eligible for sexual offender treatment under 46-18-207. The District Court denied the writ and Johnson appealed, but the Supreme Court denied and dismissed the writ. The residential treatment program authorized in 46-18-207 was not yet established as of the date of the writ, so Johnson could not avail himself of the statutorily authorized program or of the benefits of 46-18-207. Additionally, even if Johnson was eligible for the program, placement is within the discretion of the Department of Corrections, and Johnson was ineligible in any case because of his conviction for aggravated kidnapping, which is one of the exceptions to the operation of 46-18-207. Legality of Sentence for Criminal Production or Manufacture of Dangerous Drugs by Accountability: Becker was sentenced to 10 years in prison for accountability for criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs. Becker argued on appeal that the 10-year sentence was illegal because 45-9-110 does not set out a punishment for a first-time offense for accountability for criminal production or manufacture, so no statutory authority existed for the 10-year sentence. Absent that authority, Becker contended that this section should apply and that the offense was a misdemeanor punishable by not more than 6 months in the county jail. The Supreme Court agreed that subsections (2) and (3) of 45-9-110 did not provide an applicable sentence for first-time accountability for a criminal production or manufacture offense. However, 45-9-110 carries penalties in excess of 1 year in prison, so a violation of that statute is a felony, and the default penalty in 46-18-213, not this section, applies to violations of 45-9-110. Under 46-18-213, a 10-year sentence for a felony was authorized, and Becker's sentence was therefore affirmed. St. v. Becker, 2005 MT 75, 326 M 364, 110 P3d 1 (2005).

Mandatory Life Sentence Not Violative of Due Process, Cruel and Unusual Punishment, or Separation of Powers — Exception Properly Considered: Webb pleaded guilty to second offense sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to life in prison without parole pursuant to this section. Webb appealed the sentence on grounds that the mandatory life sentence violated procedural and substantive due process, the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and the separation of powers doctrine. Webb also asserted that the sentencing court failed to properly consider the exception to mandatory sentencing set out in 46-18-222(3). The Supreme Court affirmed. The sentencing court properly considered the exception and did not abuse its broad discretion in finding no unusual and substantial distress. The sentencing court offered Webb all the procedural due process necessary and did not violate substantive due process because the sentence fit within the statutory sentencing limits. Webb's contention that life without parole was cruel and unusual punishment failed because the sentence was commensurate with the gravity of the crime and consistent with state sentencing and correctional policy. The argument that mandatory sentences violate the separation of powers doctrine also failed because it is in the Legislature's province to distinguish between criminal offenses and to establish punishments, and enactment of this section was based on constitutional principles and Montana public policy. Case Notes

Enhanced Sentence for Use of Weapon — Apprendi Applied Retroactively Under Harmless Error Test — Enhanced Sentence Without Unanimous Jury Finding Harmless Error: After Adams received an enhanced sentence for use of a weapon during an aggravated assault, Adams appealed on grounds that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding that a weapon was used and that the enhanced sentence violated due process because there was no separate jury finding that a weapon was used, as required by Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000). The 2001 Legislature updated the law to address the Apprendi requirement, but as it read in 1997 during Adams's sentencing, 46-1-401 did not require a separate jury finding, so Adams argued that 46-1-401 was therefore unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held that Apprendi imposes a new obligation on the state and is thus a new rule that applies retroactively to cases pending on direct appeal or not final at the time that the new rule was issued, so Apprendi applied retroactively to Adams's direct appeal. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence on both issues. First, there was uncontroverted evidence that a weapon was involved in the crime. Second, the Supreme Court applied Neder v. U.S., 527 US 1 (1999), to determine the proper test to apply when a trial court fails to instruct the jury to make a finding of materiality. Under Neder, the proper test is the harmless error test, i.e., whether it appears beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained. Thus, in this case, the question was whether, beyond a reasonable doubt, Adams would have received an enhanced sentence based on the display or use of a weapon had the question been submitted to the jury. Given evidence that a gun was used was uncontroverted, the result would have been the same, so any error in failing to present the question to the jury was harmless. Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007), applying St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Bar Against Appeal Unconstitutional — Habeas Corpus Relief Granted: Lott was sentenced in 1992 for aggravated kidnapping, sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated burglary, and felony assault, and each sentence was enhanced by 10 years for use of a dangerous weapon. The 5-year limit on appealing the sentences that was in effect at sentencing (now a 1-year limit) expired, so Lott was procedurally barred from challenging the sentences. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), that application of the weapons enhancement to a felony offense that itself required proving use of a weapon constituted a double jeopardy violation. Guillaume was held to apply retroactively in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), so Lott's sentence was unconstitutionally enhanced with regard to the aggravated burglary and felony assault convictions. The state asserted that Lott was procedurally barred from raising the issue in a habeas corpus petition because Lott did not raise the issue on direct appeal or in a petition for postconviction relief. After analyzing habeas corpus and postconviction relief in Montana, the Supreme Court noted the constitutional guarantee that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended and concluded that as applied to a facially invalid sentence, the procedural bar in 46-22-101 unconstitutionally suspends the writ. Even if Lott had filed a direct appeal or petition for postconviction relief, the double jeopardy argument would have been unavailing because Guillaume and Whitehorn were not decided until well after both filing dates had expired. In order to avoid a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice, the Supreme Court granted Lott's petition for habeas corpus and remanded for resentencing pursuant to Guillaume and Whitehorn. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006), followed in St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007), and St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

Time for Challenge of Sentence Enhancement Expired — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: In 2003, Bingman filed a petition for postconviction relief challenging a 1986 sentence enhancement. The District Court denied the petition as untimely, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the applicable 1995 version of 46-21-102, a petition for postconviction relief needed to be filed within 5 years of the final sentence (now 1 year), and because Bingman's petition was filed long after the statutory limit, the petition was properly denied. Bingman v. St., 2005 MT 272, 329 M 151, 122 P3d 1235 (2005).

Error in Applying Weapon Enhancement Sentence Without Complying With Statutory Procedure: Following a conviction for negligent homicide, the District Court sentenced Strauss to 20 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a firearm. Strauss contended that the sentence was unlawful because Strauss was not notified of the enhancement before the sentencing hearing and because the jury did not make a separate finding at trial that the enhancing act occurred, as required by 46-1-401. The Supreme Court agreed. It was error to enhance Strauss's sentence without following the statutory procedure in 46-1-401, so the weapon enhancement portion of the sentence was stricken. (See 2001 amendment.) St. v. Strauss, 2003 MT 195, 317 M 1, 74 P3d 1052 (2003).

No Sentence Enhancement for Felony Assault With Weapon or Aggravated Burglary: Sentences on convictions for felony assault with a weapon and aggravated burglary are the only offenses that may not be enhanced under this section. St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002).

Retroactivity of Substantive and Procedural Rules Distinguished — Nichols Rule Prohibiting Retroactive Applicability of Guillaume Sentencing Enhancement Restriction Overruled: Whitehorn was convicted in 1995 of felony assault, criminal endangerment, and possession of dangerous drugs, and the sentencing court added an additional 10-year sentence for use of a weapon. In 1999, the Supreme Court decided St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), which held that enhancing a defendant's sentence for use of a weapon when the underlying offense (felony assault in Guillaume's case) required proof of the use of a weapon violated the constitutional double jeopardy provision. Whitehorn moved for resentencing in light of Guillaume, arguing that the enhanced sentence should be stricken because his underlying offense of felony assault also required proof that he used a weapon. The state initially agreed that Guillaume applied and that resentencing was appropriate, but prior to resentencing, the state changed its position in light of St. v. Aguilar, 1999 MT 159, 295 M 133, 983 P2d 345 (1999), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which provided that Guillaume would not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. Whitehorn then filed a petition for postconviction relief under 46-21-102, arguing that his case was not final because he had not exhausted the 5-year time period for filing for postconviction relief (revised to 1 year in 1997). The District Court agreed that the petition was timely filed under 46-21-102, but, relying on Nichols, denied the petition and held that Whitehorn's case was final and not pending on direct review, and thus concluded that Guillaume could not be retroactively applied. Whitehorn appealed the denial of his petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court found that the District Court erred in not retroactively applying Guillaume and reversed, holding that under the common-law doctrine of plain error, Whitehorn was not procedurally barred from raising the retroactivity argument on appeal. The court distinguished between substantive and procedural rules when considering whether to apply a rule change retroactively. In Nichols, the court adopted the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989), which stands for the proposition that on collateral review, a new procedural rule of constitutional law will not be applied retroactively if it puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe or if the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute a watershed rule of criminal procedure. In Nichols, the court concluded that Guillaume announced a new rule, but that neither Teague exception applied. However, here the court decided that Guillaume was by its own terms a substantive rule to which the Teague exceptions should not even have been applied (accord, Chambers v. U.S., 22 F3d 939 (9th Cir. 1994)). Partially overruling Nichols and a similar holding in St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), the court concluded that it was illogical to refuse to extend constitutional protections to citizens simply because their claims are raised by collateral review rather than direct appeal. However, the court retained the Guillaume analysis, clarifying that sentences on convictions for felony assault with a weapon and aggravated burglary are the only offenses that may not be enhanced under this section. St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also Desist v. U.S., 394 US 244 (1969), and Mackey v. U.S., 401 US 667 (1971).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred by Seven-Year Lapse: Following remand of St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514 (1993), in 1993, the District Court set forth findings of fact supporting Morrison's 3-year dangerous offender sentence that had been added to Morrison's 20-year prison sentence for sexual intercourse without consent, and Morrison's sentence became final. In 2000, Morrison petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that the 3-year sentence enhancement should be vacated because the use of a weapon had not been charged as a separate offense in the information and that the court relied on false or misleading evidence to support the enhancement. The court treated the petition as one for postconviction relief and denied it as untimely. Morrison appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the version of 46-21-102 in effect at the time of Morrison's final conviction in 1993, the statute of limitations required that petitions for postconviction relief be filed within 5 years after conviction became final. Morrison's petition was not filed until 7 years after conviction. Notwithstanding Morrison's argument that the statute of limitations should be equitably tolled, the petition was not timely and the District Court properly dismissed it. Morrison v. Mahoney, 2002 MT 21, 308 M 196, 41 P3d 320 (2002).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Conviction for Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: Park was sentenced to 40 years for mitigated deliberate homicide, plus 10 years for use of a weapon. Citing St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Park contended on appeal that the imposition of the additional weapon enhancement sentence violated the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. The Supreme Court distinguished Guillaume because the offense charged in that case was felony assault, which requires the use of a weapon, while mitigated deliberate homicide does not. The double jeopardy question under Guillaume and its progeny is not whether a weapon was used in the offense, but rather whether the statutory definition of the offense includes the use of a weapon, with the result that defendant is punished twice for the same offense. The court also discounted Park's argument that use of a weapon is implied every time that a deliberate or mitigated homicide occurs. The court has limited the definition of weapon in several cases, and case law also provides numerous instances of homicide when no conceivable weapon caused the death. Park's enhanced sentence for use of a weapon was affirmed. St. v. Park, 2001 MT 157, 306 M 98, 30 P3d 1062 (2001), following St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966 (2000), and St. v. Dunnette, 2000 MT 33, 298 M 208, 996 P2d 379 (2000).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed Twelve Years After Conviction Time Barred — Guillaume Inapplicable: Charlo was convicted of aggravated assault in 1986 and sentenced to 20 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon, and the sentence was affirmed in 1987 (see St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278 (1987)). Following the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Charlo petitioned for postconviction relief in 1999 on grounds that the imposition of the additional 10-year weapon enhancement sentence violated his double jeopardy rights. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) The District Court concluded that Guillaume did not apply and that no miscarriage of justice would occur if the court applied the 5-year statute of limitations on postconviction relief provided in 46-21-102 (now 1 year). The Supreme Court concurred. A petition filed 12 years after final conviction clearly violated the statute of limitations in 46-21-102. The court relied on St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), for the holding that application of the weapon enhancement provision in this section to a conviction in which the underlying offense does not require use of a weapon as an element of the crime does not constitute a double jeopardy violation. The offense of aggravated assault does not require use of a weapon, so Guillaume did not apply. The court also declined to apply the fundamental miscarriage of justice exception in St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999). Guillaume was the sole basis of Charlo's petition, so Charlo could not show that the Redcrow exception would apply. St. v. Charlo, 2000 MT 192, 300 M 435, 4 P3d 1201, 57 St. Rep. 761 (2000).

Miscarriage of Justice Exception — Newly Discovered Evidence Necessary to Trigger Waiver of Postconviction Statute of Limitations: Rosales's deferred sentence for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and use of a weapon was revoked in 1994 because Rosales violated the deferral conditions. He was sentenced to 10 years for assault and an additional 2 years for use of a weapon in violation of this section. About 5 years and 3 months later and about 2 ½ months after the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Rosales moved to amend the sentence, contending that the additional 2-year sentence for use of a weapon put him in double jeopardy, based on Guillaume. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) The District Court dismissed the motion because of the running of the 5-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief in 46-21-102 (changed to a 1-year statute of limitations in 1997). On appeal, Rosales asked the Supreme Court to reverse its application of the statute of limitations and the bar against retroactive application of the law as established in a similar case, St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which procedurally barred a defendant from moving the court to amend the sentence based on Guillaume. The Supreme Court declined, holding that the postconviction statute of limitations is a jurisdictional limit on litigation and is waived only when there is a clear miscarriage of justice—one so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity. The miscarriage of justice exception refers to actual, not legal, innocence and does not apply to postconviction claims unless the defendant alleges newly discovered evidence establishing that the defendant did not commit the offense. The Supreme Court refused to alter the conditions upon which the statute of limitations will be waived, and because the District Court was affirmed on grounds that the statute of limitations had run, Rosales's argument regarding retroactive application of the law was not considered. St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313, 57 St. Rep. 385 (2000).

No Sentence Enhancement for Use of Weapon in Assault on Police Officer: Because a conviction for assault on a police officer requires proof of use of a weapon, an additional sentence for use of a weapon under this section violates the double jeopardy provision of the Montana Constitution. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000), following St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Conviction for Criminal Endangerment Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. Keith argued that application of the weapon enhancement statute to the felony conviction for criminal endangerment violated the right to be free from multiple punishments for the same offense, pursuant to St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999). The Supreme Court distinguished Guillaume, noting that unlike the felony assault statute in that case, the definition of criminal endangerment does not require proof of the use of a weapon nor did Keith's use of a weapon raise the crime from a misdemeanor to a felony as in Guillaume. Because the offense of criminal endangerment, by its own terms, does not specifically increase a defendant's punishment for use of a weapon, application of the weapon enhancement statute to a criminal endangerment violation is not a double jeopardy violation. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), followed in St. v. Dunnette, 2000 MT 33, 298 M 208, 996 P2d 379, 57 St. Rep. 141 (2000), and St. v. Charlo, 2000 MT 192, 300 M 435, 4 P3d 1201, 57 St. Rep. 761 (2000).

Evidence of Voluntary Mental Impairment Insufficient to Trigger Waiver of Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Hearing Not Required: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court noted that evidence of Keith's reduced mental capacity was based on Keith's voluntary ingestion of alcohol and prescription drugs and that under 46-18-222(2), the court could not waive the mandatory minimum sentence. Citing numerous cases, the Supreme Court held that the statute does permit the sentencing court to reject the mandatory minimum sentence if the court determines that defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired during the commission of the offense but that the statute does not apply in cases when the maximum sentence or any sentence greater than the mandatory minimum is imposed. Here, there was no indication that the sentencing court ever intended to sentence Keith to either the 2-year mandatory minimum or to a period less than the 2-year mandatory minimum, so the exceptions did not apply. Further, because the exceptions were not an issue, Keith was not entitled to a hearing pursuant to 46-18-223. Nevertheless, in this case, the sentencing court did hold a hearing on its own motion but did not then abuse its discretion by denying Keith's request for a continuance of the sentencing hearing to allow evidence of Keith's mental capacity. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Unloaded BB Gun Not Considered Weapon for Purposes of Sentence Enhancement for Use of Dangerous Weapon: Clemo pleaded guilty to robbing a casino by threatening an employee with an unloaded BB pistol and was sentenced to 7 years with 5 years suspended for felony robbery pursuant to 45-5-401, plus an additional 2 years for committing the offense with a dangerous weapon pursuant to this section. Following St. v. Wilson, 282 M 134, 936 P2d 316, 54 St. Rep. 278 (1997), the Supreme Court concluded that Clemo's unloaded BB gun was no more capable of causing harm at the time in question than the inoperable BB gun used in Wilson and thus could not be characterized as a weapon because it was not easily able to produce serious harm when it was used to rob the casino. The case was remanded to vacate the enhanced portion of Clemo's sentence. St. v. Clemo, 1999 MT 323, 297 M 316, 992 P2d 1263, 56 St. Rep. 1292 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Matson, 227 M 36, 736 P2d 971, 44 St. Rep. 874 (1987), and In re R.L.S., 1999 MT 34, 293 M 288, 977 P2d 967, 56 St. Rep. 149 (1999).

Exceptions to General Rule of Retroactivity — Guillaume Inapplicable to Case Finalized Before Adoption of New Constitutional Rule: Although Nichols' conviction, resulting in an enhanced penalty for use of a weapon, was finalized more than 5 years prior to the Supreme Court's decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), which created a new constitutional rule barring enhanced weapon sentences when the underlying offense requires proof of use of a weapon (see 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16), Nichols nevertheless argued that the portion of his sentence precluded by Guillaume should be stricken from his sentence. The Supreme Court applied the retroactivity criteria in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), noting that two exceptions apply to the general rule of retroactivity. The first exception applies when the constitutional rule puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe; the second exception applies when the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute watershed rules of criminal procedure. Finding that Guillaume was not dictated by prior precedent and did not set out a watershed rule, the court held that the new rule did not require retroactive application to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when the Guillaume opinion was issued. Not only was Nichols' claim time-barred under the pre-1997 version of 46-21-102, his argument that the sentence should be reduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice also failed because miscarriage of justice refers to actual, not legal, innocence. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 89, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), followed in St. v. Baker, 1999 MT 251, 296 M 253, 989 P2d 335, 56 St. Rep. 987 (1999), and overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Application of Weapon Enhancement Statute to Felony Conviction When Underlying Offense Requires Proof of Weapon Use Unconstitutional Under Montana Double Jeopardy Provision: When presented with the question of whether this section, the weapon enhancement statute, violates the double jeopardy provisions of Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., the Supreme Court held that the Montana Constitution affords greater protection against multiple punishment than the federal constitution and that application of the weapon enhancement statute to felony convictions when the underlying offense requires proof of the use of a weapon violates Montana's constitutional double jeopardy provision (see 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16). In the instant case, the only factor raising Guillaume's charge from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) was the use of a weapon. The distinction between the two offenses and the different penalties imposed by each offense is the Legislature's way of punishing a criminal defendant for the use of a weapon in committing an assault. Thus, when the weapon enhancement statute was applied to the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) conviction, Guillaume was subjected to double punishment—once when the charge was elevated from misdemeanor assault to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and again when the weapon enhancement statute was applied. This is exactly what double jeopardy was intended to prevent. The state's argument, that double jeopardy did not protect against multiple punishments for the same offense because that protection is not explicit in the constitutional language, failed because the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution has been held in N.C. v. Pearce, 393 US 711, 23 L Ed 2d 656, 89 S Ct 2072 (1969), to protect against multiple punishments for the same offense, and the Montana Constitution provides at least the same protection or greater. Further, the fact that legislative modification of the felony assault (now assault with a weapon) statute could achieve the same result as the present sentencing scheme did not mean that double jeopardy did not apply in this case. St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), and St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), followed in St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 31, 293 M 268, 975 P2d 321, 56 St. Rep. 139 (1999), St. v. Roullier, 1999 MT 37, 293 M 304, 977 P2d 970, 56 St. Rep. 157 (1999), St. v. Aguilar, 1999 MT 159, 295 M 133, 983 P2d 345, 56 St. Rep. 629 (1999), St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000), St. v. Weitzel, 2000 MT 86, 299 M 192, 998 P2d 1154, 57 St. Rep. 368 (2000), and St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Park, 2001 MT 157, 306 M 98, 30 P3d 1062 (2001). Aguilar was followed in St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000). Guillaume will not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). Nichols was overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that the Supreme Court refused to retroactively apply Guillaume.

Unloaded, Inoperable BB Gun Not "Dangerous Weapon" for Sentence Enhancement Purposes: Defendant pleaded guilty to robbery and received a 15-year prison sentence. The District Court also concluded that the defendant used a dangerous weapon, a gun, in the commission of an offense and increased the sentence by 4 years. The defendant appealed, claiming that despite the victims' fears or beliefs concerning the gun, the undisputed facts established that a "dangerous weapon" was not used during the robbery because examination of the weapon revealed that it was a broken, unloaded, and inoperable BB gun. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed, ruling that District Courts must analyze the weapon itself, not the subjective beliefs and fears of the victims, to determine whether a "dangerous weapon" was used during commission of an offense. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Wilson, 282 M 134, 936 P2d 316, 54 St. Rep. 278 (1997).

"Any Offense" Includes Offenses Having Use of Weapon as Element of Offense: Zabawa argued that applying the weapons enhancement statute to him constituted double jeopardy because the use of a weapon was an element of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) to which he had pleaded guilty and that the use in the statute of "any offense" was ambiguous and should be interpreted to mean only offenses in which the use of a weapon was not an element of the offense. The Supreme Court held that the plain meaning of "any" included all offenses and that there is a presumption that the Legislature enacts a law with knowledge of existing laws and, in the present case, that would mean that the legislature used the term "any" knowing full well that there were offenses for which the use of a weapon was an element of the offense. St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996).

Weapons Enhancement Statute Not Double Jeopardy When Legislative Intent Clear Statute Intended to Impose Cumulative Punishments: Zabawa argued that applying the weapons enhancement statute to him constituted double jeopardy because the use of a weapon was an element of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) to which he had pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court held that applying the weapons enhancement statute did not constitute double jeopardy because the language of the statute clearly showed the Legislature's intent to impose cumulative punishments and that the United States Supreme Court in Mo. v. Hunter, 459 US 359 (1983), had ruled that cumulative punishments imposed in a single trial do not violate the double jeopardy clause of the fifth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999). See also St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Error by Original Judge on Maximum Sentence — Improper Guilty Plea: Prior to accepting a plea agreement, defendant was incorrectly advised by the original presiding judge that the maximum sentence possible for two counts of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) arising from the same incident was 30 years rather than 40 years. When the original judge recused himself, a second judge sentenced the defendant to 40 years. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred in imposing a 40-year sentence and instructed the District Court to modify the sentencing order to provide defendant a sentence no longer than the maximum sentence that had been advised by the original judge. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Brown, 262 M 499, 865 P2d 282, 50 St. Rep. 1658 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995), followed in St. v. Roach, 1999 MT 38, 293 M 311, 975 P2d 817, 56 St. Rep. 161 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Enhancement for Single Offense, Not Single Incident: Byers urged the adoption of the California "single incident" rule, which restricts weapons enhancement sentencing considerations to a single period of time. However, the clear language of this section dictates an enhancement of from 2 years to 10 years for each offense and in no way restricts sentencing to a single transaction. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Use of Aggregate Sentence Sufficient: Byers was unequivocally assessed 75 years for each of two counts of deliberate homicide, and the sentence was enhanced by an aggregate of 15 years under this section because a weapon was used. Byers contended that the sentence enhancement constituted a general sentence that should have been divided between the two offenses. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the specific term of 15 years was assessed over and above the specific terms of 75 years, so there was nothing general about the sentence. In a situation in which both crimes are the same, the use of an aggregate sentence within the parameters of this section is sufficient. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Sentence for Felony Assault (Now Assault With a Weapon) and Knowing Use of Firearm — Sentence Within Statutory Guideline Not Excessive: Defendant was sentenced to 10 years in prison for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and to a consecutive term of 10 years with 5 years suspended for the knowing use of a firearm during commission of the offense, was designated a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for purposes of parole eligibility, and was fined $50,000 to be paid out of proceeds recovered in a pending civil suit. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) Defendant contended the sentence was excessive given the nature of the offense and his prior record. However, the sentence was within the statutory guidelines for the offense and therefore did not violate the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992), followed in St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202, 52 St. Rep. 1019 (1995).

Knowingly — Alleged Accidental Shooting: Defendant's voluntary act of grabbing for a gun is sufficient to meet the "knowingly" requirement of the enhancement statute. St. v. Longneck, 247 M 95, 804 P2d 1044, 48 St. Rep. 107 (1991).

Supplying Weapon Used in Crime Characterized as Use: The defendant argued that he only supplied the weapon used in a robbery and murder and should not have been sentenced under the weapons enhancement statute. The Supreme Court held that providing the weapon knowing that it would be used in a crime constituted "otherwise using a firearm" under the statute. St. v. Mazurkiewicz, 245 M 172, 799 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 1962 (1990). See also St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999).

Standing to Challenge Constitutionality of Weapon Enhancement and Dangerous Offender Statutes: To challenge the constitutionality of a criminal statute or procedure, the defendant must show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the law in question. The Supreme Court held that a defendant had standing to challenge both Montana's weapon enhancement statute and dangerous offender statute (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) because he faced direct injury to his liberty interests through application of those laws. St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), followed in St. v. Mazurkiewicz, 245 M 172, 799 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 1962 (1990), and, with regard to standing to challenge criminal restitution statutes, in St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Applicability to Negligent Homicide: By its terms, the enhancement statute applies to the commission of any offense, including negligent homicide. St. v. Redfern, 228 M 311, 741 P2d 1339, 44 St. Rep. 1547 (1987).

Federal Due Process Rights: Enhancement of sentences did not violate federal due process rights even though the information under which defendant was charged did not allege violation of this section. LaMere v. Risley, 827 F2d 622 (9th Cir. 1987), followed in Nichols v. McCormick, 929 F2d 507 (9th Cir. 1991).

Application of Section 46-18-222 When Maximum Sentence Given: Section 46-18-221 requires a sentence of from 2 to 10 years when a person found guilty of any offense used a firearm during the commission of the offense. Defendant was sentenced to 10 years under this section. Therefore, 46-18-222, stating when a mandatory minimum sentence does not apply, could not be invoked because defendant was sentenced to the maximum possible sentence under 46-18-221. The purpose of 46-18-222 is to allow a judge who would otherwise have to pronounce the minimum sentence to sentence a defendant to less than the minimum sentence. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986).

Additional Sentence Only for Felony Offenses: This statute applies only to a situation in which the underlying conviction is for a felony. St. v. Trimmer, 214 M 427, 694 P2d 490, 42 St. Rep. 77 (1985), followed and clarified in St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996).

Enhanced Sentence — Ex-Policeman — Homicide by Shooting — No Equal Protection Violation: Defendant convicted of negligent homicide with a revolver was given an extra 10 years for committing the offense with a dangerous weapon. His claim that he was punished for being an ex-policeman and that thus his equal protection rights were violated was clearly without merit. He cited no authority for the claim. Given the evidence produced at trial, holding him to a greater knowledge of the risks inherent in his actions for the purpose of deciding whether to enhance his negligent homicide sentence was unquestionably reasonable and therefore constitutionally sustainable. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Negligent Homicide — Additional Sentence for Knowingly Using Gun Not Prohibited: That defendant was convicted of "negligent" homicide with a gun did not prohibit him from being given an additional sentence for "knowingly" using a dangerous weapon during the offense. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Information Not Required to Allege Use of Weapon: Defendant contended his sentence could not be enhanced under this section because the allegation that a weapon was used was not contained in the information. The information filed in a criminal prosecution need not contain a specific allegation of the use of a dangerous weapon if the charging instrument otherwise properly identifies the crime for which the defendant is charged. The statute is for punishment and not one to define an element of the crime charged. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983). See also St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), and St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Consecutive Sentence Mandate — Sentences Prior to Enactment of Mandate: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide and sentenced to 10 years and to an additional consecutive 5 years for the knowing use of a gun while committing the offense. At the time of sentencing, the court had discretion to make the 5 years run either consecutively or concurrently. This section was later amended to require that a sentence run consecutively. Defendant's contention on appeal that it was error to require the 5 years to run consecutively went to the equity of the requirement and not to its legality and should be directed to the Sentence Review Board rather than to the Supreme Court on appeal from the sentence. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Consistent Mental States — Knowing Use of Dangerous Weapon and Negligent Homicide: There is no conflict between the mental state described in this section, requiring the knowing use of a firearm or other dangerous weapon while engaged in the commission of an offense, and the negligent mental state in the statute making criminal homicide negligent homicide when it is committed negligently. It is not a denial of due process to find one guilty of negligent homicide and to further find that he knowingly used a firearm during commission of the offense and therefore enhance the penalty under this section. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Additional Penalty for Use of Weapon in Committing Crime — Not Double Jeopardy: A defendant, convicted of an offense committed with a weapon and given an additional sentence under 46-18-221, is not subjected to multiple punishments for the same offense in violation of the double jeopardy clauses of the federal and state constitutions because 46-18-221 does not constitute a separate offense or penalize the defendant for a separate offense; his sentence for an underlying offense is enhanced based upon the existence of an additional factor, the use of a weapon. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), cited in St. v. Spurlock, 225 M 238, 731 P2d 1315, 44 St. Rep. 200 (1987), followed in St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988), and St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), and distinguished in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999).

Sentence Enhanced — Defendant Not Sentenced for Crime Not Charged: Defendant was convicted of the crime of aggravated burglary with a weapon, and the charging document, while omitting any mention of additional sentencing under 46-18-221, did mention that he was armed with a knife while committing the crime and was sentenced under 46-18-221 for an additional 5 years for the use of the knife. The defendant was not sentenced for a crime with which he was not charged because 46-18-221 does not create a separate substantive offense but enhances the penalty for an underlying offense. The defendant was not denied due process due to the additional sentencing because the jury was instructed on the crime of aggravated burglary with a weapon and found him guilty of that crime. (See 2001 amendment to this section by Ch. 16.) St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Considerations for Application of Mandatory Minimum Sentence: Section 46-18-222, prior to amendment by sec. 1, Ch. 396, L. 1979, provided that although a loaded weapon was involved in the alleged assault, where no serious bodily injury was inflicted on the victim, the mandatory minimum sentence prescribed by law did not apply. It was therefore error to impose the minimum mandatory sentence. St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050 (1979).

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 in introductory clause near end after "46-18-502(3)" inserted "and restrictions on parole eligibility"; in (6) near beginning after "45-5-502(3)" inserted "45-5-503(4), 45-5-507(5), 45-5-601(3), 45-5-602(3), 45-5-603(2)(c), or 45-5-625(4)", after "determines" inserted "based on the findings contained in a sexual offender evaluation report prepared by a qualified sexual offender evaluator pursuant to the provisions of 46-23-509", and after "offender" inserted "while incarcerated, while in a residential treatment facility, or while"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to judge for references to court and substituted references to offender for references to defendant; in introductory clause before "46-18-219" inserted "mandatory life sentences prescribed by", substituted "46-18-201(1)(b)" for "46-18-201(5) through (7)", and inserted reference to 46-18-205; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 125 near end of introductory phrase substituted "46-18-201(5) through (7)" for "46-18-201(4) through (6)"; and in (6) substituted "protection of the victim and society" for "protection of society".

Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, near middle of introductory clause after "state", inserted "and 46-18-219".

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-222, enacted as sec. 14 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 at beginning of (5) substituted "in a case in which the threat of bodily injury or actual infliction of bodily injury is an actual element of the crime" for "where applicable"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (6) providing an exception from the mandatory minimum sentence and allowing deferral or suspension of mandatory sentence of imprisonment for sexual assault involving a person under age 16 if the court concludes treatment in local community is better for rehabilitation of defendant and protection of society; and made minor changes in style.

1987 Amendment: Near end of introductory clause, after "subsections", deleted "(3)" and inserted "(6)".

1983 Amendments: Chapter 392, near end of introductory clause, inserted reference to 46-18-224.

Chapter 532 inserted last sentence of (2) stating that voluntary intoxication or a drugged condition is not an impairment for purposes of subsection (2).

Source: The subsection (2) exception inserted by sec. 1, Ch. 532, L. 1983, is modeled on the Wash. Rev. Code Ann., section 46.61.024, and Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann., section 28-622.01.

1981 Amendments: Chapter 207 inserted ", and (5)" after "prescribed by subsections (3), (4)" in the first sentence.

Chapter 327 changed the reference to "46-18-502(2)" to "46-18-502(3)" to reflect amendment of that section.

Interim Study Committee Bill: Chapter 327, L. 1981 (HB 12), was introduced at the request of the interim Committee on Corrections Policy and Facility Needs. See committee report, Legislative Council, 1980.

Case Notes

Ten-Year Sentence for Criminal Distribution of Dangerous Drugs Affirmed Despite Finding of Impaired Mental Capacity: Novak was sentenced to 10 years with 6 years suspended for selling 0.06 grams of methamphetamine to an undercover informant, despite a finding that Novak was eligible for an exception to the mandatory minimum sentence because of impaired mental capacity. Novak appealed the sentence, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The fact that Novak was eligible for a sentence exception did not mean that he was entitled to it. The sentencing court's oral pronouncement of sentence complied with statutory requirements by providing adequate reasons for imposing the sentence, and the sentence fell within the parameters of 45-9-101(4) and was not illegal. St. v. Novak, 2008 MT 157, 343 M 292, 183 P3d 887 (2008).

Mandatory Life Sentence Not Violative of Due Process, Cruel and Unusual Punishment, or Separation of Powers — Exception Properly Considered: Webb pleaded guilty to second offense sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to life in prison without parole pursuant to 46-18-219. Webb appealed the sentence on grounds that the mandatory life sentence violated procedural and substantive due process, the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and the separation of powers doctrine. Webb also asserted that the sentencing court failed to properly consider the exception to mandatory sentencing set out in subsection (3) of this section. The Supreme Court affirmed. The sentencing court properly considered the exception and did not abuse its broad discretion in finding no unusual and substantial distress. The sentencing court offered Webb all the procedural due process necessary and did not violate substantive due process because the sentence fit within the statutory sentencing limits. Webb's contention that life without parole was cruel and unusual punishment failed because the sentence was commensurate with the gravity of the crime and consistent with state sentencing and correctional policy. The argument that mandatory sentences violate the separation of powers doctrine also failed because it is in the Legislature's province to distinguish between criminal offenses and to establish punishments, and enactment of 46-18-219 was based on constitutional principles and Montana public policy. St. v. Webb, 2005 MT 5, 325 M 317, 106 P3d 521 (2005). See also St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817 (1984), and St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214 (1992).

Mandatory Minimum Sentence for Incest Properly Applied — Victims Under Age Sixteen: Bailey was convicted of incest with two victims under 16 years old, and Bailey was more than 3 years older than both victims. The District Court determined that 45-5-507(4) required the imposition of a mandatory minimum sentence of 4 years and sentenced Bailey to 10 years with the Department of Corrections, with 6 years suspended, on each count. Bailey asserted error, but the Supreme Court examined the sentence for legality and affirmed. The 4-year mandatory minimum sentence in 45-5-507(4) clearly applied, and 46-18-205 did not come into play because none of the exceptions in this section to the mandatory minimum sentence for incest existed, so the District Court did not err in sentencing Bailey. St. v. Bailey, 2004 MT 87, 320 M 501, 87 P3d 1032 (2004), following St. v. Fauque, 2000 MT 168, 300 M 307, 4 P3d 651 (2000).

Failure to Raise Sentencing Objections Before District Court — Issue Not Preserved for Appeal: Tucker pleaded guilty to attempted aggravated assault with a weapon. At the sentencing hearing, Tucker argued that one of the sentencing exceptions applied to him because his mental capacity was impaired because of his transsexualism combined with the stress of his fiance's custody battles. The District Court disagreed and added the minimum 2-year weapon enhancement to his sentence. At no time did Tucker complain to the court that its findings were inadequate under 46-18-223 or allege that the sentence was illegal, excessive, or improper. Instead, Tucker argued on appeal that the sentencing court erred as a matter of law in failing to state the reasons why the sentencing exception did not apply. The Supreme Court refused to remand for resentencing because Tucker failed to bring the allegations of sentencing error to the attention of the District Court in a timely manner. The purpose of the contemporaneous objection requirement is to give the District Court the first opportunity to correct any error. Failure to do so constitutes a waiver of the right to appeal the issue. St. v. Tucker, 2000 MT 255, 301 M 466, 10 P3d 832, 57 St. Rep. 1046 (2000).

Failure to Include Written Findings of Fact Regarding Exceptions From Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Reversible Error: The District Court sentenced Sprinkle to 20 years for felony drug offenses pursuant to the mandatory minimum sentence requirement in 45-9-101, concluding that none of the exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing in this section applied. However, the court failed to comply with 46-18-223, which requires the sentencing court to state in the judgment the reasons for its decision in writing and to identify the facts relied upon in making the decision. On appeal, Sprinkle asserted that he was entitled to an exception to mandatory minimum sentencing because his participation in the drug transaction was relatively minor. Without the required written findings of fact, the Supreme Court had no basis upon which to review the judgment, so the judgment was vacated and remanded for entry of findings of fact to support the conclusion that exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing did not apply. St. v. Sprinkle, 2000 MT 188, 300 M 405, 4 P3d 1204, 57 St. Rep. 746 (2000).

No Claim to Unconstitutional Effect of Mandatory Minimum Sentence When Defendant Not Subject to Mandatory Minimum: Duffy was sentenced to 20 years for each offense of sexual abuse of his daughters, who were less than 16 years old at the time of the offense. On appeal, Duffy claimed that because of their ages, 45-5-503 and 45-5-507 required a minimum 4-year prison term, which deprived him of equal protection and due process because he did not qualify for the exception to the minimum term in subsection (5) of this section regarding instances involving a lack of serious bodily injury, asserting that he was similarly situated to persons convicted of sexual assault but treated differently because those offenders could qualify for the exception. However, before Duffy could claim standing to complain that he was unconstitutionally affected by the mandatory minimum sentences, he must have been subjected to those sentences, which was not the case here. Thus, Duffy was not affected by the disparate treatment of sex offenders based on the nature of the offenses and lacked standing to challenge the sentencing scheme on equal protection or due process grounds. St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000).

Four-Year Mandatory Minimum Sentence for Sexual Intercourse With Minor Properly Applied: By plea agreement, Fauque pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault against his 14-year-old daughter. The District Court concluded that the 4-year minimum sentence provided in 45-5-503 applied and that Fauque had failed to establish entitlement to any exceptions to the mandatory minimum sentence provided in this section. The court sentenced Fauque to 25 years on each count, with all but 4 years suspended and the sentences to run concurrently. Fauque appealed on grounds that a direct conflict existed between the mandatory minimum sentence for sexual intercourse without consent when the victim is less than 16 and the defendant is 3 or more years older contained in 45-5-503 and the 30-day mandatory minimum sentence for sexual intercourse without consent when the victim is less than 16 contained in 46-18-201 (see 1999 amendment and enactment of 46-18-205). The Supreme Court examined the legislative intent of both sentencing provisions and found no conflict in this case. The 4-year mandatory minimum provided in 45-5-503 clearly applied to Fauque, who was 53 years old at the time that he assaulted his 14-year-old daughter and who did not argue any sentencing exception under this section. The mandatory minimum (now contained in 46-18-205) in 46-18-201 simply disallowed suspension of the first 30 days of a sentence under 45-5-503 under any circumstances, even if an exception existed under this section. Because no exception existed here, 46-18-201 did not come into play, so the Supreme Court affirmed Fauque's 4-year mandatory minimum sentence pursuant to 45-5-503. St. v. Fauque, 2000 MT 168, 300 M 307, 4 P3d 651, 57 St. Rep. 693 (2000).

Evidence of Voluntary Mental Impairment Insufficient to Trigger Waiver of Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Hearing Not Required: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court noted that evidence of Keith's reduced mental capacity was based on Keith's voluntary ingestion of alcohol and prescription drugs and that under subsection (2) of this section, the court could not waive the mandatory minimum sentence. Citing numerous cases, the Supreme Court held that the statute does permit the sentencing court to reject the mandatory minimum sentence if the court determines that defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired during the commission of the offense but that the statute does not apply in cases when the maximum sentence or any sentence greater than the mandatory minimum is imposed. Here, there was no indication that the sentencing court ever intended to sentence Keith to either the 2-year mandatory minimum or to a period less than the 2-year mandatory minimum, so the exceptions did not apply. Further, because the exceptions were not an issue, Keith was not entitled to a hearing pursuant to 46-18-223. Nevertheless, in this case, the sentencing court did hold a hearing on its own motion but did not then abuse its discretion by denying Keith's request for a continuance of the sentencing hearing to allow evidence of Keith's mental capacity. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Exceptions to Mandatory Sentencing Not Applicable When Sentence Is Greater Than Minimum Sentence and Findings Not Required: Zabawa argued that the lower court erred in failing to apply to him the exceptions to the mandatory minimum sentence and also erred in failing to include in the judgment a written statement of the reasons that the lower court declined to apply the exceptions. The Supreme Court held that the exceptions do not apply in cases in which the lower court sentences the offender to more than the minimum sentence. In such cases, there is no requirement that the court make findings on why it did not apply the exceptions. St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), followed in St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), and St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Statute Inapplicable Notwithstanding Difference Between Oral and Written Sentence: Graveley was convicted of solicitation to commit deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court announced Graveley's sentence of 40 years in the custody of the Department of Corrections, with the first 10 years in a prison environment. The District Court's written judgment omitted the reference to the first 10 years. The Supreme Court held that a review of the oral record showed that the District Court was not predisposed to sentencing Graveley to the 10-year minimum sentence. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's oral pronouncement did not amount to a 10-year sentence, but a 40-year sentence with 10 years in a prison environment, and that the District Court reiterated the 40-year sentence in writing. Because this was not a minimum sentence, the Supreme Court held that this section was inapplicable. St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996).

Impairment of Mental Capacity Insufficient to Constitute Defense — Suspension of Sentence Proper: Defendant was convicted of attempt (deliberate homicide) and use of a dangerous weapon, for which he was sentenced to 10 years and 2 years, respectively. The District Court, after examining defendant's mental capacity at the time of the offense, held that incarceration was not appropriate in light of defendant's stellar community service record, the nature of the offense, the unlikelihood that defendant would ever attempt to harm the victim again, and defendant's remorse and lack of a previous criminal record. The court suspended both sentences, except for 15 days already served, and added a sentence of 4,000 hours of community service, citing St. v. Arbgast, 202 M 220, 656 P2d 828 (1983), as authority for suspending the mandatory minimum sentences. The Supreme Court distinguished Arbgast but affirmed the sentence suspension because defendant's mental capacity at the time of the offense was significantly impaired, but not so impaired as to constitute a defense. St. v. Niemi, 252 M 531, 830 P2d 1280, 49 St. Rep. 141 (1992).

Exception Properly Applied to Mandatory Sentence for Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: The state contended that the District Court erred in applying the exception contained in subsection (5) of this section when suspending all but 30 days of a sentence for sexual intercourse without consent because no serious bodily injury was inflicted on the victim. The Supreme Court cited numerous federal cases in resolving the ambiguity between 45-5-503(2) and subsection (5) of this section, concluding that because the threat or infliction of bodily harm may, depending on the circumstances, be an element of the offense of sexual intercourse without consent, the exception to the minimum sentence when no serious bodily harm was inflicted is applicable to that offense. Ambiguity regarding the applicability of the exception must be resolved in favor of leniency. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991), followed in St. v. Van Robinson, 248 M 528, 813 P2d 967, 48 St. Rep. 558 (1991).

Application of Section 46-18-222 When Maximum Sentence Given: Section 46-18-221 requires a sentence of from 2 to 10 years when a person found guilty of any offense used a firearm during the commission of the offense. Defendant was sentenced to 10 years under this section. Therefore, 46-18-222, stating when a mandatory minimum sentence does not apply, could not be invoked because defendant was sentenced to the maximum possible sentence under 46-18-221. The purpose of 46-18-222 is to allow a judge who would otherwise have to pronounce the minimum sentence to sentence a defendant to less than the minimum sentence. St. v. Nichols, 222 M 71, 720 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 1068 (1986), followed in St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184, 53 St. Rep. 239 (1996). See also St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Maximum Sentence Imposed — Refusal of Hearing on Exception to Mandatory Minimum Sentence — No Error: Since defendant was given the maximum sentence for negligent homicide, there was no chance he would be given less than the mandatory minimum and it was therefore not error to refuse a hearing on whether one of the exceptions to imposing the mandatory minimum sentence was applicable to him. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984). See also St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), and St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202, 52 St. Rep. 1019 (1995).

Sentence in Excess of Mandatory Minimum Imposed After Finding of Mitigating Circumstance: Defendant was convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, defense counsel asked that 46-18-222 be applied to defendant and that the 2-year minimum sentence for mitigated deliberate homicide not be imposed. The trial judge applied the provision of 46-18-222 relating to impaired mental capacity to defendant but sentenced defendant to more than the mandatory minimum sentence for mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence, ruling that since the trial judge had given consideration to defendant's situation and had given specific reasons for the sentence imposed, the trial judge's failure to state specifically that 46-18-222 did not apply did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Zampich, 205 M 231, 667 P2d 955, 40 St. Rep. 1235 (1983).

Killing Person Who Killed Defendant's Friend — Unusual or Substantial Duress Not Found: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide after a shootout. At the trial he stated that he only intended to "wing" the victim, that victim had shot defendant's friend so defendant shot victim, that defendant only intended to wound victim, that "nobody sticks a gun in my face and gets away with it", that victim deserved to die and did not deserve to live, and that victim killed defendant's friend, so defendant killed victim. Defendant also had the presence of mind to temporarily incapacitate victim by kicking him in the groin and killed victim while victim was running away from defendant and posed no immediate threat to defendant. Although the circumstances of the shootout imposed a certain amount of duress upon defendant, it was not unusual or substantial so as to allow application of this section and except defendant from the mandatory minimum sentence. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Level of Impairment — Applicability of Section: This section is only applicable to bring a convicted defendant under the exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing provisions. The degree of impairment contemplated in this section is not significant enough to constitute a defense to the prosecution or to require commitment and is to be considered separately from conviction and from any claims made under 46-14-311 and 46-14-312. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Finding of No Mitigating Factors Supported in Record — Alcohol and Sexual Problems: Where the trial court considered defendant's drinking and sexual problems but concluded that those conditions did not excuse defendant from accountability for his acts, and the evidence presented at the hearing and in the presentence investigation report supported the trial court's conclusion, there was no abuse of discretion in sentencing defendant as a persistent felony offender. [A 1983 amendment provided that voluntary intoxication is not a mental capacity impairment under this section.] St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Considerations for Application of Mandatory Minimum Sentence: Section 46-18-222, prior to amendment by sec. 1, Ch. 396, L. 1979, provided that although a loaded weapon was involved in the alleged assault, where no serious bodily injury was inflicted on the victim, the mandatory minimum sentence prescribed by law did not apply. It was therefore error to impose the minimum mandatory sentence. St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050 (1979).

46-18-223. Hearing to determine application of exceptions.

Case Notes

Failure to Raise Sentencing Objections Before District Court — Issue Not Preserved for Appeal: Tucker pleaded guilty to attempted aggravated assault with a weapon. At the sentencing hearing, Tucker argued that one of the sentencing exceptions applied to him because his mental capacity was impaired because of his transsexualism combined with the stress of his fiance's custody battles. The District Court disagreed and added the minimum 2-year weapon enhancement to his sentence. At no time did Tucker complain to the court that its findings were inadequate under this section or allege that the sentence was illegal, excessive, or improper. Instead, Tucker argued on appeal that the sentencing court erred as a matter of law in failing to state the reasons why the sentencing exception did not apply. The Supreme Court refused to remand for resentencing because Tucker failed to bring the allegations of sentencing error to the attention of the District Court in a timely manner. The purpose of the contemporaneous objection requirement is to give the District Court the first opportunity to correct any error. Failure to do so constitutes a waiver of the right to appeal the issue. St. v. Tucker, 2000 MT 255, 301 M 466, 10 P3d 832, 57 St. Rep. 1046 (2000).

Failure to Include Written Findings of Fact Regarding Exceptions From Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Reversible Error: The District Court sentenced Sprinkle to 20 years for felony drug offenses pursuant to the mandatory minimum sentence requirement in 45-9-101, concluding that none of the exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing in 46-18-222 applied. However, the court failed to comply with this section, which requires the sentencing court to state in the judgment the reasons for its decision in writing and to identify the facts relied upon in making the decision. On appeal, Sprinkle asserted that he was entitled to an exception to mandatory minimum sentencing because his participation in the drug transaction was relatively minor. Without the required written findings of fact, the Supreme Court had no basis upon which to review the judgment, so the judgment was vacated and remanded for entry of findings of fact to support the conclusion that exceptions to mandatory minimum sentencing did not apply. St. v. Sprinkle, 2000 MT 188, 300 M 405, 4 P3d 1204, 57 St. Rep. 746 (2000).

Evidence of Voluntary Mental Impairment Insufficient to Trigger Waiver of Mandatory Minimum Sentence — Hearing Not Required: Keith was sentenced to 10 years in prison plus 10 years for use of a weapon, with 15 years suspended, for criminal endangerment. At the sentencing hearing, the District Court noted that evidence of Keith's reduced mental capacity was based on Keith's voluntary ingestion of alcohol and prescription drugs and that under 46-18-222(2), the court could not waive the mandatory minimum sentence. Citing numerous cases, the Supreme Court held that the statute does permit the sentencing court to reject the mandatory minimum sentence if the court determines that defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired during the commission of the offense but that the statute does not apply in cases when the maximum sentence or any sentence greater than the mandatory minimum is imposed. Here, there was no indication that the sentencing court ever intended to sentence Keith to either the 2-year mandatory minimum or to a period less than the 2-year mandatory minimum, so the exceptions did not apply. Further, because the exceptions were not an issue, Keith was not entitled to a hearing pursuant to this section. Nevertheless, in this case, the sentencing court did hold a hearing on its own motion but did not then abuse its discretion by denying Keith's request for a continuance of the sentencing hearing to allow evidence of Keith's mental capacity. St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000).

Exceptions to Mandatory Sentencing Not Applicable When Sentence Is Greater Than Minimum Sentence and Findings Not Required: Zabawa argued that the lower court erred in failing to apply to him the exceptions to the mandatory minimum sentence and also erred in failing to include in the judgment a written statement of the reasons that the lower court declined to apply the exceptions. The Supreme Court held that the exceptions do not apply in cases in which the lower court sentences the offender to more than the minimum sentence. In such cases, there is no requirement that the court make findings on why it did not apply the exceptions. St. v. Zabawa, 279 M 307, 928 P2d 151, 53 St. Rep. 1162 (1996), followed in St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), and St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Sentence in Excess of Mandatory Minimum Imposed After Finding of Mitigating Circumstance: Defendant was convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide. At the sentencing hearing, defense counsel asked that 46-18-222 be applied to defendant and that the 2-year minimum sentence for mitigated deliberate homicide not be imposed. The trial judge applied the provision of 46-18-222 relating to impaired mental capacity to defendant but sentenced defendant to more than the mandatory minimum sentence for mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence, ruling that since the trial judge had given consideration to defendant's situation and had given specific reasons for the sentence imposed, the trial judge's failure to state specifically that 46-18-222 did not apply did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Zampich, 205 M 231, 667 P2d 955, 40 St. Rep. 1235 (1983).

Admissible Testimony — Testimony Claimed to Be Retrial of More Serious Prior Charge: Mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was reversed, and a negligent homicide plea bargain was made at a second trial following remand. It was not error to admit, in presentence hearing under this section, testimony claimed by defendant to constitute a retrial of the original mitigated deliberate homicide charge. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Finding of No Mitigating Factors Supported in Record — Alcohol and Sexual Problems: Where the trial court considered defendant's drinking and sexual problems but concluded that those conditions did not excuse defendant from accountability for his acts, and the evidence presented at the hearing and in the presentence investigation report supported the trial court's conclusion, there was no abuse of discretion in sentencing defendant as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

46-18-224. Additional sentence for offense committed while carrying a handgun loaded with armor-piercing ammunition.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 524 in (1) at beginning inserted "If the provisions of 46-1-401 have been complied with"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Case Notes

Record Not Reflective of Defendant's Ability to Pay Restitution — Remand: After pleading guilty to three counts of illegal branding, Mikesell was ordered to pay restitution, based in part on evidence of Mikesell's net worth. However, the record did not reflect all of Mikesell's liabilities and his ability to pay restitution from a ranching operation that was losing money. Mikesell was entitled to have the restitution award supported by evidence, and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for further findings regarding Mikesell's ability to pay restitution and the setting of restitution payments accordingly. St. v. Mikesell, 2004 MT 146, 321 M 462, 91 P3d 1273 (2004).

46-18-225. Sentencing of nonviolent felony offenders — criteria — alternatives to be considered — court to state reasons for imprisonment.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 517 in (1) at end of first sentence inserted "or a day reporting program provided for in 53-1-203"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 52 inserted (1) requiring consideration of alternatives to imprisonment for nonviolent felony offenders; in (2) in introductory clause substituted "sentencing judge" for "court"; in (2)(f) after "criminal act or" inserted "if the offender has a prior history of conviction for a criminal act, the offender"; inserted (3) requiring the sentencing judge to state reasons why alternatives to prison were not selected; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 189 in introductory clause, in (1), and in (2) substituted "a state prison" for "the state prison or the women's correctional system".

1995 Amendments: Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in introductory clause, after "offender", inserted "to whom 46-18-219 does not apply".

Chapter 546 in introductory clause, (1), and (2) substituted "women's correctional system" for "women's correctional center". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-225, enacted as sec. 15 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 10 throughout section substituted references to the Women's Correctional Center for references to a women's correctional facility; and made minor changes in style.

Effective Date: Section 8, Ch. 794, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] is effective July 1, 1991."

Case Notes

Prison Sentence Affirmed Given Sentencing Court's Adequate Consideration of Prison Alternatives for Nonviolent Offender: Shults was sentenced to 50 years in prison as a persistent felony offender after being convicted of felony theft and felony escape. Shults appealed on grounds that the sentence should be remanded for further consideration of alternative punishment because Shults was a nonviolent offender. The Supreme Court declined to remand the sentence, noting that the sentencing court provided a 10-page statement explaining its reasons for imposing the prison sentence, including a recitation of Shults's 18-year criminal history — the commission of crimes that resulted in suffering for numerous victims, Shults's numerous unsuccessful opportunities to reform, and the fact that Shults continually used his intelligence and skills to try to subvert the justice system. The sentencing court clearly considered alternatives to prison and explained why incarceration was chosen. The findings were not clearly erroneous, and the court did not abuse its broad discretion in imposing the prison sentence, which the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Use of Weapon by Person in Group Robbery but No Evidence That Defendant Used Weapon — Sentence as Violent Offender Reversed: Ferguson was one of a group of persons that attempted a robbery. It was uncontested that someone in the group brandished a knife, but testimony was conflicting whether it was Ferguson. Nevertheless, the trial court enhanced Ferguson's sentence because he was part of a crime of violence when a knife was used. However, the mere finding that someone in the group used a knife did not rise to the level of a finding that Ferguson used a knife. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed that part of Ferguson's sentence and remanded for sentencing Ferguson as a nonviolent offender. St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

No Evidence That Corporal Punishment Caused Mental Health Condition of Victim — Violent Felony Offender Designation Reversed: The sentencing court determined that Mason's excessive use of force in punishing a child with a belt constituted a violent offense and caused the child to develop a serious mental health condition, so Mason was designated a violent felony offender. However, the state produced no evidence that Mason caused the child's mental health condition or that the belt was used in a manner capable of producing death. Because the belt was not a deadly weapon, Mason's conduct did not satisfy the definition of crime of violence in 46-18-104. The violent felony offender designation was reversed. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003).

Error in Refusing to Classify Defendant as First-Time, Nonviolent Offender Following Conviction for Criminal Endangerment: Hocevar was convicted of criminal endangerment, which required a finding that her conduct created a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury. The District Court refused Hocevar's request to be treated as a first-time, nonviolent felony offender because she committed a crime of violence. However, the definition of crime of violence in 46-18-104 means a crime in which an offender causes a serious bodily injury or death. Given the various options that were available to the jury, it could not be determined on appeal whether the jury found that Hocevar actually caused a substantial risk of death or merely caused a risk of serious permanent disfigurement or protracted loss or impairment of the function or process of a bodily member or organ. In light of the uncertainty, the District Court committed reversible error in concluding that Hocevar committed an act of violence and in refusing to classify Hocevar as a first-time, nonviolent felony offender. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Misdemeanor Offender Not Entitled to Consideration of Mandatory Sentencing Requirement Applicable to Nonviolent Felony Offenders: Renee was sentenced to incarceration for three misdemeanor violations. On appeal, Renee contended that because the misdemeanors were nonviolent offenses, the District Court erred in not complying with 46-18-201 by considering alternatives to sentencing for Renee's nonviolent offenses. However, the plain language of 46-18-104(3) applies only to defendants who commit a particular kind of felony that is nonviolent. Therefore, a misdemeanor offender is not entitled to have a sentencing court consider the mandatory sentencing requirements of 46-18-201 and this section, which apply only to felony offenders. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999).

Nonviolent Felony Offenders Not Similarly Situated With Misdemeanor Offenders — No Equal Protection Violation in Different Felony and Misdemeanor Sentencing Schemes: Renee contended that Montana's nonviolent felony offender sentencing statutes violated his equal protection rights to physical liberty as a misdemeanor offender because both kinds of offenders may be subject to imprisonment, thus both felony and misdemeanor offenders are similarly situated classes dealt with unequally under the law. The Supreme Court disagreed. Relying on Tigner v. Tex., 310 US 141, 84 L Ed 1124, 60 S Ct 879 (1940), the court found that the constitution does not require that things that are different in fact or opinion be treated in law as though they were the same. Misdemeanor and felony offenders are not similarly situated because of differences in the quality and duration of punishment, as well as the long-term effects on an individual's liberty interest brought about by a felony conviction as compared to that for a misdemeanor conviction. Renee failed to make the necessary threshold showing that misdemeanor and nonviolent felony offenders are similarly situated, so the equal protection challenge failed. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999), distinguishing In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997).

District Court Required to Consider Alternatives — Alternative Sentences Allowed to Be Imposed: Alden pleaded guilty to several offenses, and at the sentencing hearing, the District Court considered but rejected alternatives to terms of imprisonment. The District Court's rejection was based upon testimony and written documents. Because there was testimony supporting Alden's contention that he should not have been sentenced to prison, Alden appealed the sentence. The Supreme Court held that the standard applicable to the exercise of the District Court's discretion is whether the law was incorrectly applied or whether the District Court's findings are clearly erroneous. The Supreme Court noted that the applicable statutes require the District Court to consider an alternative to imprisonment but only allow and do not require the District Court to impose that alternative. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had considered the alternatives but that the presentence investigation, Alden's admission, the absence of a reason or excuse for the offenses, the risk that Alden would reoffend, the need to protect society, the seriousness of the crime charged, and the ineffective nature of prior treatment all supported the District Court's view that imprisonment was necessary notwithstanding testimony supporting an opposite view. For these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. St. v. Alden, 282 M 45, 934 P2d 210, 54 St. Rep. 234 (1997).

Sexual Abuse — Failure of District Court to Consider Sentencing Alternatives — No Objection — Sentence Not Illegal or Violation of Due Process: Swoboda pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of children, was classified as a nondangerous offender, and was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections. On appeal, she claimed as error the District Court's failure to consider alternatives to incarceration. The Supreme Court noted that she had not objected at sentencing to the District Court's failure and declined to review the judgment. The Supreme Court noted that in the past, it had made an exception and reviewed such a failure of the District Court when the state conceded the failure of the District Court or when the sentence was illegal. Here, however, the Supreme Court noted that the sentence was not beyond the District Court's jurisdiction. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep 310 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that the failure of the District Court was not a manifest miscarriage of justice and would not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or the proceedings. St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996).

Requirements for Sentencing Nonviolent Felony Offenders Mandatory: Savaria was convicted in District Court on seven counts of felony theft and was sentenced to 10 years in the state prison.

Savaria appealed, claiming that the District Court had failed to consider the obligations imposed upon a District Court by 46-18-201 and this section in sentencing a nonviolent felony offender. The Supreme Court held that those considerations are mandatory and that under the circumstances, the District Court failed to properly sentence Savaria. St. v. Savaria, 274 M 197, 906 P2d 215, 52 St. Rep. 1153 (1995).

No Error in Trial Court's Considering Wishes of Victim: Stevens contended that the trial court erred in analyzing the law and sentencing him, a nonviolent offender, to a term of imprisonment. The Supreme Court held that although the statute establishing criteria for sentencing nonviolent offenders does not list the victim's wishes as a factor to be considered, neither does it prohibit consideration of the victim's wishes. Therefore, there had been no error on the trial court's part. St. v. Stevens, 273 M 452, 904 P2d 590, 52 St. Rep. 1078 (1995).

Failure to State Reasons for Not Selecting Alternatives to Imprisonment Must Be Objected to if Sentence Not Illegal: Nelson argued that the lower court failed to consider alternatives to imprisonment for a nonviolent offender as required by statute. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had failed to consider alternatives as required but that the sentence imposed by the lower court was not in excess of the maximum allowed by law and therefore was not illegal. The Supreme Court further held that since the sentence was not illegal, Nelson could not raise the consideration of alternatives on appeal when he had failed to object to the sentence when it was entered. St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663, 52 St. Rep. 1069 (1995), distinguishing St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), and St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025 (1993), and following St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307 (1994). Nelson was followed, with respect to the District Court's failure to consider alternatives being raised for the first time on appeal, in St. v. Harper, 284 M 185, 943 P2d 1255, 54 St. Rep. 837 (1997). Nelson was followed, with respect to the exception arising when a defendant alleges that a sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing, in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999).

Procedure for Considering Alternatives to Prison for Nonviolent Offender: Because the District Court did not consider alternatives to prison as required by 46-18-201, did not take into account the criteria contained in 46-18-201 and this section that require examination of alternatives to prison, and did not, as required by 46-18-201, state its reasons why alternatives to imprisonment were not selected, the prison sentence was vacated and the case remanded. St. v. Pence, 273 M 223, 902 P2d 41, 52 St. Rep. 937 (1995).

Failure to Consider Sentencing Alternatives to Incarceration for Nonviolent Felony Offense — Remand: Criminal sentencing alternatives are strictly matters of statute in Montana. Section 46-18-201 requires a trial court to consider alternatives to imprisonment when sentencing a nonviolent felony offender, and this section sets out 10 criteria that the court must consider. The court has no discretion in making these considerations. Therefore, when the court in this case considered pertinent facts concerning defendant's background but did not specifically consider any alternatives to incarceration, failure to consider the sentencing alternatives warranted remand for resentencing. St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926, 52 St. Rep. 828 (1995), following St. v. Stevens, 259 M 114, 854 P2d 336 (1993).

Sentence of Imprisonment of Dangerous Offender — No Need to Consider Alternatives: After a conviction for kidnapping and assault, when the District Court clearly articulated numerous reasons for designating the defendant as a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) and its reasons were fully supported by the record, the court's reasons for designating the defendant a dangerous offender are sufficient to rule out alternatives to imprisonment. By its findings, the court, as a practical matter, satisfied the requirements of statutory criteria for sentencing. St. v. Eichenlaub, 272 M 332, 901 P2d 90, 52 St. Rep. 786 (1995).

Failure to State Reasons for Not Selecting Alternatives to Imprisonment as Error: The Supreme Court reversed a lower court's sentence for a nonviolent felony offender because the lower court had failed to state its reasons for not selecting alternatives to imprisonment and failed to indicate that it had examined the statutory sentencing criteria. St. v. Stevens, 259 M 114, 854 P2d 336, 50 St. Rep. 707 (1993).

of prostitution, promotion of prostitution, or aggravated promotion of prostitution when the prostitute was 12 years of age or younger and the prostitute's client was 18 years of age or older at the time of the offense; inserted (1)(b)(xi) including the crime of sexual abuse of children; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to sentencing judge for references to court and substituted references to offender for references to defendant and person; in (1)(a) at beginning inserted exception clause; in (1)(b) after "provided in" substituted "the following sections" for "45-5-103, 45-5-202(3), 45-5-302(2), 45-5-303(2), 45-5-401(2), 45-5-502(3), 45-5-503(2) and (3), 45-9-101(2), (3), and (5)(d), 45-9-102(4), 45-9-103(2), and 45-9-109"; inserted (1)(b)(i) through (1)(b)(xi) listing various crimes; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 395 in (1) near beginning of first sentence and in (2) inserted "or nolo contendere". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 432 inserted (1)(b)(iii) referring to 45-5-213. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

A composite section was prepared by the code commissioner by adding "assault with a weapon" to the reference to 45-5-213 inserted by Ch. 432 to reflect the changes made by Ch. 52, pursuant to sec. 14, Ch. 52, L. 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1991 Amendments: Chapter 42 in (1) changed subsection reference to 45-9-102.

Chapter 519 near end of (1) inserted "45-9-109"; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendment: In (1) inserted reference to 45-9-101(5)(d). Amendment effective April 20, 1989.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 370 in (1), near beginning of second sentence, changed "45-5-202(2)" to "45-5-202(3)".

Chapter 610 in second sentence of (1) substituted reference to 45-5-103 for reference to 45-5-103(2).

1981 Amendment: Section 7, Ch. 198, L. 1981, provided in part:

"(2) There is added to those sections listed in subsection (1) of section 1 [46-18-231], following the language in those sections specifying the term of imprisonment for which an offender may be imprisoned, the words "and may be fined not more than $50,000" or other similar language allowing the court to fine the offender a maximum of $50,000 in addition to a term of imprisonment. The code commissioner shall change the listed sections in accordance with this section and may make minor incidental adjustments consistent with this section as may be necessary to reflect the intent of this section without changing the meaning of the listed sections as amended by this section.

(3) There is added to those sections listed in subsection (4) of this section, following any language in those sections specifying the term of imprisonment for which an offender may be imprisoned but without specifying a fine that may be ordered to be paid, the words "or shall be punished by a fine of not more than $50,000 or by both such fine and imprisonment", or other similar language allowing the court to fine the offender a maximum of $50,000 in lieu of imprisonment or to punish the offender by both a fine and imprisonment. The code commissioner shall change the listed sections in accordance with this section and may make minor incidental adjustments consistent with this section as may be necessary to reflect the intent of this section without changing the meaning of the listed sections as amended by this section.

(4) 13-27-205, 13-27-206, 19-11-207 [renumbered 19-18-207], 20-9-435, 23-5-106 [now repealed], 30-13-142, 32-1-236, 32-1-473, 32-1-505, 45-5-104, 45-5-204, 45-5-105, 45-5-201, 45-5-203, 45-5-204, 45-5-304, 45-5-505, 45-5-603, 45-5-613, 45-5-621, 45-6-101 through 45-6-103, 45-6-204, 45-6-301, 45-6-316, 45-6-317, 45-6-325, 45-6-327, 45-7-101, 45-7-102, 45-7-201, 45-7-206 through 45-7-208, 45-8-106, 45-8-215, 45-8-318, 45-8-334, 45-8-335, 45-9-101(4), 45-9-102(4), 45-9-103(3), 45-9-107, 46-18-213, 46-18-502, 46-31-204, 50-38-107, 61-3-604, 81-5-102, and 81-9-118."

Defendant's Objection to Fine Raised for First Time on Appeal Not Considered — Trial Court's Failure to Abide by Statutory Sentencing Requirements Not Reversible Error if Sentence Would Have Been Legal — Not Reviewable on Appeal Under Lenihan Rule: Kotwicki argued on appeal that the $25,000 fine imposed by the trial court was illegal because the trial court did not abide by the statutory requirements of this section to make a determination of the defendant's ability to pay the fine. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was not entitled to raise the issue of an illegal sentence for the first time on appeal because in the case before it, the trial court, had it reviewed the statutory requirements, could have legally imposed the fine and therefore the trial court's sentence was not illegal. The Supreme Court further held that the Lenihan rule of being able to raise, for the first time on appeal, the issue of an illegal sentence depends on whether the defendant raises a plausible allegation that the sentence is illegal and held that although Kotwicki alleged an illegal sentence, he failed to present a colorable claim that his sentence fell outside statutory parameters and warranted review. St. v. Kotwicki, 2007 MT 17, 335 M 344, 151 P3d 892 (2007), clarifying St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), and St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002), and followed in St. v. Park, 2008 MT 429, 347 M 462, 198 P3d 321 (2008), and St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008).

Criminal Fines Distinct From Other Court-Imposed Compensatory Financial Obligations — Fisher Overruled: The plain meaning of "fine" in 46-18-403 does not encompass fees, costs, charges, or other court-imposed financial obligations. Criminal fines are punitive in nature and are distinct from other court-imposed financial obligations associated with a criminal proceeding that are compensatory in nature, such as an assessment of fees for probationary supervision or a charge to defray a local government's costs in administering the criminal justice system. Voerding v. St., 2006 MT 125, 332 M 262, 136 P3d 502 (2006), overruling St. v. Fisher, 2003 MT 33, 314 M 222, 65 P3d 223 (2003), to the extent that Fisher suggests that the term "fine" in 46-18-403(2) encompasses other types of court-imposed financial obligations, such as fees, charges, and costs. See also St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Imposition of Mandatory Statutory Fine Without Specifying Payment Schedule or Consideration of Ability to Pay Not Erroneous: Mingus was convicted of DUI and fined the statutory minimum $1,000, as required in 61-8-731. The fine was statutorily mandated and clearly within statutory parameters. Mingus asserted error because the sentencing court did not inquire into his ability to pay, as required in this section, or establish a payment schedule, as allowed in 46-18-234. The Supreme Court disagreed. Ability to pay and consideration of a payment schedule apply only to discretionary fines, not statutorily mandated fines. When a fine is mandated, the sentencing court has no discretion whether to impose the fine, irrespective of defendant's ability to pay, nor is a sentencing court required to establish a payment schedule or specify when a mandatory fine must be paid under 61-8-731. St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Consider Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Fine — Reversible Error: This section requires that the sentencing judge, prior to sentencing, consider whether a defendant will be able to pay a fine, taking into account the defendant's financial resources and the nature of the burden that payment of the fine would impose. McLeod contended that the sentencing court failed to consider whether payment of a $1,000 fine for a drug conviction would conflict with McLeod's ability to pay child support. The Supreme Court examined the record and agreed that the sentencing judge did not consider McLeod's financial resources and the nature of the burden that payment of the fine would impose. The imposition of the fine was reversed for a further determination of whether McLeod had the ability to pay the fine. St. v. McLeod, 2002 MT 348, 313 M 358, 61 P3d 126 (2002).

Conditioning Suspended Portion of Incarceration Sentence Upon Entering Into Plan to Pay Fine in Installments: The court conditioned suspension of half the incarceration term upon defendant's entering into a plan for payment of a fine in installments. The court did not impose the fine as a condition on the suspended portion of the incarceration term. Thus, the Sentence Review Board's elimination of the suspended portion of the incarceration term did not eliminate the obligation to pay the fine. St. v. George, 2002 MT 300, 313 M 11, 59 P3d 1151 (2002).

Fine of Vacation Pay and Sick Leave Pay Absent Showing of Ability to Pay — Remand: The District Court fined defendant his vacation pay and sick leave pay as part of his sentence. Prior to entry of judgment but after the court made known its intention to levy the fine, defendant's attorney notified the court that it held a prior lien on defendant's vacation pay and sick leave pay. Because it was not clear from the record that defendant would be able to pay the fine levied by the court, the Supreme Court remanded for further proceedings on that part of the order that levied the fine, in accordance with this section. St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994).

Imposition of Mandatory Statutory Fine Without Specifying Payment Schedule or Consideration of Ability to Pay Not Erroneous: Mingus was convicted of DUI and fined the statutory minimum $1,000, as required in 61-8-731. The fine was statutorily mandated and clearly within statutory parameters. Mingus asserted error because the sentencing court did not inquire into his ability to pay, as required in 46-18-231, or establish a payment schedule, as allowed in 46-18-234. The Supreme Court disagreed. Ability to pay and consideration of a payment schedule apply only to discretionary fines, not statutorily mandated fines. When a fine is mandated, the sentencing court has no discretion whether to impose the fine, irrespective of defendant's ability to pay, nor is a sentencing court required to establish a payment schedule or specify when a mandatory fine must be paid under 61-8-731. St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004).

Improper Imposition of District Court Costs Based on Local Court Rule: Blackwell pleaded guilty to DUI pursuant to a plea agreement on the day of trial. The District Court assessed Blackwell one-half of the jury costs, including 1 day of salary of the District Court Clerk, pursuant to the court's local rule rather than state sentencing statutes. Blackwell appealed the assessment, and the Supreme Court reversed. Although costs of jury service could have been imposed under this section, the statute does not authorize imposition of any portion of a Clerk's salary as costs. The District Court erred in relying on its local rule instead of applying this section, so the order assessing costs was vacated. St. v. Blackwell, 2001 MT 198, 306 M 267, 32 P3d 771 (2001).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Cost of Jury Selection and Prosecution Improperly Charged to Indigent Defendant: It was determined that Winterrowd was indigent, so counsel was appointed for him from the public defender's office. After being informed that Winterrowd had received a social security settlement and would no longer be considered indigent, the public defender moved to withdraw. Trial was continued to allow Winterrowd to obtain counsel. About 1 week before the scheduled hearing, Winterrowd moved for another continuance because the settlement had not arrived and he had not yet retained counsel. The state objected, arguing that Winterrowd had not demonstrated due diligence and that his claim that he would receive a settlement was unsupported by documentation. The trial court did not rule on the continuance motion. At the start of trial, Winterrowd again moved for a continuance, but the motion was denied. The trial proceeded through voir dire, with Winterrowd acting pro se. Following a break, the court granted the motion to continue and excused the jurors but ordered Winterrowd to pay the costs incurred in summoning the jurors and in prosecuting him. After granting the public defender's motion to withdraw, it was error for the court to charge Winterrowd with the costs when he was unable to obtain counsel. St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522, 55 St. Rep. 307 (1998).

Payment of Justice's Court Cost Imposed as Judgment of District Court Held Improper — Smith Reaffirmed: Morales was charged with assaulting a sports official, in violation of 45-5-211, after striking a basketball referee. Upon his conviction in Justice's Court, Morales appealed to District Court. Upon his conviction, the District Court ordered Morales to pay the costs of the trial in Justice's Court. The Supreme Court reaffirmed its holding in Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), and held that a trial de novo in District Court has the effect of erasing any debt for costs in Justice's Court incurred before the appeal to District Court. St. v. Morales, 284 M 238, 943 P2d 1286, 54 St. Rep. 862 (1997).

Justice's Court Costs May Not Be Imposed as Part of District Court Sentence: Smith appealed his conviction in Justice's Court to District Court. The District Court found Smith guilty and as part of the sentence imposed the costs incurred in the Justice's Court proceedings. The Supreme Court held that an appeal to a District Court from a Justice's Court was a trial de novo and that only the costs of the District Court proceedings could be imposed as part of the sentence. Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058, 54 St. Rep. 96 (1997).

Expenses of Investigation Not Recoverable as Costs — Exception for Money Paid by Undercover Agents: Defendants Richard and David Fertterer were convicted of felony criminal mischief for illegally killing game. They contended on appeal that they could not be required to pay the costs of the investigation incurred by the state prior to the filing of the information. Citing Masanovich v. School District No. 1, 178 M 138, 582 P2d 1234 (1978), and St. v. Haynes, 633 P2d 38 (Oreg. App. 1981), the Supreme Court held that the costs of investigation were not recoverable because there was no statutory authority for the charge, as there is for other costs. However, the court made an exception, recognized in another Oregon case, for money paid directly to defendants by undercover agents. In this case, the state was allowed to recover guide service fees and other expenses paid to the Fertterers. St. v. Fertterer, 255 M 73, 841 P2d 467, 49 St. Rep. 846 (1992).

Jury Costs, Including Venue Change, Properly Chargeable — Insufficient Record: Defendants Richard and David Fertterer were convicted of felony criminal mischief for illegally killing game. They contended on appeal that they could not be required to pay the costs of the jury trial, especially those costs involving a change of venue that Fertterers claimed was made necessary by extensive pretrial publicity caused by the state. The Supreme Court held that there was no factual record to support Fertterers' charges and that no motion had been made by them at trial on the matter and no hearing requested. The Supreme Court concluded that the plain language of the statute authorized the charging of the costs. St. v. Fertterer, 255 M 73, 841 P2d 467, 49 St. Rep. 846 (1992).

Imposition of Trial Costs Not Unconstitutional: Defendant contended that this section and 46-18-233 are unconstitutional because they leave it to the discretion of the judge whether to impose costs of prosecution, thus permitting discrimination in violation of equal protection of the law. In striking down defendant's argument, the Supreme Court held that it is within the trial court's discretion to impose prosecution, jury, and counsel costs on defendant. St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

Constitutionality: Defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide and was assessed costs and expenses as part of his sentence. Defendant contended that 46-18-232 was unconstitutional since it enhanced punishment in retribution for a defendant's exercise of a fundamental constitutional right. Statutes that allow a discretionary imposition of costs have been upheld against due process arguments. The statute does no more than deprive a financially able defendant of available funds that, in fairness, should be remitted to the public coffers. St. v. Weinberger, 204 M 278, 665 P2d 202, 40 St. Rep. 844 (1983).

2005 Amendment: Chapter 232 at beginning of introductory clause inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 585 in (1) substituted "by the clerk of district court to:

(a) the state treasurer for deposit into the state general fund" for "by a district court to the county general fund of the county in which the court is held, except that:

(a) if the costs assessed include any district court expense listed in 3-5-901, the money collected from assessment of these costs must be paid to the state for deposit into the state general fund to the extent that the expenses were paid by the state"; in (1)(b) after "chapter 9 or 10" substituted "and at the court's discretion" for "the court may order the money paid into"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2002.

Code Commissioner Instruction: Pursuant to sec. 47, Ch. 257, L. 2001, in (1)(a) in version effective July 1, 2002, the code commissioner changed "state treasurer" to "department of revenue".

Saving Clause: Section 55, Ch. 585, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 509 deleted (1)(c) that read: "(c) if the fine was imposed for a violation of 45-5-206, 50% of the amount collected must be deposited in the state special revenue fund for use of the department of family services in the battered spouses and domestic violence grant program created by 52-6-101"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (1)(c) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of family services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995. The Ch. 546 amendment in (1)(c) was rendered void by the Ch. 509 amendment.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 296 near beginning of first sentence, after "court", deleted "except money collected by a justice's court"; at beginning of (1) inserted "by a district court"; in (1)(b), after "chapter 9", inserted "or 10"; in (1)(c), after "collected", deleted "except for fines collected by a justice court and distributed pursuant to 3-10-601"; and inserted (2) concerning payment by a Justice's Court.

Chapter 704 near middle of (1)(a) substituted "state" for "department of commerce". Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1989 Amendment: In (2) substituted "drug forfeiture account" for "drug forfeiture fund".

1987 Amendments: Chapter 553 inserted (3) relating to disposition of a fine imposed for violation of 45-5-206.

Chapter 557 near beginning, after "court", inserted "except money collected by a justice's court".

1985 Amendments: Chapter 680 inserted (1) providing that money collected by a court as fines and costs under 46-18-231 and 46-18-232 must be paid the county general fund.

Chapter 1, Sp. L. 1985, amended Ch. 680, L. 1985, by substituting "department of commerce" for "supreme court administrator" in (1).

1983 Amendment: Inserted exception at end of section relating to fines imposed for violating Title 45, chapter 9.

Case Notes

Order That Defendant Pay "Assessments" to Community Entities as Part of Sentence for Sexual Assault Illegal: As part of Krum's sentence for two counts of felony sexual assault, the District Court ordered Krum to pay a $5,000 assessment to the Park County Court Automation Fund, $2,500 to the Tri-County Network for Domestic Violence, and $2,500 to the Park County Big Brothers and Sisters in order to give back to society and to those who assist victims of these types of crimes. Krum appealed the assessments, and the Supreme Court reversed. Although the sentencing court had authority to fine Krum up to $50,000 for each conviction, the court did not include a fine per se in Krum's sentence, but instead ordered the payment of assessments to the community entities. However, this section provides that all fines and costs collected from a criminal defendant be paid to the Department of Revenue for deposit in the general fund, and a District Court may not redirect money collected from a defendant simply by labeling the money as an assessment instead of a fine. The state argued that the assessments were authorized as a condition of sentencing pursuant to 46-18-202 because the assessments were reasonably related to the underlying crimes, but the Supreme Court held that 46-18-202 does not provide the necessary authority for imposing assessments in the first place. The assessments were not limitations on Krum's conduct and could not be considered restitution because the money was not payable to the victims. Thus, the assessment portion of the sentence was unauthorized and illegal. The remainder of the sentence was affirmed, but the case was remanded with instructions to strike the illegal assessments from the sentence. St. v. Krum, 2007 MT 229, 339 M 154, 168 P3d 658 (2007), followed in St. v. Stephenson, 2008 MT 64, 342 M 60, 179 P3d 502 (2008), to the extent that a fine or surcharge payable to the community service program that is imposed without statutory authority is illegal. Stephenson was followed in St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

46-18-236. Imposition of charge upon conviction or forfeiture — administration.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 374 in (7)(c) at end substituted "account provided for in 53-9-113" for "state general fund to be used to provide services to crime victims as provided in Title 53, chapter 9, part 1". Amendment effective July 1, 2009, and terminates June 30, 2015.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 361 in (1)(c) increased charge imposed upon certain convictions from $25 to $50. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 118 in middle of (7)(c) substituted language requiring payment to the crime victims compensation and assistance program for services provided in Title 53, chapter 9, part 1, for former language requiring payment to "crime victims compensation and assistance account established in 53-9-109"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 23, 2001.

Chapter 449 in (1) near middle of introductory clause after "jurisdiction on a" substituted "person" for "defendant"; in (1)(c) increased charge from $10 to $25; in two places in (2) substituted "person" for "defendant"; in (5) near middle of first sentence after "collected" inserted "under subsections (1)(a) and (1)(b)" and in third sentence near beginning after "district court" inserted "or justice's court"; in (7)(a) near middle after "program" inserted "including a program operated by a private, nonprofit organization"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 118, L. 2001, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature in Senate Bill No. 83 changed funding for the crime victims compensation and assistance program from an earmarked special revenue account to the general fund; and

WHEREAS, the crime victims compensation and assistance program has been supported entirely by general fund money since fiscal year 1996; and

WHEREAS, repealing section 53-9-109 is necessary in order to clarify the conflict that currently exists between actual appropriation practices and the law."

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: (Both versions) Chapter 398 inserted (1)(c) adding collection of additional $10 for each misdemeanor or felony charge for certain offenses; inserted (7)(a) through (7)(c) regarding disposition of charge collected under subsection (1)(c); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1999.

(Temporary version) Chapter 411 in second sentence in (6)(b) after "salaries of its" inserted "county attorney and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1999, and terminates July 1, 2001.

Style changes were slightly different in the chapters. In each case, the codifier chose appropriate text.

1991 Amendment: In (1)(a) increased charge for misdemeanor from $10 to $15. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1987 Amendment: Near beginning of (5), after "subsection (1)", inserted "except those collected by a justice's court" and in third sentence deleted reference to a Justice's Court as a court of original jurisdiction; and in first sentence of (6)(b), after "district", deleted "or justices'".

1986 Amendment: In (1)(a) and (1)(b) substituted "for each" for "in each" and "charge" for "case"; in (3) inserted "and must be imposed in addition to any fine"; in (4) substituted language requiring this section's charge to be collected from the first installment if allowed to be paid in installments for "The total of the charge imposed by this section and any fine assessed may not exceed the maximum fine authorized by law for the offense"; in (5) inserted last sentence relating to disposition of a charge paid to a court that sits in a consolidated city-county government; at beginning of (6) deleted "On or before the 10th day of each month, the county finance officer or treasurer shall remit to the state treasurer for deposit to the state general fund $10 for each misdemeanor case and the greater of $20 or 10% of the fine levied in each felony case. A county may retain up to 10% of the funds remitted to the state treasurer to cover only the costs of administering this section"; and inserted (6)(b) concerning charges collected under subsection (1) by District or Justices' Courts.

Case Notes

No Error in Allowing Parole Officer to Set Restitution Schedule — Refusal to Waive Administrative Fees Proper: Denham contended that it was error for the sentencing court to delegate the scheduling of monthly restitution payments to a parole officer because the version of 46-18-244 in effect at the time of the crime did not provide for that delegation of authority. The Supreme Court held that the amendments to the statute were purely procedural and did not constitute retroactive legislation, impair Denham's rights, or impose additional duties on Denham, so allowing the parole officer to set the restitution schedule was not error. Denham also appealed the $60,099 restitution and the 10% administrative fee and minimal surcharges. However, Denham assured the court at sentencing of his ability to pay the restitution amount, so it was reasonable to assume that he also had the ability to pay the administrative fee and surcharges. The sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Denham, 2005 MT 26, 326 M 24, 107 P3d 1263 (2005).

Conviction Charge as Penalty — Distribution: The charge imposed on criminal defendants by this section is a penalty or a forfeiture. 42 A.G. Op. 63 (1988).

Collection of Charge Upon Forfeiture of Bail Bond: In order to collect the additional charge required by 46-18-236 in the event the offender posts bail and chooses not to appear, a court may exercise its power under 46-9-302 and increase the bail schedule for minor offenses in a like amount. 41 A.G. Op. 59 (1986).

46-18-237. Garnishment — report by supervising authority.

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 272 throughout section substituted references to person for references to prisoner; in (1) near middle of introductory clause after "corrections" inserted "or a person supervised by the department"; and in (2) near middle of first sentence after "report to the" substituted "office of victims services in the department of justice" for "board of crime control". Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 272, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who have an unpaid restitution obligation on [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2003.

Severability: Section 6, Ch. 475, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 7, Ch. 475, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] is effective on passage and approval." Approved May 1, 1997.

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-251(2) and this section meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and 46-18-244(2), and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) 2009 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 66 in (1) in second sentence after "paid" inserted "whether or not the offender is under state supervision" and at beginning of third sentence inserted "If the offender is under state supervision, payment of restitution"; in (2)(a) near beginning before "offender" deleted "court shall require the" and after "46-18-245" deleted "if the offender is able to pay"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 25, 2009.

Chapter 374 in (2)(b) and (2)(c) at end of second sentence after "paid" inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2009, and terminates June 30, 2015.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 272 in (1) near beginning of first sentence after "shall" inserted "as part of the sentence", near middle after "victim" deleted "of the offense", after "pecuniary loss" deleted "as a result of the offense", and at end after "economic loss" deleted "as a result of the crime" and in second sentence after "offender" inserted "or the offender's estate" and at end inserted "and is a condition of any probation or parole"; inserted (2)(b) concerning collection and payment of restitution; in (2)(c) at beginning of first sentence substituted "In a misdemeanor case, payment of restitution and of the cost of supervising the payment of restitution" for "Payment" and after "court" inserted "until the offender has fully paid the restitution and the cost of supervising the payment of restitution" and at end of second sentence after "46-18-245" inserted "which shall disburse the restitution to the person or entity to whom the court ordered restitution to be paid"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 272, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who have an unpaid restitution obligation on [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 181 in (1), in first sentence before "restitution", inserted "full" and inserted second sentence regarding the ongoing duty to pay restitution; in (2), at beginning of first sentence after "court", substituted "shall" for "may", near middle, after "46-18-245", inserted "if the offender is able to pay", and at end, after "$5", deleted "or more than $250"; in (3), at beginning of first sentence after "If", inserted "at any time", near middle, after "is not", deleted "and will not be", after "restitution" deleted "during the period of state supervision", and at end substituted "during the time that the offender is unable to pay" for "commensurate with the amount of restitution that would have been imposed" and inserted second sentence setting out community service credit against restitution.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 125 in (1) substituted "shall require" for "may require" and at end inserted phrase relating to pecuniary loss; and inserted (3) allowing community service in lieu of restitution.

Chapter 310 at end of (1) inserted "including a person suffering an economic loss as a result of the crime".

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 43, Ch. 125, L. 1995, provided: "[Sections 10 [46-18-201], 13 [46-18-241], and 21 [46-18-302]] apply to trials for and sentences imposed for crimes that were committed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1995.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (2) relating to payment of cost of supervising the making of restitution.

Case Notes

Expenses Recoverable in Civil Action Properly Imposed as Restitution — Sufficient Evidence of Restitution Amount: Essig was convicted of stalking and sentenced to pay restitution of $5,582.03, including counseling expenses for the victim's children, blood testing for one of the children, and the cost of six memory cards for a digital camera. Essig contested the restitution and the amount, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under 46-18-243, pecuniary loss includes general damages that a person could recover in a civil action against the defendant. In this case, the evidence showed that the expenses could have been recovered in a civil action by the victim and thus were legally imposed as restitution. The value of the various items was supported by the evidence and their inclusion as restitution was not erroneous. St. v. Essig, 2009 MT 340, 353 M 99, 218 P3d 838 (2009).

Sufficient Connection Between Victim of Vehicle Accident and Evidence Tampering to Warrant Defendant's Payment of Victim's Funeral Expenses as Restitution: Sherman was thrown from her car in a vehicle accident, and as she lay in the road, she was struck and killed by Ness's vehicle. Ness did not stop and subsequently repaired and washed his car in an effort to conceal evidence of the accident. Ness was convicted of tampering with evidence and ordered to pay $3,500 for Sherman's funeral expenses as restitution. Ness challenged the restitution on grounds that because Sherman was not a victim of the evidence tampering conviction, there was no nexus between the crime and the restitution. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to St. v. LaTray, 2000 MT 262, 302 M 11, 11 P3d 116 (2000), classification of a person as a victim for purposes of ordering restitution does not depend on the person's relationship to the elements of the crime for which the defendant is convicted. In this case, restitution for Sherman's funeral expenses was not wholly unrelated to Ness's crime, and the expenses were based on Ness's involvement, which created a nexus between restitution and the crime. Because the funeral expenses were paid to Sherman's estate directly out of the crime victims compensation account, that account was entitled to $3,500 restitution. St. v. Ness, 2009 MT 300, 352 M 317, 216 P3d 773 (2009).

Mitigation of Damages as Restitution for Criminal Activity — Additional Restitution of Loss of Income Warranted: Kalal was convicted of theft of a tractor; he received a 2-year deferred sentence and was ordered to pay restitution for the value of the tractor and other stolen property. Kalal satisfied the restitution obligation, but Petranek, the victim of the theft, sought additional restitution for loss of income because he had anticipated using the tractor for various income-producing activities, including building a fence, building a cabin, and seeding land for grass production and farming. The District Court noted that other tractors could be rented, but that Petranek's limited availability to work on projects presented serious impediments to renting a tractor. The court thus determined that Petranek suffered a loss of income for summer grazing and cabin rental in the amount of $15,960. Kalal appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying precedents from the fields of tort and contract law, the court recognized that an injured person is not expected to do what is unreasonable or impracticable, so the applicable standard is what would a reasonable and prudent person be expected to do, if capable, under the circumstances. While recognizing the duty to mitigate damages, the District Court correctly reasoned that no reasonable person could be expected to spend money or time that the person does not have to mitigate an injury for which the person is not responsible. Therefore, under these circumstances and given the impracticability and expense of renting and transporting a tractor a long distance for short periods of time, the restitution award of $15,960 for Petranek's loss of income was reasonable. St. v. Kalal, 2009 MT 103, 350 M 128, 204 P3d 1240 (2009).

Drug Task Force Considered Victim of Drug Offense — Restitution to Task Force as Part of Plea Agreement Affirmed: As part of a plea agreement on a drug charge, Jones agreed to pay $125 in restitution to the Eastern Montana Drug Task Force. Jones later appealed the restitution condition on grounds that it was illegal because the task force was not a victim of the drug distribution offense. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because Jones agreed in the plea agreement to pay restitution to the task force, the task force was a victim, as defined in 46-18-243(2)(a)(vi), to whom the sentencing court could require Jones to pay restitution. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Krum, 2007 MT 229, 339 M 154, 168 P3d 658 (2007).

Defendant Not Involved in Initial Vehicle Theft or Damage — Restitution Not Owing: Seghetti stole a vehicle and picked up Breeding and another friend for a ride, during which the vehicle was damaged while Seghetti was driving. Seghetti then revealed that the vehicle was stolen, and Breeding suggested driving the vehicle to California. During the trip, Breeding and Seghetti shared the driving. California police stopped the vehicle for a broken turn signal, and Breeding and Seghetti were subsequently charged with and convicted of felony theft. At sentencing, the District Court ordered that Breeding pay restitution for damage to the vehicle. Asserting that he was not driving when the damage occurred and thus was not responsible for the damage, Breeding appealed the restitution order. The Supreme Court reversed. Without a causal connection between Breeding's commission of theft and the damage inflicted earlier by Seghetti, there was no basis for requiring Breeding to pay restitution for that damage, so the District Court was ordered to strike the restitution requirement from Breeding's sentence. St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 M 323, 184 P3d 313 (2008).

Restitution Obligations Not Discharged Upon Fulfillment of Criminal Sentence: As a condition of sentences for theft, burglary, and deceptive practices, Brown was ordered to pay restitution. Upon completion of his prison sentences, Brown was released without having paid restitution in full. Brown was subsequently imprisoned following conviction for other criminal offenses, and the Department of Corrections began garnishing Brown's prison wages to satisfy the unpaid restitution obligations from the previous sentences. Brown requested that the District Court waive payment of the restitution on grounds that the Department lacked authority to garnish his prison wages to pay restitution obligations from sentences that were previously discharged. The court agreed and ordered the Department to cease garnishment and to reimburse any money collected to satisfy those obligations. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Unlike the other conditions of Brown's sentences, the restitution obligations were civil judgments required by this section to be paid in full, and those obligations were not discharged or fulfilled by virtue of Brown's completion of the criminal sentences and discharge from prison. Pursuant to 46-18-244, the Department was authorized to garnish Brown's prison wages to satisfy the previously unpaid restitution. St. v. Brown, 2008 MT 115, 342 M 476, 182 P3d 75 (2008).

Reimbursement to Insurer That Reimbursed Victim Affirmed: An insurer that reimbursed a victim for pecuniary loss had the right of subrogation to the extent of the reimbursement, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in ordering defendant to pay restitution to the insurer to make the insurer whole. St. v. Sharp, 2006 MT 301, 334 M 470, 148 P3d 625 (2006).

Imposition of Restitution Based on Documented Losses Not Violative of Constitutional Prohibition Against Excessive Fines: As set out in St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004), a restitution award violates the constitutional prohibition against excessive fines if the award is grossly disproportional to the gravity of the offense. Here, Kuykendall was convicted of criminal endangerment and ordered to pay restitution of over $10,000 to a peace officer who was injured during the crime. Kuykendall asserted that the restitution amount was grossly disproportional to the crime of criminal endangerment, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The amount of loss suffered by the officer was documented and was not refuted by Kuykendall at trial. The sentencing court relied on the only evidence presented at the sentencing hearing, and the amount of restitution ordered was directly related to the amount of loss and thus was not grossly disproportional. The restitution amount was not excessive and was affirmed. St. v. Kuykendall, 2006 MT 110, 332 M 180, 136 P3d 983 (2006).

Improper Order to Pay Child Support as Condition of Sentence for Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Erickson entered a plea agreement on drug charges, and although it was not part of the agreement, the sentencing court ordered that Erickson also forfeit one-third of his prison earnings as restitution to be paid toward Erickson's delinquent child support. Erickson never invited or acquiesced to the child support order. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that possession of dangerous drugs is a victimless crime for which restitution cannot be owed and also noted that the amount of restitution must be determined and fixed. The court agreed with Erickson that there was no connection between drug crimes and the failure to pay child support, so ordering payment of child support arrearages as restitution was not an appropriate condition of sentencing for a drug crime. However, in this case, the sentencing court made it clear that the order to pay child support was in lieu of requiring Erickson to pay cleanup costs associated with a clandestine drug lab, attorney costs, or jury costs. The sentencing court could have imposed both costs and restitution if not for the imposition of the illegal child support obligation, so the Supreme Court was unable to determine what sentence would have been imposed if the law had been correctly applied. The case was remanded for resentencing on whether Erickson must pay restitution and costs. St. v. Erickson, 2005 MT 276, 329 M 192, 124 P3d 119 (2005).

Restitution Amount Set by Sentencing Court Rather Than Jury — No Error: After the jury found Field guilty of theft by deception, the District Court imposed restitution in the amount of $17,632.67. Field contended that under Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000), any fact that increases a penalty for a crime above the statutory maximum must be submitted to the jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt and that because the restitution amount was set by the court rather than by the jury, Field should not be required to pay restitution in the court-ordered amount. The Supreme Court held that the Apprendi rule does not apply to restitution because restitution is not a criminal punishment, but rather is a civil remedy administered for convenience by courts that have entered criminal convictions. Thus, once the jury found Field guilty of theft by deception, the District Court was free to apply the maximum statutory sentences and to order Field to pay an appropriate amount of restitution. St. v. Field, 2005 MT 181, 328 M 26, 116 P3d 813 (2005). See also U.S. v. George, 403 F3d 470 (7th Cir. 2005).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Restitution Order Proper Given Defendant's Ability to Pay: The sentencing court ordered Thaut to pay $69,457 in restitution. Thaut appealed the award on grounds that the court failed to meet statutory requirements establishing Thaut's financial resources and future ability to pay and on grounds that due process rights were violated when the court failed to consider several factors in Thaut's ability to pay, including Thaut's age and short time to work following parole, minimum wage employment history, lack of assets and ability to acquire assets in the future, and mental health issues related to an alleged prior head injury. However, the presentence investigation and supplemental presentence investigation provided adequate documentation regarding Thaut's ability to pay restitution and to work hard to earn a living. Further, Thaut had no documented physical limitations and was unemployed only because he was incarcerated. The District Court's determination that Thaut had the ability to pay medical expenses, a grant from the Board of Crime Control, and property damages was amply supported by the record, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Restitution Order Reimbursing Victim for Mortgage Payments and Cost of Installing Surveillance Equipment Not Unconstitutional Excessive Fine or Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Good was found guilty of assault and as part of his sentence was ordered to pay restitution to the victim of approximately $6,000. Good argued that restitution constituted an excessive fine and cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court held that although by nature all fines are punitive, the test to determine if the fine is excessive is whether the fine is grossly disproportional. When the amount of restitution is geared directly to the amount of the victim's loss caused by the defendant's illegal activity, proportionality is built into the order. The Supreme Court also held that in the instant case, there was a finding that the defendant was not indigent and had the means to pay the restitution and therefore the order did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004).

Improper Inclusion of Social Security Benefits When Determining Income for Purposes of Restitution: An order that Social Security benefits be included in appellant's net income for purposes of determining the amount of net income to be paid as restitution improperly burdened appellant's Social Security benefits. Including Social Security benefits in income conflicts with 42 U.S.C. 407(a), which provides that the benefits cannot be subjected to execution, levy, attachment, garnishment, or other legal process. The order was an improper attempt to subject the benefits to "other legal process". St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004).

Review of Legality of Imposing Restitution — Failure to Raise Issue Below: If a defendant appeals a sentence in a criminal case on the grounds that it is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, the issue may be reviewed even if no objection was made at the time of sentencing. Therefore, defendant's claim that an order to pay restitution as a condition to a suspended sentence was illegal was not waived by his failure to raise the issue below and would be reviewed on appeal. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004).

Restitution Properly Ordered When Dismissed Charges Related to Charge for Which Defendant Convicted: McIntire was charged with felony burglary, misdemeanor theft, and misdemeanor forgery. Pursuant to a plea agreement, McIntire pleaded guilty to the burglary charge and the other charges were dismissed. The trial court ordered McIntire to pay restitution, but McIntire contended that because the forgery charges were dismissed, restitution could not be ordered to compensate for the forged checks and that the court lacked authority to impose restitution when there was no longer a victim with respect to the dismissed forgery charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The victim was the same for both crimes, and the burglary was directly connected to the forgery, constituting an ongoing criminal transaction, so dismissal of the forgery charges did not deprive the court of authority to impose a restitution obligation on McIntire for the checks stolen from the victim during the burglary and for the pecuniary loss from the subsequent forgery of those checks. St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Question Whether Restitution Connected to Crime — Remand for Reconsideration of Restitution: McDanold assisted in kidnapping and assaulting Berry, who was later killed by another man who was also involved in the kidnapping and assault. Although McDanold did not kill Berry, upon McDanold's conviction, the District Court ordered McDanold to pay restitution to Berry's parents and to the crime victims compensation fund. On appeal, McDanold contended that the sentencing court improperly ordered the restitution because the expenses were unrelated to McDanold's crimes and also asserted that he had been double-billed for some expenses that had been paid by the crime victims compensation fund. The state contended that there was an arguable connection between McDanold's offenses and the pecuniary losses to Berry's parents and to the fund. The Supreme Court remanded for reconsideration of restitution, including the parents' claims and whether they had indeed been compensated in part by the crime victims compensation fund. St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004).

Costs Directly Related to Defendant's Criminal Conduct Properly Included in Restitution Calculation: Thompson was a maintenance worker at a commercial building and had keys to the entire building. Thompson was convicted of stealing and then pawning tools from the maintenance room in the building and was ordered to pay restitution, including the costs of rekeying the entire building. Thompson contended that requiring payment of the cost of rekeying the building went beyond recovery for any pecuniary losses and was an abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court disagreed. The reason the building was rekeyed was a direct result of Thompson's criminal conduct, and the expense was an out-of-pocket loss directly related to the thefts, so including those special damage expenses in the restitution calculation was proper. St. v. Thompson, 2004 MT 131, 321 M 332, 91 P3d 12 (2004).

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and 46-18-251(2) meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-244(2) and subsection (1) of this section, and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004), and St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Restitution Adequately Documented in PSI Report and Information Submitted by Victim: Heath contended that the presentence investigation report (PSI) contained insufficient information to document his ability to pay restitution and the victim's pecuniary loss, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished Brown, Hilgers, and Pritchett on grounds that the PSI report deficiencies in those cases were not present in Heath's case. Rather, the court followed St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003), and St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003), finding that the PSI report adequately addressed Heath's employability, assets and debts, and capability of paying restitution. The valuation of the victim's pecuniary loss was adequately provided in documentation submitted by the victim and, coupled with expert testimony on the value of recovered items, provided substantial credible evidence upon which to base the restitution amount. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Failure of Presentence Report to Document Restitution Concerns — Payment of Restitution at Discretion of Probation Officer Improper: Following a sexual assault conviction, Flanagan was ordered to pay for all offense-related medical and counseling costs, after payment by the victim's insurance, and all future costs for the next 2 years. Flanagan asserted that the restitution plan was illegal based on St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), because the presentence investigation report did not document Flanagan's monthly expenses or address his future ability to pay restitution and because the development of a restitution schedule was left to the discretion of the probation officer. The Supreme Court agreed and remanded for addition to the presentence report of documentation of Flanagan's monthly expenses and future ability to pay restitution and to allow the District Court to hold a hearing to enter a sentence and judgment addressing Flanagan's ability to pay and the time of restitution payments. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Proof of Inability to Pay Restitution — Deferment of Sentence Extended to Allow Payment — Error: A probationer sufficiently proved that her failure to continue restitution payments was not caused by lack of a good faith effort to pay and that her income was insufficient to make even the $10 monthly payment that her probation officer was apparently willing to accept. The state's argument that she might soon receive a workers' compensation lump-sum settlement that she could use to pay the remaining restitution and would receive a "windfall" if her deferred sentence and probation were not extended for 2 years for failure to pay so that she could make further payments had no merit. Disability benefits are not a windfall; they are partial compensation for the loss of earning capacity. In addition, the duty to pay restitution remains until it is fully paid, and restitution may be collected in a civil proceeding at any time, including after the conclusion of state supervision under a sentence. Therefore, the District Court abused its discretion when it did not excuse the probationer's failure to pay, and the order extending the deferred sentence and probation for 2 years was reversed. St. v. Welling, 2002 MT 308, 313 M 67, 59 P3d 1146 (2002).

District Court Error in Postponing Determination of Restitution: The District Court provided that as a condition of probation, restitution would be an amount stipulated by counsel and approved by the court. The Supreme Court held that 46-18-242 and this section require the trial court to establish the amount of restitution and terms of payment at the time of sentencing and remanded the case to the District Court for a determination of restitution. Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002).

Imposition of Restitution Upon Satisfaction of Statutory Procedures: Benoit was convicted of felony theft for falsifying voided transactions and customer discounts while employed at a restaurant over a 1 ½-year period. Benoit was ordered to pay $15,933.90 in restitution to the employer, based on calculations by the business manager who examined transaction records during the time that Benoit was on duty, and estimated the business's pecuniary losses. Benoit contested the restitution award on grounds that documentation of the victim's pecuniary loss was not provided in the presentence investigation or at the restitution hearing and that because the restitution amounts were speculative, the District Court had no authority to impose restitution. The Supreme Court noted that a sentencing court is required to impose a sentence that includes full restitution if the victim is found to have sustained a pecuniary loss, but restitution may not be imposed unless the procedures in 46-18-242 through 46-18-249 and this section are satisfied. Failure of a presentence investigation to document a victim's loss and the offender's financial resources and ability to pay restitution, as required in 46-18-242, renders the judgment illegal, but that information was included in the presentence report in this case. Therefore, the District Court did have authority to impose restitution. Further, although the actual losses resulting from Benoit's admitted theft could not be determined with certainty, the method employed in calculating the loss was reasonable based on the best evidence available under the circumstances. The employer was entitled to recover its estimated pecuniary losses, plus reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the case, including wages paid to three employees who assisted in calculating restitution. St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), followed in St. v. O'Connor, 2009 MT 222, 351 M 329, 212 P3d 276 (2009), with regard to reasonableness of the method employed in calculating the loss based on the best evidence available under the circumstances.

No Abuse of Discretion in Imposing Sentence Greater Than Sentence Suggested in Plea Agreement — Sentence Adequately Explained: Wells was charged with DUI, negligent vehicular assault, operation of a motor vehicle without insurance, and driving with a revoked license. Wells entered a plea agreement in which he pleaded guilty to negligent vehicular assault and driving with a revoked license and agreed to pay restitution, and the prosecution agreed to recommend a 5-year sentence with all but 18 months suspended. At the sentencing hearing, Wells' probation officer disagreed with the recommended sentence, stating that 18 months was an insufficient time for Wells to deal with his alcohol and drug problems and that restitution was unlikely given Wells' work and drug abuse history. The sentencing court considered the testimony and the evidence and imposed a 5-year sentence without any time suspended. Wells appealed on grounds that the sentence was not adequately explained and was erroneous. Under St. v. Stumpf, 187 M 225, 609 P2d 298 (1980), the sentencing court has the discretion to impose the maximum sentence allowed by law but should provide any rationale for the sentence. Here, the court provided a rationale, explaining the nature of the offense and the degree of harm done by Wells and describing Wells' history of drug abuse and inability to pay restitution as well as a concern for future harm to society. Wells was informed that the judge was not bound by the terms of the plea agreement and retained the authority to impose a greater or lesser sentence than recommended, within the statutory limits for the offense. The sentence was adequately explained and within statutory limits and was thus affirmed. St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 112, 305 M 303, 27 P3d 47 (2001).

Payment of Child Support Improper Condition of Sentence for Felony DUI — Victim and Correlation to Underlying Offense Necessary for Imposition of Restitution: Horton was arrested for DUI, and a search of his driving record revealed nine prior DUI convictions. A further search showed that Horton also owed more than $47,000 in back child support. Horton was charged with felony DUI, with driving with a suspended or revoked license, as a habitual traffic offender operating a motor vehicle, and with felony nonsupport. By plea agreement, Horton agreed to plead guilty to the traffic offenses in exchange for dismissal of the nonsupport charge. The plea agreement stated that the state would recommend a 13-month sentence to be served in prerelease, followed by 4 years of probation, and, as a condition of the probationary sentence, provided that Horton would also make regular child support payments plus an additional sum monthly toward the support arrearage. As set out in the agreement, Horton pleaded guilty to the traffic offenses, and the nonsupport charge was dismissed. At sentencing, the habitual traffic offender charge was subsequently dismissed for failure of the state to prove that a valid habitual offender designation was in place at the time of the offense, and in addition, Horton's counsel objected to the court ordering payment of any child support arrearage, arguing that because the nonsupport charge had been dismissed, Horton would be paying restitution on a count for which he had not been convicted. Nevertheless, the court ordered Horton to pay support and promised to revoke his probation and sentence him to 4 years in prison with no parole if support was not paid. On appeal, Horton argued that the District Court abused its discretion and exceeded statutory mandates when it required him to pay restitution for an offense that was dismissed, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), for the position that restitution is statutorily limited to the victim of the crime and that because there was no victim who sustained pecuniary or economic loss as a result of the felony DUI or driving with a suspended or revoked license, restitution was inappropriate. The state argued that Horton was attempting to receive the benefit of the plea agreement—having the felony nonsupport charge dismissed—without holding up his end of the bargain by paying child support. The Supreme Court noted that a plea agreement is subject to contract law and that the court will not assist a defendant in escaping the obligations of a plea agreement once its benefits are received. However, the court also pointed out that a District Court's authority to impose sentences in criminal cases is defined and constrained by statute. The statutory authority for payment of restitution is in 46-18-201, which limits payment of restitution to the victim of a crime for which a defendant is convicted, and because Horton was not convicted of nonsupport, there was no victim to whom Horton could be ordered to pay restitution. The state also contended that ordering Horton to pay child support was proper because under 46-18-202(1), a sentencing court may impose any condition reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, but there was no correlation or connection between Horton's conviction for DUI and ordering him to pay child support. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered that the portion of Horton's sentence requiring payment of child support be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), followed in St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Restitution Proper for Ambulance and Towing Charges Related to Hit and Run and High-Speed Chase: LaTray was convicted of DUI, operating a vehicle without proof of insurance, operating a vehicle while a habitual traffic offender, leaving the scene of an accident, and criminal endangerment. The charges stemmed from a hit-and-run accident and subsequent high-speed chase, which ended when LaTray lost control of his car, went into a ditch, and rolled the vehicle. Officials at the scene called an ambulance as a precautionary measure and called a tow truck to remove LaTray's vehicle from the ditch. As restitution, the sentencing court ordered LaTray to pay the costs of the ambulance and tow truck. LaTray appealed on grounds that restitution is limited to pecuniary losses suffered by direct victims, as defined in terms of the offenses for which he was convicted, asserting that the ambulance company and towing service were not victims of his offenses, so restitution could not be ordered for their reimbursement. The Supreme Court disagreed. The plain language of this section does not limit restitution to a victim defined in terms of the offense or to a loss arising directly from the criminal conduct. Also, St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), makes it clear that classification of a victim for restitution purposes does not depend on the individual's relationship to the elements of the crime for which a defendant is sentenced. Further, restitution is not confined to the amount by which a defendant is enriched at a victim's expense, but rather the restitution statute empowers courts to impose restitution for economic loss as a result of a crime. Here, the ambulance and towing companies suffered an economic loss in out-of-pocket expenses for services for which they were not reimbursed, and the losses were the direct result of LaTray's criminal conduct, which created a situation for which the services were reasonably necessary for the safety of the public or LaTray himself. The restitution order was affirmed. St. v. LaTray, 2000 MT 262, 302 M 11, 11 P3d 116, 57 St. Rep. 1098 (2000). See also St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407 (1999).

Failure to Document Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution and Victim's Pecuniary Loss — Restitution Sentence Improper: The general mandate to sentencing courts is that a sentence must include full restitution whenever it is found that the victim of an offense has sustained a pecuniary loss, subject to mandatory detailed statutory procedures and qualifications. Here, although the District Court received some evidence of these amounts during the sentencing hearing, the failure of the presentence investigation report to document the victim's pecuniary loss, as well as the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, provided the court no authority to impose a sentence of restitution and rendered its judgment illegal. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), following St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), and St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Sentence of Restitution Based on Defendant's Indigency Constituting Due Process Violation: Pritchett entered the garage of a former employer in an effort to return two hunting rifles that he had stolen and pawned to support his gambling habit. Pritchett dropped his flashlight and, unable to find it in the dark, lit a cigarette lighter, which ignited a leaking propane bottle and caused an explosion that destroyed the garage and its contents. Pritchett was convicted of burglary and ordered to pay restitution of $63,569.25. Noting that the amount of restitution was "enormous", the probation officer who prepared the presentence investigation report stated that Pritchett should receive a 20-year suspended sentence to allow adequate time to pay off the restitution. The District Court adopted the sentencing recommendation exactly as proposed. Although the court did not expressly state that it was sentencing Pritchett to the maximum term to provide sufficient time to pay the ordered restitution, there was sufficient evidence in the record to show that the length of the sentence was based on Pritchett's indigency because, given Pritchett's limited financial resources, no shorter time would allow payment of restitution. Under St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), basing a prison term on a defendant's indigency is a violation of the right to due process. Thus, the Supreme Court vacated the sentence and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Defendant Not Responsible for Restitution in Excess of Damages Caused by Criminal Conduct: During the course of a drug investigation, Beavers admitted accepting stolen property in exchange for illegal drugs. The District Court ordered Beavers to pay restitution to the victims of the thefts, even though Beavers did not actually steal the property. Under St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180 (1995), an accused is liable for restitution for offenses to which the accused has admitted guilt, been found guilty, or has agreed to pay restitution, so Beavers was not responsible for restitution for offenses she did not commit. Beavers' admission of the offense of receiving stolen property was sufficient to satisfy the causal standard of this section, that the victim suffered loss as a result of Beavers' offense, so the court did not abuse its discretion in ordering restitution; however, Beavers was required to pay restitution only for the property that formed the basis of the offense, not for property that was stolen by others but not received and possessed by Beavers. When stolen property is recovered, the amount of restitution owed is the difference between the value of the property taken and the salvage value of the property returned, and the state has the burden of establishing those values. The case was remanded for calculation of the amount of restitution owed. St. v. Beavers, 2000 MT 145, 300 M 49, 3 P3d 614, 57 St. Rep. 567 (2000).

When Restitution Owing: Under 46-18-201, the sentencing court is required to provide for full restitution by a defendant to the victim of a criminal offense who sustains a pecuniary loss. Here, Hilgers' issuance of more than 50 bad checks and stealing cash and diverting checks and money orders from his employer in an amount exceeding $33,500 clearly qualified as a pecuniary loss. The court found the state's witnesses more credible than Hilgers, providing adequate support in the record as to the amount owing. The restitution amount was not clearly erroneous and was affirmed on appeal. However, the Supreme Court remanded for lack of documentation, as required under 46-18-242, regarding Hilgers' financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, finding the information in the presentence report regarding Hilgers' age, education, assets and obligations, and marital and employment status inadequate in addressing Hilgers' resources and ability to pay the amount in question. St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), following St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Inclusion in Restitution of Costs Related to Pecuniary Loss — Wages Paid to Embezzler Not Recoverable as Pecuniary Loss: Under this section, a sentencing court may include in restitution costs paid by the victim as a result of defendant's criminal act as long as the costs are considered pecuniary loss, as defined by 46-18-243. This loss may include economic loss as a result of the crime, out-of-pocket losses, such as medical expenses, and reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the victim in filing charges or in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the offense. Here, Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution, but argued that the fact that this section excludes general damages militated against the inclusion in the restitution obligation of amounts beyond the total stolen from the employer. Brewer improperly characterized the employer's out-of-pocket losses as general damages. The employer paid accounting firms, employees, labor contractors, a software company, and a locksmith more than $15,000 in an attempt to reconstruct books and repair damage resulting from Brewer's crime. Those expenses were all considered out-of-pocket losses within the context of this section and were properly includable in the restitution calculation. However, wages paid to Brewer over the course of employment did not constitute pecuniary loss and were not recoverable as restitution. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999). See also St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), and St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Interest Properly Imposed on Restitution Obligation: Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution to the employer, including 10% interest on the restitution obligation. Brewer contended that interest in this case was per se an abuse of discretion insofar as it exceeded the employer's pecuniary loss. The issue of whether interest may be properly applied to restitution under this section was a case of first impression in Montana. Interest is not expressly provided for by the restitution statute, which provides for restitution to a victim who suffers a pecuniary loss, defined in 46-18-243 as special damages, but not general damages, that a person could recover in a civil action arising out of the facts constituting the criminal activity. Interest is a special damage available in a civil action under 27-1-210 and thus was properly applied to Brewer's restitution. However, interest is not allowed on damages such as pain and suffering, mental anguish or suffering, or punitive damages. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999).

No Evidence That Victim Will Be Unjustly Enriched — Credit Against Restitution Properly Denied: Kober stole money from the Montana State University-Bozeman student health service and was ordered to pay restitution. Because the stolen money was considered taxable income, Kober was also charged with failing to properly report income for state income tax purposes. From the proceeds of the subsequent sale of the family home, Kober paid $46,004.67 to the Department of Revenue to satisfy its lien for back income taxes. Because the money was placed in the general fund from which the University System receives part of its funding, Kober maintained that the University System would benefit from the payment of the back income taxes and that in order to avoid a windfall unjustly enriching the university, the restitution amount should be offset by $46,004.67. However, Kober did not establish that any of the $46,004.67 would actually be distributed to or benefit Montana State University-Bozeman or the student health service, so the District Court properly denied Kober's request for a credit against restitution. St. v. Kober, 1999 MT 264, 296 M 425, 989 P2d 399, 56 St. Rep. 1076 (1999).

Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Discharge Held Not to Discharge Restitution Obligation: After Woods was convicted and sentenced for writing a bad check, he was given a Chapter 7 discharge in bankruptcy. Woods then argued to the Supreme Court that the requirement that he make restitution was also discharged. Citing Kelly v. Robinson, 479 US 36 (1986), the Supreme Court held that Woods's Chapter 7 discharge did not discharge his restitution obligation. In making its ruling, the Supreme Court distinguished Pennsylvania Dept. of Public Welfare v. Davenport, 495 US 552 (1990), in which the U.S. Supreme Court held that Chapter 13 bankruptcy discharges do in fact discharge restitution obligations but also noted that the result in Davenport had been overturned by legislation enacted by the U.S. Congress. St. v. Woods, 286 M 355, 951 P2d 981, 54 St. Rep. 1445 (1997).

Requiring Defendant to Pay Restitution for Admitted Offenses for Which Defendant Is Not Charged or Convicted: Blanchard argued that the lower court erred in requiring him, as part of the plea bargain, to pay restitution for offenses that he admitted committing but for which he was never charged or convicted. The Supreme Court held that the issue is one of first impression in Montana but that other jurisdictions have held that an accused is liable for restitution for offenses admitted to even if the accused is not charged or convicted of the crimes and especially in cases in which the accused has agreed to pay the restitution as part of a plea bargain. The Supreme Court also held that the lower court had not erred in ordering the restitution when it was intended to serve a rehabilitative purpose. St. v. Blanchard, 270 M 11, 889 P2d 1180, 52 St. Rep. 54 (1995), and followed in St. v. Beavers, 2000 MT 145, 300 M 49, 3 P3d 614, 57 St. Rep. 567 (2000).

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 272 in (1) in introductory clause after "victim" deleted "of the offense" and after "loss" deleted "as a result of the offense"; in (1)(a) substituted "a list of the offender's assets" for "documentation of the offender's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution"; in (1)(b) at beginning substituted "an affidavit that specifically describes" for "documentation of", after "loss" inserted "and the replacement value in dollars of the loss", and at end after "victim" deleted "or by the board of crime control if compensation for the victim's loss has been reimbursed by the state"; in (2) near middle after "court" substituted "shall accept" for "may receive" and after "evidence of" deleted "the offender's ability to pay and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

The amendments to this section made by Ch. 114, L. 2003, were rendered void by sec. 9, Ch. 272, L. 2003, a coordination section.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 272, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who have an unpaid restitution obligation on [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 118 at end of (1)(b) substituted "reimbursed by the state" for "reimbursed by the crime victims compensation and assistance account". Amendment effective March 23, 2001.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 118, L. 2001, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature in Senate Bill No. 83 changed funding for the crime victims compensation and assistance program from an earmarked special revenue account to the general fund; and

WHEREAS, the crime victims compensation and assistance program has been supported entirely by general fund money since fiscal year 1996; and

WHEREAS, repealing section 53-9-109 is necessary in order to clarify the conflict that currently exists between actual appropriation practices and the law."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 near beginning of (1) substituted reference to victim's pecuniary loss for "restitution may be a proper condition of a deferred or suspended sentence"; at end of (1)(b) inserted reference to Board of Crime Control and crime victims compensation and assistance account; and made minor changes in style.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

Report Containing List of Victim's Medical Expenses Insufficient to Serve as Victim-Submitted Affidavit: A presentence investigation report set out the medical expenses paid by or on behalf of a crime victim, but no documentation or evidence of payment was included. The Supreme Court concluded that the report was not sufficient in form and substance to serve as the victim-submitted affidavit of medical expenses required under 46-18-242(1)(b) to form the basis for establishing the amount of restitution owed by defendant for the victim's medical expenses. St. v. Hunt, 2009 MT 265, 352 M 70, 214 P3d 1234 (2009). See also McDermott v. Carie, LLC, 2005 MT 293, 329 M 295, 124 P3d 168 (2005).

Affidavit Required: The state charged Smietanka with the felony offense of sexual intercourse without consent. Smietanka and the state subsequently entered into a plea agreement pursuant to which the state agreed to amend the information to charge misdemeanor offenses of assault and negligent endangerment and eliminate the sexual intercourse without consent offense. The state further agreed to recommend that the District Court sentence Smietanka to a 6-month suspended sentence on each count, with the sentences to run concurrently, and with credit for 200 days for time served in jail. In return, Smietanka agreed to plead guilty to the two misdemeanor offenses and to pay a fine, public defender fees, and costs as determined by the court. Smietanka appeared in District Court and pleaded guilty to the two misdemeanor offenses. The court accepted the guilty pleas and proceeded directly to sentencing. The state then recommended a 6-month suspended sentence on the assault offense and a concurrent 12-month suspended sentence on the negligent endangerment offense, with 200 days credit for time served. The state also requested that the court impose restitution payable to the Montana Department of Justice's crime victims compensation program (CVCP). In support of its request for restitution, the state presented the court with a letter from the CVCP stating that the victim of Smietanka's offenses had filed an application for compensation benefits. The state also called a Deputy County Attorney as a witness, who testified that she had called the CVCP, verified that the CVCP paid $765.98 on behalf of the victim, and made a handwritten notation to that effect at the bottom of the CVCP letter. The District Court sentenced Smietanka on the assault offense to a 6-month suspended term in the Jefferson County jail. It deferred imposition of sentence on the negligent endangerment offense for 2 years. Smietanka was given credit against his sentences for 200 days of time served in jail. The court also imposed restitution of $765.98, public defender fees of $1,000, and various fees and surcharges. The court entered judgment on the convictions and sentences, and Smietanka appealed. Smietanka contended that the state failed to present the District Court with an affidavit from the CVCP specifically describing its alleged pecuniary loss and the state conceded that it failed to present the required affidavit describing the nature of the expenses for which it requested reimbursement. In light of this concession, the District Court erred in ordering Smietanka to pay restitution without adequate documentary support as required by this section. St. v. Smietanka, 2008 MT 357, 346 M 353, 195 P3d 797, (2008).

Determination of Restitution When Amount of Actual Loss Unknown: McMaster admitted taking money from Wright, but the actual amount could not be determined. The District Court received several restitution recommendations ranging from $12,914 proposed in the presentence investigation report to $334,425 based on a cash flow analysis. After considering testimony from numerous experts and from McMaster and Wright, the Court set restitution at $30,000, and McMaster appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. As established in St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), a victim may recover losses even though the actual losses are uncertain if the losses are calculated by use of reasonable methods based on the best available evidence. Nothing requires a court or victim to substantiate a restitution calculation with documentation, nor is a court circumscribed from relying on victim testimony presented at a sentencing hearing. The court properly considered McMaster's written statement and Wright's nonexpert undocumented testimony presented at the sentencing hearing. Substantial evidence supported the court's findings and the court did not abuse its discretion when it set restitution at $30,000. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 268, 345 M 172, 190 P3d 302 (2008).

Adequate Information in Presentence Investigation Report to Meet Statutory Requirements for Restitution Payments: Kuykendall asserted that his sentence imposing restitution was illegal because the sentencing court failed to consider his financial resources and future ability to pay restitution. Noting the 2003 amendments to this section, the Supreme Court disagreed. The presentence investigation report stated that Kuykendall was unemployed and had no income, no assets, and no debt, and it detailed the losses suffered by the victim. That information was adequate to meet the statutory requirements for setting out Kuykendall's ability to pay restitution. St. v. Kuykendall, 2006 MT 110, 332 M 180, 136 P3d 983 (2006).

Imposition of Restitution Based on Documented Losses Not Violative of Constitutional Prohibition Against Excessive Fines: As set out in St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004), a restitution award violates the constitutional prohibition against excessive fines if the award is grossly disproportional to the gravity of the offense. Here, Kuykendall was convicted of criminal endangerment and ordered to pay restitution of over $10,000 to a peace officer who was injured during the crime. Kuykendall asserted that the restitution amount was grossly disproportional to the crime of criminal endangerment, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The amount of loss suffered by the officer was documented and was not refuted by Kuykendall at trial. The sentencing court relied on the only evidence presented at the sentencing hearing, and the amount of restitution ordered was directly related to the amount of loss and thus was not grossly disproportional. The restitution amount was not excessive and was affirmed. St. v. Kuykendall, 2006 MT 110, 332 M 180, 136 P3d 983 (2006).

Restitution Improper Absent Documentation of Victim's Loss: This section requires the sentencing court to consider some documentation of a victim's pecuniary loss, and restitution may not be imposed unless this statutory requirement is satisfied. In this case, absent evidence of the victim's loss in the presentence investigation report or at the sentencing hearing, it was improper to order Hirt to pay restitution to the victim of a sexual assault. St. v. Hirt, 2005 MT 285, 329 M 267, 124 P3d 147 (2005). See also St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000).

Joint and Several Liability for Restitution Properly Imposed: Following conviction for three counts of burglary, the District Court found Workman jointly and severally liable for the full amount of restitution to the burglary victims and ordered Workman to pay restitution in the amount of $26,840.33. Workman was accompanied in the burglaries by four accomplices, and Workman argued that he should be held responsible only for his proportionate share as divided among all the defendants. That argument was rejected, and Workman appealed on grounds that restitution was improperly imposed. Workman relied on the 2001 version of this section, contending that the required documentation of his financial resources was inaccurate, and on the 2001 version of 46-18-244, arguing that the sentencing court failed to establish a payment schedule or set the amount of installment payments. The Supreme Court noted that both the required documentation and payment schedule provisions were deleted by the 2003 Legislature and are no longer required. Workman's argument that restitution should be apportioned among his accomplices also failed because the fate of the accomplices was immaterial to the court's authority to impose restitution. Under the 2003 versions of the restitution laws and given that Workman stipulated that he owed the full amount, the District Court properly held Workman jointly and severally liable for the pecuniary loss suffered by his victims. St. v. Workman, 2005 MT 22, 326 M 1, 107 P3d 462 (2005).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

No Standing to Raise Constitutionality of Restitution Statutes Absent Showing of Direct Personal Injury: The 2003 Legislature amended the state restitution statutes, and Thaut sought to challenge the constitutionality of the amendments on numerous grounds. However, Thaut was unable to show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the restitution laws. Pursuant to St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990), and Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), Thaut lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the restitution statutes, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004). See also St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), in which defendant established direct economic injury and thus standing to challenge the constitutionality of repayment conditions on equal protection grounds through the District Court's order to repay $2,398 in costs of appointed counsel.

Restitution Order Proper Given Defendant's Ability to Pay: The sentencing court ordered Thaut to pay $69,457 in restitution. Thaut appealed the award on grounds that the court failed to meet statutory requirements establishing Thaut's financial resources and future ability to pay and on grounds that due process rights were violated when the court failed to consider several factors in Thaut's ability to pay, including Thaut's age and short time to work following parole, minimum wage employment history, lack of assets and ability to acquire assets in the future, and mental health issues related to an alleged prior head injury. However, the presentence investigation and supplemental presentence investigation provided adequate documentation regarding Thaut's ability to pay restitution and to work hard to earn a living. Further, Thaut had no documented physical limitations and was unemployed only because he was incarcerated. The District Court's determination that Thaut had the ability to pay medical expenses, a grant from the Board of Crime Control, and property damages was amply supported by the record, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Establish Restitution Amount — Reversible Error: Following conviction for burglarizing casinos, Eixenberger was ordered by the District Court to pay restitution for losses and damages sustained by the casinos in a sum to be determined, plus interest. Eixenberger challenged the restitution award amount, and the Supreme Court reversed. It was error for the sentencing court to order payment of restitution in an amount to be determined rather than to specify the total amount, as required in 46-18-244. The presentence investigation report also failed to document the victims' pecuniary losses and Eixenberger's resources and ability to pay, as required by this section, so further sentencing proceedings were warranted on remand. St. v. Eixenberger, 2004 MT 127, 321 M 298, 90 P3d 453 (2004).

Restitution Adequately Documented in PSI Report and Information Submitted by Victim: Heath contended that the presentence investigation report (PSI) contained insufficient information to document his ability to pay restitution and the victim's pecuniary loss, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished Brown, Hilgers, and Pritchett on grounds that the PSI report deficiencies in those cases were not present in Heath's case. Rather, the court followed St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003), and St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003), finding that the PSI report adequately addressed Heath's employability, assets and debts, and capability of paying restitution. The valuation of the victim's pecuniary loss was adequately provided in documentation submitted by the victim and, coupled with expert testimony on the value of recovered items, provided substantial credible evidence upon which to base the restitution amount. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Restitution Sentence Proper Despite Failure to List Pecuniary Loss in Presentence Investigation Report — Remand to Determine Restitution When Amount Undetermined: Following Dunkerson's conviction for theft and burglary, the District Court ordered restitution for the victim. The presentence investigation (PSI) report listed the loss as an undetermined amount. Failure of a PSI report to document a victim's pecuniary loss and the offender's ability to pay renders a restitution sentence illegal, although a full evidentiary hearing can vitiate the need for loss documentation in a PSI report. Here, the PSI report noted that the victim needed more time to accurately account for restitution owed, which satisfied the loss requirement of this section, so the District Court did not err in ordering restitution even though the amount of restitution was not in the PSI report. However, the court did err by not specifying the amount owed and the time and method of payment, so the case was remanded to determine the amount and method of payment pursuant to 46-18-244. St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003).

Failure of Presentence Report to Document Restitution Concerns — Payment of Restitution at Discretion of Probation Officer Improper: Following a sexual assault conviction, Flanagan was ordered to pay for all offense-related medical and counseling costs, after payment by the victim's insurance, and all future costs for the next 2 years. Flanagan asserted that the restitution plan was illegal based on St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), because the presentence investigation report did not document Flanagan's monthly expenses or address his future ability to pay restitution and because the development of a restitution schedule was left to the discretion of the probation officer. The Supreme Court agreed and remanded for addition to the presentence report of documentation of Flanagan's monthly expenses and future ability to pay restitution and to allow the District Court to hold a hearing to enter a sentence and judgment addressing Flanagan's ability to pay and the time of restitution payments. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

District Court Error in Postponing Determination of Restitution: The District Court provided that as a condition of probation, restitution would be an amount stipulated by counsel and approved by the court. The Supreme Court held that 46-18-241 and this section require the trial court to establish the amount of restitution and terms of payment at the time of sentencing and remanded the case to the District Court for a determination of restitution. Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002).

Imposition of Restitution Upon Satisfaction of Statutory Procedures: Benoit was convicted of felony theft for falsifying voided transactions and customer discounts while employed at a restaurant over a 1 ½-year period. Benoit was ordered to pay $15,933.90 in restitution to the employer, based on calculations by the business manager who examined transaction records during the time that Benoit was on duty, and estimated the business's pecuniary losses. Benoit contested the restitution award on grounds that documentation of the victim's pecuniary loss was not provided in the presentence investigation or at the restitution hearing and that because the restitution amounts were speculative, the District Court had no authority to impose restitution. The Supreme Court noted that a sentencing court is required to impose a sentence that includes full restitution if the victim is found to have sustained a pecuniary loss, but restitution may not be imposed unless the procedures in 46-18-241 through 46-18-249 are satisfied. Failure of a presentence investigation to document a victim's loss and the offender's financial resources and ability to pay restitution, as required in this section, renders the judgment illegal, but that information was included in the presentence report in this case. Therefore, the District Court did have authority to impose restitution. Further, although the actual losses resulting from Benoit's admitted theft could not be determined with certainty, the method employed in calculating the loss was reasonable based on the best evidence available under the circumstances. The employer was entitled to recover its estimated pecuniary losses, plus reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the case, including wages paid to three employees who assisted in calculating restitution. St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), followed in St. v. O'Connor, 2009 MT 222, 351 M 329, 212 P3d 276 (2009), with regard to reasonableness of the method employed in calculating the loss based on the best evidence available under the circumstances.

Failure to Document Victim's Pecuniary Loss and Offender's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution — Restitution Condition Vacated: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was a requirement that Muhammad pay $5,000 in restitution. Under 46-18-201, a sentencing judge shall require a defendant to pay full restitution to a victim if the judge finds that the victim has sustained a pecuniary loss. Imposition of restitution is subject to detailed statutory procedures and qualifications, which include documented evidence of the victim's loss and the offender's ability to pay. The sentencing court is required to specify the amount, method, and time of each payment to the victim. Here, the presentence investigation did not document the victim's pecuniary loss or Muhammad's future ability to pay restitution, nor did the sentencing court consider Muhammad's future ability to pay because the relevant evidence was not presented to the court. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the restitution condition of the sentence was illegal, and that condition was vacated. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002), following St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and followed in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Failure to Document Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution and Victim's Pecuniary Loss — Restitution Sentence Improper: The general mandate to sentencing courts is that a sentence must include full restitution whenever it is found that the victim of an offense has sustained a pecuniary loss, subject to mandatory detailed statutory procedures and qualifications. Here, although the District Court received some evidence of these amounts during the sentencing hearing, the failure of the presentence investigation report to document the victim's pecuniary loss, as well as the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, provided the court no authority to impose a sentence of restitution and rendered its judgment illegal. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), following St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), and St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

When Restitution Owing: Under 46-18-201, the sentencing court is required to provide for full restitution by a defendant to the victim of a criminal offense who sustains a pecuniary loss. Here, Hilgers' issuance of more than 50 bad checks and stealing cash and diverting checks and money orders from his employer in an amount exceeding $33,500 clearly qualified as a pecuniary loss. The court found the state's witnesses more credible than Hilgers, providing adequate support in the record as to the amount owing. The restitution amount was not clearly erroneous and was affirmed on appeal. However, the Supreme Court remanded for lack of documentation, as required under this section, regarding Hilgers' financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, finding the information in the presentence report regarding Hilgers' age, education, assets and obligations, and marital and employment status inadequate in addressing Hilgers' resources and ability to pay the amount in question. St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), following St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Financial Resources and Future Ability to Pay Restitution Properly Considered: In imposing interest on Brewer's restitution obligation, Brewer contended that the court did not properly consider her financial resources and future ability to pay restitution or specify the amount, method, and time of each payment, as required by 46-18-244. At the sentencing hearing, Brewer testified that: (1) she had obtained two jobs; (2) because her husband's wages covered the household expenses, she intended to put all her wages toward restitution; and (3) she had already made nearly $6,000 in restitution payments and intended to continue the payments. Based on this testimony, the District Court properly considered Brewer's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution in ordering repayment according to a schedule of repayment arrived at with the probation officer. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999).

Presentence Investigation Inadequate to Support Restitution — Restitution Order Inadequate: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court ordered Brown to make restitution to the one victim and to the families of both victims. The presentence investigation report contained no documentation of the pecuniary loss of either victim and inadequate documentation of Brown's financial resources, especially his future earning capacity. The Supreme Court noted that as probable consequences of these errors, the District Court's order for restitution did not require Brown to pay a specific amount at a specific time. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the order could not lawfully be made and remanded the case to the District Court. St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), distinguished in St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), in which the failure of the presentence investigation to set forth the amount of restitution was not considered fatal because defendant was given a hearing and because defendant had entered a plea bargain providing that the amount was to be agreed upon by the parties prior to sentencing and if the parties were unable to agree on an amount, it would be determined by the court, and St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), and followed in St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003).

Restitution Proper Only if Sentence Deferred or Suspended: The Supreme Court vacated the lower court's restitution order on the basis that no portion of the defendant's sentence was deferred or suspended as is required by the statute before restitution can be ordered. St. v. Mazurkiewicz, 245 M 172, 799 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 1962 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Bourne, 259 M 274, 855 P2d 222, 50 St. Rep. 791 (1993), in which restitution was clearly attendant to conditions of parole if and when parole occurred.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

Expenses Recoverable in Civil Action Properly Imposed as Restitution — Sufficient Evidence of Restitution Amount: Essig was convicted of stalking and sentenced to pay restitution of $5,582.03, including counseling expenses for the victim's children, blood testing for one of the children, and the cost of six memory cards for a digital camera. Essig contested the restitution and the amount, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under 46-18-243, pecuniary loss includes general damages that a person could recover in a civil action against the defendant. In this case, the evidence showed that the expenses could have been recovered in a civil action by the victim and thus were legally imposed as restitution. The value of the various items was supported by the evidence and their inclusion as restitution was not erroneous. St. v. Essig, 2009 MT 340, 353 M 99, 218 P3d 838 (2009).

Sufficient Connection Between Victim of Vehicle Accident and Evidence Tampering to Warrant Defendant's Payment of Victim's Funeral Expenses as Restitution: Sherman was thrown from her car in a vehicle accident, and as she lay in the road, she was struck and killed by Ness's vehicle. Ness did not stop and subsequently repaired and washed his car in an effort to conceal evidence of the accident. Ness was convicted of tampering with evidence and ordered to pay $3,500 for Sherman's funeral expenses as restitution. Ness challenged the restitution on grounds that because Sherman was not a victim of the evidence tampering conviction, there was no nexus between the crime and the restitution. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to St. v. LaTray, 2000 MT 262, 302 M 11, 11 P3d 116 (2000), classification of a person as a victim for purposes of ordering restitution does not depend on the person's relationship to the elements of the crime for which the defendant is convicted. In this case, restitution for Sherman's funeral expenses was not wholly unrelated to Ness's crime, and the expenses were based on Ness's involvement, which created a nexus between restitution and the crime. Because the funeral expenses were paid to Sherman's estate directly out of the crime victims compensation account, that account was entitled to $3,500 restitution. St. v. Ness, 2009 MT 300, 352 M 317, 216 P3d 773 (2009).

Restitution Proper for Felony Criminal Endangerment: As part of Perkins' plea agreement on a charge of felony criminal endangerment, the state was allowed to seek restitution, and the sentencing court assessed $5,947 in restitution. Perkins appealed. The state conceded that $78.44 was not supported by documentation, but the Supreme Court held that there was sufficient legal authority for the sentencing court to impose restitution as part of the sentence. Therefore, the restitution award was affirmed but was reduced by $78.44. St. v. Perkins, 2009 MT 150, 350 M 387, 208 P3d 386 (2009).

Mitigation of Damages as Restitution for Criminal Activity — Additional Restitution of Loss of Income Warranted: Kalal was convicted of theft of a tractor; he received a 2-year deferred sentence and was ordered to pay restitution for the value of the tractor and other stolen property. Kalal satisfied the restitution obligation, but Petranek, the victim of the theft, sought additional restitution for loss of income because he had anticipated using the tractor for various income-producing activities, including building a fence, building a cabin, and seeding land for grass production and farming. The District Court noted that other tractors could be rented, but that Petranek's limited availability to work on projects presented serious impediments to renting a tractor. The court thus determined that Petranek suffered a loss of income for summer grazing and cabin rental in the amount of $15,960. Kalal appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying precedents from the fields of tort and contract law, the court recognized that an injured person is not expected to do what is unreasonable or impracticable, so the applicable standard is what would a reasonable and prudent person be expected to do, if capable, under the circumstances. While recognizing the duty to mitigate damages, the District Court correctly reasoned that no reasonable person could be expected to spend money or time that the person does not have to mitigate an injury for which the person is not responsible. Therefore, under these circumstances and given the impracticability and expense of renting and transporting a tractor a long distance for short periods of time, the restitution award of $15,960 for Petranek's loss of income was reasonable. St. v. Kalal, 2009 MT 103, 350 M 128, 204 P3d 1240 (2009).

Drug Task Force Considered Victim of Drug Offense — Restitution to Task Force as Part of Plea Agreement Affirmed: As part of a plea agreement on a drug charge, Jones agreed to pay $125 in restitution to the Eastern Montana Drug Task Force. Jones later appealed the restitution condition on grounds that it was illegal because the task force was not a victim of the drug distribution offense. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because Jones agreed in the plea agreement to pay restitution to the task force, the task force was a victim, as defined in 46-18-243(2)(a)(vi), to whom the sentencing court could require Jones to pay restitution. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Krum, 2007 MT 229, 339 M 154, 168 P3d 658 (2007).

Determination of Restitution When Amount of Actual Loss Unknown: McMaster admitted taking money from Wright, but the actual amount could not be determined. The District Court received several restitution recommendations ranging from $12,914 proposed in the presentence investigation report to $334,425 based on a cash flow analysis. After considering testimony from numerous experts and from McMaster and Wright, the Court set restitution at $30,000, and McMaster appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. As established in St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002), a victim may recover losses even though the actual losses are uncertain if the losses are calculated by use of reasonable methods based on the best available evidence. Nothing requires a court or victim to substantiate a restitution calculation with documentation, nor is a court circumscribed from relying on victim testimony presented at a sentencing hearing. The court properly considered McMaster's written statement and Wright's nonexpert undocumented testimony presented at the sentencing hearing. Substantial evidence supported the court's findings and the court did not abuse its discretion when it set restitution at $30,000. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 268, 345 M 172, 190 P3d 302 (2008).

Defendant Not Involved in Initial Vehicle Theft or Damage — Restitution Not Owing: Seghetti stole a vehicle and picked up Breeding and another friend for a ride, during which the vehicle was damaged while Seghetti was driving. Seghetti then revealed that the vehicle was stolen, and Breeding suggested driving the vehicle to California. During the trip, Breeding and Seghetti shared the driving. California police stopped the vehicle for a broken turn signal, and Breeding and Seghetti were subsequently charged with and convicted of felony theft. At sentencing, the District Court ordered that Breeding pay restitution for damage to the vehicle. Asserting that he was not driving when the damage occurred and thus was not responsible for the damage, Breeding appealed the restitution order. The Supreme Court reversed. Without a causal connection between Breeding's commission of theft and the damage inflicted earlier by Seghetti, there was no basis for requiring Breeding to pay restitution for that damage, so the District Court was ordered to strike the restitution requirement from Breeding's sentence. St. v. Breeding, 2008 MT 162, 343 M 323, 184 P3d 313 (2008).

Reimbursement to Insurer That Reimbursed Victim Affirmed: An insurer that reimbursed a victim for pecuniary loss had the right of subrogation to the extent of the reimbursement, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in ordering defendant to pay restitution to the insurer to make the insurer whole. St. v. Sharp, 2006 MT 301, 334 M 470, 148 P3d 625 (2006).

Restitution Owing Under Youth Court Act — Market Value Versus Replacement Cost — Deduction of Salvage Value From Restitution Amount: T.M.R., a youth, stole a vehicle from his friend's parents' garage and went for a joyride. The vehicle was destroyed, and the youth was placed on probation and ordered to pay restitution. The parties disagreed on the amount of restitution owed. The Supreme Court noted that prior to the 2003 amendments to adult sentencing statutes, restitution was consistently based on market value if it could be ascertained. Unlike the adult sentencing statutes, the Montana Youth Court Act was not amended in 2003 to include replacement cost as a way to determine restitution. Thus, the court concluded that the more equitable and consistent approach to determine restitution under the Act was to measure damages based on market value. The court noted that the victims received $500 in salvage value for the vehicle and also held that the restitution amount should be reduced by the amount of salvage received. In re T.M.R., 2006 MT 246, 334 M 64, 144 P3d 809 (2006).

Restitution Proper for Insurance Fraud: Borsberry was convicted of insurance fraud and ordered to pay restitution of $22,997.52 to the insurer in repayment of the fraudulently obtained amount. Borsberry appealed on grounds that restitution was not proper because the insurer was not a victim who suffered a pecuniary loss. The Supreme Court disagreed. Borsberry's policy contained a provision that his policy would be voided if a fraudulent claim was filed. The insurer paid the fraudulent claim under a reservation of rights and suffered a pecuniary loss based on Borsberry's criminal activity. Under Tyler v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 255 M 174, 841 P2d 538 (1992), insurance payments made under fraudulent claims entitle the insurer to restitution in the amount of the payments. The restitution fell within statutory parameters and was affirmed. St. v. Borsberry, 2006 MT 126, 332 M 271, 136 P3d 993 (2006).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Cost of Installing Surveillance Equipment Subject to Restitution as Pecuniary Loss Incurred in Cooperation in Investigation of Offense: Good, convicted of assault, argued that the District Court erred in requiring him to pay restitution for surveillance equipment installed by Huseby at the insistence of law enforcement officials after Huseby was assaulted and subjected to other abuse by Good, who lived next door to him at the time. Prior to his conviction for assault, Good had obtained a court order for the removal of the equipment as an invasion of his family's privacy. The Supreme Court held that the cost of the surveillance equipment did fit the statutory definition of pecuniary loss in this section as a cost incurred in cooperating with law enforcement in the investigation of an offense and therefore was a cost for which restitution could be ordered. St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004).

Mortgage Payments Subject to Restitution as Pecuniary Losses That Would Be Compensable in Civil Action: Good, convicted of assault, argued that the District Court erred in requiring him to pay restitution for mortgage payments made by Huseby on his former residence, which Huseby was unable to rent, when Huseby moved from that residence and purchased a new home after being assaulted and subjected to other abuse by Good, who lived next door to him at the time. The Supreme Court held that although Good may not have been able to predict that his behavior would lead to Huseby's moving, Good's abominable behavior was the proximate cause of the move and would have been compensable in civil court and therefore was subject to a restitution order as a pecuniary loss as defined in this section. St. v. Good, 2004 MT 296, 323 M 378, 100 P3d 644 (2004).

Restitution Properly Ordered When Dismissed Charges Related to Charge for Which Defendant Convicted: McIntire was charged with felony burglary, misdemeanor theft, and misdemeanor forgery. Pursuant to a plea agreement, McIntire pleaded guilty to the burglary charge and the other charges were dismissed. The trial court ordered McIntire to pay restitution, but McIntire contended that because the forgery charges were dismissed, restitution could not be ordered to compensate for the forged checks and that the court lacked authority to impose restitution when there was no longer a victim with respect to the dismissed forgery charges. The Supreme Court disagreed. The victim was the same for both crimes, and the burglary was directly connected to the forgery, constituting an ongoing criminal transaction, so dismissal of the forgery charges did not deprive the court of authority to impose a restitution obligation on McIntire for the checks stolen from the victim during the burglary and for the pecuniary loss from the subsequent forgery of those checks. St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Question Whether Restitution Connected to Crime — Remand for Reconsideration of Restitution: McDanold assisted in kidnapping and assaulting Berry, who was later killed by another man who was also involved in the kidnapping and assault. Although McDanold did not kill Berry, upon McDanold's conviction, the District Court ordered McDanold to pay restitution to Berry's parents and to the crime victims compensation fund. On appeal, McDanold contended that the sentencing court improperly ordered the restitution because the expenses were unrelated to McDanold's crimes and also asserted that he had been double-billed for some expenses that had been paid by the crime victims compensation fund. The state contended that there was an arguable connection between McDanold's offenses and the pecuniary losses to Berry's parents and to the fund. The Supreme Court remanded for reconsideration of restitution, including the parents' claims and whether they had indeed been compensated in part by the crime victims compensation fund. St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004).

Liability of Illegal Branding Defendant for Cost of Boarding Confiscated Livestock With Livestock Commission: When Mikesell was investigated for illegal branding of livestock on his property, the cattle were seized and taken to the Miles City Livestock Commission. Mikesell pleaded guilty to three counts of illegal branding, and the cost of the feed bill at the Livestock Commission was assessed as restitution. Mikesell contended that the feed cost should not be assessed because the cattle remained at the Livestock Commission long after he had requested that the cattle be released to him. However, the prosecution did not allow release of the cattle to Mikesell because they did not belong to him. Because the cost was associated with the illegal branding charges, Mikesell was responsible for the cost of feeding the cattle until the parties came to an agreement on the cattle's disposition. St. v. Mikesell, 2004 MT 146, 321 M 462, 91 P3d 1273 (2004).

No Restitution Owing for Loss of Cattle Unassociated With Criminal Illegal Branding Charge: Mikesell pleaded guilty to three counts of illegal branding of cattle pastured on his property. As part of restitution, the trial court also found that Mikesell owed $30,000 for 55 cattle that were missing after being pastured on Mikesell's land. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The loss of the 55 cattle from possible drowning or other untimely demise was a civil matter and was not associated with the illegal branding for which Mikesell was guilty. Because the loss did not arise from Mikesell's criminal activity, he was not responsible for restitution for the lost cattle. St. v. Mikesell, 2004 MT 146, 321 M 462, 91 P3d 1273 (2004).

Costs Directly Related to Defendant's Criminal Conduct Properly Included in Restitution Calculation: Thompson was a maintenance worker at a commercial building and had keys to the entire building. Thompson was convicted of stealing and then pawning tools from the maintenance room in the building and was ordered to pay restitution, including the costs of rekeying the entire building. Thompson contended that requiring payment of the cost of rekeying the building went beyond recovery for any pecuniary losses and was an abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court disagreed. The reason the building was rekeyed was a direct result of Thompson's criminal conduct, and the expense was an out-of-pocket loss directly related to the thefts, so including those special damage expenses in the restitution calculation was proper. St. v. Thompson, 2004 MT 131, 321 M 332, 91 P3d 12 (2004).

Out-of-Pocket Cleanup Expenses Properly Included as Part of Restitution Owed: Following Dunkerson's conviction for theft and burglary, the District Court included $7,180 for the victim's cleanup costs as part of the restitution. Dunkerson contended that the amount was erroneous because he provided testimony that a professional cleaner would charge only $960. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the cleanup faced by the victim could not be likened to the professional cleaning of a home that had not been burglarized. This section allows a victim to recover all special damages, including out-of-pocket expenses. The District Court's findings were not clearly erroneous, and the award was affirmed. St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003).

Payment of Child Support Improper Condition of Sentence for Felony DUI — Victim and Correlation to Underlying Offense Necessary for Imposition of Restitution: Horton was arrested for DUI, and a search of his driving record revealed nine prior DUI convictions. A further search showed that Horton also owed more than $47,000 in back child support. Horton was charged with felony DUI, with driving with a suspended or revoked license, as a habitual traffic offender operating a motor vehicle, and with felony nonsupport. By plea agreement, Horton agreed to plead guilty to the traffic offenses in exchange for dismissal of the nonsupport charge. The plea agreement stated that the state would recommend a 13-month sentence to be served in prerelease, followed by 4 years of probation, and, as a condition of the probationary sentence, provided that Horton would also make regular child support payments plus an additional sum monthly toward the support arrearage. As set out in the agreement, Horton pleaded guilty to the traffic offenses, and the nonsupport charge was dismissed. At sentencing, the habitual traffic offender charge was subsequently dismissed for failure of the state to prove that a valid habitual offender designation was in place at the time of the offense, and in addition, Horton's counsel objected to the court ordering payment of any child support arrearage, arguing that because the nonsupport charge had been dismissed, Horton would be paying restitution on a count for which he had not been convicted. Nevertheless, the court ordered Horton to pay support and promised to revoke his probation and sentence him to 4 years in prison with no parole if support was not paid. On appeal, Horton argued that the District Court abused its discretion and exceeded statutory mandates when it required him to pay restitution for an offense that was dismissed, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), for the position that restitution is statutorily limited to the victim of the crime and that because there was no victim who sustained pecuniary or economic loss as a result of the felony DUI or driving with a suspended or revoked license, restitution was inappropriate. The state argued that Horton was attempting to receive the benefit of the plea agreement—having the felony nonsupport charge dismissed—without holding up his end of the bargain by paying child support. The Supreme Court noted that a plea agreement is subject to contract law and that the court will not assist a defendant in escaping the obligations of a plea agreement once its benefits are received. However, the court also pointed out that a District Court's authority to impose sentences in criminal cases is defined and constrained by statute. The statutory authority for payment of restitution is in 46-18-201, which limits payment of restitution to the victim of a crime for which a defendant is convicted, and because Horton was not convicted of nonsupport, there was no victim to whom Horton could be ordered to pay restitution. The state also contended that ordering Horton to pay child support was proper because under 46-18-202(1), a sentencing court may impose any condition reasonably related to the objectives of rehabilitation and the protection of the victim and society. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), a sentencing condition must have some correlation or connection to the underlying offense, but there was no correlation or connection between Horton's conviction for DUI and ordering him to pay child support. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered that the portion of Horton's sentence requiring payment of child support be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), followed in St. v. Setters, 2001 MT 101, 305 M 253, 25 P3d 893 (2001).

Restitution Proper for Ambulance and Towing Charges Related to Hit and Run and High-Speed Chase: LaTray was convicted of DUI, operating a vehicle without proof of insurance, operating a vehicle while a habitual traffic offender, leaving the scene of an accident, and criminal endangerment. The charges stemmed from a hit-and-run accident and subsequent high-speed chase, which ended when LaTray lost control of his car, went into a ditch, and rolled the vehicle. Officials at the scene called an ambulance as a precautionary measure and called a tow truck to remove LaTray's vehicle from the ditch. As restitution, the sentencing court ordered LaTray to pay the costs of the ambulance and tow truck. LaTray appealed on grounds that restitution is limited to pecuniary losses suffered by direct victims, as defined in terms of the offenses for which he was convicted, asserting that the ambulance company and towing service were not victims of his offenses, so restitution could not be ordered for their reimbursement. The Supreme Court disagreed. The plain language of 46-18-241 does not limit restitution to a victim defined in terms of the offense or to a loss arising directly from the criminal conduct. Also, St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), makes it clear that classification of a victim for restitution purposes does not depend on the individual's relationship to the elements of the crime for which a defendant is sentenced. Further, restitution is not confined to the amount by which a defendant is enriched at a victim's expense, but rather the restitution statute empowers courts to impose restitution for economic loss as a result of a crime. Here, the ambulance and towing companies suffered an economic loss in out-of-pocket expenses for services for which they were not reimbursed, and the losses were the direct result of LaTray's criminal conduct, which created a situation for which the services were reasonably necessary for the safety of the public or LaTray himself. The restitution order was affirmed. St. v. LaTray, 2000 MT 262, 302 M 11, 11 P3d 116, 57 St. Rep. 1098 (2000). See also St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407 (1999).

Use of Replacement Cost, Rather Than Market Value, of Converted Property Resulting in Erroneous Calculation of Restitution: Pritchett entered the garage of a former employer in an effort to return two hunting rifles that he had stolen and pawned to support his gambling habit. Pritchett dropped his flashlight and, unable to find it in the dark, lit a cigarette lighter, which ignited a leaking propane bottle and caused an explosion that destroyed the garage and its contents. Pritchett was convicted of burglary and ordered to pay restitution. In calculating the victim's pecuniary loss, the District Court used replacement cost, rather than actual market value, of the garage and its contents. Pritchett argued on appeal that this method of valuation resulted in a significant overstatement of his restitution obligation. The Supreme Court found that the appropriate civil action arising out of Pritchett's destruction of the garage would be an action for conversion of personal property, the loss of which is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of conversion under 27-1-320. Thus, when personal property is converted, the restitution must be based on the market value of the goods converted. The District Court's use of the replacement cost of the items was an incorrect measure of the restitution obligation, constituting reversible error. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Inclusion in Restitution of Costs Related to Pecuniary Loss — Wages Paid to Embezzler Not Recoverable as Pecuniary Loss: Under 46-18-241, a sentencing court may include in restitution costs paid by the victim as a result of defendant's criminal act as long as the costs are considered pecuniary loss, as defined by this section. This loss may include economic loss as a result of the crime, out-of-pocket losses, such as medical expenses, and reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the victim in filing charges or in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the offense. Here, Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution, but argued that the fact that 46-18-241 excludes general damages militated against the inclusion in the restitution obligation of amounts beyond the total stolen from the employer. Brewer improperly characterized the employer's out-of-pocket losses as general damages. The employer paid accounting firms, employees, labor contractors, a software company, and a locksmith more than $15,000 in an attempt to reconstruct books and repair damage resulting from Brewer's crime. Those expenses were all considered out-of-pocket losses within the context of 46-18-241 and were properly includable in the restitution calculation. However, wages paid to Brewer over the course of employment did not constitute pecuniary loss and were not recoverable as restitution. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999). See also St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), and St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Interest Properly Imposed on Restitution Obligation: Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution to the employer, including 10% interest on the restitution obligation. Brewer contended that interest in this case was per se an abuse of discretion insofar as it exceeded the employer's pecuniary loss. The issue of whether interest may be properly applied to restitution under 46-18-241 was a case of first impression in Montana. Interest is not expressly provided for by the restitution statute, which provides for restitution to a victim who suffers a pecuniary loss, defined in this section as special damages, but not general damages, that a person could recover in a civil action arising out of the facts constituting the criminal activity. Interest is a special damage available in a civil action under 27-1-210 and thus was properly applied to Brewer's restitution. However, interest is not allowed on damages such as pain and suffering, mental anguish or suffering, or punitive damages. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999).

Victims' Families Ineligible for Restitution: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court ordered Brown to make restitution to the one victim and to the families of both victims. The Supreme Court held that the families of the victims do not qualify for restitution under the definition of "victim". (See 1995 amendment.) St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994).

Restitution Allowed for Period Longer Than Charged Offense: Defendant was charged with theft and tampering with public records over a 2-year period. All but 6 months of her 20-year sentence were suspended on the condition that she repay the money she stole at work over a 5-year period. She argued the amount was not substantiated by evidence because she was not being tried for her activities during the first 3 years and that in essence, she was sentenced for criminal activity for which she was not convicted. There was evidence in the sentencing hearing that her crimes were spread out over a 5-year period. The restitution order was proper. St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 181 in (1), in first sentence after "time of", inserted "each" and deleted second sentence that read: "The court may not establish a payment schedule extending beyond the period of state supervision over the offender"; in (2), in first sentence after "time of", inserted "each" and at beginning of second sentence, after "court", substituted "shall" for "may" and after "victim" substituted "of the full amount" for "up to but not in excess"; in (4), near middle after "services", inserted "to the victim"; and inserted (5) regarding remedial measures that may be taken if necessary to preserve property or assets that could be used to satisfy an anticipated restitution order.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 at end of (1) substituted "period of state supervision over the offender" for "period for which the sentence has been suspended or deferred under 46-18-201"; inserted (3) relating to methods of payment of restitution; inserted (4) allowing restitution in services in lieu of money or restitution to a third person; and made minor changes in style.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Administrative Rules

Title 20, chapter 12, ARM Restitution.

Case Notes

Restitution Obligations Not Discharged Upon Fulfillment of Criminal Sentence: As a condition of sentences for theft, burglary, and deceptive practices, Brown was ordered to pay restitution. Upon completion of his prison sentences, Brown was released without having paid restitution in full. Brown was subsequently imprisoned following conviction for other criminal offenses, and the Department of Corrections began garnishing Brown's prison wages to satisfy the unpaid restitution obligations from the previous sentences. Brown requested that the District Court waive payment of the restitution on grounds that the Department lacked authority to garnish his prison wages to pay restitution obligations from sentences that were previously discharged. The court agreed and ordered the Department to cease garnishment and to reimburse any money collected to satisfy those obligations. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Unlike the other conditions of Brown's sentences, the restitution obligations were civil judgments required by 46-18-241 to be paid in full, and those obligations were not discharged or fulfilled by virtue of Brown's completion of the criminal sentences and discharge from prison. Pursuant to this section, the Department was authorized to garnish Brown's prison wages to satisfy the previously unpaid restitution. St. v. Brown, 2008 MT 115, 342 M 476, 182 P3d 75 (2008).

Open-Ended Restitution Condition Reversed: As a condition of Meyers' sentence for assaulting his child, it was ordered that Meyers pay restitution to all the victims in an amount to remain open until the victims received any help that they needed. However, this section requires that the sentencing court specify the total amount of restitution that the offender shall pay. Thus, it was reversible error for the sentencing court to leave the amount of restitution open, and the Supreme Court remanded for reimposition of the restitution requirement in a specified amount. St. v. Meyers, 2007 MT 230, 339 M 160, 168 P3d 645 (2007).

Restitution Payment Schedule Not Required: Pursuant to the 2003 amendments to this section, a sentencing court is not required to set a restitution payment schedule. St. v. Kuykendall, 2006 MT 110, 332 M 180, 136 P3d 983 (2006).

Improper Order to Pay Child Support as Condition of Sentence for Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Erickson entered a plea agreement on drug charges, and although it was not part of the agreement, the sentencing court ordered that Erickson also forfeit one-third of his prison earnings as restitution to be paid toward Erickson's delinquent child support. Erickson never invited or acquiesced to the child support order. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that possession of dangerous drugs is a victimless crime for which restitution cannot be owed and also noted that the amount of restitution must be determined and fixed. The court agreed with Erickson that there was no connection between drug crimes and the failure to pay child support, so ordering payment of child support arrearages as restitution was not an appropriate condition of sentencing for a drug crime. However, in this case, the sentencing court made it clear that the order to pay child support was in lieu of requiring Erickson to pay cleanup costs associated with a clandestine drug lab, attorney costs, or jury costs. The sentencing court could have imposed both costs and restitution if not for the imposition of the illegal child support obligation, so the Supreme Court was unable to determine what sentence would have been imposed if the law had been correctly applied. The case was remanded for resentencing on whether Erickson must pay restitution and costs. St. v. Erickson, 2005 MT 276, 329 M 192, 124 P3d 119 (2005).

No Error in Allowing Parole Officer to Set Restitution Schedule — Refusal to Waive Administrative Fees Proper: Denham contended that it was error for the sentencing court to delegate the scheduling of monthly restitution payments to a parole officer because the version of this section in effect at the time of the crime did not provide for that delegation of authority. The Supreme Court held that the amendments to the statute were purely procedural and did not constitute retroactive legislation, impair Denham's rights, or impose additional duties on Denham, so allowing the parole officer to set the restitution schedule was not error. Denham also appealed the $60,099 restitution and the 10% administrative fee and minimal surcharges. However, Denham assured the court at sentencing of his ability to pay the restitution amount, so it was reasonable to assume that he also had the ability to pay the administrative fee and surcharges. The sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Denham, 2005 MT 26, 326 M 24, 107 P3d 1263 (2005).

Joint and Several Liability for Restitution Properly Imposed: Following conviction for three counts of burglary, the District Court found Workman jointly and severally liable for the full amount of restitution to the burglary victims and ordered Workman to pay restitution in the amount of $26,840.33. Workman was accompanied in the burglaries by four accomplices, and Workman argued that he should be held responsible only for his proportionate share as divided among all the defendants. That argument was rejected, and Workman appealed on grounds that restitution was improperly imposed. Workman relied on the 2001 version of 46-18-242, contending that the required documentation of his financial resources was inaccurate, and on the 2001 version of this section, arguing that the sentencing court failed to establish a payment schedule or set the amount of installment payments. The Supreme Court noted that both the required documentation and payment schedule provisions were deleted by the 2003 Legislature and are no longer required. Workman's argument that restitution should be apportioned among his accomplices also failed because the fate of the accomplices was immaterial to the court's authority to impose restitution. Under the 2003 versions of the restitution laws and given that Workman stipulated that he owed the full amount, the District Court properly held Workman jointly and severally liable for the pecuniary loss suffered by his victims. St. v. Workman, 2005 MT 22, 326 M 1, 107 P3d 462 (2005).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Restitution Order Proper Given Defendant's Ability to Pay: The sentencing court ordered Thaut to pay $69,457 in restitution. Thaut appealed the award on grounds that the court failed to meet statutory requirements establishing Thaut's financial resources and future ability to pay and on grounds that due process rights were violated when the court failed to consider several factors in Thaut's ability to pay, including Thaut's age and short time to work following parole, minimum wage employment history, lack of assets and ability to acquire assets in the future, and mental health issues related to an alleged prior head injury. However, the presentence investigation and supplemental presentence investigation provided adequate documentation regarding Thaut's ability to pay restitution and to work hard to earn a living. Further, Thaut had no documented physical limitations and was unemployed only because he was incarcerated. The District Court's determination that Thaut had the ability to pay medical expenses, a grant from the Board of Crime Control, and property damages was amply supported by the record, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Establish Restitution Amount — Reversible Error: Following conviction for burglarizing casinos, Eixenberger was ordered by the District Court to pay restitution for losses and damages sustained by the casinos in a sum to be determined, plus interest. Eixenberger challenged the restitution award amount, and the Supreme Court reversed. It was error for the sentencing court to order payment of restitution in an amount to be determined rather than to specify the total amount, as required in this section. The presentence investigation report also failed to document the victims' pecuniary losses and Eixenberger's resources and ability to pay, as required by 46-18-242, so further sentencing proceedings were warranted on remand. St. v. Eixenberger, 2004 MT 127, 321 M 298, 90 P3d 453 (2004).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Establish Restitution Payment Schedule — Reversible Error: The District Court ordered that Heath pay restitution "on a schedule to be supervised and regulated by the Adult Probation and Parole Field Services". The Supreme Court held that this payment method did not comply with the statutory requirement that the District Court set the amount, method, and time of each payment to the victim and remanded for an amendment to the judgment that properly addressed the method and time of Heath's restitution payments. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and 46-18-251(2) meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and subsection (2) of this section, and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), followed in St. v. McDanold, 2004 MT 167, 322 M 31, 97 P3d 1076 (2004), and St. v. McIntire, 2004 MT 238, 322 M 496, 97 P3d 576 (2004).

Restitution Adequately Documented in PSI Report and Information Submitted by Victim: Heath contended that the presentence investigation report (PSI) contained insufficient information to document his ability to pay restitution and the victim's pecuniary loss, citing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished Brown, Hilgers, and Pritchett on grounds that the PSI report deficiencies in those cases were not present in Heath's case. Rather, the court followed St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003), and St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003), finding that the PSI report adequately addressed Heath's employability, assets and debts, and capability of paying restitution. The valuation of the victim's pecuniary loss was adequately provided in documentation submitted by the victim and, coupled with expert testimony on the value of recovered items, provided substantial credible evidence upon which to base the restitution amount. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Reimbursement Costs for Court-Appointed Attorney Proper: Defendant contended that the District Court improperly required victim restitution in an incest case because the court did not specify an amount of total restitution, consider the victim's pecuniary loss, or consider defendant's financial resources or ability to pay, as required in this section. The Supreme Court held that defendant had mischaracterized the issue, noting that the District Court had not ordered any amount for victim restitution, but rather had ordered defendant to pay an amount in reimbursement costs for defendant's court-appointed attorney, and had correctly considered defendant's resources as set out in the presentence investigation report, as provided in 46-8-113. Payment of reimbursement costs was affirmed. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Restitution Sentence Proper Despite Failure to List Pecuniary Loss in Presentence Investigation Report — Remand to Determine Restitution When Amount Undetermined: Following Dunkerson's conviction for theft and burglary, the District Court ordered restitution for the victim. The presentence investigation (PSI) report listed the loss as an undetermined amount. Failure of a PSI report to document a victim's pecuniary loss and the offender's ability to pay renders a restitution sentence illegal, although a full evidentiary hearing can vitiate the need for loss documentation in a PSI report. Here, the PSI report noted that the victim needed more time to accurately account for restitution owed, which satisfied the loss requirement of 46-18-242, so the District Court did not err in ordering restitution even though the amount of restitution was not in the PSI report. However, the court did err by not specifying the amount owed and the time and method of payment, so the case was remanded to determine the amount and method of payment pursuant to this section. St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003).

Use of Market Value to Determine Value of Lost Property — Exception — Use of Hearsay Testimony Proper to Establish Market Value: Dunkerson contended that the District Court erred in accepting a burglary victim's hearsay testimony regarding valuation of some of the lost property when the valuation was not based on market value. The Supreme Court agreed that replacement value should be used only if market value cannot be determined, even though under St. v. Bingman, 229 M 101, 745 P2d 342 (1987), hearsay testimony is admissible during sentencing. The case was remanded so the District Court could receive appropriate testimony to establish the market value of property for which market value was not previously established. St. v. Dunkerson, 2003 MT 234, 317 M 228, 76 P3d 1085 (2003).

Failure of Presentence Report to Document Restitution Concerns — Payment of Restitution at Discretion of Probation Officer Improper: Following a sexual assault conviction, Flanagan was ordered to pay for all offense-related medical and counseling costs, after payment by the victim's insurance, and all future costs for the next 2 years. Flanagan asserted that the restitution plan was illegal based on St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), because the presentence investigation report did not document Flanagan's monthly expenses or address his future ability to pay restitution and because the development of a restitution schedule was left to the discretion of the probation officer. The Supreme Court agreed and remanded for addition to the presentence report of documentation of Flanagan's monthly expenses and future ability to pay restitution and to allow the District Court to hold a hearing to enter a sentence and judgment addressing Flanagan's ability to pay and the time of restitution payments. St. v. Flanagan, 2003 MT 123, 316 M 1, 68 P3d 796 (2003).

Deferral of Sentence to Allow Payment of Restitution Not Violative of Due Process Rights: Benoit was charged with felony theft and entered a nonbinding plea agreement to plead guilty in exchange for a recommendation for a 2-year deferred sentence, based on the possible imposition of various conditions, including the payment of restitution. Benoit was then convicted and ordered to repay $15,933.90 in restitution. At the restitution hearing, Benoit admitted that with her current take-home salary and expenses, the restitution could not be repaid in 2 years, so the sentencing court sentenced Benoit to a 6-year deferred sentence to allow time to pay the restitution, but gave Benoit the opportunity to withdraw the guilty plea after 2 years if restitution was paid within that time. Benoit appealed on grounds that increasing the deferred sentence was a violation of due process, citing St. v. Farrell, 207 M 483, 676 P2d 168 (1984), and St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and asserted that the sentence should be remanded for determination of a length of sentence consistent with the charge and Benoit's history instead of the ability to pay restitution. The Supreme Court distinguished Farrell and Pritchett, noting that Benoit's sentence was not based on indigency, and coupled with the fact that Benoit was given the opportunity to withdraw the guilty plea prior to the termination of the 6-year deferred sentence, Benoit's due process rights were not violated through imposition of the conditional 6-year deferred sentence. St. v. Benoit, 2002 MT 166, 310 M 449, 51 P3d 495 (2002).

Failure to Document Victim's Pecuniary Loss and Offender's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution — Restitution Condition Vacated: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was a requirement that Muhammad pay $5,000 in restitution. Under 46-18-201, a sentencing judge shall require a defendant to pay full restitution to a victim if the judge finds that the victim has sustained a pecuniary loss. Imposition of restitution is subject to detailed statutory procedures and qualifications, which include documented evidence of the victim's loss and the offender's ability to pay. The sentencing court is required to specify the amount, method, and time of each payment to the victim. Here, the presentence investigation did not document the victim's pecuniary loss or Muhammad's future ability to pay restitution, nor did the sentencing court consider Muhammad's future ability to pay because the relevant evidence was not presented to the court. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the restitution condition of the sentence was illegal, and that condition was vacated. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002), following St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000), and followed in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Failure to Document Defendant's Financial Resources and Ability to Pay Restitution and Victim's Pecuniary Loss — Restitution Sentence Improper: The general mandate to sentencing courts is that a sentence must include full restitution whenever it is found that the victim of an offense has sustained a pecuniary loss, subject to mandatory detailed statutory procedures and qualifications. Here, although the District Court received some evidence of these amounts during the sentencing hearing, the failure of the presentence investigation report to document the victim's pecuniary loss, as well as the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, provided the court no authority to impose a sentence of restitution and rendered its judgment illegal. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), following St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098 (1994), and St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866 (1999), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Failure to Specify Amount, Method, and Time of Payment — Restitution Order Invalid: The District Court ordered defendant to make restitution payments according to a schedule to be determined by defendant's probation officer. However, this section requires the court to specify the amount, method, and time of payments, after considering the defendant's financial resources and future ability to pay. Thus, the court failed to comply with the statutory requirements by leaving that determination to the discretion of the probation officer, invalidating the restitution order. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

Use of Replacement Cost, Rather Than Market Value, of Converted Property Resulting in Erroneous Calculation of Restitution: Pritchett entered the garage of a former employer in an effort to return two hunting rifles that he had stolen and pawned to support his gambling habit. Pritchett dropped his flashlight and, unable to find it in the dark, lit a cigarette lighter, which ignited a leaking propane bottle and caused an explosion that destroyed the garage and its contents. Pritchett was convicted of burglary and ordered to pay restitution. In calculating the victim's pecuniary loss, the District Court used replacement cost, rather than actual market value, of the garage and its contents. Pritchett argued on appeal that this method of valuation resulted in a significant overstatement of his restitution obligation. The Supreme Court found that the appropriate civil action arising out of Pritchett's destruction of the garage would be an action for conversion of personal property, the loss of which is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of conversion under 27-1-320. Thus, when personal property is converted, the restitution must be based on the market value of the goods converted. The District Court's use of the replacement cost of the items was an incorrect measure of the restitution obligation, constituting reversible error. St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000).

When Restitution Owing: Under 46-18-201, the sentencing court is required to provide for full restitution by a defendant to the victim of a criminal offense who sustains a pecuniary loss. Here, Hilgers' issuance of more than 50 bad checks and stealing cash and diverting checks and money orders from his employer in an amount exceeding $33,500 clearly qualified as a pecuniary loss. The court found the state's witnesses more credible than Hilgers, providing adequate support in the record as to the amount owing. The restitution amount was not clearly erroneous and was affirmed on appeal. However, the Supreme Court remanded for lack of documentation, as required under 46-18-242, regarding Hilgers' financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, finding the information in the presentence report regarding Hilgers' age, education, assets and obligations, and marital and employment status inadequate in addressing Hilgers' resources and ability to pay the amount in question. St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), following St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), followed in St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539, 57 St. Rep. 1093 (2000), and distinguished in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

Financial Resources and Future Ability to Pay Restitution Properly Considered: In imposing interest on Brewer's restitution obligation, Brewer contended that the court did not properly consider her financial resources and future ability to pay restitution or specify the amount, method, and time of each payment, as required by this section. At the sentencing hearing, Brewer testified that: (1) she had obtained two jobs; (2) because her husband's wages covered the household expenses, she intended to put all her wages toward restitution; and (3) she had already made nearly $6,000 in restitution payments and intended to continue the payments. Based on this testimony, the District Court properly considered Brewer's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution in ordering repayment according to a schedule of repayment arrived at with the probation officer. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999).

Inclusion in Restitution of Costs Related to Pecuniary Loss — Wages Paid to Embezzler Not Recoverable as Pecuniary Loss: Under 46-18-241, a sentencing court may include in restitution costs paid by the victim as a result of defendant's criminal act as long as the costs are considered pecuniary loss, as defined by 46-18-243. This loss may include economic loss as a result of the crime, out-of-pocket losses, such as medical expenses, and reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the victim in filing charges or in cooperating in the investigation and prosecution of the offense. Here, Brewer embezzled over $96,000 and was ordered to pay restitution, but argued that the fact that 46-18-241 excludes general damages militated against the inclusion in the restitution obligation of amounts beyond the total stolen from the employer. Brewer improperly characterized the employer's out-of-pocket losses as general damages. The employer paid accounting firms, employees, labor contractors, a software company, and a locksmith more than $15,000 in an attempt to reconstruct books and repair damage resulting from Brewer's crime. Those expenses were all considered out-of-pocket losses within the context of 46-18-241 and were properly includable in the restitution calculation. However, wages paid to Brewer over the course of employment did not constitute pecuniary loss and were not recoverable as restitution. St. v. Brewer, 1999 MT 269, 296 M 453, 989 P2d 407, 56 St. Rep. 1090 (1999). See also St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), and St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Presentence Investigation Inadequate to Support Restitution — Restitution Order Inadequate: Brown was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and negligent homicide after killing one pedestrian and injuring another when he lost control of his vehicle. The District Court ordered Brown to make restitution to the one victim and to the families of both victims. The presentence investigation report contained no documentation of the pecuniary loss of either victim and inadequate documentation of Brown's financial resources, especially his future earning capacity. The Supreme Court noted that as probable consequences of these errors, the District Court's order for restitution did not require Brown to pay a specific amount at a specific time. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the order could not lawfully be made and remanded the case to the District Court. St. v. Brown, 263 M 223, 867 P2d 1098, 51 St. Rep. 24 (1994), distinguished in St. v. Hilgers, 1999 MT 284, 297 M 23, 989 P2d 866, 56 St. Rep. 1146 (1999), in which the failure of the presentence investigation to set forth the amount of restitution was not considered fatal because defendant was given a hearing and because defendant had entered a plea bargain providing that the amount was to be agreed upon by the parties prior to sentencing and if the parties were unable to agree on an amount, it would be determined by the court, and St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004), and followed in St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003).

Inability to Pay Restitution — Not Violative of Equal Protection in Light of State Correctional Policy and Previous Offenses: A defendant convicted of felony theft was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison with 2 years suspended and, in addition, was ordered to pay restitution. The defendant asserted on appeal that he was sentenced to a prison term because of his indigency, in violation of his right to equal protection. However, the District Judge specifically noted the prison term was necessary to protect the property of others and that the defendant's criminal record contained three previous misdemeanor thefts. The Supreme Court found these to be sufficient reasons to support incarceration and upheld the state's correctional policy outlined in 46-18-101. The court noted that the sentence was well within the parameters of punishment for felony theft in 45-6-301. Finding no abuse of discretion or violation of the defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Carroll, 220 M 466, 716 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 531 (1986).

No Evidence That Victim Will Be Unjustly Enriched — Credit Against Restitution Properly Denied: Kober stole money from the Montana State University-Bozeman student health service and was ordered to pay restitution. Because the stolen money was considered taxable income, Kober was also charged with failing to properly report income for state income tax purposes. From the proceeds of the subsequent sale of the family home, Kober paid $46,004.67 to the Department of Revenue to satisfy its lien for back income taxes. Because the money was placed in the general fund from which the University System receives part of its funding, Kober maintained that the University System would benefit from the payment of the back income taxes and that in order to avoid a windfall unjustly enriching the university, the restitution amount should be offset by $46,004.67. However, Kober did not establish that any of the $46,004.67 would actually be distributed to or benefit Montana State University-Bozeman or the student health service, so the District Court properly denied Kober's request for a credit against restitution. Restitution Obligations Not Discharged Upon Fulfillment of Criminal Sentence: As a condition of sentences for theft, burglary, and deceptive practices, Brown was ordered to pay restitution. Upon completion of his prison sentences, Brown was released without having paid restitution in full. Brown was subsequently imprisoned following conviction for other criminal offenses, and the Department of Corrections began garnishing Brown's prison wages to satisfy the unpaid restitution obligations from the previous sentences. Brown requested that the District Court waive payment of the restitution on grounds that the Department lacked authority to garnish his prison wages to pay restitution obligations from sentences that were previously discharged. The court agreed and ordered the Department to cease garnishment and to reimburse any money collected to satisfy those obligations. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Unlike the other conditions of Brown's sentences, the restitution obligations were civil judgments required by 46-18-241 to be paid in full, and those obligations were not discharged or fulfilled by virtue of Brown's completion of the criminal sentences and discharge from prison. Pursuant to 46-18-244, the Department was authorized to garnish Brown's prison wages to satisfy the previously unpaid restitution. St. v. Brown, 2008 MT 115, 342 M 476, 182 P3d 75 (2008).

Proof of Inability to Pay Restitution — Deferment of Sentence Extended to Allow Payment — Error: A probationer sufficiently proved that her failure to continue restitution payments was not caused by lack of a good faith effort to pay and that her income was insufficient to make even the $10 monthly payment that her probation officer was apparently willing to accept. The state's argument that she might soon receive a workers' compensation lump-sum settlement that she could use to pay the remaining restitution and would receive a "windfall" if her deferred sentence and probation were not extended for 2 years for failure to pay so that she could make further payments had no merit. Disability benefits are not a windfall; they are partial compensation for the loss of earning capacity. In addition, the duty to pay restitution remains until it is fully paid, and restitution may be collected in a civil proceeding at any time, including after the conclusion of state supervision under a sentence. Therefore, the District Court abused its discretion when it did not excuse the probationer's failure to pay, and the order extending the deferred sentence and probation for 2 years was reversed. Criminal Fines Distinct From Other Court-Imposed Compensatory Financial Obligations — Fisher Overruled: The plain meaning of "fine" in 46-18-403 does not encompass fees, costs, charges, or other court-imposed financial obligations. Criminal fines are punitive in nature and are distinct from other court-imposed financial obligations associated with a criminal proceeding that are compensatory in nature, such as an assessment of fees for probationary supervision or a charge to defray a local government's costs in administering the criminal justice system. Voerding v. St., 2006 MT 125, 332 M 262, 136 P3d 502 (2006), overruling St. v. Fisher, 2003 MT 33, 314 M 222, 65 P3d 223 (2003), to the extent that Fisher suggests that the term "fine" in 46-18-403(2) encompasses other types of court-imposed financial obligations, such as fees, charges, and costs. See also St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Order for Restitution Upon Imposition of Deferred or Suspended Sentence — 1999 Amendments to Sentencing Statute Clarified: Heath was convicted of theft and possession of burglary tools and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 2 years suspended upon conditions, including payment of restitution. Heath appealed on grounds that the 1999 amendments to 46-18-201 no longer allowed a sentencing court to impose restitution as a condition of a suspended or deferred sentence. Upon amendment in 1999, an internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was not changed to reflect the renumbering of the other subsections, which resulted in an ambiguity in the plain language of the 46-18-201, potentially rendered 46-18-237 and subsection (2) of this section meaningless, created uncertain directives for payment of restitution for all victims in 46-18-241(1) and 46-18-244(2), and created a potentially absurd application of 46-18-201(1). Because of the potentially absurd consequences of the 1999 amendment, the Supreme Court looked beyond the words of the statute and inquired whether the Legislature intended to make any change in the substance and effect of 46-18-201. The court concluded that the 1999 amendment was a simple codification error that resulted in a cross-reference problem that was completely inconsistent with legislative intent to authorize sentencing courts to impose restitution when necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society if there is an appropriate correlation to the offense committed. Heath's argument failed, and the imposition of restitution as a condition of Heath's suspended sentence was affirmed. (Note: The erroneous internal reference in 46-18-201(5) was deleted in 2003.) Case Notes

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under this section. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), and St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), regarding authority of sentencing court.

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 71, L. 1993, provided: "It is the intent of the legislature to amend 46-18-256 and 50-18-101 in order to comply with federal requirements of the Crime Control Act of 1990 that requires states to enact laws related to human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) testing of certain convicted offenders or be subject to reduced federal funding.

Upon the request of the victim or the victim's representatives, testing and the test results must be made available for the victim's information. Testing information may or may not reveal exposure to the HIV virus. If exposed, the victim can seek medical treatment and take steps to protect others from the further spread of the epidemic.

This bill is intended to be a benefit to public health and safety by attempting to control and limit the potential spread and impact of disease. It is not intended to add additional sanctions or penalties for conviction of sexual abuse offenses or to make criminals of the victims of disease."

Part Case Notes

Claims Raised on Direct Appeal Barred by Statute or Res Judicata on Petition for Postconviction Relief: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were summarily dismissed. Although res judicata prevents claims raised on appeal from being raised again in a petition for postconviction relief, Dawson argued that three of his claims for postconviction relief could not have been raised on direct appeal because they required evidence not found in the record and thus should not have been subject to summary judgment. The District Court concluded that the issues could have been raised on direct appeal and were not preserved through objection at trial and so were barred by res judicata and 46-21-105. The Supreme Court examined all three of Dawson's claims before affirming that 46-21-105 was properly applied to two of the claims and that no prejudice resulted from the application of res judicata to the third. Lastly, Dawson raised Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182 (1996), as grounds for reconsideration of several other claims based on serving the "ends of justice". The Supreme Court felt no compulsion to reconsider any of Dawson's claims to serve those ends because the claims were barred by res judicata. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Death Row Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Delay Attributed to Defendant's Appeals: Citing Lackey v. Tex., 514 US 1045, 131 L Ed 2d 304, 115 S Ct 1421 (1995), Gollehon claimed that his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated by the amount of time that he spent on death row and by the number of sentencing hearings in his capital murder case. The Supreme Court declined to apply Lackey because the majority of the delay in Gollehon's case was caused by his own pursuit of constitutional and statutory rights in state and federal courts and was not caused by the state. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999). See also St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996).

Unconstitutional Retroactive Application of New Death Penalty Statute: Defendant was sentenced to death under a statute (later found unconstitutional) that mandated the death penalty. A new death penalty statute was passed providing for consideration of aggravating and mitigating circumstances during sentencing. Defendant was then resentenced to death under the new statute. In effect, the new statute added a sentencing "trial" at which the judge could consider evidence at the trial on guilt. This violated due process because counsel for defendant at the trial on guilt would have handled the trial differently had he known the evidence would also be used at the sentencing stage. The District Court was instructed to grant habeas corpus unless the state vacated the death sentence. Coleman v. McCormick, 874 F2d 1280 (9th Cir. 1989).

Life Sentence Followed by Death Sentence on Retrial: Defendant who was given a life sentence at his first deliberate homicide trial could not be given a death sentence at retrial because it placed him in double jeopardy. The life sentence constituted acquittal as to aggravating circumstances that would have justified the death penalty. Fitzpatrick v. McCormick, 869 F2d 1247 (9th Cir. 1989).

Aggravating Circumstances Related to Sentencing — Jury Determination Not Required: Defendant argued that the aggravating circumstances with which the trial court justified the death penalty were equivalent to a finding of malice and that he was therefore entitled to have a jury determine facts constituting the aggravating circumstances. The Supreme Court held that defendant was not entitled to a jury determination because the aggravating circumstances were related to sentencing only and were not elements of the crime charged. Capital sentencing procedures do not require jury participation. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Defendant's Right to Limit Appeal: Defendant clearly expressed his intent to pursue only those appellate issues which must be reviewed as a matter of law. The Supreme Court affirmed his right to do so after finding that defendant was adjudged competent to make such a choice, holding that his decision must be respected if it is made competently, voluntarily, intelligently, and with full knowledge of the consequences. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

No Right to Second Psychiatric Examination: Defendant was convicted of aggravated kidnapping and deliberate homicide, pursuant to pleas of guilty, and was sentenced to death. Judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Subsequently, defendant filed a motion for an additional psychiatric evaluation based on the case of Ake v. Okla., 470 US 68, 84 L Ed 2d 53, 105 S Ct 1087 (1985), which was decided after arguments in defendant's case. The Supreme Court distinguished the facts of defendant's case from the facts in Ake and denied defendant's motion. The Supreme Court found that defendant had already been afforded his right to access to a competent psychiatrist for the preparation of a defense based on his mental condition and was not entitled to an additional psychiatric examination. The Ake decision lacks direct application to Montana's capital sentencing proceedings and defendant's case. St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110, 42 St. Rep. 1348 (1985).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

1983 Amendments Not Bill of Attainder: Chapter 411, L. 1983, amended 46-19-103 to allow the defendant to choose death by lethal injection as an alternative to hanging. Section 7 makes the act applicable to death sentences whether first pronounced before or after its effective date, making the act specifically retroactive. The act is not a bill of attainder as argued by the defendant who was convicted before the effective date of the act and sentenced to death after its effective date. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 211 M 341, 684 P2d 1112, 41 St. Rep. 1400 (1984).

Death Penalty Not Disproportionate to Deliberate Homicide: When a life has been taken by an offender, it cannot be said that the punishment of death is invariably disproportionate to the crime. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981), followed in St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Death Penalty — Facially Neutral — Discrimination to Be Shown: Petitioner challenged Montana's death penalty statutes as arbitrary and discriminatory. Montana has instituted sentencing procedures that focus on the character of the defendant and the circumstances of the crime. In doing this, arbitrariness is conclusively removed from sentencing. As regards discrimination, the disproportionate impact of a facially neutral law will not make the law unconstitutional unless discriminatory intent or purpose is found. Montana's law is facially neutral, and no allegation of discriminatory intent was raised. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Constitutionality of Former Death Sentence Statute: Section 94-5-105, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which provided a procedure for the imposition of a sentence of death for a conviction of deliberate homicide, was constitutional on its face. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Increase of Sentence After New Trial — Due Process: The defendant, who had been sentenced to 100 years' imprisonment for deliberate homicide, was not denied due process of law when, after a new trial on the same charge, he was sentenced to death. The due process clause is not offended by all possibilities of increased punishment upon retrial after appeal, but only those that pose a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness. When the District Court Judge was replaced for the new trial and sentencing and the new judge stated his reasons for imposing the death penalty with clarity, the threat of vindictiveness was not a realistic likelihood. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Sentencing Under Statutes Amended After Date of Crime: The sentencing of the defendant to death for a conviction of aggravated kidnapping under statutes amended after section 94-5-304, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was declared unconstitutional did not violate the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws. The amendments were ameliorative in nature and did not deprive defendant of a substantial right or immunity that he possessed at the time the crime was committed. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Constitutionality:

Montana's statutory scheme for imposing the death penalty meets the standards established by the U.S. Supreme Court. The penalty is not cruel and unusual simply because Montana's criminal statutes allow its imposition in this case for the crime of aggravated kidnapping but not for the crime, as committed here, of deliberate homicide. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

In light of recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions (Woodson v. N. C., 428 US 280, 49 L Ed 2d 944, 96 S Ct 2978 (1976); Coker v. Ga., 433 US 584, 53 L Ed 2d 982, 97 S Ct 2861 (1977); Roberts v. La., 431 US 633, 52 L Ed 2d 637, 97 S Ct 1993 (1977)), section 94-5-304, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), as it existed at the time of the defendant's trial, was unconstitutional on its face as a mandatory death penalty statute. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

While the statutes did not provide for the jury in the bifurcated sentencing procedure, they were within the constitutional boundaries of recent U.S. Supreme Court cases. The sentence of death in this case was rested on a narrowly defined type of murder or kidnapping. The former statute provided for the sentencing judge to consider mitigating circumstances. In addition, appellate judicial review and other sentence review was provided. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

By an earlier decision of the U.S. Supreme Court, statutes allowing the sentencer discretion as to whether to impose the death penalty were unconstitutional; although the conviction would be upheld, a sentence of death made at the discretion of the court under a former statute was unconstitutional and would be commuted to life imprisonment. St. v. Rhodes, 164 M 455, 524 P2d 1095 (1974).

Retroactive Application of Death Penalty Provisions — No Ex Post Facto Violation: Where after the commission of the crime of homicide, the U.S. Supreme Court found the death penalty statute unconstitutional and the state Legislature took only the procedural step of redefining the punishment, not the crime, there is no ex post facto violation in upholding the previous death penalty imposed, since the defendant had "fair warning" of the consequences of homicide. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Review of Death Sentence — Disproportionate Application: The Supreme Court, in reviewing a death sentence to determine whether it is disproportionate, reviews the circumstances of the crime of which the defendant is accused and in light of those circumstances, the judgment and the sentence thereupon imposed. It examines cases involving similar crimes, for the single purpose, making certain that as far as the defendant in this particular case is concerned, there has been no discriminatory action on the part of the sentencing judge and no abuse of discretion by the sentencing judge and that the sentencing judge has considered and applied fairly and without discrimination the applicable law. The Supreme Court looks for the even-handed application of death sentences without regard to sex, color, creed, or race or any other discriminating consideration. When this has occurred, as here, the death sentence must be upheld. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Requisites of a Valid Death Penalty: The U.S. Supreme Court seems to have established three general criteria that are requisite to a valid death penalty statutory scheme: (1) there must be at least one statutory aggravating circumstance before a death sentence may be considered; (2) the defense must be afforded the opportunity to bring before the sentencing body at a separate sentencing hearing any mitigating circumstances relating to the individual defendant; and (3) there must be available prompt judicial review of the sentencing decision by a court of statewide jurisdiction. The statutory scheme in existence at the time of commission of the crimes charged in the instant case met the above criteria. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Prospective Juror's View of Death Penalty: Two prospective jurors were properly excluded under the exception to the general rule of Witherspoon v. Ill., 391 US 510, 20 L Ed 2d 776, 88 S Ct 1770 (1968), because they were irrevocably committed to voting against conviction because of the possibility of a death penalty. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

Burden to Mitigate: Petitioner, under a sentence of death, alleged error in that the burden in sentencing rests on him to show mitigation. The mitigating factors regarding the death penalty sentence have no bearing on guilt or innocence. It is permissible to allow facts pertinent only to the question of punishment to be determined by a judge rather than by a jury, and the State need not prove such facts beyond a reasonable doubt. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Jury Not Involved in Sentencing — Different Factors Required: Petitioner claimed he was denied constitutional rights because the jury was not involved in the sentencing determination; he was sentenced to hang. The factor of overriding importance in sentencing schemes is that the trial and sentencing must be bifurcated, with different factors considered at each. The factors considered by a judge in imposing the death penalty are not elements of the crime. There is no constitutional requirement that a jury make the determination to impose the death penalty. Petitioner's claim was properly dismissed. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 154 in (1)(a) at beginning inserted "Subject to subsection (1)(b)"; inserted (1)(b) providing that evidence of an aggravating circumstance may not be admitted or considered unless the defendant pleaded guilty to the offense and admitted the aggravating circumstance or the trier of fact found beyond a reasonable doubt that the aggravating circumstance existed; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 125 in first sentence inserted third clause referring to harm caused to victim or victim's family; and made minor changes in style.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 43, Ch. 125, L. 1995, provided: "[Sections 10 [46-18-201], 13 [46-18-241], and 21 [46-18-302]] apply to trials for and sentences imposed for crimes that were committed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1995.

Case Notes

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Sentencing Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the sentencing phase. Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) present crucial mitigating evidence to the sentencing court; (2) conduct an adequate sentencing investigation; and (3) move the sentencing court for reconsideration of its conclusion that Dawson posed a substantial and continuing threat and had no chance for rehabilitation. On the first point, Dawson contended that counsel should have offered the statement of the state's key witness regarding another man whom she saw near the crime scene, which Dawson maintained would have bolstered his defense theory that he acted under duress or coercion. However, the statement was vague, and Dawson never offered information concerning the involvement of others. Neither the jury nor the sentencing court accepted the defense theory, and Dawson could not demonstrate prejudice because of counsel's failure to offer the statement. Counsel's decision not to present or argue evidence of Dawson's drug use as a mitigating factor did not constitute ineffective assistance, given counsel's determination that evidence of drug use would have been inflammatory and prejudicial and would have been an aggravating rather than mitigating factor. Failure of counsel to present evidence at sentencing of Dawson's good behavior in jail also did not constitute ineffective assistance because that evidence was presented at the guilt phase and was thus considered at the sentencing phase as well. Second, Dawson's assertion that counsel overlooked demonstrations of remorse found in the records of the staff that conducted his psychiatric examination, which would have served to rebut the findings by the sentencing court regarding his lack of remorse, did not constitute prejudice because the court's finding was based on the court's own observations of Dawson throughout the lengthy proceedings. It was also reasonable for counsel not to investigate Dawson's medical and school records, absent any evidence that further investigation would have been beneficial. Dawson's argument that counsel erred in failing to interview boyhood friends to develop or determine the existence of mitigating evidence also failed. Counsel did present letters from Dawson's mother, sister, and former spouses, and the failure to further investigate boyhood friends did not constitute ineffective assistance. Third, counsel's failure to move the sentencing court for reconsideration of its conclusion that Dawson posed a substantial and continuing threat and had no chance for rehabilitation was not ineffective assistance given the findings in St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988), that evidence supported the sentencing court's finding of aggravating factors and that the death sentence was appropriate. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at sentencing. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Consideration of Victim Impact Statement Not Reversible Error: The District Court considered the oral statements of the victim's father before sentencing the defendant to death. The Supreme Court held that the lower court's consideration of the victim impact statement was not error because the statement was considered by a judge, not a jury, and the statement was not written and was short and unemotional. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Defendant's Silence Considered in Sentencing — No Error: Trial judge's observation of defendant's silence at trial as a factor in imposing the death sentence did not constitute improper consideration of defendant's constitutional right to remain silent. The sentencing order contained a finding that defendant demonstrated no remorse or genuine concern for human life. The finding could be seen as an expression of the absence of a mitigating factor, and in light of several other factors warranting imposition of the death sentence, the presence of the finding in the sentencing order was not significant. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Reference to Victim Impact Information by Sentencing Judge Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Defendant claimed the death sentence was improper because the sentencing judge referred to the victim impact information contained in the presentence investigation report. Defendant cited the holding in Booth v. Maryland, 482 US 496, 96 L Ed 2d 440, 107 S Ct 2529 (1987), that it was a violation of the eighth amendment of the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.) for a sentencing jury to refer to information in a victim impact statement during the sentencing stage of a capital murder trial. The Montana Supreme Court held that Booth was factually distinguishable from Montana sentencing procedures, noting that a judge rather than a jury performs sentencing under Montana law. Furthermore, the judge may be allowed to hear and rule on the admissibility of evidence that the jury is not allowed to hear, yet he is still responsible for sentencing. Absent evidence that the judge was adversely affected by victim impact information, there was no constitutional violation. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988), followed in St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), and Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Presentence Report Properly Used by Judge: Defendant's contention that hearsay tainted the presentence report was without merit. Section 46-18-112 authorizes a complete investigation into the background of the defendant and does not limit hearsay. The District Court's reliance upon the recommendation of the probation officer was not error. Section 46-18-302 authorizes the sentencing judge to consider the widest possible scope of inquiry when determining the sentence to be imposed. The court followed the position established in St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985), regarding the sentencing judge's discretion to use the presentence report and sentencing recommendations. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 52 throughout section substituted references to offender for references to defendant and person; inserted (1)(a)(vi) regarding certain sexual crimes when the victim is less than 18 years old; deleted former (9) that read: "(9) The offense was deliberate homicide and was committed by a person during the course of committing sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, deviate sexual conduct, or incest, and the victim was less than 18 years of age"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 126 in (1)(a)(i) substituted "while in official detention, as defined in 45-2-101" for "serving a sentence of imprisonment in the state prison"; in (1)(a)(ii) after "by a" substituted "person" for "defendant"; inserted (1)(a)(vi) regarding a deliberate homicide committed by a person during the course of committing sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, deviate sexual conduct, or incest if the victim was under 18 years of age; in (3) after "committed while" substituted "in official detention, as defined in 45-2-101" for "incarcerated at the state prison"; deleted former (9) that read: "(9) The offense was deliberate homicide and was committed by a person during the course of committing sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, deviate sexual conduct, or incest, and the victim was less than 18 years of age"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 491 in (1)(a)(i) and (3) substituted "a state prison" for "the state prison". Amendment effective April 27, 1999.

Style changes were slightly different in the chapters. In each case, the codifier chose appropriate text.

The amendments to (1)(a)(i) and (3) by Ch. 491 were rendered void by the amendments made by Ch. 126 and were not codified.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 312 inserted (10) concerning the offense of sexual intercourse without consent when the convicted person has a prior conviction for that offense and during each offense inflicted serious bodily injury on a person; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (9) concerning deliberate homicide during course of sexual crime involving a minor.

1987 Amendment: At end of (7), after "death of the victim", inserted remainder of subsection referring to death of a rescuer.

1985 Amendment: Inserted (8) including as aggravating circumstances an offense committed at the State Prison by a person convicted of deliberate homicide or found to be a persistent felon.

Case Notes

Constitutional Standard Applicable to Aggravating Circumstance Regarding Offense Committed as Part of Scheme or Operation and Regarding Aggravated Kidnapping: Each statutory aggravating circumstance under this section must satisfy a constitutional standard derived from Furman v. Ga., 408 US 238, 33 L Ed 2d 346, 92 S Ct 2726 (1972), requiring that the aggravating circumstance not be so vague that it fails to channel the discretion of the sentencing court, resulting in arbitrary and capricious sentencing. The circumstance set out in subsection (5) of this section satisfies the constitutional standard by narrowing the class of persons eligible for the death penalty in two respects: (1) the offense must be committed as part of a planned undertaking or systematic plan; and (2) the scheme or operation must contemplate the death of more than one person. The circumstance set out in subsection (7) of this section also satisfies the constitutional requirement by providing the death of the victim as the factor that narrows the class of persons who have committed the predicate felony of aggravated kidnapping. Defendant's argument that an aggravating factor is required to narrow the class of persons who have committed two predicate felonies was in error because the aggravating factors set out in this section are independent of each other and each one, by itself, is sufficient to justify imposition of the death penalty. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993). (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996)(Smith III).

Prison Inmate — Aggravating Circumstances Applicable to Conviction for Deliberate Homicide by Accountability: A prison inmate who was convicted of killing another inmate contended that the aggravating circumstances of subsections (1) and (2) of this section did not apply because he was found not guilty of deliberate homicide, but guilty of deliberate homicide by accountability. However, the jury was clearly and correctly instructed that the offense of deliberate homicide by accountability requires a deliberate homicide and a finding that the defendant acted with common purpose before or during the homicide. The jury did not find defendant not guilty of deliberate homicide, but found only that he did not act alone during the crime, thus allowing the conviction of both men involved in the crime without having to determine which man struck the fatal blow. Because defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide by accountability, the sentencing consideration of whether to use the death penalty for the conviction was not double jeopardy, nor was consideration of aggravating circumstances an error. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993), distinguishing Enmund v. Fla., 458 US 782, 73 L Ed 2d 1140, 102 S Ct 3368 (1981).

Not Error to Consider Lack of Remorse as Aggravating Factor: The defendant in a multiple homicide case moved to have his death sentence set aside on the basis that the trial court relied on the defendant's lack of remorse as an aggravating factor justifying the death penalty. The Supreme Court held that there was no error because the lack of remorse relates to the propriety of the death sentence even though it is not statutorily enumerated as an aggravating circumstance. St. v. Langford, 248 M 420, 813 P2d 936, 48 St. Rep. 492 (1991). The petition for postconviction relief was denied in St. v. Langford, 249 M 385, 819 P2d 151, 48 St. Rep. 620 (1991).

Evidence of Torture and Lying in Wait or Ambush: A finding of aggravating circumstances was justified upon evidence of homicide by means of torture and lying in wait or ambush. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Defendant on Parole — Questionable Aggravating Circumstance for Purpose of Death Penalty: This section fails to address whether deliberate homicide committed by a parolee from this or any other state constitutes an aggravating circumstance for purposes of the death penalty. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988), distinguished in St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998).

Evidence of "Lying in Wait" and That "The Offense Was Aggravated Kidnapping Which Resulted in the Death of the Victim": The evidence in the record clearly proved that sufficient aggravating circumstances existed to warrant imposition of the death penalty in that the crime of deliberate homicide had been "committed by a person lying in wait or ambush" and the crime of aggravated kidnapping "resulted in the death of the victim". St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Lying in Wait: When the defendant had robbed a bank and in the course of his escape drove his automobile into a coulee, stopped his machine, and shortly thereafter shot and killed one of his pursuers, an instruction that homicide committed by lying in wait constituted murder in the first degree under a former section was proper. St. v. Jackson, 71 M 421, 230 P 370 (1924).

Applicability of Brady Rule — Evidence of Accomplice's Rape, Criminal History, and Violent Background Insufficient for New Trial: In a postconviction relief proceeding, petitioner claimed that the state's failure at the first trial to disclose the accomplice's criminal history or sexual assault allegation was prejudicial and warranted a new trial. The Supreme Court found this argument completely without merit. Although the evidence may have been helpful in impeaching the accomplice's testimony, in no way could the failure to disclose this information reasonably be taken to put the whole case in such a different light as to undermine confidence in the verdict. Even in the absence of the accomplice's testimony, there was an overwhelming abundance of other accomplice testimony and corroborative evidence to establish petitioner's guilt. The state did not violate Brady with regard to the guilt phase of petitioner's trial because any favorable information that the state failed to disclose was not material to petitioner's guilt or innocence. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Proper Finding of Nonexistence of Mitigating Factors in Prison Homicide — Death Penalty Affirmed: Johnson did not dispute the District Court's finding that two aggravating circumstances existed, but contended that the court's conclusion, that there were no mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency, was in error. The trial court is not required to make findings on each piece of purportedly mitigating evidence produced; it is only required to consider all aggravating and mitigating evidence presented. Johnson's version of the circumstances surrounding the murder, which if believed may have indicated that some degree of leniency was appropriate, was not credible. Having considered Johnson's proposed mitigating circumstances and rejected them, the District Court's decision was affirmed. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998).

No Error in Analyzing Mitigating Circumstances: The District Court did not err in analyzing mitigating circumstances by: (1) considering every enumerated mitigating factor rather than only those that were raised by defendant; (2) failing to consider, as mitigating evidence, defendant's testimony that the homicide victim was the aggressor; (3) failing to make independent findings on defendant's justifiable use of force defense; (4) failing to find that sentences in other cases did not constitute a mitigating circumstance; (5) failing to consider whether the death sentence in this case was disproportionate or excessive, which is the province of the Supreme Court; and (6) not making findings on each piece of purportedly mitigating evidence produced by defendant. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998), following St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272 (1996), and distinguishing St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992 (1984).

Duty of Prosecution to Give Defendant All Requested Exculpatory Information — Applicability of Brady Rule — Remand for Resentencing: Under Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963), the prosecution is required to give a criminal defendant all requested exculpatory information material either to the defendant's guilt or to punishment. Under U.S. v. Bagley, 473 US 667, 87 L Ed 2d 481, 105 S Ct 3375 (1985), the prosecution must also deliver to the defendant all evidence significant for impeachment purposes. In order to require reversal of a defendant's conviction or sentence, a Brady violation must relate to material information. The standard for materiality was set out in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 US 419, 131 L Ed 2d 490, 115 S Ct 1555, 63 USLW 4303 (1995), holding that the defendant must show that there is a reasonable probability that had the information been provided, the result would have been different. The effect of suppressed Brady material must be considered collectively rather than on an item-by-item basis. In the present case, defendant raised numerous issues in an attempt to show that the state had failed to disclose certain materials. After examining each issue, the Supreme Court found that all but two were immaterial and that those two would not have affected the outcome of the trial even if they had been disclosed. However, there was a reasonable probability that had that information been provided to the defendant, the result of the sentencing hearing could have been different if the undisclosed information could have been used to support defendant's contention of mitigating circumstances. Therefore, the court vacated the sentences and remanded for resentencing. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995), followed in Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), and St. v. Buckles, 1999 MT 79, 294 M 95, 979 P2d 177, 56 St. Rep. 331 (1999). See also Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000), holding that it was harmless error for the District Court to fail to address new claims in its Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Order dismissing petitioner's amended petition for postconviction relief.

Applicability of "Catchall" Mitigating Circumstance to Postoffense Conduct: The enormously broad "catchall" mitigating circumstance in subsection (8) of this section reflects the Legislature's intent to permit a defendant to raise any and all facts and evidence that might mitigate against the death penalty, including evidence of conduct during incarceration subsequent to the offense. Evidence may include any evidence required in a presentence investigation under 46-18-112 relative to a defendant's characteristics, circumstances, needs, and potentialities. In this case, the sentencing court erred by failing to order a presentence investigation and report that included consideration of defendant's admission of guilt, contrition, commitment to rehabilitation, and conduct while incarcerated, which were all relevant as mitigating evidence. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II), following Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586, 57 L Ed 2d 973, 98 S Ct 2954 (1978), Skipper v. S.C., 476 US 1, 90 L Ed 2d 1, 106 S Ct 1669 (1986), and Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

District Court Not Precluded From Considering Any Mitigating Factor: A District Court in a capital case may not be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that a defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death. In this case, the District Court did not err in its consideration of mitigating evidence of defendant's family background and the testimony of a codefendant concerning the circumstances of the offense. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993), following Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586, 57 L Ed 2d 973, 98 S Ct 2954 (1978), and Skipper v. S.C., 476 US 1, 90 L Ed 2d 1, 106 S Ct 1669 (1986). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Consideration of "Catchall" of Mitigating Circumstances: The trial court reviewed in detail the first seven elements comprising mitigating circumstances under this section and found no evidence of any of the elements. Gollehon presented evidence of childhood abuse under the catchall element of subsection (8) of this section, and the court properly considered the evidence without passion or prejudice and with consideration of whether the sentence was proportional to the crime, as required by 46-18-310. It was not error for the court to then conclude that the evidence was insufficient to preclude the death penalty. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Absence of Prior Criminal History — Death Sentence Affirmed: The absence of a prior criminal history was insufficient to warrant leniency when the nature of the capital crimes for which defendant was convicted was weighed against the lack of a significant criminal history. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), followed in St. v. Langford, 248 M 420, 813 P2d 936, 48 St. Rep. 492 (1991).

Mitigating Circumstances Not Sufficiently Substantial to Warrant Leniency: The Supreme Court affirmed the death penalty after finding the trial court properly considered and rejected 21 items defendant alleged as mitigating circumstances, including defendant's physical and mental disabilities, expression of remorse and desire to reform, lack of violent crimes in his past criminal record, the effect of an injury sustained during commission of the crimes, and miscellaneous personal problems. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Significant History of Prior Criminal Activity: The District Court's finding that no mitigating circumstances existed in favor of the defendant was upheld when the defendant had a long history of prior criminal activity and no other facts existed in mitigation of the penalty. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Case Notes

Finding of Aggravating Circumstance and No Mitigating Circumstance — Mandatory Death Sentence: Upon finding a single aggravating circumstance, that defendant had previously been convicted of homicide, and finding no mitigating circumstances sufficient to call for leniency, the District Court was statutorily required to sentence defendant to death. Further, under a death penalty scheme like Montana's, it is not required that a death penalty be reversed or that a new sentencing hearing be conducted if one of several aggravating circumstances found to exist is subsequently held to be inapplicable, as long as the inapplicability of one aggravating circumstance does not render the death penalty arbitrary or capricious. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998).

Failure to Establish Standard Governing Weighing of Aggravating and Mitigating Factors Not Unconstitutional Allocation of Burden of Proof: As set out in Zant v. Stephens, 462 US 862, 77 L Ed 2d 235, 103 S Ct 2733 (1983), the fact that this section fails to establish a standard governing the District Court's weighing of aggravating and mitigating factors does not mean it is constitutionally flawed. Imposition of the death sentence is required if the court finds one or more aggravating circumstances and finds no mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993)(Smith II), distinguishing People v. Young, 814 P2d 834 (Colo. 1991). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Verbatim Adoption of Proposed Findings in Death Penalty Sentencing — Reversal Not Required: The Supreme Court does not condone a District Court's verbatim adoption of proposed findings, especially when weighing aggravating and mitigating circumstances in a matter as grave as imposition of the death penalty. However, findings and conclusions that are sufficiently comprehensive and pertinent to the issues to provide a basis for decision and that are supported by evidence will not be overturned simply because the District Court relied on proposed findings and conclusions submitted by counsel, nor are findings adopted in that manner so inherently flawed that the prevailing party must be reversed. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993), distinguishing Patterson v. St., 513 S2d 1257 (Fla. 1987).

Substantial Evidence of Aggravating Circumstances: There was substantial evidence to support the following factual findings in the sentencing order: (1) the victim died as a result of beatings; (2) defendant knew the victim was married and had a family; (3) the victim pleaded for his life with defendant and accomplices, to no avail; (4) defendant's demeanor at trial and at the sentencing hearing exhibited no remorse; (5) defendant could have removed himself from the entire episode and saved the victim's life on more than one occasion, but failed to do so; (6) two aggravating circumstances applied, namely that the offense of deliberate homicide was committed by means of torture and the offense of aggravated kidnapping resulted in the death of the victim; (7) the mitigating circumstance that defendant acted under the domination of another person did not apply; (8) evidence did not show that defendant was substantially impaired by his drinking; (9) defendant was an accomplice in a deliberate homicide committed by another person; and (10) the only possible mitigating circumstance was insubstantial to call for leniency. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Death Penalty Upon Finding of Aggravating Circumstances — Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Defendant maintained that 46-18-305 allowed the imposition of cruel and unusual punishment because it did not sufficiently narrow the class of death-eligible defendants. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that this argument was previously rejected in St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980). St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Burden to Mitigate: Petitioner, under a sentence of death, alleged error in that the burden in sentencing rests on him to show mitigation. The mitigating factors regarding the death penalty sentence have no bearing on guilt or innocence. It is permissible to allow facts pertinent only to the question of punishment to be determined by a judge rather than by a jury, and the State need not prove such facts beyond a reasonable doubt. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981), followed in St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993). See also Walton v. Ariz., 497 US 639, 111 L Ed 2d 511, 110 S Ct 3047 (1990) (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Jury Not Involved in Sentencing — Different Factors Required: Petitioner claimed he was denied constitutional rights because the jury was not involved in the sentencing determination; he was sentenced to hang. The factor of overriding importance in sentencing schemes is that the trial and sentencing must be bifurcated, with different factors considered at each. The factors considered by a judge in imposing the death penalty are not elements of the crime. There is no constitutional requirement that a jury make the determination to impose the death penalty. Petitioner's claim was properly dismissed. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Mitigation Insufficient to Offset Aggravation: Aggravating and mitigating factors to be considered by the sentencing court in death penalty cases do not mandate the death penalty upon the finding of an aggravating circumstance, but rather require consideration of whatever mitigating circumstances are found to be present. The District Court found that the aggravating factor (death of the victim of aggravated kidnapping) was not offset by the mitigating factor (lack of a prior criminal record), and the Supreme Court affirmed that decision. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Requirement of "Sufficiently Substantial" Mitigating Factors: The statutory language allowing consideration of only "sufficiently substantial" mitigating factors is not an encroachment upon the discretion of the judge when he passes sentence on capital cases in violation of Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586, 57 L Ed 2d 973, 98 S Ct 2954 (1978), since it only requires the factor to have some substance or weight. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

46-18-306. Specific written findings of fact.

Case Notes

No Requirement That Written Findings Be Filed Concurrently With Oral Imposition of Death Sentence: Nothing in this section requires the District Court to file its written findings concurrently with its oral imposition of the death sentence. A 1-week delay in filing of written findings did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II), distinguishing Christopher v. Fla., 583 S2d 642 (Fla. 1991). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

46-18-307. Automatic review of sentence.

Case Notes

Prison Murder — Death Sentence Not Imposed Under Influence of Passion, Prejudice, or Arbitrary Factors: Johnson was convicted of killing another prison inmate and contended on appeal that the death sentence was imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors because the District Court predicated its sentence on Montana's correctional policy, as set forth in 46-18-101, but that the policy does not expressly provide for death as punishment for any crime. The Supreme Court agreed that the statute does not expressly discuss death as a punishment for criminal conduct, but noted that, being a general declaration of state correctional policy, the statute also does not discuss most of the sentencing options allowed by law. Notwithstanding the fact that the death sentence has been affirmed as constitutional, the District Court's findings reflected its consideration of the general statutory principles that a sentence be based primarily on the crime committed, the prospects of rehabilitation, the circumstances under which the crime was committed, and the offender's criminal history. The circumstances of this crime, coupled with Johnson's long history of assaultive and predatory behavior both in and out of prison, were reflected in the court's analysis and showed that the court carefully and dispassionately considered all the evidence before it concluded that the death penalty was appropriate. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998).

Sentence Imposed Same Day as Sentencing Hearing — No Influence of Passion, Prejudice, or Other Arbitrary Factor: Despite defendant's contention that the death sentence was based on his lack of rehabilitation, when the District Court took evidence before it into account in determining to impose the death sentence and examined aggravating and mitigating circumstances in a thorough and detailed manner, the fact that the sentence was imposed on the same day as the sentencing hearing did not constitute the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998).

Statutory Narrowing of Class of Death-Eligible Persons: The Supreme Court specifically held that subsection (7) of this section genuinely narrowed the class of death-eligible persons and was an appropriate aggravating circumstance for the death penalty. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Postconviction Relief — On New Ground After Automatic Review — Not Barred: Petitioner was convicted of deliberate homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery and was sentenced to death. His sentence was automatically reviewed by the Supreme Court. Petitioner then filed for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21, part 1, and the State moved to dismiss the issues raised as res judicata. The court held that res judicata cannot be invoked by the State so as to deprive a litigant of the right to file a petition for postconviction relief, if the petitioner has a new basis or ground for coming before the court. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981). See also Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Right to Postconviction Relief Petition After Automatic Review: A defendant sentenced to death is entitled to an automatic sentence review under 46-18-307, et seq. This automatic review does not stand in the place of postconviction relief, and after the automatic review, a defendant may petition for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Expeditious Review of Death Sentence: When the death penalty has been imposed in a case, the Legislature has directed the Supreme Court, because of the nature of the penalty involved, to undertake expeditiously the functions of reviewing the record to determine if any errors have been committed resulting in imposition of an illegal sentence and to determine if the sentence is appropriate under the circumstances. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Montana Rules For Automatic Review of a Death Sentence: These rules were adopted by Montana Supreme Court order dated September 13, 1984, effective October 1, 1984. The order and rules appear at 41 St. Rep. 1960. They are reprinted below. An incorrect Rule 8 reference to "174 Mont." has been changed to "147 Mont.".

"Rule 1. Purpose and scope of rules. (1) These rules govern procedures for the conduct of the automatic review of death sentences and associated appeals by the Montana Supreme Court under sections 46-18-310, MCA.

(2) Unless otherwise provided in these rules violation of these procedural rules will not entitle a party to relief absent a showing that the violation has caused significant prejudice to the party's right to a fair hearing.

(3) If no procedure is specifically prescribed by these rules, the Court shall proceed in conformance with the applicable statute or rule governing appellate practice in criminal cases.

Rule 2. Initiation of automatic review. (1) When a district court imposes a sentence of death, the county attorney shall within five days file in the district court a notice of automatic review. The notice shall state that the Supreme Court will conduct an automatic review of the death sentence in accordance with sections 46-18-307 through 46-18-310, MCA, and these rules, and that a defendant wishing to present issues other than those specified in section 46-18-310, MCA, must file a notice of appeal under Rule 5 of these rules.

(2) The filing of a notice of automatic review serves the same purpose and has the same effect as the filing of a notice of appeal under section 46-20-201, MCA, and [former] Rule 4, M.R.App.Civ.P. (now M.R.App.P., now superseded).

(3) The county attorney shall serve copies of the notice of automatic review on both the defendant and his counsel, if any, and also upon the attorney general. The county attorney shall file an additional copy with the clerk of the Supreme Court.

(4) In cases where co-defendants were tried jointly in the district court and both received death sentences, the automatic review of the death sentences shall proceed separately before the Supreme Court. The county attorney shall file and serve separate notices of automatic review for each co-defendant in compliance with subsection (3) of this rule.

Rule 3. Docketing. The clerk of the Supreme Court shall docket the automatic review without fee and shall assign a docket number to the automatic review upon filing of the notice of automatic review by the county attorney under Rule 2. If a notice of appeal is filed, the clerk shall assign a separate docket number to the appeal, but shall note on the docket that the appeal and automatic review are consolidated for purposes of proceedings in the Supreme Court.

Rule 4. Record for automatic review. (1) The record for automatic review must include both the district court clerk's record and the transcript of proceedings from the district court.

(2) On the day the notice of automatic review is filed, the county attorney shall order a transcript of all recorded proceedings in the district court. The county shall pay the cost of the transcript.

(3) The clerk of the district court shall forward the entire record to the clerk of the Supreme Court within ten days after receipt of the transcript.

Rule 5. Appeals. (1) A defendant who wishes to seek review of issues of law pertaining to his trial or sentence other than those specified in section 46-18-310, MCA, shall file a notice of appeal within twenty days after imposition of sentence.

(2) If no notice of appeal is timely filed, the Supreme Court will consider no issues other than those presented on automatic review pursuant to section 46-18-310, MCA.

(3) Upon a showing of good and sufficient reason for the failure to file within twenty days, the Supreme Court may grant a motion to allow a defendant to file a notice of appeal out of time. No such motion will be considered by the Court if filed more than sixty days after the date of imposition of sentence.

Rule 6. Briefs. (1) Automatic review without appeal. If no notice of appeal has been filed, the defendant may file an opening brief within twenty days of the filing of the record on automatic review with the clerk of the Supreme Court which shall address the issues set forth in section 46-18-310, MCA. The state shall file a brief expressing its views on the issues set forth in section 46-18-310, MCA, within twenty days of service of the defendant's brief, if any, or within forty days of the filing of the record on appeal if the defendant chooses to file no brief. The defendant may file a reply brief, which shall be limited to the rebuttal of the state's argument, within ten days of service of the state's brief.

(2) Automatic review combined with appeal. If the defendant files a timely notice of appeal, he shall file his opening brief within thirty days after the filing of the record with the clerk of the Supreme Court. The defendant's opening brief shall address the issues specified in section 46-18-310, MCA, and all other issues arising from the trial and sentencing for which review is sought. The state shall file a responding brief within thirty days after service of the defendant's opening brief. The defendant may file a reply brief within fourteen days after service of the state's brief.

(3) Untimely notice of appeal. If the Supreme Court grants a defendant's motion for leave to file a notice of appeal out of time, the order granting the motion shall provide a briefing schedule for the parties.

Rule 7. Action by the Court. (1) The Court shall hear oral argument en banc in any case governed by these rules on the next calendar commencing more than thirty days after the filing of the state's brief.

(2) If no notice of appeal has been filed, the Court may review only the issues specified by section 46-18-310, MCA. If the defendant has filed a notice of appeal, the Court shall also consider all issues presented by the defendant in his brief, subject to the rules of law governing the preservation in the district court of questions for review on appeal.

Rule 8. Service. Defendants in automatic review cases shall comply with Supreme Court Rule II, 147 Mont. at xxiv.

Rule 9. Stays. The trial court shall enter a stay of execution of a death sentence upon the filing of a notice of automatic review. The stay expires upon issuance of remittitur on the Supreme Court's order affirming, vacating, or modifying the sentence. If the stay expires upon affirmance of a death sentence after the date set for execution of sentence has passed or within five days prior to the execution date, the execution date will be vacated, and the Supreme Court will remand the case to the district court for the setting of a new execution date in compliance with section 46-19-103, MCA.

Rule 10. Suspension of Rules. In the interest of expediting proceedings for automatic review, or for other good cause, the Supreme Court may suspend the operation of these rules and order proceedings in accordance with its direction.

Rule 11. Title and effective date. (1) These rules may be cited as "Montana Rules for Automatic Review of a Death Sentence."

(2) These rules take effect on October 1, 1984, and they govern the automatic review of death sentence imposed after their effective date."

Case Notes

Expeditious Review of Death Sentence: When the death penalty has been imposed in a case, the Legislature has directed the Supreme Court, because of the nature of the penalty involved, to undertake expeditiously the functions of reviewing the record to determine if any errors have been committed resulting in imposition of an illegal sentence and to determine if the sentence is appropriate under the circumstances. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 154 in (1)(b) near beginning after "supports the" inserted "trier of fact's finding of the existence or nonexistence of the aggravating circumstances enumerated in 46-18-303 and the sentencing", after "nonexistence of the" deleted "aggravating or", and after "enumerated in" deleted "46-18-303 and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 302 in (1)(c), in two places, substituted "other cases" for "similar cases" and inserted "in which a sentencing hearing was held pursuant to 46-18-301, whether the sentence imposed was death or a sentence other than death"; and inserted (2) requiring the sentencing court's factfindings to be upheld unless they are clearly erroneous and prohibiting the Supreme Court from substituting its judgment for that of the sentencing court with respect to witness credibility, drawing evidentiary inferences, and resolving conflicts in evidence. Amendment effective April 17, 1997.

Case Notes

Capacity of Defendant to Withdraw Appeals — Rees Standard: Dawson was convicted of a capital crime and sentenced to death, and after years of appeals, Dawson decided to fire his attorneys, discontinue all appeals, and proceed with imposition of the death penalty. Dawson filed a pro se motion in state and federal courts to dismiss all pending appeals, and the Supreme Court considered whether to grant the motion. To decide whether a person under a death sentence has the mental competence to waive the right to further judicial review, the court applied the federal standard in Rees v. Payton, 384 US 312 (1966). The standard is whether the defendant has the capacity to appreciate the defendant's position and make a rational choice with respect to continuing or abandoning further litigation or whether the defendant is suffering from a mental disease, disorder, or defect that may substantially affect the defendant's capacity in the premises. After examining the record, the Supreme Court determined that Dawson did not suffer from a mental disease, disorder, or defect, that he had the capacity to appreciate his position, that he had made a rational choice to abandon further litigation, and that his motion to dismiss the appeal was voluntarily made. Once Dawson's competency was determined and the voluntariness of his action was established, Dawson was protected by his right to privacy from further medical examination and evaluation and from testimony from his doctor, and was entitled to the individual autonomy to make his private decision. Absent any showing that Dawson was denied any right while incarcerated or evidence of prison conditions that would cause him to abandon his desire to live, the Supreme Court dismissed Dawson's appeal and remanded to the District Court for execution of the original death sentence. St. v. Dawson, 2006 MT 69, 331 M 444, 133 P3d 236 (2006). See also Rumbaugh v. Procunier, 753 F2d 395 (5th Cir. 1985), and Dennis v. Budge, 378 F3d 880 (9th Cir. 2004).

Right of Defendant to Waive Counsel: Dawson was convicted of a capital crime and sentenced to death, and after years of appeals, Dawson decided to fire his attorneys, discontinue all appeals, and proceed with imposition of the death penalty. Dawson filed a pro se motion in state and federal courts to dismiss all pending appeals, and the Supreme Court considered whether to grant the motion. A defendant has a constitutionally guaranteed right to the assistance of counsel, but that right does not prohibit a defendant from rejecting the assistance of counsel. A defendant may be granted a request for self-representation if the waiver of the right to counsel is unequivocal, voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. The court examined the record and determined that Dawson's request to waive counsel met the criteria. Dawson was allowed to discharge his counsel, and an attorney was appointed to act as standby counsel. St. v. Dawson, 2006 MT 69, 331 M 444, 133 P3d 236 (2006).

Newly Discovered Evidence — Accomplice's Affidavit as to Ambiguity of Petitioner's Grunt — Insufficient for Postconviction Relief: In a postconviction relief proceeding, petitioner claimed that newly discovered evidence in the form of an accomplice's affidavit warranted a new trial.

The Supreme Court held that the ambiguous interpretation of petitioner's grunt in response to whether he agreed that the victim should be killed was not probative of innocence and was only relevant to the imposition of the death penalty. Therefore, the evidence was rendered moot when petitioner's death penalty sentence was vacated on appeal. Kills on Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Criteria Necessary to Establish Brady Violation: The suppression by the prosecution of material evidence favorable to the accused violates the due process rights of the accused, pursuant to Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963), including failing to disclose an agreement with a prosecution witness in exchange for testimony if the agreement provides tangible benefits. When there is no agreement, there is no duty to disclose. To establish a Brady violation, the petitioner must establish that: (1) the state possessed evidence, including impeachment evidence, favorable to the defense; (2) the petitioner did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence; (3) the prosecution suppressed the favorable evidence; and (4) had the evidence been disclosed, a reasonable probability exists that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different. Here, Gollehon asserted that pretrial and posttrial agreements by the state with a prosecution witness prejudiced Gollehon's due process rights because if the jury had known of the agreements, the credibility of the witness would have been in doubt. However, aside from a guarantee of the witness's safety, which was disclosed to the jury at trial, Gollehon could not establish a Brady violation through the existence of an undisclosed pretrial agreement. Further, in order for posttrial assistance to be relevant, there must have been an agreement for parole before trial in order to support a Brady violation. In the absence of evidence of a pretrial agreement, there can be no Brady violation because no evidence was suppressed from the jury. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2005 MT 318, 329 M 497, 125 P3d 1096 (2005). See also Giglio v. U.S., 405 US 150, 766 L Ed 2d 104, 92 S Ct 763 (1972), Alderson v. Zant, 22 F3d 1541 (11th Cir. 1994), and Mills v. Singletary, 63 F3d 999 (11th Cir. 1995).

Death Row Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Delay Attributed to Defendant's Appeals: Citing Lackey v. Tex., 514 US 1045, 131 L Ed 2d 304, 115 S Ct 1421 (1995), Gollehon claimed that his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated by the amount of time that he spent on death row and by the number of sentencing hearings in his capital murder case. The Supreme Court declined to apply Lackey because the majority of the delay in Gollehon's case was caused by his own pursuit of constitutional and statutory rights in state and federal courts and was not caused by the state. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999). See also St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996).

Deliberate Homicide by Accountability Proportional to Other Capital Crimes — Death Sentence Affirmed: The senseless, calculated, brutal, and deliberate homicide of a prison inmate by two other inmates wielding baseball bats, when compared to other cases decided in Montana, the 9th Circuit, and the U.S. Supreme Court, led the Montana Supreme Court to conclude that the death penalty was appropriate. When considering proportionality, the court examined the gravity of the offenses, the brutality with which they were committed, and the existence of any factors meriting leniency, with the purpose of making certain that there was no discriminatory action on the part of the sentencing judge. Because imposition of the death sentence was not random or arbitrary, the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment was not violated. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998); St. v. Turner, 262 M 39, 864 P2d 235, 50 St. Rep. 1267 (1993); St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Proper Finding of Nonexistence of Mitigating Factors in Prison Homicide — Death Penalty Affirmed: Johnson did not dispute the District Court's finding that two aggravating circumstances existed, but contended that the court's conclusion, that there were no mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency, was in error. The trial court is not required to make findings on each piece of purportedly mitigating evidence produced; it is only required to consider all aggravating and mitigating evidence presented. Johnson's version of the circumstances surrounding the murder, which if believed may have indicated that some degree of leniency was appropriate, was not credible. Having considered Johnson's proposed mitigating circumstances and rejected them, the District Court's decision was affirmed. St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998).

Proportionality of Death Penalties in Prison Homicide: Sattler was sentenced to death after killing another inmate while incarcerated. Consistent with its role in reviewing whether the sentence was disproportionate to the penalty in similar cases, the Supreme Court reviewed the only two similar existing cases, St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249 (1993), and St. v. Turner, 262 M 39, 864 P2d 235 (1993). Despite a variance in the number of aggravating circumstances between the cases, given that the brutality and gravity of the homicides in each case were substantially similar, coupled with defendant's lack of acceptance of responsibility by continually asserting that the homicide was justified because he was defending himself, Sattler's death penalty was not disproportionate or excessive to the penalty imposed in the similar cases. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998).

Accomplice to Felony Murder — Review for Compliance With Proportionality and Individualized Treatment Standards: Vernon Kills On Top contended upon review of his death penalty for felony murder that the sentence violated both the constitutional requirement for individualized punishment and the proportionality requirement. In analyzing the imposition of a death sentence, the Supreme Court will apply both federal and state constitutional standards derived from the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const. Although these constitutional provisions contain no explicit prohibition against disproportionate sentences and no express mandate for individualized punishment, the cruel and unusual punishment clauses ban sentences that are grossly disproportionate to the crime for which the defendant was convicted. As set out in Enmund v. Fla., 458 US 782 (1981), the death penalty is unique in its severity and irrevocability, so the state is required to focus on the defendant's personal intent, character, and culpability, not merely on the defendant's role as an accomplice. Because Vernon was not present when the killing occurred, did not inflict the death-causing injuries, and actually sought to avoid the killing, the sentence of death imposed on Vernon was disproportionate and thus was vacated. This reasoning does not preclude imposition of a death sentence upon an accomplice to felony murder; however, each case will be reviewed on the basis of its unique facts to ensure that the death sentence is not disproportionate to the degree of the defendant's culpability. Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), reversing St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273 (1990), and distinguishing Tison v. Ariz., 481 US 137 (1987).

Findings Relied Upon for Death Sentence Unsupported by Evidence — Felony Murder: Upon review of a death sentence, several statements from a previous opinion on Vernon Kills On Top's culpability for a homicide in which he did not directly participate were found to be unsupported by the record. The standard of review used by the Supreme Court pursuant to this section in such cases is broader than the clearly erroneous standard and includes whether the findings are supported by the evidence (see 1997 amendment). Applying that standard, the court found, on independent constitutional grounds, that because Vernon was not present when the killing occurred, did not inflict the death-causing injuries, and actually sought to avoid the killing, the sentence of death imposed on Vernon should be vacated. Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996).

Consideration of "Catchall" of Mitigating Circumstances: The trial court reviewed in detail the first seven elements comprising mitigating circumstances under 46-18-304 and found no evidence of any of the elements. Gollehon presented evidence of childhood abuse under the catchall element of 48-18-304(8), and the court properly considered the evidence without passion or prejudice and with consideration of whether the sentence was proportional to the crime, as required by this section. It was not error for the court to then conclude that the evidence was insufficient to preclude the death penalty. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Constitutionality of Death Sentence: Imposition of the death sentence is constitutional under the review criteria of this section. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Federal Court Decision Regarding Statute Similar to Montana's Not Binding on Montana Courts: The defendant challenged the constitutionality of Montana's death penalty on the basis of a federal court decision that held that a similar statute of another state was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held that the decision was not binding on Montana and also noted that the federal decision had been appealed to the federal Supreme Court. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Factors Properly Considered and Sentence Affirmed:

District Court imposition of the death sentence was affirmed after finding: (1) defendant's race was not a factor in the verdict or sentencing; (2) there was no error in consideration of statements made by the victim's father (distinguishing Booth v. Md., 482 US 496, 96 L Ed 2d 440, 107 S Ct 2529 (1987)); (3) the sentence was not imposed under passion, prejudice, or any arbitrary factor; (4) the sentencing court properly considered aggravating and mitigating circumstances; (5) under the standard set out in Tison v. Ariz., 481 US 137, 95 L Ed 2d 127, 107 S

Ct 1676 (1987), and in Enmund v. Fla., 458 US 782, 73 L Ed 2d 1140, 102 S Ct. 3368 (1982), the death sentence did not constitute excessive or cruel and unusual punishment and was warranted for defendant who was a major participant in the deliberate homicide and who exhibited a reckless indifference for human life; and (6) considering the gravity of the offenses, the brutality with which they were carried out, and the existence of any factors meriting leniency, the death sentence was not disproportionate or excessive to others imposed in similar cases. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

The death penalty was affirmed after review showed: (1) there was no influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor in sentencing; (2) the trial court properly considered aggravating and mitigating circumstances; and (3) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate to the penalty imposed in similar cases, considering both the crime and the defendant. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Abduction Resulting in Death of Victim — Capital Punishment Not Disproportionate: The death penalty was not disproportionate or excessive in a case where defendant abducted a young boy at gunpoint, later replacing the boy with another hostage who was eventually killed. The circumstances were comparable to the four capital punishment cases previously considered in Montana, and although the circumstances were not identical, the crime was properly classified as both heinous and perverse and of sufficient magnitude to qualify for capital punishment. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Defendant's Right to Limit Appeal: Defendant clearly expressed his intent to pursue only those appellate issues which must be reviewed as a matter of law. The Supreme Court affirmed his right to do so after finding that defendant was adjudged competent to make such a choice, holding that his decision must be respected if it is made competently, voluntarily, intelligently, and with full knowledge of the consequences. St. v. Keith, 231 M 214, 754 P2d 474, 45 St. Rep. 556 (1988).

Capital Sentence Requested by Defendant — No Basis for Resentencing: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated kidnapping and two counts of deliberate homicide. Defendant requested the death penalty. After sentencing, defendant had second thoughts and on appeal sought a resentencing. The Supreme Court held there was no basis for resentencing because: (1) sentencing was not tainted by reliance on prior Canadian convictions obtained without counsel; (2) inclusion of juvenile offenses as adult offenses in presentence report was not error; (3) a court-ordered presentence interview was not violative of the fifth amendment; (4) recommendation for the death penalty in the presentence report was not improper; (5) no judicial error was committed in the extent of review of mitigating factors and no unconstitutional limit was placed on the court's consideration of mitigating circumstances; (6) no error was found in the court's denial of defendant's motion for additional psychiatric evaluation; (7) defendant was not required to be present at proceedings occurring after the verdict; (8) jury participation is not constitutionally required in capital sentencing procedures; (9) no indication was found that the trial court imposed the death penalty out of passion or prejudice; and (10) the sentence was not excessive or disproportionate. St. v. Smith, 217 M 461, 705 P2d 1087, 42 St. Rep. 463 (1985) (Smith I). A habeas corpus petition was conditionally granted in Smith v. McCormick, 917 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), a subsequent resentencing of death was reversed and remanded for preparation of a new presentence investigation, St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993) (Smith II), and following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Cases to Be Set Forth in Final Opinion: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of deliberate homicide and two counts of aggravated kidnapping. The District Court imposed the death sentence, and notice of appeal was filed. Prior to submission of briefs and prior to review, defendant petitioned the Supreme Court, asking what cases it would consider in its decision on his appeal. The Supreme Court held that this section requires only that the cases considered in deciding whether the death penalty is disproportionate be set forth in the final opinion. Beyond this statutory mandate, the court refused to create an affirmative duty to predisclose the cases that would be considered on appeal. St. v. Smith, 211 M 379, 41 St. Rep. 1434 (1984).

Knowledge of Sentencing Judge: Coleman petitioned for a Writ of Habeas Corpus as an original proceeding, asking the Supreme Court to vacate his death sentence and remand his cause for resentencing as to the aggravated kidnapping conviction by a District Court Judge other than the judge who had twice sentenced him to death. Coleman contends that during a plea bargaining session, at which the judge was present, his original counsel stated that he believed Coleman was guilty of deliberate homicide and sexual intercourse without consent, based on a sodium amytal examination Coleman underwent. At the same time, counsel stated he thought the State would have difficulty proving Coleman committed aggravated kidnapping. The Supreme Court found this was not equivalent to an admission of the aggravated kidnapping. The court said that guilt was determined by the jury. The death sentence was based on the finding of guilt on the aggravated kidnapping charge. There was no indication counsel's remarks influenced the judge. Coleman v. Risley, 203 M 237, 663 P2d 1154, 40 St. Rep. 418 (1983), followed in St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 1388 (1993) (Smith II). Following automatic appeal and review, the death sentence was affirmed in St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996) (Smith III).

Death Penalty — Facially Neutral — Discrimination to Be Shown: Petitioner challenged Montana's death penalty statutes as arbitrary and discriminatory. Montana has instituted sentencing procedures that focus on the character of the defendant and the circumstances of the crime. In doing this, arbitrariness is conclusively removed from sentencing. As regards discrimination, the disproportionate impact of a facially neutral law will not make the law unconstitutional unless discriminatory intent or purpose is found. Montana's law is facially neutral, and no allegation of discriminatory intent was raised. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Review Requirements — Consideration of Hearing Transcript and Other Sentences: Petitioner contended that he was denied meaningful appellate sentence review in that the court did not consider the transcript of the sentencing hearing or a compilation, which he submitted, of sentences imposed for crimes committed throughout the state. The transcript was before the court and considered. The court compared petitioner's sentence with those of other capital defendants, and that is all that was required. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Evidence of "Lying in Wait" and That "The Offense Was Aggravated Kidnapping Which Resulted in the Death of the Victim": The evidence in the record clearly proved that sufficient aggravating circumstances existed to warrant imposition of the death penalty in that the crime of deliberate homicide had been "committed by a person lying in wait or ambush" and the crime of aggravated kidnapping "resulted in the death of the victim". St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Sentence Not Excessive or Disproportionate — Aggravated Kidnapping: A sentence of death for aggravated kidnapping which resulted in the death of the victim when the defendant abducted the victim while making a night deposit and shot him twice in the head after driving him outside of town was not excessive or disproportionate to the penalty imposed in similar cases. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Sentence Not Excessive or Disproportionate — Deliberate Homicide: A sentence of death for deliberate homicide when the defendant abducted the victim and shot him twice in the head was not excessive or disproportionate to the penalty imposed in similar cases, especially in light of the existence of aggravating circumstances under 46-18-303. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Significant History of Prior Criminal Activity: The District Court's finding that no mitigating circumstances existed in favor of the defendant was upheld when the defendant had a long history of prior criminal activity and no other facts existed in mitigation of the penalty. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Arbitrary Factors Not Found: The defendant argued that the sentence imposed was a result of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors. He argued that the sentence given to his accomplice in this crime, when compared to his own, reflects the prejudice inherent in the sentencing. However, the defendant was also found guilty of aggravated kidnapping, a charge finally dropped against his accomplice. It was for this crime that the death penalty was imposed. The defendant, a black man, also argued that his race was a factor operating to his prejudice with respect to the imposition of the death penalty. The defendant speculated as to various possible factors evidencing such prejudice, but speculation was not sufficient to establish this claim. The court examined the sentence and determined it was not imposed as a result of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors or because of race. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Similar Cases — Vacated Sentences Considered: The Supreme Court, in fulfilling its duty to compare "similar cases" to assure that sentencing is not excessive or disproportionate to those other sentences, may include for comparison similar cases in which the sentence has been imposed by the District Court, even though the sentence has been vacated on appeal. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979).

Part 4
Factors That Reduce Sentence

Part Case Notes

Modification of Original Sentence as Dangerous Offender Not Allowed: At the time of Moorman's original sentencing in 1982, 46-18-404 (now repealed) did not allow a District Court in a revocation proceeding to add new terms or conditions to a defendant's original sentence. The court could not impose a dangerous offender designation upon revocation of a suspended sentence when the original sentence was silent on the issue or designated the defendant as nondangerous. However, Moorman was designated a dangerous offender when originally sentenced. Under the version of 46-18-203 in effect at the time of sentencing, the court could revoke the suspension or impose sentence and order Moorman committed but could not modify the sentence. Therefore, Moorman's original dangerous offender designation remained a part of his sentence upon the subsequent revocation of his suspended sentence. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

46-18-401. Consecutive sentences.

Commission Comments

Source: Model Sentencing Act, sections 19, 21 and 22, General Laws of Massachusetts Chapter 279, Section 27.

The merger is not mandatory, but is in the discretion of the judge, although the language suggests that in most instances the merger should occur. The result of this approach is a unified sentence rather than a multiplicity of sentences.

Subsection [(4)] is included in an attempt to avoid consecutive sentences where only a single criminal episode was involved.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 372 deleted (5) that read: "(5) Except as provided in this subsection, whenever a prisoner is sentenced for an offense committed while he was imprisoned in the state prison or while he was released on parole or under the supervised release program, the new sentence runs consecutively with the remainder of the original sentence. The prisoner starts serving the new sentence when the original sentence has expired or when he is released on parole under chapter 23, part 2, of this title in regard to the original sentence, whichever is sooner. In the latter case, the sentences run concurrently from the time of his release on parole"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

1989 Amendment: In (1)(a), after "remaining term", substituted "may not" for "shall" and after "other term" deleted "except as provided in subsection (5)"; in (1)(b) substituted "may not" for "shall"; in (2), near beginning, substituted "whether or not it merges" for "merging" and near end substituted "any sentence that is merged" for "the sentences being merged"; in (4) substituted "must run consecutively" for "shall run concurrently"; and made minor change in punctuation.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "supervised release program" for "prisoner furlough program" in the middle of (5).

Case Notes

Credit Properly Given for Time Served While Incarcerated Prior to Revocation: In 2001, Damon was sentenced on a felony conviction to the Department of Corrections (DOC) for 10 years with 5 years suspended with conditions and on a misdemeanor conviction to the county detention center for 6 months, with the sentences to run concurrently. Damon began serving the suspended portion of the sentence on June 8, 2005, and several weeks later, he was arrested and charged under a separate cause number with several offenses. Damon pleaded guilty to one count of felony obstruction of justice and received a 10-year suspended sentence with credit for the time served in the detention center following the arrest. In November 2005, Damon was arrested for violating probation conditions in the original case, and the state petitioned to revoke the 5-year suspended sentence in the original case. The District Court revoked the 5-year suspended sentence based on the probation violations and sentenced Damon to 5 years with the DOC with credit for 98 days served in the detention center following arrest for the probation violations, but the court refused to credit Damon for street time served during the probation period following June 8, 2005, or for the time served following the second arrest. Damon challenged the time credited, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had the District Court credited the 5-year revoked sentence with the time following the second arrest, Damon would have received double credit for those days. Nothing in 46-18-203(7)(b) entitles a defendant to additional credit against a revoked sentence for time served relating solely to a separate offense for which the defendant received a consecutive sentence credited with the same period of time served. Thus, the District Court did not err in crediting Damon's sentence with only a portion of the time served while incarcerated prior to the sentence revocation. St. v. Damon, 2007 MT 276, 339 M 413, 170 P3d 490 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Illegal Sentence Challenged During Revocation Proceeding — Court Limited to Lawful Elements of Original Sentence: Seals was convicted of three felony and two misdemeanor drug possessions and was committed to the Department of Corrections for 15 years, with 10 years suspended, to run concurrently. At the time of his arrest, the law in effect limited Seals' imprisonment to 5 years for each count. Upon recognition that the 15-year sentences were outside the parameters of the sentencing statute, the District Court amended Seals' sentence for one count to impose a legal sentence of 5 years, but again imposed sentences of 10 years each, all suspended, to run concurrently with each other and consecutive to the first count. After Seals served the 5 years for count one and was discharged to his suspended sentences, the state moved for revocation for probation violations and recommended that the court revoke Seals' suspended sentences and commit him to prison for 10 years, 5 suspended, for each count. Seals objected, arguing that the commitment and the consecutive nature of the sentences constituted an illegal increase of his original commitment to the Department of Corrections and was beyond the court's statutory sentencing authority. The state argued that this section gave the court discretion to run the sentences imposed upon revocation consecutively or concurrently. In response, the District Court revised the sentences from 10 years to 5 years but retained the consecutive nature of the sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that 46-18-203 and not this section governed sentencing upon revocation. Under 46-18-203, the District Court could have required that Seals serve either the originally imposed sentence or a lesser sentence. However, because the originally imposed sentence was illegal, the court ruled that ordering Seals to serve sentences consecutively rather than concurrently resulted in sentences that did not qualify as lesser sentences. St. v. Seals, 2007 MT 71, 336 M 416, 156 P3d 15 (2007).

Public Policy for Consecutive Sentencing Unless Otherwise Ordered by Court: Auld was on parole for a felony violation in Hawaii when he was convicted of criminal endangerment and witness tampering in Montana. The Montana court sentenced Auld to 6 months imprisonment for criminal endangerment and 10 years imprisonment for witness tampering, to run concurrently with each other but consecutively with any sentence imposed by the State of Hawaii. Auld appealed on grounds that the language of subsection (1) of this section does not allow a consecutive sentence to be imposed when the previous conviction originates from a court in another state. The Supreme Court disagreed that subsection (1) contains the decisive language relevant to this issue and instead cited subsection (4) of this section as a clear indication that Montana public policy is to have sentences, wherever imposed, run consecutively unless otherwise ordered by a court. St. v. Auld, 2006 MT 189, 333 M 125, 142 P3d 753 (2006).

Rejection of Credit for Elapsed Time Served While on Probation: While serving a suspended sentence for a crime in Montana, Miller was convicted of a crime in Indiana and served a 2-year sentence there. Upon release on parole in Indiana, Miller returned to Montana and subsequently violated the terms of the Montana suspension. The suspension was revoked, and Miller was ordered to serve the remainder of the sentence at the state prison. Miller argued that he was entitled to credit for the time served in Indiana against the Montana commitment, but the District Court declined to allow credit for the Indiana time served, and Miller appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Montana law does not provide that a defendant is to receive credit on a suspended commitment in Montana for time spent in prison in another state on a separate conviction. The District Court did not order that the Montana and Indiana convictions be merged, so the Montana commitment continued to run while Miller was in prison in Indiana. It was only when Miller violated the terms of the suspended sentence after returning to Montana that the suspension was revoked, and upon revocation, the District Court had the discretion to allow or reject part or all of the time that had elapsed as a credit against the commitment. St. v. Miller, 2006 MT 159, 332 M 472, 139 P3d 839 (2006).

Credit Allowed for Time Served Concurrently With Other Sentences: Tracy's original sentence in Cascade County was for 10 years suspended with the Department of Corrections, to run concurrently with two other sentences that Tracy received in Yellowstone County. When Tracy violated his release conditions, the District Court in Cascade County revoked the original 10-year sentence but declined to give Tracy credit for the time served in detention pursuant to the Yellowstone County sentences. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, when read together, 46-18-203 and this section require that Tracy be given credit for time spent in a detention center or on home arrest on all the sentences that were being served concurrently. The case was remanded to calculate and grant appropriate credit. St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Presumption of Punishment for Going to Trial Based on Difference Between Pretrial Offer and Actual Sentence — Remand: As set out in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981), when a District Court becomes involved in plea negotiations and an offer is made, any difference in the sentencing after trial must point out the factors justifying an increased sentence, and failure to enumerate the factors leads to the presumption that a greater sentence has been imposed for a vindictive purpose. Here, when the District Court failed to justify having an 11-year sentence run consecutively rather than concurrently with another sentence, the Baldwin standard requiring an explanation for imposing a harsher sentence than that offered in plea negotiations was not met, constituting reversible error. The case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Maximum Allowable Sentence Imposed for Each Conviction to Run Consecutively — Sentence Lawful: On rehearing, petitioner was sentenced to 40 years for robbery, life imprisonment for aggravated kidnapping, and life imprisonment for deliberate homicide, with the sentences to run consecutively. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the sentences fall within the applicable statutory parameters and that the court lawfully sentenced the petitioner. To the extent that the complaints relate to the equity of the sentence, those complaints are properly addressed to the Sentence Review Division of the court. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Multiple Negligent Homicides Arising Out of Same Act — Consecutive Sentences Allowed: Defendant was sentenced to two consecutive 10-year sentences for the deaths of two men in a drunken driving accident. Defendant appealed on double jeopardy grounds, claiming that the convictions arose out of a single act and that the District Court could only impose concurrent sentences. The Supreme Court held that because two people were killed in the accident, two distinct offenses of negligent homicide were committed. Montana law not only authorizes consecutive sentences for multiple offenses but presumptively requires them. St. v. Weigle, 285 M 341, 947 P2d 1053, 54 St. Rep. 1182 (1997).

Lack of Knowledge of Consecutive Sentence Not Proved — No Basis for Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: Allen pleaded guilty to one count of homicide during a prison riot. After being sentenced to a 25-year consecutive term, he moved to withdraw his plea on the basis that he did not know that the law required a consecutive term in his case. The Supreme Court held that the evidence indicated that he was aware of consequences of his plea. The Supreme Court advises District Courts to avoid this issue in the future by specifically referring to the consecutive sentence requirement in this section when interrogating a defendant with respect to entering a guilty plea. St. v. Allen, 265 M 293, 876 P2d 639, 51 St. Rep. 519 (1994).

Operation of Statute Clarified by Previous Supreme Court Opinion: McGuire was convicted on felony theft and burglary counts in Gallatin County and was sentenced in Gallatin County after being sentenced on other charges in Flathead County. The Gallatin County sentence contained no reference to the Flathead County sentence and did not expressly provide that it would run concurrently with the Flathead County sentence. The Supreme Court held that the Gallatin County District Court did not err in sentencing McGuire because any ambiguity in whether the two sentences were to run concurrently was clarified by the holding of the Supreme Court in St. v. McGuire, 260 M 386, 860 P2d 148, 50 St. Rep. 1122 (1993). In that case, the Supreme Court held that the Flathead County District Court had exceeded its authority by providing that McGuire's sentence was to run consecutively to one not yet imposed. The Supreme Court modified the sentence and judgment in that case by striking the portion providing for consecutive sentences. Therefore, when read together with the opinion in McGuire I, the effect of the Gallatin County District Court order in this case is that the sentence will run consecutively with the sentence imposed by the Flathead County District Court. St. v. McGuire, 260 M 389, 860 P2d 150, 50 St. Rep. 1132 (1993).

Order to Serve Probation After Sentence Discharged Unwarranted: Petitioner was sentenced to serve 15 years, with 10 years suspended, for selling drugs in Sheridan County. While on parole for the Sheridan County conviction, petitioner pleaded guilty to selling drugs in Gallatin County and received two concurrent 12-year sentences. When discharged from prison on the Gallatin County charges, petitioner was placed on 10 years probation for the 10-year suspended sentence in Sheridan County. The Supreme Court ordered that the petitioner be discharged from probation on the Sheridan County sentence, holding that the plain meaning of subsections (1)(b) and (5) of this section require that the "original" Sheridan County sentence be served before the "new" Gallatin County sentence begins to run. Since the Gallatin County sentence has been discharged and the suspended portion of the Sheridan County sentence was merged in the Gallatin County sentence, the state has no authority to require petitioner to serve the suspended portion of the Sheridan County sentence consecutively with the end of the Gallatin County sentence. Robbins v. McCormick, 258 M 429, 853 P2d 1205, 50 St. Rep. 599 (1993).

Parolee's Shooting of Plaintiff Not Foreseeable: The Department of Institutions miscalculated the prisoner's parole eligibility date and paroled him before he was eligible to be released. The plaintiff was shot by the parolee and sued the Department for negligence. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that the Department was not liable because it could not have reasonably foreseen that the parolee would shoot someone. Kiger v. St., 245 M 457, 802 P2d 1248, 47 St. Rep. 2206 (1990).

Former Statute — Suspended Sentence Merged With New Sentence: The defendant, while serving two suspended sentences, was convicted of a new offense. At the close of the trial for the new offense, the judge sentenced the defendant without mentioning the prior sentences. In a subsequent hearing, the judge stated that the sentences were to run consecutively. The Supreme Court held that under the former version of the statute, the sentences merged unless the court specified otherwise and that the lower court had to make that determination at the close of the trial, not at the subsequent hearing. St. v. Thiel, 242 M 77, 788 P2d 337, 47 St. Rep. 565 (1990).

Merger of Sentences Imposed by Different Courts: Defendant was sentenced once by the Eleventh District Court and twice by the Fourth District Court for felony convictions and, upon incarceration, was informed that sentences from all three causes would run consecutively. Absent any court order to the contrary, the sentences were merged in accordance with this section to run concurrently. In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988).

Instruction on Flight Proper When Based on Evidence: A jury instruction allowing consideration of testimony showing flight or concealment by the defendant as a circumstance tending to prove consciousness of guilt was proper in light of defendant's admission that he left the scene of the crime. St. v. Hurlbert, 232 M 115, 756 P2d 1110, 45 St. Rep. 923 (1988), citing St. v. Walker, 148 M 216, 419 P2d 300 (1966). Walker was followed in St. v. Patton, 280 M 278, 930 P2d 635, 53 St. Rep. 1402 (1996). Patton was followed in St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998), in which it was held that even in the limited environment of prison, a defendant may fly to wherever the defendant thinks is safe to dispose of evidence, but that only some departure from a crime scene is necessary to support giving an instruction on flight. Patton was also followed in St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999). See also St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929, 56 St. Rep. 1190 (1999), in which the Supreme Court reconsidered the probative value of the flight instruction and directed that the better policy in future cases when evidence of flight has been properly admitted is to reserve comment on the significance of flight to counsel, rather than to the court through jury instructions. However, in Hall's case, no prejudice attached because the instruction included the qualification that evidence of flight was not, by itself, sufficient evidence of guilt, but rather only one circumstance to be considered by the jury. Hall was followed in St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999).

Imposition of Consecutive Terms Within Court's Discretion: Defendant claimed that imposition of consecutive sentences in connection with a single episode of criminal behavior violated the intent of this section; however, on its face this statute clearly vests the District Court with discretion to impose consecutive terms regardless of whether the criminal acts arose out of a single occurrence of misconduct. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Modification of Sentence Not Authorized: This section limits the discretion of the sentencing judge to merger of sentence. In the absence of merger, there is no statutory authorization for modification of sentence. St. v. George, 224 M 495, 730 P2d 412, 43 St. Rep. 2363 (1986).

Good Time Earned While Serving One Sentence Not Applicable to Later Sentence: In 1970, petitioner was convicted of burglary and sentenced to 10 years in the Montana State Prison. He was released on parole in 1971. In 1976, he was returned to the Montana State Prison after being convicted on another burglary charge. Subsequently his parole was revoked. During the time petitioner was on parole, good time could be earned under 53-30-105 (now repealed) by a parolee. Under a 1981 amendment to that section, this is no longer possible. In 1982, petitioner filed a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, claiming that the good time he earned while on parole should be applied to reduce the discharge date of his second sentence, as the second sentence had been merged (under 46-23-217, prior to amendment) with the first sentence. The Supreme Court ruled that the sentences ran concurrently but were not merged and that therefore any good time petitioner earned while on parole on his first sentence may be applied only to the first sentence.

Bagley v. Risley, 207 M 121, 672 P2d 1126, 40 St. Rep. 1937 (1983). See also St. v. Pendergrass, 281 M 129, 932 P2d 1056, 54 St. Rep. 94 (1997), holding that an escape sentence did not merge with other sentences. Pendergrass was reversed in Chandler v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 294, 302 M 309, 18 P3d 312, 57 St. Rep. 1247 (2000).

Concurrent Sentence Unless Specified: Under the former version of this section, if the District Court did not specify whether a sentence was to run concurrently or consecutively, it ran concurrently with any prior commitment. Petition of Parrett, 154 M 257, 459 P2d 268 (1969).

Sequence of Consecutive Sentences: When the petitioner was sentenced to serve consecutive sentences for escape and using an automobile without the consent of the owner and the warden executed the sentences in a sequence reverse to that indicated by the court, there was no infringement on his rights and his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was denied. Petition of Cheadle, 143 M 327, 389 P2d 579 (1964).

Concurrent Felony and Misdemeanor Sentences: When the defendant is convicted of a felony under the first portion of a consolidated information and of a misdemeanor under the second portion, and the trial court decrees that the sentences can be served concurrently, the sentence for the felony should be served in the state prison, credit for the misdemeanor fine should be given at the same time, and any remaining time under the misdemeanor at the end of the state prison term should be served in the county jail. St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963).

Attorney General's Opinions

Consecutive Suspended or Deferred Sentences — Probationary Period: When a sentencing court imposes a suspended or deferred sentence on more than one count and orders the periods of suspension or deferral to run consecutively, for purposes of probation revocation, the probationary period for the first count is considered to run before the period on the second and successive counts. 42 A.G. Op. 116 (1988).

Petition to Revoke Suspension or Deferral — May Apply to More Than One Sentence: Conditions of release are a part of the judgment in a case, and there is no prohibition against revoking the uncompleted sentences in a single proceeding where the terms of the judgment have been violated. Thus, if suspended or deferred sentences are to be served consecutively and time remains on more than one period of suspension or deferral, then more than one suspension or deferral may be revoked in the same proceeding. 42 A.G. Op. 116 (1988).

Consecutive Sentences: A prisoner sentenced pursuant to 46-18-401(5) must serve that term consecutively with the remainder of his original term. If the prisoner has not been designated a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404), he is ineligible for parole until he has served at least one-half of his new sentence in addition to any minimum time he must serve with respect to his original sentence. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Inconsistent Statutes: When two statutes are wholly inconsistent, incompatible, and incapable of being reconciled, the later statute impliedly repeals the earlier one if it does not expressly do so. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Prisoner Receives New Sentence: If a prisoner who has received a new consecutive sentence under 46-18-401(5) is paroled, the remaining time of his new and original sentences thereafter run concurrently. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Section 46-23-217 Impliedly Repealed: Section 46-23-217 was impliedly repealed by the enactment of 46-18-401(5). A sentence imposed regarding a crime committed after July 1, 1977, by a prisoner at the state prison or on parole or supervised release runs consecutively with the remainder of the prisoner's original sentence. Any crime committed on or before July 1, 1977, by a prisoner while on parole or conditional release runs concurrently with the prisoner's original sentence unless otherwise specified by the sentencing court. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

In a recent Montana decision, State ex rel[.] Nelson v. Ellsworth, 141 Mont. 78, 375 P.2d 316 (1962) in interpreting R.C.M. 1947 Section 94-4717, a statute dealing with the time when a sentence commences, the Montana Supreme Court held it could give no credit for the time served on a prior reversed conviction because the sentence must commence when the person is delivered to the penitentiary and could not have begun prior to that time. The court suggested that any possible injustice was a legislative problem. The intent of this section is to rectify this injustice. In absence of a statute, such as the above section, the position the Montana Court has taken will preclude it from giving credit.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 372 in version effective January 31, 1997, deleted second sentence that read: "In calculating the time imprisoned, the person so convicted shall have the credit for all the time earned in diminution of sentence as provided under 53-30-105, unless the sentencing authority, in its discretion, may choose to deny such credit"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 31, 1997.

Case Notes

Rejection of Credit for Elapsed Time Served While on Probation: While serving a suspended sentence for a crime in Montana, Miller was convicted of a crime in Indiana and served a 2-year sentence there. Upon release on parole in Indiana, Miller returned to Montana and subsequently violated the terms of the Montana suspension. The suspension was revoked, and Miller was ordered to serve the remainder of the sentence at the state prison. Miller argued that he was entitled to credit for the time served in Indiana against the Montana commitment, but the District Court declined to allow credit for the Indiana time served, and Miller appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Montana law does not provide that a defendant is to receive credit on a suspended commitment in Montana for time spent in prison in another state on a separate conviction. The District Court did not order that the Montana and Indiana convictions be merged, so the Montana commitment continued to run while Miller was in prison in Indiana. It was only when Miller violated the terms of the suspended sentence after returning to Montana that the suspension was revoked, and upon revocation, the District Court had the discretion to allow or reject part or all of the time that had elapsed as a credit against the commitment. St. v. Miller, 2006 MT 159, 332 M 472, 139 P3d 839 (2006).

Probationer Not Entitled to Good Time Credit for Time Served on Original Sentence: Williams' suspended sentence for felony assault was revoked after Williams violated the terms of the suspension. Williams requested that he be credited for good time that he served on the suspended sentence. The District Court concluded that Williams was a probationer, not a parolee, and declined to grant good time credit. Williams appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Williams' original sentence did not provide that Williams be treated as a parolee, so as a probationer, Williams was not entitled to credit for good time under McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001). St. v. Williams, 2003 MT 136, 316 M 140, 69 P3d 222 (2003).

No Credit Allowed for Time Served While on Probation: Gundrum was placed on probation but was later arrested on a probation violation. Gundrum contended that he should receive credit for the time that he was on probation under this section, even though he was not incarcerated. The Supreme Court disagreed. This section applies to credit for time served while incarcerated and thus does not apply to Gundrum. Further, under 46-18-203 and McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001), a judge has complete discretion to consider elapsed time that an offender is on probation and may expressly allow or reject the time as credit on the offender's sentence. Here, the District Court considered the nature of Gundrum's violations and the magnitude of his financial obligations before denying credit for time served on probation. Gundrum did not assert that the District Court failed to follow the mandates of 46-18-203, and the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of credit for time that Gundrum served on probation. Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001).

Effect on Eligibility for Parole: Section 46-18-402 allows the sentencing authority to deny credit for good time earned while serving a prior modified or invalid sentence but does not authorize the sentencing authority to provide that credit for time previously served should not be considered in determining eligibility for parole. St. v. Zachmeier, 153 M 64, 453 P2d 783 (1969).

Applicability: When habeas corpus was granted to a petitioner who had served a considerable portion of his sentence and whose commitment was set aside and the petitioner was permitted to withdraw his guilty plea, the court held that 46-18-402 should be observed upon any subsequent imposition of a new sentence. Morsette v. Ellsworth, 151 M 319, 443 P2d 28 (1968).

Case Notes

Defendant Entitled to Credit for Jail Time: When incarceration was directly related to the offense for which the defendant is being sentenced, credit for time served must be given. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 375, 346 M 491, 197 P3d 956 (2008).

Credit Properly Given for Time Served While Incarcerated Prior to Revocation: In 2001, Damon was sentenced on a felony conviction to the Department of Corrections (DOC) for 10 years with 5 years suspended with conditions and on a misdemeanor conviction to the county detention center for 6 months, with the sentences to run concurrently. Damon began serving the suspended portion of the sentence on June 8, 2005, and several weeks later, he was arrested and charged under a separate cause number with several offenses. Damon pleaded guilty to one count of felony obstruction of justice and received a 10-year suspended sentence with credit for the time served in the detention center following the arrest. In November 2005, Damon was arrested for violating probation conditions in the original case, and the state petitioned to revoke the 5-year suspended sentence in the original case. The District Court revoked the 5-year suspended sentence based on the probation violations and sentenced Damon to 5 years with the DOC with credit for 98 days served in the detention center following arrest for the probation violations, but the court refused to credit Damon for street time served during the probation period following June 8, 2005, or for the time served following the second arrest. Damon challenged the time credited, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had the District Court credited the 5-year revoked sentence with the time following the second arrest, Damon would have received double credit for those days. Nothing in 46-18-203(7)(b) entitles a defendant to additional credit against a revoked sentence for time served relating solely to a separate offense for which the defendant received a consecutive sentence credited with the same period of time served. Thus, the District Court did not err in crediting Damon's sentence with only a portion of the time served while incarcerated prior to the sentence revocation. St. v. Damon, 2007 MT 276, 339 M 413, 170 P3d 490 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Tracy, 2005 MT 128, 327 M 220, 113 P3d 297 (2005).

Suspension of Sentence Following Probation Violation Not Violative of Double Jeopardy — Credit for Time Served Properly Allowed: DeWitt was convicted of two counts of aggravated burglary, found to be a persistent felony offender, and sentenced to three consecutive 10-year sentences. DeWitt appealed, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to dismiss one count. While awaiting resentencing, DeWitt was incarcerated for 1,275 days. The District Court then resentenced DeWitt to one 10-year sentence for aggravated burglary and a consecutive 10-year sentence as a persistent felony offender, suspended all but 1,275 days of the 20-year sentence, and gave DeWitt credit for 1,275 days served. Without prison time to serve, DeWitt was immediately released on probation. DeWitt subsequently violated probation, the suspended sentence was revoked, and DeWitt was sentenced to 10 years with 5 years suspended, with credit for 160 days served while awaiting revocation proceedings. DeWitt appealed on grounds that the sentencing court failed to allow credit for the 1,275 days served when the suspended sentence was revoked and the new 10-year sentence was imposed and asserted that his double jeopardy rights were violated by reinstatement of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. When the sentencing court sentenced DeWitt following the probation violation, the court had a 16.5-year suspended sentence to work with, which was more than sufficient to account for the 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended that was imposed. Although a sentencing court must give credit for time served, revocation of a suspended sentence based on a probation violation and reinstatement of the original sentence does not constitute double jeopardy as long as the sentence is within the parameters of the sentence imposed in the initial suspended sentence and credit is allowed for time served. Further, a persistent felony offender designation is not a separate crime carrying a separate sentence, but rather is a statutorily required sentence enhancement that is part of the initial sentence, so the sentencing court could not have "dropped" the persistent felony offender count and sentenced DeWitt only under the aggravated burglary count, thereby limiting the available time on resentencing to 6.5 years. The sentence was not violative of double jeopardy, was within statutory parameters, and was affirmed. St. v. DeWitt, 2006 MT 302, 334 M 474, 149 P3d 549 (2006).

Criminal Fines Distinct From Other Court-Imposed Compensatory Financial Obligations — Fisher Overruled: The plain meaning of "fine" in this section does not encompass fees, costs, charges, or other court-imposed financial obligations. Criminal fines are punitive in nature and are distinct from other court-imposed financial obligations associated with a criminal proceeding that are compensatory in nature, such as an assessment of fees for probationary supervision or a charge to defray a local government's costs in administering the criminal justice system. Voerding v. St., 2006 MT 125, 332 M 262, 136 P3d 502 (2006), overruling St. v. Fisher, 2003 MT 33, 314 M 222, 65 P3d 223 (2003), to the extent that Fisher suggests that the term "fine" in subsection (2) of this section encompasses other types of court-imposed financial obligations, such as fees, charges, and costs. See also St. v. VanWinkle, 2008 MT 208, 344 M 175, 186 P3d 1258 (2008).

Failure to Give Defendant Credit for Pretrial Incarceration Time Served — Remand: In the sentencing court's oral sentence, Hoots was assessed fines on three separate counts, but in the written judgment, the sums were not set out as to each count, nor was Hoots given monetary credit against the fines for pretrial time served in incarceration. The Supreme Court remanded for resentencing to conform the written judgment to the oral sentence and to give Hoots credit for pretrial time served. St. v. Hoots, 2005 MT 346, 330 M 144, 127 P3d 369 (2005).

Remand to Determine Credit for Prejudgment Time Served — Failure to Object Not Fatal to Appeal: The District Court gave Erickson credit for time served on charges for two separate crimes. Erickson did not object to the credit at sentencing, but instead contested the credit on appeal. Following St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004), the Supreme Court applied the exception to the rule that failure to timely object to a sentence risks waiver of a sentencing issue on appeal because giving Erickson less credit than he was entitled to would violate statutory mandates. A defendant's sentence may be credited with incarceration time only if the incarceration was directly related to the offense for which the sentence was imposed. The record on appeal was unclear regarding whether Erickson's bond was revoked on one of the charges and whether Erickson received proper presentence credit, so the case was remanded to determine whether Erickson was given proper credit for time served for each offense. St. v. Erickson, 2005 MT 276, 329 M 192, 124 P3d 119 (2005), following St. v. Kime, 2002 MT 38, 308 M 341, 43 P3d 290 (2002), and followed in St. v. Henderson, 2008 MT 230, 344 M 371, 188 P3d 1011 (2008). Henderson was followed in St. v. Allison, 2008 MT 305, 346 M 6, 192 P3d 1135 (2008). On remand, the District Court determined that Erickson's bond was not formally revoked on the first charge and properly credited Erickson with 267 days served on the first charge and for 457 days served from arrest to the sentencing hearing on the second charge. St. v. Erickson, 2008 MT 50, 341 M 426, 177 P3d 1043 (2008).

Failure to Credit Defendant Against Fine for Time Incarcerated Prior to Conviction — Fine Vacated: Following Wiedrich's conviction for DUI, the District Court assessed a $1,000 fine but failed to give Wiedrich credit for the time that he was incarcerated prior to conviction. Because the credit far exceeded the amount of the fine, the Supreme Court vacated the fine. St. v. Wiedrich, 2005 MT 127, 327 M 214, 112 P3d 1054 (2005).

No Credit for Time Served on Informal House Arrest: The District Court conditioned Gulbranson's release on bond with informal house arrest. Gulbranson contended that the house arrest restricted his liberty in a manner sufficiently similar to incarceration, as provided in this section, to require that he be given credit for time served. However, Gulbranson did not cite any legal authority to support the contention, and the Supreme Court declined to consider the unsupported argument. Instead, the Supreme Court held that the informal house arrest in this case was not house arrest as provided for in Title 46, ch. 18, part 10, so 46-18-203 did not require that Gulbranson's sentences be credited with time served for that period. Gulbranson failed to show that the District Court was statutorily required to credit him for time served while released on bond, so it was within the District Court's discretion whether to allow credit. Absent an abuse of discretion, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gulbranson, 2003 MT 139, 316 M 163, 69 P3d 1187 (2003), followed in St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 112, 342 M 461, 182 P3d 62 (2008), and St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009).

No Discretion in Giving Defendant Credit for Time Served and Fine Paid: Fisher was sentenced to 13 months plus 5 years of probation and fined $1,000 and $570 in costs for felony DUI. Fisher moved to amend, requesting $47 a day credit for 31 days of pretrial commitment, with the remaining 6 days applied to the sentence. The motion was denied, and Fisher appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. A sentencing court has no discretion in applying this section. The court must employ both subsections and give a defendant credit for each day of incarceration against both the sentence and any fine imposed. (In 2005, an amendment made the credit against a fine discretionary.) Once a valid sentence is pronounced, the court has no discretion to modify the sentence except to correct factual errors. Rather, an illegal sentence must be addressed in the manner provided by law for appeal and postconviction relief. St. v. Fisher, 2003 MT 33, 314 M 222, 65 P3d 223 (2003), following Billings v. Layzell, 242 M 145, 789 P2d 221 (1990), followed in St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004), and overruled in Voerding v. St., 2006 MT 125, 332 M 262, 136 P3d 502 (2006), to the extent that Fisher suggests that the term "fine" in subsection (2) of this section encompasses other types of court-imposed financial obligations, such as fees, charges, and costs.

Multiple Sentences Imposed Consecutively — Defendant Entitled to Credit for Presentence Incarceration Only Once Against Aggregate of All Terms Imposed: Price was convicted of fourth offense DUI and four misdemeanors in connection with a motor vehicle accident. The District Court sentenced Price to jail time for three charges. For the misdemeanors, Price was sentenced to 2 days in jail for driving with a revoked license and to 10 days for failure to provide proof of insurance. For the DUI conviction, Price was sentenced to 12 months with the Department of Corrections. The sentences were to run consecutively. To account for the time spent in jail awaiting trial, the court credited Price with 18 days served, first applying 12 days' credit to the misdemeanors and then applying the remaining 6 days' credit to the DUI sentence. Price appealed on grounds that the court was required to grant full credit for time served on each sentence imposed. The Supreme Court concluded that Price's interpretation was not warranted by the plain language of this section and would result in a fundamental unfairness in the administration of criminal sentencing among similarly situated defendants and would defeat the Legislature's purpose for permitting consecutive sentences. This section entitles defendants to credit for presentence incarceration only once against the aggregate of all terms imposed when multiple sentences are imposed consecutively. Price was entitled to receive credit for each day of incarceration, and the District Court properly awarded Price credit for each day served. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 150, 310 M 320, 50 P3d 530 (2002). See also St. v. Boettcher, 423 NW 2d 533 (Wis. 1988).

Concurrent Incarceration for Separate Offense — Defendant's Sentence Credited With Time Served in Incarceration Only if Incarceration Directly Related to Offense for Which Sentence Imposed: When arrested for felony theft, DUI, and driving with a suspended license, Kime was already in supervised release for a prior felony assault conviction. Bail was set at $25,000, but Kime did not post bail, remaining incarcerated. Shortly thereafter, Kime was removed from the supervised release program and transferred to the state prison to serve the remainder of the felony assault sentence. Kime ultimately pleaded guilty to the felony theft, DUI, and driving with a suspended license charges. At sentencing, Kime asked the District Court to credit his sentence with the time that he was incarcerated between the date of the arrest and the date of sentencing. However, the court credited the sentence only with the 20 days served between Kime's arrest and transfer to prison. Kime appealed, arguing that because the three new offenses were bailable offenses and the District Court imposed a sentence of imprisonment, the sentence should have been credited with the entire time of incarceration pursuant to this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. The general purpose of this section is to eliminate the disparity of treatment between indigent and nonindigent defendants, and that purpose is not served by crediting a defendant's sentence for time served when the defendant would not have been released on bail in any event as a result of being held on a sentence related to an earlier offense. Therefore, a defendant's sentence may be credited with time served in incarceration only if that incarceration was directly related to the offense for which the sentence was imposed. St. v. Kime, 2002 MT 38, 308 M 341, 43 P3d 290 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001), and followed in St. v. Henderson, 2008 MT 230, 344 M 371, 188 P3d 1011 (2008). Henderson was followed in St. v. Allison, 2008 MT 305, 346 M 6, 192 P3d 1135 (2008).

Failure to Credit Inmate With Time Served Before Sentencing in Written Judgment After Allowing Credit in Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: At the sentencing hearing, Horton inquired as to whether he would get credit for time served between arrest and sentencing. The judge responded that credit would be granted automatically. However, in the written judgment entered 2 days later, the judge denied credit for time served because Horton was being held on a probation violation. Under this section, Horton was entitled to credit for each day of incarceration prior to or after sentencing, and pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the court's oral pronouncement controlled over the written judgment. Thus, the Supreme Court directed that the provision in the written judgment denying Horton credit for time served be stricken. St. v. Horton, 2001 MT 100, 305 M 242, 25 P3d 886 (2001).

Credit Not Due for Nonbailable Offense for Which Life Without Parole Is Sentence: In view of appellant's four consecutive life terms, plus 40 years for use of a weapon, without eligibility for parole, credit for time served before trial is immaterial. Because death was a possible punishment for appellant and a person is not entitled to bail when death is a possible punishment and because a person is entitled to credit for time served before trial only on a bailable offense, appellant was not entitled to credit. St. v. Race, 285 M 177, 946 P2d 641, 54 St. Rep. 1099 (1997).

Credit for Pretrial Detention: The defendant was held in jail for 30 days prior to his trial for two traffic violations. The lower court refused to give him credit for the time served toward payment of the fine. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the language of the statute in effect at the time was mandatory in requiring credit for time served. Billings v. Layzell, 242 M 145, 789 P2d 221, 47 St. Rep. 558 (1990).

Prior Incarceration in Other States: This statute has application only to Montana offenses and sentences and has no application to time served in prisons or jails of other states. Petition of Woods, 166 M 537, 535 P2d 173 (1975).

Credit on Deferred Imposition of Sentence:

When the defendant was held in the county jail for 31 days in lieu of bail prior to trial and was sentenced to a term of probation, and less than 31 days before the expiration of his 3-year term of probation a petition for revocation of probation was filed and the defendant was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, the defendant's contention that he was entitled to a credit of 31 days preconviction jail time on the probationary order and that the Montana state court had lost jurisdiction was without merit since probation is not "a judgment of imprisonment" and preconviction jail time credit is of legislative grace and not a constitutional guarantee. Gray v. Warden of Mont. St. Prison, 523 F2d 989 (9th Cir. 1975).

A period of confinement in the county jail was not credited to the period of deferred imposition of sentence since a deferred imposition of sentence is not a judgment of imprisonment. Petition of Gray, 163 M 321, 517 P2d 351 (1973).

Revocation of Deferral — Credit for Time Served: Prison time previously served as a condition of deferment of sentence must be credited against the prison term imposed upon revocation of the petitioner's deferred imposition of sentence. State ex rel. Bovee v. District Court, 162 M 98, 508 P2d 1056 (1973).

Retroactive Application: This section did not apply to a prisoner who was sentenced after the effective date of this section for a crime committed prior to such effective date. Petition of Wilson, 154 M 508, 463 P2d 469 (1970).

Part 5
Persistent Felony Offenders

Part Case Notes

Youth Tried, Convicted, and Sentenced Under Transfer Statute Correctly Sentenced as Persistent Felony Offender: In 1999, when Mainwaring was a juvenile, he pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and was convicted pursuant to 41-5-206 and sentenced pursuant to 41-5-2503(1)(a). A part of that sentence was later suspended under 41-5-2510. Later, shortly after turning 21, Mainwaring assaulted a child. The state brought assault charges against Mainwaring and then sought to have the court designate Mainwaring as a persistent felony offender (PFO). The District Court approved the designation as a PFO, based on Mainwaring's 1999 felony conviction, and Mainwaring was convicted and sentenced to 20 years in prison. The Supreme Court held that a conviction under 41-5-206(6) was equivalent to any adult felony conviction and that there is nothing in the Montana Youth Court Act or the Criminally Convicted Youth Act that precludes the application of the PFO statutes and designation to an individual previously convicted of a felony when the individual was a youth. Citing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore had the authority to apply the PFO statutes and designation to Mainwaring. The Supreme Court also overruled Mainwaring's due process objections and affirmed his conviction. St. v. Mainwaring, 2007 MT 14, 335 M 322, 151 P3d 53 (2007).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protection: As set out in St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978), the persistent felony offender statute authorizing enhanced sentences for recidivists does not constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989).

Due Process and Equal Protection: Section 46-18-502 does not violate the equal protection and due process guarantees although only a minority of repeat felony offenders are prosecuted under it. St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978).

Ex Post Facto Laws: The persistent felony offender statute, as applied to the defendant, did not violate constitutional safeguards dealing with ex post facto laws because the law did not punish him for conduct prior to enactment of 46-18-502 but merely notified the defendant he was subject to increased punishment if he in the future committed an additional felony crime. St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978).

Restoration of Rights: Rather than involving any civil or political "right", increasing the sentence of a persistent felony offender is entirely consistent with the constitutional mandate that "Laws for the punishment of crime shall be founded on the principles of prevention and reformation." St. v. Maldonado, 176 M 322, 578 P2d 296 (1978).

Harmless Admission: When a defendant's prior conviction of a felony was not charged during the trial but was admitted by the defendant in his testimony, such admission was not prejudicial since the sentence he finally received was less than he would have received under the former second offense statute. Petition of Gallagher, 153 M 440, 456 P2d 306 (1969).

46-18-501. Definition of persistent felony offender.

Case Notes

Alternative Sentence for Drug Offense Not Precluded by Persistent Felony Offender Statutes, but Incarceration Not Error: Brendal pleaded guilty to fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs and was sentenced to 25 years in prison with 15 years suspended. Based on prior convictions for the same offense, the sentencing court designated Brendal as a persistent felony offender and imposed a mandatory 10-year prison sentence. Brendal appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court should have considered a sentence to a drug treatment program pursuant to the alternative sentencing authority in 45-9-202. However, the Supreme Court affirmed. The persistent felony offender statutes do not preclude a District Court from providing an alternative sentence under 45-9-202 for a person convicted of a drug-related offense, as long as the required criteria for imposing an alternative sentence are satisfied. Therefore, although the District Court could have provided an alternative sentence, it was not error to sentence Brendal to incarceration. St. v. Brendal, 2009 MT 236, 351 M 395, 213 P3d 448 (2009).

Assignment of Persistent Felony Offender Status for Commission of Second Felony Before Conviction of First Felony Consistent With Definition: The language in this section clearly defines a persistent felony offender as a person who has previously been convicted of a felony and who is presently being sentenced for a second felony committed on a different occasion than the first. Under this language, the persistent felony offender statute can be used to enhance a sentence when the second felony was committed before conviction of the first felony. St. v. Anderson, 2009 MT 39, 349 M 245, 203 P3d 764 (2009), affirming St. v. Williamson, 218 M 242, 707 P2d 530 (1985), and St. v. Hamm, 250 M 123, 818 P2d 830 (1991).

Consideration of Sentencing Factors in Sentencing Persistent Felony Offender Not Violative of Right to Trial by Jury: Following conviction for an eighth DUI, Vaughn was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to a 50-year term in the state prison. Relying on the proposition in Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004), that factual findings that serve to enhance a sentence beyond the statutory maximum must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt, Vaughn appealed the felony sentence, asserting that the 50-year sentence imposed under 46-18-502 served to enhance the sentence beyond the maximum 13-month commitment to the Department of Corrections followed by a suspended sentence of up to 5 years authorized for felony DUI in 61-8-731 and that therefore the persistent felony offender sentence should have been determined by a jury on the facts. The Supreme Court first noted that the Blakely proposition applies to a fact other than the fact of a prior conviction and that it is the fact of a defendant's prior felony conviction that authorizes an enhanced sentence under 46-18-502 and this section. Here, Vaughn's enhanced felony DUI sentence was based on the sentencing court's finding that Vaughn had a prior felony DUI conviction. That factual determination may properly be made by the sentencing court rather than by a jury. The prior DUI was a sentencing factor that was an aggravating or mitigating circumstance supporting the imposition of a sentence within the range authorized for a persistent felony offender. Thus, Vaughn's right to a trial by jury was not violated by the sentencing court's findings of fact in support of a sentence as a persistent felony offender. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007). See also Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000).

Constitutionality of Persistent Felony Offender Statutes: Shults contended that the persistent felony offender (PFO) statutes were unconstitutional on their face in violation of double jeopardy, equal protection, and cruel and unusual punishment or as they applied to Shults's case. The Supreme Court disagreed. First, the PFO statutes do not constitute double jeopardy because a sentence as a habitual criminal is not viewed as a new jeopardy (see Gryger v. Burke, 334 US 728 (1948)). Second, Shults was not able to show that the PFO statutes classify two or more similarly situated groups in an unequal manner and thus failed to meet the first threshold of a meritorious equal protection claim. Last, a sentence that is within maximum statutory guidelines and that is not so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community is not considered cruel and unusual punishment. Shults's sentence was within statutory parameters, and in light of Shults's 18-year criminal history and repeated failure to conform his behavior to societal norms despite having numerous opportunities to do so, the sentence could not be seen as so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community and thus was not considered cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Failure to Raise Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Consideration Barred: Osborne was convicted of a fourth DUI in 1999, and when charged with felony DUI in 2003, the state sought to have Osborne declared a persistent felony offender. The District Court obliged, and Osborne was declared a persistent felony offender and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 5 years suspended. Osborne did not appeal the sentence directly, but filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that the sentence was not legal. The petition was denied, and Osborne appealed. The state argued that the Supreme Court was procedurally barred under 46-21-105 from considering the petition because the legal challenge to the sentence could have been raised on direct appeal. Osborne asserted that because the state did not raise the procedural bar issue in District Court, that argument was waived. Although the Supreme Court as a rule does not consider issues raised for the first time on appeal, this general rule does not preclude consideration of jurisdictional questions raised for the first time on appeal. The procedural bar is jurisdictional, so the court considered the state's argument, concluding that lack of subject matter jurisdiction may not be waived and that 46-21-105 represents a jurisdictional limit on courts' ability to entertain and decide petitions for postconviction relief and effectively prohibits courts from exercising jurisdiction over grounds for relief that could have been raised on direct appeal. Thus, Osborne's failure to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal precluded consideration in a postconviction petition. St. v. Osborne, 2005 MT 264, 329 M 95, 124 P3d 1085 (2005).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protections: Wardell was convicted of felony sexual contact with a child in South Dakota and later was charged with numerous sexual crimes in Montana, including failure to register as a sex offender. The District Court sentenced Wardell to 5 years on the failure to register count and designated Wardell as a persistent felony offender, ultimately adding an additional 20-year consecutive sentence. Wardell appealed on grounds that the conviction for failure to register and the sentence for persistent felony offender constituted double jeopardy because each relied on the same underlying conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. A sentence as a habitual criminal is not to be viewed as a new jeopardy. The sentence enhancement was related to the second crime—failure to register—and thus did not constitute double jeopardy. Under this section, the dual use of the prior South Dakota conviction for designating Wardell as a persistent felon was authorized. Further, it is not a crime to be a persistent felony offender, and being designated a persistent felony offender cannot constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005).

Use of Persistent Felony Offender Statute to Increase Sentence Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Wardell was originally sentenced as a persistent felony offender to 45 years in prison with 30 years suspended. Wardell filed a petition for postconviction relief, and that sentence was vacated. Upon resentencing, Wardell's sentence was increased to 20 years suspended plus 5 years for failure to register as a sex offender. Wardell argued on appeal that the sentence constituted cruel and unusual punishment because it was excessive when compared to other sentences for failure to register. The Supreme Court noted that Wardell's sentence was within statutory maximum guidelines and was not so disproportionate to the crime as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community or of justice. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

District Court Jurisdiction to Apply Persistent Felony Offender Designation to Felony DUI: Yorek pleaded guilty to and was sentenced on a felony DUI charge. The District Court determined that it had jurisdiction and imposed a persistent felony offender designation. Yorek sought postconviction relief on grounds that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to impose a persistent felony offender designation for felony DUI. The District Court denied the petition for postconviction relief, concluding that sentencing for felony DUI is not solely governed by 61-8-731 and 61-8-734, that nothing in the persistent felony offender statute excludes felony DUI offenders from its application, and that Yorek waived any jurisdiction claim by pleading guilty. The Supreme Court affirmed. Nothing in 46-18-502 distinguishes between or among the types of felonies to which it applies, or excludes DUI offenders. Rather, if the underlying charge meets the definition of a felony and if the state has provided proper notice of its intent to seek persistent felony offender status under 46-13-108, a District Court has the statutory authority to designate and sentence an offender as a persistent felony offender. Yorek's crime met the definition of a felony, and Yorek fell squarely within the persistent felony offender statute. The state met the notice provisions, and the District Court possessed subject matter jurisdiction to designate Yorek as a persistent felony offender. Because the jurisdiction question was dispositive, the Supreme Court did not reach the question of whether Yorek's guilty plea was a procedural bar against bringing the claim. St. v. Yorek, 2002 MT 74, 309 M 238, 45 P3d 872 (2002), followed in St. v. Pettijohn, 2002 MT 75, 309 M 244, 45 P3d 870 (2002), and St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005).

Release From Commitment Triggering Commencement of Statutory Persistent Felony Offender Period: Montoya's initial suspended sentence for a 1984 felony burglary conviction was revoked, and he was resentenced to prison for 5 years in 1994, with 2 years of the sentence suspended with conditions. Montoya was then released from commitment in 1996. Under this section, the 5-year period began to run in 1996, and a subsequent 1998 felony conviction was well within the time limit of the statute, so the sentencing court did not err in designating Montoya a persistent felony offender. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), following St. v. Graves, 241 M 533, 788 P2d 311, 47 St. Rep. 483 (1990), clarifying St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988), and followed in St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999).

Unconstitutionality of Prior Conviction Not Proved: LaPier's attorney asked LaPier's parole officer, Riley, if anything in Riley's investigative report indicated that in a police court trial, LaPier had waived his right to a jury trial. Riley indicated that nothing in his report showed a waiver. LaPier argued on appeal that he could not be found a persistent felony offender because the police court conviction was constitutionally infirm. The Supreme Court upheld LaPier's conviction, stating that there is a presumption of the regularity of court proceedings and LaPier had offered no direct evidence that he had been denied his right to a jury trial. St. v. LaPier, 1998 MT 174, 289 M 392, 961 P2d 1274, 55 St. Rep. 707 (1998). See also St. v. Perry, 283 M 34, 938 P2d 1325 (1997).

Notice of Intent to Seek Increased Punishment Not Filed With Court Until After Trial — No Error in Persistent Felony Offender Designation: The state timely served defense counsel with notice of its intent to seek increased punishment for McQuiston as a persistent felony offender but did not file the notice with the court until after trial was concluded, 5 months before sentencing. McQuiston contended that timely filing of the notice was a jurisdictional prerequisite and that failure to so do constituted reversible error. However, the state's notice to defense counsel 5 months before trial and to the court 5 months before sentencing did not prejudice McQuiston, and the persistent felony offender designation was not made in error. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Definitional Requirements of Persistent Felony Offender Met — Enhanced Sentence Proper: Sentence enhancement was proper upon a showing that defendant was: (1) previously convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide on February 19, 1980; (2) paroled on that offense on October 9, 1985; and (3) convicted of two counts of burglary, one count of theft, and one count of attempt on March 29, 1989. The definitional requirements of this section having been met, an additional 10-year consecutive sentence was proper. St. v. Graves, 241 M 533, 788 P2d 311, 47 St. Rep. 483 (1990), followed in St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999).

Proof of Constitutionality of Prior Conviction Not Required: While a constitutionally infirm conviction cannot be used to support a determination of persistent felony offender (see St. v. Lewis, supra), the state is not required to prove that a prior conviction offered for purposes of the persistent felony offender determination is constitutionally valid. St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989). See also St. v. Okland, 283 M 10, 941 P2d 431, 54 St. Rep. 467 (1997), and St. v. Ailport, 1998 MT 315, 292 M 172, 970 P2d 1044, 55 St. Rep. 1292 (1998).

Probation Not "Commitment" — Enhanced Sentence Reversed: The trial court relied on subsection (2)(b) of this section in enhancing defendant's sentence because the present offense occurred less than 5 years after defendant's probation from a prior suspended sentence. The state contended that probation constituted commitment for purposes of designating defendant a persistent felony offender. The Supreme Court disagreed and voided the enhanced sentence, finding that the plain meaning of "commitment" reveals that the period of commitment begins when a defendant is handed over to law enforcement personnel for confinement and ends when the defendant is released from custody. The statutory 5-year period starts when an offender is once again free to victimize society, not at the end of a period of probation. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988), clarified in St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999).

Defendant Persistent Felony Offender: Defendant claimed that his prior felony conviction was invalid because the offense was committed on the Flathead Reservation, and that he was convicted in the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District, which lacked jurisdiction. The court observed that this is not the forum for determining whether the court that issued his prior conviction had jurisdiction. Defendant had a prior felony conviction for the offense of armed robbery that qualified him as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985).

No Collateral Estoppel and Due Process Bars to Sentencing: Defendant argued that collateral estoppel and due process barred his status as both a persistent felony offender and dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) because the designations served to sentence him twice for the same offense. The court found no merit to the argument. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985).

Time of Multiple Offenses — No Window of Opportunity: Defendant was charged with two felonies occurring at about the same time and had previously been convicted of a felony 5 years prior to the later charges. Defendant's attorney erroneously advised him that the state could notice him as a persistent felony offender based on the former conviction. Defendant pleaded guilty to avoid increased punishment as a persistent felony offender and later sought to withdraw the plea on grounds of coercion and ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The courts rejected defendant's contention that the statute should be construed to ban the use of the statute since the second offense was committed prior to the conviction on the first one. "On a different occasion" does not mean "in a different time frame". Separate crimes committed at about the same time can be used to increase punishment under this statute. A defendant may not commit any number of felonies between the time he commits his first felony and his conviction therefor and be immune from designation as a persistent felony offender. There is no "window of opportunity" under 46-18-501. St. v. Williamson, 218 M 242, 707 P2d 530, 42 St. Rep. 1551 (1985), followed in St. v. Hamm, 250 M 123, 818 P2d 830, 48 St. Rep. 830 (1991).

Deferred Imposition of Sentence Not Dismissed — "Conviction" for Purposes of Persistent Felony Offender Status: On appeal following conviction for criminal mischief and attempted burglary for which the defendant was sentenced as a persistent felony offender, the defendant argued that a prior conviction and deferred imposition of sentence should not have been considered a "conviction" under the persistent felony offender statutes because he successfully completed probation, even if the record of his prior conviction was not expunged or the sentence dismissed. The Supreme Court held, consistent with the rationale of St. v. Drew, 158 M 214, 490 P2d 230 (1971), that the case should be remanded to District Court to determine whether the prior unrevoked deferred sentence should be dismissed, and directed that if the sentence is dismissed then it should not be considered in determining whether the defendant is a persistent felony offender. St. v. Gladue, 209 M 235, 679 P2d 1256, 41 St. Rep. 669 (1984).

Timing of Sentencing Required to Bring Defendant Within Operation of Statute: Where the defendant was convicted of two counts of negligent homicide following a previous conviction for burglary within 5 years prior to the negligent homicide convictions, the District Court did not err in sentencing the defendant under the persistent felony offender statute. The defendant's contention that he is not "presently being sentenced for a second felony" until after the court has determined to sentence him to a term of imprisonment for more than 1 year is a hypertechnical construction of the statute intended to avoid the clear intention of the Legislature. The defendant's case is covered by the legislative mandate [deleted by a 1983 amendment] that the chapter be liberally construed to the end that dangerous offenders be correctively treated in custody for long terms as needed. St. v. Ballard, 202 M 81, 655 P2d 986, 39 St. Rep. 2342 (1982).

Void Conviction: Since the prior felony conviction was void because of a denial of due process during arraignment, it was improper to sentence the defendant under the former second offense statute. Lewis v. St., 153 M 460, 457 P2d 765 (1969), followed in St. v. Okland, 283 M 10, 941 P2d 431, 54 St. Rep. 467 (1997). Okland was followed, with a different result, in St. v. Ailport, 1998 MT 315, 292 M 172, 970 P2d 1044, 55 St. Rep. 1292 (1998).

1999 Amendment: Chapter 52 at beginning of (2) inserted exception clause; in (2)(b)(ii) after "parole" deleted "or otherwise"; in (2)(c) at end deleted "the offender shall, except as provided in 46-18-219, be imprisoned in the state prison for a term of not less than 10 years or more than 100 years or shall be fined an amount not to exceed $50,000, or both"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 52, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, the Correctional Standards and Oversight Committee was authorized by the Fifty-Fifth Legislature to conduct a study of correctional standards and to act as a correctional oversight committee; and

WHEREAS, the Committee contracted for a review of Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, sentencing statutes; and

WHEREAS, the Committee found that the statutes providing for sentencing and judgment regarding criminal procedures are confusing and rife with cross-references, internal references, and inconsistent terminology that make the statutes difficult to read and understand; and

WHEREAS, the Committee recommended that a bill be drafted to amend Title 46, chapter 18, MCA, to make nonsubstantive changes to clarify and streamline the statutes to eliminate contradictions, confusion, inconsistent terminology, and excessive internal references.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to so amend certain sentencing-related statutes."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in (1), near beginning, and in (2), near end, inserted reference to exception in 46-18-219; and made minor changes in style.

Coordination Instruction — Effective Dates: Section 21, Ch. 482, L. 1995, provided: "(1) If House Bill No. 357 and [this act] [Senate Bill No. 66] are both passed and approved:

(a) [sections 1 through 18] of [this act] are effective July 1, 1997; and

(b) the sentencing commission shall include recommendations for implementing the public policy contained in [sections 1 through 18] of [this act].

(2) [Sections 19, 20, and this section] [enacted as codification and coordination instructions] are effective July 1, 1995.

(3) If House Bill No. 357 is not passed and approved, then this section is void." House Bill No. 357 was approved March 31, 1995, as Ch. 306, L. 1995. Therefore, the amendments to 46-18-502, enacted as sec. 16 of Senate Bill No. 66, are effective July 1, 1997.

1981 Amendments: Chapter 198, L. 1981, inserted language allowing the court to fine the offender a maximum of $50,000 in lieu of imprisonment or to punish the offender by both a fine and imprisonment.

Chapter 327 inserted "Except as provided in subsection (2)" at the beginning of (1); inserted (2) relating to an offender who was a persistent felony offender at the time of his previous felony conviction, except the language relating to the $50,000 fine, which was added pursuant to Ch. 198 (see above); inserted "or the first 10 years of a sentence imposed under subsection (2)" in (3); and inserted (4) requiring that a sentence under subsection (2) runs consecutive to any other sentence.

Case Notes

Persistent Felony Offender Sentence Limited to 100 Years: Gaither received an 85-year sentence for felony attempted sexual abuse of children, 10 years for felony criminal endangerment, and an additional 50 years with 10 years suspended as a persistent felony offender, for a total of 135 years in prison. Gaither appealed the sentence on grounds that the maximum sentence that could be imposed as a persistent felony offender is 100 years. The state contended that the sentence available under 46-18-502 could be applied to specific crimes in order to augment the overall sentence available for a defendant being sentenced for more than one felony. The Supreme Court interpreted 46-18-502 as mandatory, so that once a District Court decides to sentence an offender as a persistent felony offender, the sentence must be from 10 to not more than 100 years. The statute does not give a District Court authority to mix and match a persistent felony offender sentence with another felony conviction occurring in the same proceeding and exceed the 100-year limit on imprisonment. Because Gaither's sentence exceeded the 100-year limitation, it was illegal, so the case was remanded for resentencing, and if the state sought to sentence Gaither as a persistent felony offender, the prison sentence could not exceed 100 years. St. v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 M 344, 220 P3d 640 (2009).

Alternative Sentence for Drug Offense Not Precluded by Persistent Felony Offender Statutes, but Incarceration Not Error: Brendal pleaded guilty to fraudulently obtaining dangerous drugs and was sentenced to 25 years in prison with 15 years suspended. Based on prior convictions for the same offense, the sentencing court designated Brendal as a persistent felony offender and imposed a mandatory 10-year prison sentence. Brendal appealed the sentence on grounds that the sentencing court should have considered a sentence to a drug treatment program pursuant to the alternative sentencing authority in 45-9-202. However, the Supreme Court affirmed. The persistent felony offender statutes do not preclude a District Court from providing an alternative sentence under 45-9-202 for a person convicted of a drug-related offense, as long as the required criteria for imposing an alternative sentence are satisfied. Therefore, although the District Court could have provided an alternative sentence, it was not error to sentence Brendal to incarceration. St. v. Brendal, 2009 MT 236, 351 M 395, 213 P3d 448 (2009).

Consideration of Sentencing Factors in Sentencing Persistent Felony Offender Not Violative of Right to Trial by Jury: Following conviction for an eighth DUI, Vaughn was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to a 50-year term in the state prison. Relying on the proposition in Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004), that factual findings that serve to enhance a sentence beyond the statutory maximum must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt, Vaughn appealed the felony sentence, asserting that the 50-year sentence imposed under this section served to enhance the sentence beyond the maximum 13-month commitment to the Department of Corrections followed by a suspended sentence of up to 5 years authorized for felony DUI in 61-8-731 and that therefore the persistent felony offender sentence should have been determined by a jury on the facts. The Supreme Court first noted that the Blakely proposition applies to a fact other than the fact of a prior conviction and that it is the fact of a defendant's prior felony conviction that authorizes an enhanced sentence under 46-18-501 and this section. Here, Vaughn's enhanced felony DUI sentence was based on the sentencing court's finding that Vaughn had a prior felony DUI conviction. That factual determination may properly be made by the sentencing court rather than by a jury. The prior DUI was a sentencing factor that was an aggravating or mitigating circumstance supporting the imposition of a sentence within the range authorized for a persistent felony offender. Thus, Vaughn's right to a trial by jury was not violated by the sentencing court's findings of fact in support of a sentence as a persistent felony offender. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007). See also Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000).

Suspension of Sentence Following Probation Violation Not Violative of Double Jeopardy — Credit for Time Served Properly Allowed: DeWitt was convicted of two counts of aggravated burglary, found to be a persistent felony offender, and sentenced to three consecutive 10-year sentences. DeWitt appealed, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to dismiss one count. While awaiting resentencing, DeWitt was incarcerated for 1,275 days. The District Court then resentenced DeWitt to one 10-year sentence for aggravated burglary and a consecutive 10-year sentence as a persistent felony offender, suspended all but 1,275 days of the 20-year sentence, and gave DeWitt credit for 1,275 days served. Without prison time to serve, DeWitt was immediately released on probation. DeWitt subsequently violated probation, the suspended sentence was revoked, and DeWitt was sentenced to 10 years with 5 years suspended, with credit for 160 days served while awaiting revocation proceedings. DeWitt appealed on grounds that the sentencing court failed to allow credit for the 1,275 days served when the suspended sentence was revoked and the new 10-year sentence was imposed and asserted that his double jeopardy rights were violated by reinstatement of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. When the sentencing court sentenced DeWitt following the probation violation, the court had a 16.5-year suspended sentence to work with, which was more than sufficient to account for the 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended that was imposed. Although a sentencing court must give credit for time served, revocation of a suspended sentence based on a probation violation and reinstatement of the original sentence does not constitute double jeopardy as long as the sentence is within the parameters of the sentence imposed in the initial suspended sentence and credit is allowed for time served. Further, a persistent felony offender designation is not a separate crime carrying a separate sentence, but rather is a statutorily required sentence enhancement that is part of the initial sentence, so the sentencing court could not have "dropped" the persistent felony offender count and sentenced DeWitt only under the aggravated burglary count, thereby limiting the available time on resentencing to 6.5 years. The sentence was not violative of double jeopardy, was within statutory parameters, and was affirmed. St. v. DeWitt, 2006 MT 302, 334 M 474, 149 P3d 549 (2006).

Constitutionality of Persistent Felony Offender Statutes: Shults contended that the persistent felony offender (PFO) statutes were unconstitutional on their face in violation of double jeopardy, equal protection, and cruel and unusual punishment or as they applied to Shults's case. The Supreme Court disagreed. First, the PFO statutes do not constitute double jeopardy because a sentence as a habitual criminal is not viewed as a new jeopardy (see Gryger v. Burke, 334 US 728 (1948)). Second, Shults was not able to show that the PFO statutes classify two or more similarly situated groups in an unequal manner and thus failed to meet the first threshold of a meritorious equal protection claim. Last, a sentence that is within maximum statutory guidelines and that is not so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community is not considered cruel and unusual punishment. Shults's sentence was within statutory parameters, and in light of Shults's 18-year criminal history and repeated failure to conform his behavior to societal norms despite having numerous opportunities to do so, the sentence could not be seen as so disproportionate as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community and thus was not considered cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Failure to Raise Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Consideration Barred: Osborne was convicted of a fourth DUI in 1999, and when charged with felony DUI in 2003, the state sought to have Osborne declared a persistent felony offender. The District Court obliged, and Osborne was declared a persistent felony offender and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 5 years suspended. Osborne did not appeal the sentence directly, but filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that the sentence was not legal. The petition was denied, and Osborne appealed. The state argued that the Supreme Court was procedurally barred under 46-21-105 from considering the petition because the legal challenge to the sentence could have been raised on direct appeal. Osborne asserted that because the state did not raise the procedural bar issue in District Court, that argument was waived. Although the Supreme Court as a rule does not consider issues raised for the first time on appeal, this general rule does not preclude consideration of jurisdictional questions raised for the first time on appeal. The procedural bar is jurisdictional, so the court considered the state's argument, concluding that lack of subject matter jurisdiction may not be waived and that 46-21-105 represents a jurisdictional limit on courts' ability to entertain and decide petitions for postconviction relief and effectively prohibits courts from exercising jurisdiction over grounds for relief that could have been raised on direct appeal. Thus, Osborne's failure to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal precluded consideration in a postconviction petition. St. v. Osborne, 2005 MT 264, 329 M 95, 124 P3d 1085 (2005).

District Court Jurisdiction to Apply Persistent Felony Offender Designation to Felony DUI: Yorek pleaded guilty to and was sentenced on a felony DUI charge. The District Court determined that it had jurisdiction and imposed a persistent felony offender designation. Yorek sought postconviction relief on grounds that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to impose a persistent felony offender designation for felony DUI. The District Court denied the petition for postconviction relief, concluding that sentencing for felony DUI is not solely governed by 61-8-731 and 61-8-734, that nothing in the persistent felony offender statute excludes felony DUI offenders from its application, and that Yorek waived any jurisdiction claim by pleading guilty. The Supreme Court affirmed. Nothing in this section distinguishes between or among the types of felonies to which it applies, or excludes DUI offenders. Rather, if the underlying charge meets the definition of a felony and if the state has provided proper notice of its intent to seek persistent felony offender status under 46-13-108, a District Court has the statutory authority to designate and sentence an offender as a persistent felony offender. Yorek's crime met the definition of a felony, and Yorek fell squarely within the persistent felony offender statute. The state met the notice provisions, and the District Court possessed subject matter jurisdiction to designate Yorek as a persistent felony offender. Because the jurisdiction question was dispositive, the Supreme Court did not reach the question of whether Yorek's guilty plea was a procedural bar against bringing the claim. St. v. Yorek, 2002 MT 74, 309 M 238, 45 P3d 872 (2002), followed in St. v. Pettijohn, 2002 MT 75, 309 M 244, 45 P3d 870 (2002), and St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005).

Failure to Adequately Inform Defendant of Maximum Possible Penalty — Reversible Error in Failing to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: After offering an Alford plea but prior to a change of plea hearing, Melone signed an acknowledgment of waiver of rights, stating that he understood the maximum possible penalty for felony assault and that his sentence could be enhanced for using a deadly weapon and because of his prior criminal record. At the change of plea hearing, the court informed Melone that the weapon enhancement penalty would not apply and that the maximum penalty for felony assault was "ten years in the Montana State Prison or a $50,000 fine". The court then allowed Melone to withdraw his guilty plea and enter the Alford plea. The court later sentenced Melone to 10 years in prison, plus 10 years to be served consecutively as a persistent offender. Melone moved for a hearing on the persistent offender enhancement and requested that he be allowed to withdraw his plea. The court rejected the motion to withdraw the plea, but vacated the sentence and granted a new sentencing hearing to allow Melone to present evidence regarding applicability of the persistent offender enhancement. Following the hearing, the court affirmed its original sentence. Melone appealed, contending that he was never informed that he could receive up to 100 years because of his potential status as a persistent offender and that, as a consequence, his plea was not knowing and voluntary. The Supreme Court agreed. Under 46-12-210 and 46-16-105, a defendant must be informed of the maximum penalty, including the effect of any penalty enhancement provision. The fact that the prosecutor informed Melone of a possible persistent offender penalty immediately prior to questioning did not satisfy the statutory requirement that the court inform the defendant of the maximum penalty. Melone's statements in the written acknowledgment were insufficient to satisfy the doubts of the Supreme Court that Melone was aware that his sentence could be enhanced by up to 100 years as a result of his plea. Rather, it appeared that Melone was under the mistaken belief that he risked sentence enhancement only if he proceeded to trial. Resolving their doubt that the plea was voluntary in favor of Melone, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case to District Court to allow Melone to withdraw the plea. St. v. Melone, 2000 MT 118, 299 M 442, 2 P3d 233, 57 St. Rep. 493 (2000).

Sentence of 100 Years Without Parole for Sexual Intercourse Without Consent Committed Upon Person of Same Gender Not Excessive — Persistent Felony Offender: Ford contended that his sentence of 100 years without parole eligibility for sexual intercourse without consent committed upon a person of the same gender was excessively harsh and disproportionate to the gravity of the crime. The Supreme Court found that the sentence was within legal parameters provided by statute and affirmed the sentence, noting that Ford: (1) was a persistent felony offender; (2) had a prior criminal history of sexually preying on young boys; (3) had undergone previous attempts by professional therapists and state officials to treat his problems but was apparently unwilling to accept the provided treatment; and (4) had a predatory nature. St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 947 (1996).

Notice of Intent to Seek Increased Punishment Not Filed With Court Until After Trial — No Error in Persistent Felony Offender Designation: The state timely served defense counsel with notice of its intent to seek increased punishment for McQuiston as a persistent felony offender but did not file the notice with the court until after trial was concluded, 5 months before sentencing. McQuiston contended that timely filing of the notice was a jurisdictional prerequisite and that failure to so do constituted reversible error. However, the state's notice to defense counsel 5 months before trial and to the court 5 months before sentencing did not prejudice McQuiston, and the persistent felony offender designation was not made in error. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Determinative of Sentence Rather Than Statute Governing Underlying Offense: On March 13, 1995, the District Court sentenced McQuiston in open court to 15 years in the state prison, with 5 years suspended, for sexual intercourse without consent and 15 years in the state prison, with 5 years suspended, for incest. On March 14, the court entered written judgment sentencing McQuiston to two consecutive terms of 30 years in the state prison, with the last 5 years suspended, for each offense and further designated McQuiston a persistent felony offender and a dangerous offender. On March 31, the court, after review of the transcript of the sentencing hearing, amended the sentence to 22 ½ years in prison, with 5 years suspended, for each offense and ordered the sentences to be served consecutively for a total of 45 years in prison, with 10 years suspended. McQuiston alleged error in sentencing, arguing that the sentence constituted an ex post facto violation because it was based on the incest penalty in effect at the time of sentencing rather than the penalty in effect at the time that the offense occurred. However, when a defendant has been designated a persistent felony offender, it is this section that determines the maximum sentence, not the statute governing the underlying offense. The 22 ½-year sentence was well within the maximum allowed under this section, was not applied ex post facto, and was thus affirmed. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Maximum Statutory Sentence for Persistent Felony Offender — Not Additional Sentence: After finding Fitzpatrick to be a persistent felony offender, the District Court sentenced him to 10 years for escape and 5 years for burglary, plus an additional 100 years on each count as a persistent felony offender. The sentence imposed by this section is a maximum sentence, replacing the maximum sentence for the offense, and is not a sentence in addition to the sentence for the offense. Therefore, the Supreme Court vacated the sentences as being in excess of statutory maximums and remanded for resentencing consistent with this section. The sentences may not exceed 100 years on each count and must run consecutively. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 247 M 206, 805 P2d 584, 48 St. Rep. 164 (1991), replacing a prior opinion at 48 St. Rep. 5 (1991), followed in St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202, 52 St. Rep. 1019 (1995), and distinguished in St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and St. v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 M 300, 177 P3d 488 (2008), in which persistent felony offender sentences imposed in addition to sentences for the original offenses were not considered illegal because the total sentences imposed were below the maximum provided for by subsection (2) of this section and were thus within statutory parameters.

Second Felony Arising as Result of First Felony — Persistent Offender Designation Proper — Crimes Sufficiently Disparate: Defendant was arrested on a felony drug charge and later assaulted an officer while attempting to escape. Defendant asserted that the District Court erred in designating him a persistent felony offender because both underlying convictions arose from a single transaction. However, the fact that both crimes arose out of the same transaction does not in itself bar application of the persistent felony offender designation. In general, when different crimes, even though unrelated in nature, are committed at the same place, on the same victim or group of victims, and at the same time or as part of a continuous series of criminal acts, they should be considered as having been committed on the same occasion for sentence enhancement purposes. In this case, the crimes were sufficiently disparate in time, place, and victim that they could not be said to have occurred on the same occasion, so sentence enhancement was appropriate. St. v. Hawkins, 239 M 404, 781 P2d 259, 46 St. Rep. 1786 (1989).

Defendant Not Designated Persistent Felony Offender in Previous Conviction — Discretion of Judge Within Statutory Limits: Defendant argued that because he was not designated a persistent felony offender in his previous conviction, he should have received only 5 years under 46-18-502(1) rather than 50 years with 40 years suspended under 46-18-502(2). However, the sentence was within the range authorized by this section, and the judge did not abuse his discretion in imposing the sentence when the defendant could have been designated a persistent felony offender at the time of his previous conviction, based on his record at that time. St. v. Tracy, 233 M 529, 761 P2d 398, 45 St. Rep. 1705 (1988).

Rules of Evidence Inapplicable to Sentencing: Defendant contended that the court erred in adding 10 years to his sentence for being a persistent felony offender because the court relied on evidence improperly before it. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence because the rules of evidence do not apply to sentencing and because the evidence was competent. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988).

Three Hundred-Year Prison Sentence of Mentally Ill Defendant Upheld: Sentencing defendant, who was found mentally ill but criminally culpable, to the Montana State Prison for a term of 300 years without the possibility of parole or furlough was not cruel and unusual punishment. The District Court had stated, among other things, that defendant was very dangerous and there was no treatment program that would alter his behavior. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Defendant Under Duty to Contest Presentence Report in Lower Court: After conviction of theft and robbery, defendant was designated as a persistent felony offender and his sentence was enhanced. Defendant contended that there was no evidence that he was the same person whose prior record was introduced at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court, relying on St. v.

Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979), held that the defendant has an affirmative duty to contest matters contained in a presentence report. He chose not to and is precluded from doing so on appeal. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983), distinguished in St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999).

Finding of No Mitigating Factors Supported in Record — Alcohol and Sexual Problems: Where the trial court considered defendant's drinking and sexual problems but concluded that those conditions did not excuse defendant from accountability for his acts, and the evidence presented at the hearing and in the presentence investigation report supported the trial court's conclusion, there was no abuse of discretion in sentencing defendant as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Sentence Under Persistent Offender Statute Not Cruel and Unusual — Fairness Questions for Sentence Review Board: A sentence of 100 years is within the maximum allowable by the persistent felony offender statute, and as such does not violate the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution. Challenges to the equitability of a sentence as opposed to its legality are properly directed to the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Specific Objection to Evidence Required in Persistent Felony Offender Hearing: By failing to make a specific objection, the defendant waived his right to assert that the State's certificate of prior conviction was not competent evidence without proof that he was the person named in the certificate. The defendant was informed well in advance of the time he entered his guilty plea that he would be tried as a persistent felony offender. At the hearing to determine whether the defendant was a persistent felony offender, he had an opportunity to object to the State's lack of identification but failed to do so. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979). See also St. v. Brown, 228 M 209, 741 P2d 428, 44 St. Rep. 1462 (1987).

Presumption of Constitutionality: Following a conviction for attempted deliberate homicide, the defendant was sentenced as a persistent felony offender to 30 years in prison without parole. While the defendant claims the sentence to be unconstitutional, it was held in St. v. Karathanos, 158 M 461, 493 P2d 326 (1972), that a sentence within statutory limits is presumed to be constitutional. The defendant has the burden of overcoming the presumption and has not done so. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Persistent Felony Offender Versus Law-Abiding Citizen: Article II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., grants an offender who has served his sentence a fair opportunity to enjoy the rights that law-abiding citizens enjoy. It does not grant him immunity from being treated as a persistent felony offender. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978). See St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Presentence Investigation: Although the State proved the defendant's status as a persistent felony offender by means of a prior felony conviction pending appeal, the need for a presentence investigation report was not thereby eliminated. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

Statutes Construed Together: The Supreme Court saw no problem in construing 46-18-502 and 46-18-503 (renumbered 46-13-108) together to provide both the procedural requirements and substantive basis for implementing persistent felony offender sanctions since that is precisely what the Legislature intended. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

Misuse of Plea Bargaining Process and Habitual Criminal Statute: Without declaring the plea bargaining process constitutionally infirm or the habitual criminal statute unconstitutional on its face, the Supreme Court held that the defendant was denied due process under federal and state provisions when he realistically was sentenced to 10 years for attempted burglary and 40 years for refusing to plead guilty and insisting upon a jury trial. St. v. Sather, 172 M 428, 564 P2d 1306 (1977).

Sentence for Prior Conviction: A judgment under former law that the defendant "be imprisoned in the state prison for the term of ten years, five years upon the conviction for assault in the second degree, and five years for the prior conviction of a felony as by the statute made and provided" was not void as to the 5 years for the former conviction. St. v. Connors, 27 M 227, 70 P 715 (1902).

2001 Amendment: Chapter 585 in second sentence substituted "must be forwarded to the state treasurer for deposit in the state general fund" for "must be paid to the county treasurer of the county in which the court is held and by him credited as provided by law. If the fine or forfeiture is paid to the county treasurer, at the time of such payment there shall be filed with the county treasurer a complete statement showing the total of the fine or forfeiture received or incurred with an itemized statement of the costs incurred by the county in such action. The statement shall give the title of the cause and be subscribed by the person or officer making such payment"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2002.

Order That Fine Be Paid to Charitable Organization — Reversible Error: The District Court fined defendant his vacation pay and sick leave pay and ordered that those funds be paid to the Great Falls United Way. Because the order did not comply with the statutory payment requirements of this section, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the judgment for further proceedings. St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994).

Allocation of Justice's Court Fines and Costs: Money which has been collected as fines and costs in Justice's Court and paid to the County Treasurer by the Justice of the Peace and which remains after the specific allocations made in this section should be credited to the county general fund pursuant to 46-18-235. 41 A.G. Op. 39 (1985).

Restitution Not to Be Made From Forfeited Appearance Bond: A judge is without the authority to order restitution to be made from a forfeited appearance bond. Restitution is not a "cost" of the case that may be defrayed. Section 46-18-603 refers specifically to costs incurred by the county, not by the victim. The money from the forfeited bond is to be paid to the County Treasurer. 38 A.G. Op. 96 (1980).

Child Support as Restitution and Condition of Probation: Child support violations were noted in the presentence investigation. Defendant should have known that they might be considered by the court, so there was no due process violation. The District Court properly ordered payment of child support as a form of restitution and rehabilitation and as a legitimate condition of parole. St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Condition of Probation: Under former law, provisions in a probation order permitting the petitioner to have employment outside the county jail, absolving the Sheriff from liability in permitting the petitioner to be absent from his custody without bail, and requiring that the petitioner pay his own board at the jail from his earnings, while similar to some former provisions relating to convicted misdemeanants serving county jail sentences, did not convert a condition of probation into a term of imprisonment. Case Notes

Alcoholics — Refraining as Valid Condition of Parole: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Parole Conditions — Application to Suspended Portion of Sentence: Parole conditions set by Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) also applied to period of suspended sentence where court passing sentence did not set conditions upon suspended portion of sentence, particularly where that court expressly directed that when defendant was not in prison he was to be under the supervision of the Board and court could revoke the suspended sentence for violation of those conditions. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Restrictions During Deferral — Abuse of Discretion: When the court deferred imposition of sentence but required the defendants to serve 1 year in the county jail with release for working hours, it abused its discretion to impose reasonable restrictions or conditions during the period of the deferred imposition. St. v. Openshaw, 172 M 511, 565 P2d 319 (1977).

Case Notes

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), and St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), regarding authority of sentencing court.

Sex Offender Registration and Disclosure Requirements Not Violative of Privacy or Right of Convicted to Restoration of Rights: Mount was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and served his sentence. Nine days after final discharge from prison in 1996, Mount registered as a sexual offender, but he was convicted in 2000 of failing to update the registration as required in 46-23-507. On appeal, Mount asserted that the ongoing registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act violated the right to privacy under Art. II, sec. 10, Mont. Const., and constitutional and statutory provisions for reinstatement of the rights of a citizen under Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., and this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. As a fundamental right, the right to individual privacy may be infringed only by a compelling state interest; however, protection of the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevention of the victimization of vulnerable children, and assistance in keeping track of sex offenders constitute the requisite compelling interest. Further, Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., and this section apply only to the restoration of civil and political rights, and a conviction for sexual intercourse without consent does not fall under this category of protected rights. Thus, Mount was not deprived of any rights by the registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004).

Addition of Written Sentencing Conditions Not Enunciated Orally at Hearing — Johnson Applied: Drube failed to complete a sex offender program, so the District Court revoked his suspended sentence and sentenced him to a 9-year term, with commitment to the Department of Corrections for the first 5 years and the remainder to be served at the state prison. The court specified that the prison portion of the sentence be suspended as long as Drube met sentencing conditions, including completion of a long-term aftercare program. Drube appealed the sentence on grounds that the court imposed a condition on the sentence that was impossible to fulfill and because the written revocation and sentencing order differed from the oral sentence enunciated at the sentencing hearing. Reviewing the sentence for legality, the Supreme Court affirmed. Drube presented nothing establishing that it would be impossible to complete the sex offender program within the reinstated 5-year commitment to the Department. Arguing that eight written conditions added to the suspended sentence by written order should be stricken, Drube cited St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), for the proposition that when written and oral sentences differ, the oral order prevails. The Supreme Court agreed with the general rule in Lane, but noted that the rule is not absolute. Under St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480 (2000), when deciding whether a subsequent written sentencing order is unlawful because it contains conditions not enunciated orally, the court first determines whether a defendant was afforded the opportunity to respond to the inclusion upon sufficient notice at hearing and second whether the portion of the written sentence substantively increases the defendant's loss of liberty and sacrifice of property. Here, all the conditions in the 2002 written revocation and sentencing order were contained either in Drube's original sentence or in a 2001 revocation and sentencing order and thus were not new or unknown to Drube, who had the opportunity to respond to the conditions placed on the sentence, nor did Drube present any argument that the eight conditions substantively increased the loss of liberty or sacrifice of property. Thus, the 2002 sentencing order was not rendered unlawful by the addition of conditions not imposed orally at the sentencing hearing. St. v. Drube, 2003 MT 138, 316 M 156, 69 P3d 1182 (2003).

Conditions Imposed in Written Judgment and Sentence Different From Those Imposed in Oral Sentence — Lane, Waters, and Simpson Reviewed — Test to Determine Which New Conditions Lawful or Unlawful — Payment of Restitution and Costs: Johnson was sentenced orally for writing bad checks and later contended that four of the conditions imposed in the written judgment and sentence by the District Court were unlawful under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), because they were not announced orally when she was sentenced in open court. The Supreme Court reviewed its decisions in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142 (1999), and St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361 (1999), and reasoned that a written sentence would be held unlawful only if it substantively increased the defendant's loss of liberty or the defendant's sacrifice of property. Under this test, the Supreme Court held that two of the four penalties not mentioned by the District Court in its oral pronouncement of Johnson's sentence were unlawful, those being the restitution ordered to the Missoula County jail of money expended for Johnson's medical care and the requirement that Johnson pay for the costs of her prosecution in District Court. The Supreme Court held that the other two parts of the written sentence, the requirement that Johnson make restitution from money earned in prison and the imposition of certain "civil" restrictions as conditions of Johnson's suspended sentence, such as the requirement that Johnson stay out of gambling casinos, were lawfully imposed because they did not increase the amount of money that Johnson was ordered to pay or increase Johnson's deprivation of liberty in addition to those penalties imposed orally. The requirement for payment from prison earnings only specified where the money was to come from, and the "civil" restrictions were largely mentioned by the District Court at Johnson's sentencing hearing. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

No Departmental Authority to Modify Sentence During Term of Sentence Through Special Probationary Conditions: Field was sentenced to 16 years in prison with 8 years suspended for felony deviate sexual conduct. After serving a portion of the sentence, Field was placed on probation. The sentencing judge attempted to incorporate conditions that might be imposed on probation by providing that any agent of the Montana Probation and Parole Bureau (now Department of Corrections) was authorized to arrange and establish rules necessary for Field's probation and to modify, increase, or reduce the requirements of the rules. Based on that authority, 4 years after the sentence, a Department probation officer added a handwritten special parole condition that Field not be alone with minor children. When Field violated the special condition, the probationary sentence was revoked. As amended in 1995, this section allows a sentencing judge to incorporate by reference conditions of parole established by the Department at the time that the sentence is imposed, but does not authorize a judge to grant to the Department the power to modify a sentence by imposing subsequent constitutional infringements, such as a restriction on the freedom of association, after the judgment and sentence have been signed. Here, no evidence was offered that the special condition imposed on Field was a standard Department rule at the time of sentencing, and nothing in the sentence allowed for the special condition that Field not be alone with a minor; therefore, Field's incarceration for parole violation was premised on a violation of a special condition that was never imposed by a court. Reversing, the Supreme Court held that sentencing of a defendant to an abridgment of a constitutionally protected interest must be performed by the District Court and articulated at the time of sentencing, not modified by a probation officer 4 years after a sentence is imposed. St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203, 57 St. Rep. 1123 (2000).

Right to Possess Firearms — Not Specifically Prohibited by Judge but Prohibited by State Agency Administering Probation: As a condition of probation, defendant was placed by the judge under the jurisdiction of the Department of Corrections and ordered to comply with the terms and conditions established by the Department. The Department had an administrative rule making nonpossession of firearms a standard condition for probationers. Because the sentencing court did not, as required by this section, specifically enumerate and specifically include in the sentence order a prohibition against possessing a firearm, the Department of Corrections could not, and the rule did not, deprive defendant of the right to possess firearms. (However, see the 1995 amendment to subsection (1) of this section, which reversed this holding.) U.S. v. Brooks, 270 M 136, 890 P2d 759, 52 St. Rep. 113 (1995).

Restoration of Civil Rights Determined by Law of State Where Original Conviction Obtained: When defendant was convicted of felony in North Dakota and moved to Montana during the probationary period, the question of restoration of civil rights is determined by North Dakota law. Conviction would be considered still in existence for purposes of the statute criminalizing a transaction in firearms by a convicted felon, even though under Montana law, civil rights would have been considered restored prior to commission of the gun transaction. U.S. v. Eaton, 31 F3d 789 (1994).

Detention of Prisoner After Expiration of Sentence Not Allowed: The plaintiffs, whose child had been killed by a released prisoner, sued the state in tort on the basis that the state could have initiated civil commitment proceedings against the prisoner, rather than releasing him. The Supreme Court held that the state has no authority to hold a prisoner beyond the expiration of his sentence and no duty to initiate civil proceedings. VanLuchene v. St., 244 M 397, 797 P2d 932, 47 St. Rep. 1609 (1990).

Restriction Not Included in Sentence — Prisoner Suffrage: The constitutional restrictions on the petitioner's suffrage rights while he is in prison are effective regardless of whether the court, under this section, added or omitted such restrictions in the sentence imposed. Emery v. St., 177 M 73, 580 P2d 445 (1978).

Robbery With Gun Apparently Under Coat — Sentence of Thirty Years Permissible: Defendant claimed that his 30-year sentence for robbery of a convenience store was disproportionate to the facts (which included a finding that he had his hand under his coat and the store clerk believed he had a gun). The sentence was within the permissible statutory range, there was no clear abuse of discretion, and the sentence was properly reviewable in the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court. Allegations of Improper Conduct of Counsel — No Disqualification of Judge: In statements made to a presentence investigator and ultimately to the District Judge, Gleed alleged improper conduct by his trial counsel. On appeal, he argued that the seriousness of the charges could have caused the judge to take a negative view in sentencing him and that therefore the judge should have disqualified himself. The proper procedure for disqualifying a judge is outlined in 3-1-802; however, none of the circumstances for disqualification were present in this case. Gleed did not follow the statutory procedure for disqualification, nor did he attempt to have his sentence reviewed by the sentence review division under Title 46, ch. 18, part 9. Instead, he raised the issue on appeal, alleging in a conclusory fashion that the judge was biased against him. The Supreme Court held that there was no merit to Gleed's argument that the judge was biased and should have disqualified himself. Sentence was affirmed. St. v. Gleed, 220 M 56, 713 P2d 543, 43 St. Rep. 169 (1986).

Equitableness of Sentence Considered: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide and sentenced to 10 years and to an additional consecutive 5 years for the knowing use of a gun while committing the offense. At the time of sentencing, the court had discretion to make the 5 years run either consecutively or concurrently. Section 46-18-221, under which the 5 years was imposed, was later amended to require that a sentence under the section run consecutively. Defendant's contention on appeal that it was error to require the 5 years to run consecutively went to the equity of the requirement and not to its legality and should be directed to the Sentence Review Board rather than to the Supreme Court on appeal from the sentence. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982), followed in St. v. Warnick, 202 M 120, 656 P2d 190, 39 St. Rep. 2369 (1982).

Proportionality Review Sufficient: The function of the Sentence Review Division is to consider the appropriateness of a sentence with respect to an individual offender and as to the particular offense involved. In considering an application for postconviction review, the court held that a proportionality review is sufficient if the Sentence Review Division considers the records of appealed cases. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981).

Fairness of Sentence Under Persistent Offender Statute — Question for Board: A sentence of 100 years is within the maximum allowable by the persistent felony offender statute, and as such does not violate the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution. Challenges to the equitability of a sentence as opposed to its legality are properly directed to the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Jurisdiction Over Revocation Proceedings: For violation of parole conditions imposed by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole), the original sentencing court has the implied power and jurisdiction to revoke a suspension of sentence granted by the Sentence Review Division without violating the double jeopardy protection. In fact, the Sentence Review Division lacks jurisdiction over a revocation proceeding initiated by the State. In re Ratzlaff, 172 M 439, 564 P2d 1312 (1977).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 69 at end of (2) substituted "locations as determined by the review division" for "Deer Lodge"; at end of (4) deleted "and such clerical help as it deems adequate and fix their compensation"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

SUPREME COURT ORDERS

Order of May 14, 1998: On May 6, 1998, this Court received a letter from the Honorable William Nels Swandal, Chair of the Sentence Review Division of the Supreme Court of Montana. Judge Swandal pointed out that as a result of this Court's recent opinion in Ranta v. State of Montana, 1998 MT 95, the Sentence Review Division must, in future cases, inform a criminal defendant of his or her right to have representation by counsel in both deciding whether to file an application for sentence review and in appearing and presenting a case to the Sentence Review Division. Judge Swandal's letter went on to state, "It is my understanding that there is no mechanism in place at this time to appoint counsel for defendants at sentence review, or to determine if they qualify for counsel." Judge Swandal suggested discussions to determine an appropriate way to implement the Ranta decision.

The Court having now reviewed and considered Judge Swandal's letter, and his understanding being correct that there is not presently a mechanism in place for the appointment of counsel for defendants at sentence review,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that whenever a criminal defendant is represented by appointed counsel in proceedings before a Montana district court, counsel's representation of that defendant shall continue throughout any sentence review proceedings under Title 46, Chapter 18, part 9, MCA. Upon a district court's sentencing of such a criminal defendant, the clerk of the district court shall provide notice of such continuing representation to the defendant, his counsel, and counsel for the State.

The Clerk is directed to provide copies of this Order to the members of the Sentence Review Division: The Honorable William Nels Swandal, the Honorable Richard G. Phillips, and the Honorable Jeffrey H. Langton; to all other judges of the district courts of the State of Montana; to all clerks of the district courts of the State of Montana; to Barbara Fairhurst, secretary for the Sentence Review Division; and to the State Bar of Montana with the request that it be published in the next possible issue of the Montana Lawyer.

Order of June 16, 1998: On May 14, 1998, this Court issued an order setting forth the appropriate procedure for the appointment of counsel at sentence review proceedings. We ordered that "whenever a criminal defendant is represented by appointed counsel in proceedings before a Montana district court, counsel's representation of that defendant shall continue throughout any sentence review proceedings under Title 46, Chapter 18, part 9, MCA."

By way of a letter dated June 4, 1998, the Sentence Review Board has asked that we issue a supplemental order in answer to certain questions which have arisen with respect to the appointment and reimbursement of counsel for sentence review proceedings.

In answer to the questions posed by the Sentence Review Board,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that, whether appointed or retained, counsel for a criminal defendant shall represent that defendant throughout any sentence review proceedings under Title 46, Chapter 18, part 9, MCA. As with any other case, a criminal defendant represented by retained counsel must pay the cost of that representation. If, however, a defendant is found indigent by the court and represented by appointed counsel, the county from which the conviction arose will pay for that representation.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that, as in other cases, the amount appointed counsel will be reimbursed for representing a criminal defendant on sentence review is to be determined either by the court, or in accordance with the public defender contract.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the correct reimbursement procedure is that employed on all other appeals.

The Clerk of Court is directed to provide copies of this Order to the members of the Sentence Review Division: the Honorable William Nels Swandal, the Honorable Richard G. Phillips, and the Honorable Jeffery H. Langton; to all other judges of the district courts of the State of Montana; to all clerks of the district courts of the State of Montana; to Barbara Fairhurst, secretary for the Sentence Review Division; and to the State Bar of Montana with the request that it be published in the next possible issue of the Montana Lawyer.

Rules of Sentence Review Division:

In order to provide for the more effective administration of the review of sentences imposed on convicted felons in the State of Montana, in accordance with Title 46, Chapter 18, of the Montana Code Annotated, 1985, the Sentence Review Division of the Supreme Court by this order hereby adopted the following rules, thereby superseding all previous such rules.

RULE 1. After notice and within sixty (60) days after a defendant is sentenced to a term of one year or more in the State Prison, the defendant may apply to have his sentence reviewed by the Sentence Review Division of the Supreme Court of Montana. It is the duty of trial counsel to protect the defendants interest in this respect and the duty of the trial court to ensure that the defendant understands he has a right to review of the sentence imposed. If such review is requested, the sentence may be increased, decreased, affirmed as entered by the trial court, or otherwise altered by the Sentence Review Division. The filing of application for review of sentence does not stay execution of the sentence.

RULE 2. The Clerks of the District Courts of the State of Montana shall serve upon persons sentenced to more than one (1) year in the State Prison a completed Montana Sentence Review Form No. 1, together with three (3) blank copies of Montana Sentence Review Form No. 2. The clerk shall further serve upon the defendant a copy of the courts Sentence and Judgment. Service shall also be made when a deferred or suspended sentence if revoked and the defendant is sentenced to more than one (1) year in the State Prison.

RULE 3. The defendants Application for Sentence Review (Montana Sentence Review Form No. 2) must be filed with the Clerk of the District Court for the county from which the defendant was sentenced. In the event the defendant has been sentenced and is serving time upon two sentences from separate counties, separate applications must be submitted to each Clerk of Court for the county from which the defendant was sentenced, if the defendant wants each sentence reviewed.

RULE 4. The Clerk of the District Court will file the original copy of said application for Review of Sentence (Montana Sentence Review Form No. 2) in the court file of the defendant. The Clerk will then complete Clerks Certificate and Statement (Montana Sentence Review Form

No. 3) and forward it, together with the original court file and other documents required by Form No. 3 to:

Sentence Review Division
Room 315, Justice Building
215 North Sanders
Helena, MT 59620

RULE 5. The Clerk of the District Court shall forward said Clerks Certificate and Statement, together with all documents required, to the secretary of the Sentence Review Division within ten (10) working days after receipt of the Application for Review of Sentence.

RULE 6. The Clerk of the District Court shall forward a copy of the Application for Review of Sentence (Montana Sentence Review Form No. 2) to the Judge who imposed the sentence and a copy to the County Attorney for the County from which the defendant was sentenced within five (5) working days of receipt of same from the defendant.

RULE 7. In the event the Application for Review of Sentence is filed more than 60 days after the sentence is imposed, the Clerk shall proceed as if it were filed on time. However, the secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall thereafter promptly notify the defendant that the application is untimely and request the defendant file within thirty (30) days a statement of reasons why the Sentence Review Division should hear the matter. The Sentence Review Division will rule upon such matters after said thirty (30) days has elapsed and may refuse to hear such application if the reasons for the late filing are insufficient. The Sentence Review Division will hear late applications which have been caused by the taking of an appeal to the Montana Supreme Court.

When there is a pending appeal or request for post-conviction relief, the application for Sentence Review should not be filed until such time as the petition for post-conviction relief or the appeal has been determined, at which time the defendant shall be given sixty (60) days in which to file for review of the sentence.

RULE 8. The secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall not accept an Application for Review of Sentence directly; all such applications must be filed in compliance with MCA 46-18-903, which requires they be filed with the Clerk of the District Court.

RULE 9. The secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall keep a minute book in which shall be recorded the date and time the completed application for review was received by the Clerk of the District Court. The Sentence Review Division shall hear applications in the order they are received by the respective Clerks of Court unless circumstances make such order impractical or the Sentence Review Division orders otherwise.

RULE 10. The Sentence Review Division records are public records and open to public inspection except for decisions which are pending and which have not been released or finally approved by the judges.

RULE 11. After the Application for Review is filed as herein provided, the secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall accept for filing briefs concerning the review of sentence, and any material considered by the sentencing judge at the time of the imposition of sentence. The Sentence Review Division will not consider any new material, letters, petitions, or matters which were not presented to the sentencing judge.

RULE 12. The Sentence Review Division shall meet at the Montana State Prison, Deer Lodge, Montana, at the Womens Correctional Center in Billings, Montana, or at some other convenient place, at such times as shall be approved by the Division. The secretary shall notify each member of the place and dates of such meetings.

RULE 13. The secretary of the Sentence Review Division shall send notices of the time and place of such hearing at least twenty (20) days prior to such hearing to each of the following:

A. The judge who imposed the sentence,
B. The County Attorney for the county from which the defendant was sentenced,
C. The defendant,
D. The defendants attorney, if known,
E. The Montana Defender Project, if involved,
F. Any other person who has requested such notice.

RULE 14. The Sentence Review Divisions hearings shall be public. Admittance shall be subject to the rules of admission into the Montana State Prison generally. Proceedings shall be as informal as possible to allow full expression by all parties and their attorneys. The Rules of Evidence will serve as a guide but are not binding in the proceeding. The defendant shall have the right to appear and to be represented by counsel. For purposes of this rule, the appearance of the defendant may be accomplished by a video conference so that all participants can see each other. The defendant is not entitled to counsel at the expense of the State of Montana. The defendant will be responsible for retaining an attorney if he or she so chooses. The Montana Defender Project may represent a defendant, but such representation is not required. The State may be represented by the County Attorney and/or Attorney General. By requesting a review of his or her sentence by the Sentence Review Division, and proceeding without an attorney, the defendant waives the right to be represented by an attorney, and his or her sentence may be increased, decreased, or left unchanged by the Division.

RULE 15. The record from which the Sentence Review Division shall conduct its review shall consist of the following:

A. Copy of the information and affidavit in support of the motion for leave to file,
B. Copy of plea agreement or transcript setting forth the same,
C. Pre-sentence report,
D. Sentence and judgment and reasons for same, or transcript containing said reasons,
E. Other documents relied on by the sentencing judge,
F. Transcript of sentencing hearing.

Failure to include any of the foregoing items may be cause for the Sentence Review Division to decline to conduct the sentence review and the Sentence Review Division may remand the same to the Clerk of the District Court for compilation of the necessary documents. If the sentencing judge did not set forth his reasons for sentence, or did not consider a pre-sentence report, or if there are critical matters which should have been presented at the sentencing hearing, the Sentence Review Division may vacate the sentence and remand it for re-sentencing based upon proper documentation. In the event the sentence and judgment contains clerical errors, the Sentence Review Division may vacate the sentence and remand for re-sentencing.

RULE 16. The primary objective of the Sentence Review Division is to provide for uniformity in sentencing when appropriate and to ensure that the interest of the public and the defendant are adequately addressed by the sentence. In reviewing the sentences the Sentence Review Division shall consider the correctional policy of the State of Montana as set forth in the Section 46-18-101 to protect society by preventing crime through punishment and rehabilitation of the convicted. The Sentence Review Division will hold an individual responsible and accountable for his/her actions and shall ensure that persons convicted of crime are dealt with in accordance with their individual characteristics, circumstances, needs and potentialities. The review shall be undertaken to assure that the sentence imposed is based on the following:

A. The crime committed;
B. The prospects of rehabilitation of the offenders;
C. The circumstances under which the crime was committed;
D. The criminal history of the offender.

The Sentence Review Division shall further review the sentences, with a view to removing dangerous and habitual offenders from society and providing corrective treatment for such long terms as needed. In other cases, the Sentence Review Division shall consider whether the offender could have been dealt with adequately by probation, suspended sentence or fine where such disposition appears practicable and not detrimental to the needs of public safety and the welfare of the individual.

RULE 17. The sentence imposed by the District Court is presumed correct, and the sentence will not be reduced or increased unless it is deemed clearly inadequate or excessive.

RULE 18. The Sentence Review Division will not consider any matter or development subsequent to the imposition of the sentence in the District Court. Matters not to be considered include:

A. Institutional adjustment,
B. New social information,
C. Institutional disciplinary actions pending or had against the defendant,
D. Work report, or
E. Inmate release plans.

RULE 19. If the Sentence Review Division orders a different sentence than the one originally imposed, the District Court in a convenient county shall re-sentence the defendant as ordered by the Sentence Review Division.

A. The time served on any sentence reviewed shall be deemed to have been served on the sentence as revised by the Sentence Review Division.

B. The decision of the Sentence Review Division will be final. The decision and reasons for such decision will be stated in a written opinion reported and published in the Montana Reports.

C. Copies of the decisions of the Sentence Review Division shall be furnished to the following:

1. The Clerk of the District Court from which the defendant was originally sentenced,

2. The judge who imposed the sentence reviewed,
3. The County Attorney for the County from which the defendant was originally sentenced,
4. The defendant,
5. The principal officer of the institution where the defendant is confined,
6. The attorney for the defendant or the Montana Defender Project.

RULE 20. Once the defendants application is set for hearing, no continuance will be granted without a written motion and good cause.

RULE 21. The defendants attorney is entitled to inspect and copy any document filed with the Sentence Review Division.

RULE 22. Rehearing may be ordered by the Sentence Review Division upon application in writing directed to the Sentence Review Division within thirty (30) days of notice of the Sentence Review Divisions decision on the original application. Rehearing shall not stay any order or judgment previously made unless the Sentence Review Division specifically stays such previous order or judgment. Only one petition for rehearing shall be permitted by any applicant for sentence review, and the grounds therefor shall be clearly stated in said petition in accordance with rules governing rehearings in the Supreme Court of Montana.

RULE 23. A record, by court reporter or by tape recording, shall be made of all proceedings before the Sentence Review Division, and preserved for five (5) years.

RULE 24. A hearing shall be held on each application for sentence review within 180 days of the date of filing. The division will consider for dismissal any application which has not been heard within such time period. Continuances may be granted only for sufficient cause shown. Ordinarily, failure to have an attorney shall not constitute sufficient cause to grant a continuance.

These rules are effective the 18th day of September, 1997.

Case Notes

Application for Extraordinary Relief from Montana Supreme Court Only Recourse for Defendant Who Wishes to Challenge Decision of the Sentence Review Division: The District Court lacked jurisdiction to review decisions of the Sentence Review Division because it is a division of the Montana Supreme Court. Jordan v. St., 2008 MT 334, 346 M 193, 194 P3d 657, (2008).

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a "no review" window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the "no review" window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Challenge to Equity of Sentence Properly With Sentence Review Division, Not Supreme Court: A challenge to the equity of a sentence, as opposed to the legality of a sentence, properly lies with the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court, which does not review a sentence on appeal for mere inequity or disparity. In this case, defendant cloaked an equity challenge in the vestiges of a constitutional argument in seeking Supreme Court review, but the court declined to address it, leaving the matter to the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004), following St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202 (1995), and followed in St. v. Baker, 2008 MT 396, 347 M 159, 197 P3d 1001 (2008).

No Due Process Right to Sentence Review — Actual Incarceration Required Before Sentence Subject to Review — Suspended Sentences Precluded From Review: Holt pleaded guilty to sexual assault, received a 10-year suspended sentence, and subsequently applied for sentence review. The Sentence Review Division denied the application on grounds that Holt did not qualify for sentence review because his sentence was suspended in its entirety and involved no actual incarceration. Holt appealed, alleging violation of his due process rights. After granting Holt's writ of supervisory control pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 2(2), Mont. Const., and former Rule 17(a), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), the Supreme Court held that sentence review is not a constitutional right, but rather a system that the Legislature voluntarily created. Thus, the discretion to determine the circumstances and conditions under which sentence review will be allowed lies with the Legislature, and the state's discretion is not subject to due process concerns unless it offends some principle of justice so deeply rooted in the traditions and conscience of the people as to be ranked fundamental (see Mont. v. Egelhoff, 518 US 37, 135 L Ed 2d 361, 116 S Ct 2013 (1996)). The Sentence Review Division's interpretation of 46-18-903(1), excluding a person who is not incarcerated from sentence review, comports with the rules of statutory construction, is consistent with the sentence review statutes as a whole, reflects the intent of the Legislature, avoids absurd or unduly harsh results, and is entitled to deference because the Division is charged with administration of the sentence review statutes. Because sentence review is a statutory right of relatively recent origin, the due process clauses of the U.S. and Montana Constitutions do not demand that sentence review be available at all, nor do they limit the Legislature's restriction of sentence review to defendants who are actually incarcerated. State ex rel. Holt v. District Court, 2000 MT 142, 300 M 35, 3 P3d 608, 57 St. Rep. 560 (2000).

Standard of Review of Criminal Sentence Clarified — Supreme Court Review of Legality of Sentence Only: In an effort to clear up a prevalent inconsistency in Montana case law regarding the appropriate standard of review of criminal sentences, the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, i.e., whether the sentence is within the parameters provided by statute, which in turn implies de novo review—a sentence is either legal or it is not. The court overruled St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and any other Montana decision that suggests that the Supreme Court will also review criminal sentences for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), followed in St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002). However, see St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), wherein the Supreme Court fashioned a hybrid standard of review for offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions but no term of incarceration who are ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division. In reviewing those sentences, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division.

Authority to Amend Written Judgment to List Reasons for Parole Restriction: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to state its reasons for restricting parole eligibility in the court's original written judgment and that further error occurred when the court amended the written judgment, following remand from the Sentence Review Division, to list the reasons parole was restricted. Under 46-18-117 (now repealed), the District Court may correct an erroneous sentence at any time to correct clerical errors and to make the record reflect what was actually decided, as long as the correction does not set aside the judgment or change what was originally intended. Here, the amended judgment was consistent with the oral pronouncement of judgment and merely set forth the reasons for imposing the parole restriction. Further, 46-18-117 (now repealed) allows correction of a sentence following remand from an appellate court. The Sentence Review Division functions as part of the appellate process. Thus, when the Division remanded the matter to the District Court for clarification, the court had the express statutory authority to issue an order amending the written judgment to list its reasons for imposing the parole eligibility restriction. St. v. Christianson, 1999 MT 156, 295 M 100, 983 P2d 909, 56 St. Rep. 613 (1999).

Failure to Appoint Counsel for Defendant During Sentence Review Process — Sentence Review as Critical Stage of Proceedings: To the extent that the Sentence Review Division has the power to impose any sentence that could be imposed by the District Court, including increasing a sentence, sentence review is a critical stage of the proceedings against a defendant because of the potential for substantial prejudice from possible further loss of liberty. Therefore, assistance of counsel is necessary to aid a defendant in presenting the defendant's case during all stages of the review process. Defendant's mere appearance before the Sentence Review Division does not constitute a valid waiver of the right to counsel. Thus, it is the duty of the Sentence Review Division to inform a defendant of the right to counsel representation both when deciding whether to file an application for review and when appearing and presenting a case to the Division. The Sentence Review Division rule holding to the contrary was held to be unconstitutional. Ranta v. St., 1998 MT 95, 288 M 391, 958 P2d 670, 55 St. Rep. 378 (1998), following Consiglio v. Warden, St. Prison, 220 A2d 269 (Conn. 1966).

Suspended Sentence Properly Revoked — No Supreme Court Review of Disparate Sentences: Baisch's sentence was suspended on condition that, among other things, he remain law-abiding, undergo a psychological examination, and complete his graduate equivalency diploma within 1 year. When Baisch's probation officer called Baisch in to inquire as to why he was not meeting appointments in fulfilling his diploma requirements, Baisch became belligerent and was arrested for assault and criminal mischief. The charges were dismissed because of a defect in language, but the state petitioned to revoke the suspended sentence anyway. The state met its burden of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that Baisch violated the terms of probation, and the District Court did not err in reinstating Baisch's 7-year prison term. Baisch's argument that the sentence was too harsh was not appropriate for consideration by the Supreme Court because arguments of that nature are reserved for consideration by the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Baisch, 1998 MT 12, 287 M 191, 953 P2d 1070, 55 St. Rep. 41 (1998), followed in St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

This section empowers the review division to review sentences of incarceration for one year or more in the State Prison. Upon imposition of sentence, the clerk of the sentencing Court must give the defendant written notice of this right of appeal to the review division and notice of the possibility that his sentence may be increased on appeal. The trial Judge may submit a statement of his reasons for a particular sentence to the review division and the review division may require the submission of such a statement.

Case Notes

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a "no review" window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the "no review" window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

No Due Process Right to Sentence Review — Actual Incarceration Required Before Sentence Subject to Review — Suspended Sentences Precluded From Review: Holt pleaded guilty to sexual assault, received a 10-year suspended sentence, and subsequently applied for sentence review. The Sentence Review Division denied the application on grounds that Holt did not qualify for sentence review because his sentence was suspended in its entirety and involved no actual incarceration. Holt appealed, alleging violation of his due process rights. After granting Holt's writ of supervisory control pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 2(2), Mont. Const., and former Rule 17(a), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), the Supreme Court held that sentence review is not a constitutional right, but rather a system that the Legislature voluntarily created. Thus, the discretion to determine the circumstances and conditions under which sentence review will be allowed lies with the Legislature, and the state's discretion is not subject to due process concerns unless it offends some principle of justice so deeply rooted in the traditions and conscience of the people as to be ranked fundamental (see Mont. v. Egelhoff, 518 US 37, 135 L Ed 2d 361, 116 S Ct 2013 (1996)). The Sentence Review Division's interpretation of subsection (1) of this section, excluding a person who is not incarcerated from sentence review, comports with the rules of statutory construction, is consistent with the sentence review statutes as a whole, reflects the intent of the Legislature, avoids absurd or unduly harsh results, and is entitled to deference because the Division is charged with administration of the sentence review statutes. Because sentence review is a statutory right of relatively recent origin, the due process clauses of the U.S. and Montana Constitutions do not demand that sentence review be available at all, nor do they limit the Legislature's restriction of sentence review to defendants who are actually incarcerated. State ex rel. Holt v. District Court, 2000 MT 142, 300 M 35, 3 P3d 608, 57 St. Rep. 560 (2000).

Lack of Sentence Review Process for Misdemeanants Not Violative of Equal Protection: The plain language of this section applies the sentence review process only to felons facing incarceration in the state prison, not to misdemeanants. Because felons and misdemeanants are not similarly situated classes, the lack of a sentence review process for misdemeanants does not violate equal protection guarantees. St. v. Renee, 1999 MT 135, 294 M 527, 983 P2d 893, 56 St. Rep. 545 (1999).

Application for Sentence Review Not Considered Direct Appeal — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: Postconviction relief provides a defendant with a procedure to address claims that would have been raised by means of a petition for writ of habeas corpus or a writ of error coram nobis, while the Sentence Review Division reviews the equity of a sentence. The plain language of 46-21-105 makes it clear that an application for review of a sentence, as contained in this section, is not a direct appeal within the context of 46-21-105. Further, the common-law rule of plain error does not extend to cases in which a defendant had the opportunity to challenge a dangerous offender designation on direct appeal but chose not to. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

This section gives the review division the authority to substitute any sentence the trial judge could have imposed, including an increased term. It is intended that the statute be construed so as to prevent the consideration of the evidence which was not before the trial judge, such as post-sentence rehabilitation, and cooperation, but allows the division to require the production of pre-sentence reports, transcript of sentencing day proceedings, and other documents such as psychiatric reports that were before the primary sentencing authority, and any other relevant material that could have or should have been obtained at the time of sentencing.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 69 in (1)(a)(i) after "imposed" deleted "either increasing or decreasing the penalty"; at end of (1)(a)(ii) inserted "including a decrease or increase in the penalty"; in (2) at beginning of second sentence substituted "The person requesting the review may appear and has the right to be represented by counsel" for "The appellant may appear and be represented by counsel"; in (3) near end of second sentence substituted "person" for "defendant"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

1985 Amendment: In (2) inserted last sentence allowing other interested persons to attend and participate in the review; and in (3) inserted first sentence creating a presumption that the District Court sentence is correct.

Case Notes

Failure to Appoint Counsel for Defendant During Sentence Review Process — Sentence Review as Critical Stage of Proceedings: To the extent that the Sentence Review Division has the power to impose any sentence that could be imposed by the District Court, including increasing a sentence, sentence review is a critical stage of the proceedings against a defendant because of the potential for substantial prejudice from possible further loss of liberty. Therefore, assistance of counsel is necessary to aid a defendant in presenting the defendant's case during all stages of the review process. Defendant's mere appearance before the Sentence Review Division does not constitute a valid waiver of the right to counsel. Thus, it is the duty of the Sentence Review Division to inform a defendant of the right to counsel representation both when deciding whether to file an application for review and when appearing and presenting a case to the Division. The Sentence Review Division rule holding to the contrary was held to be unconstitutional. Ranta v. St., 1998 MT 95, 288 M 391, 958 P2d 670, 55 St. Rep. 378 (1998), following Consiglio v. Warden, St. Prison, 220 A2d 269 (Conn. 1966).

Stiffening of Sentence by Sentence Review Division That Found Original Sentence Not Inadequate: Offender pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and was sentenced to 20 years in the state prison. The Sentence Review Division found that the sentence was not inadequate or excessive, but modified the sentence to provide for no parole until 7 years had been served and to require completion of the prison's anger management program and other counseling considered appropriate by the staff. The Division stated that the modification was made because during the sentence review hearing, offender showed no remorse or concern for the victim, showed disdain for the victim, and accepted no responsibility for his actions. On petition for postconviction relief, the court held that having found that the original sentence was not inadequate, the Sentence Review Division lacked jurisdiction to alter the sentence. The court struck the modification from the sentence. St. v. Torres, 277 M 514, 922 P2d 1180, 53 St. Rep. 826 (1996).

Review of Sentence for Inequity: Review of a sentence for mere inequity or disparity is for the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court, which will review only for legality of the sentence, under the abuse of discretion standard. St. v. Lloyd, 208 M 195, 676 P2d 229, 41 St. Rep. 263 (1984), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991). See also St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

Implications of Decision to Let Sentence Stand: Given the function of the Sentence Review Division, its decision to leave as originally imposed a 40-year sentence for robbery amounts to an implicit finding that the sentence was not so greatly disproportionate to the crime so as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. In re Jones, 176 M 412, 578 P2d 1150 (1978).

Sentence Increase: An increase of a sentence under this section did not constitute double jeopardy or denial of due process or equal protection of the laws. St. v. Henrich, 162 M 114, 509 P2d 288 (1973).

Questions Reviewable: The Review Division established by this chapter provides appellate review of "legal" sentences and therefore could not review the contention of the defendant that his sentence under 45-9-102 was "illegal" because he was denied the statutory presumption in favor of deferred imposition. St. v. Simtob, 154 M 286, 462 P2d 873 (1969).

Finality of Review by Sentence Review Division: The Supreme Court held that the petitioner's challenges to her sentences had previously been reviewed by the Sentence Review Division and that with respect to review of sentences for mere inequity or disparity, the Division's decision is final. No Credit for Time Served on Informal House Arrest: The District Court conditioned Gulbranson's release on bond with informal house arrest. Gulbranson contended that the house arrest restricted his liberty in a manner sufficiently similar to incarceration, as provided in 46-18-403, to require that he be given credit for time served. However, Gulbranson did not cite any legal authority to support the contention, and the Supreme Court declined to consider the unsupported argument. Instead, the Supreme Court held that the informal house arrest in this case was not house arrest as provided for in this part, so 46-18-203 did not require that Gulbranson's sentences be credited with time served for that period. Gulbranson failed to show that the District Court was statutorily required to credit him for time served while released on bond, so it was within the District Court's discretion whether to allow credit. Absent an abuse of discretion, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gulbranson, 2003 MT 139, 316 M 163, 69 P3d 1187 (2003), followed in St. v. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Case Notes

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Alteration of Judgment: The warden of the state prison has no authority to change or alter a judgment of conviction in any particular. State ex rel. Nelson v. Ellsworth, 141 M 78, 375 P2d 316 (1962).

Authority to Detain:

Proceedings in contempt are in their nature criminal, and the order adjudging one in contempt is in its nature a final judgment, but the Sheriff cannot execute a judgment in a criminal matter or proceeding without "competent authority", as provided in 7-32-2205. Hence, when one has been committed for contempt and the Sheriff does not hold a certified copy of the order of commitment, he is not authorized to detain the person so committed. In re Mettler, 50 M 299, 146 P 747 (1915).

The certified copy of the judgment is the evidence of the warden's authority for detaining the prisoner. Stephens v. Conley, 48 M 352, 138 P 189 (1914).

Case Notes

Fine or Imprisonment:

A judgment under former law requiring a defendant who was convicted on three counts of an information charging violations of the liquor law to pay a fine of $200 and to serve 60 days in the county jail on each count and, if the fines were not paid, to serve them out at the rate of 1 day for each $2 of the fines was held not uncertain or ambiguous. It meant that he would be imprisoned for a total of 180 days and would serve 1 day for each $2 of the fines aggregating $600. In re Pyle, 72 M 494, 234 P 254 (1925).

The District Court had the power under a former statute to impose a sentence of imprisonment in the county jail for a certain number of days, the defendant in addition to pay a fine in a stated amount and, in default of payment, to stand committed 1 day for every $2 of the fine after expiration of the term of imprisonment until the fine was paid. In re Londos, 54 M 418, 170 P 1045 (1918).

A judgment under former law in a case of misdemeanor, imposing a fine of $500 and providing that in default of payment the defendant be imprisoned "for the term of one day for each $2 of said fine", was sufficiently definite and certain. State ex rel. Poindexter v. District Court, 51 M 186, 149 P 958 (1915).

Attorney General's Opinions

Imprisonment in County Jail Upon Failure to Pay Traffic Fine: Both 61-8-711 and 46-19-102 concern imprisonment upon failure to pay fines for traffic offenses. Because a particular statute governs when a general statute and a particular statute on the same subject are inconsistent, 61-8-711 governs. However, if the failure to pay is based on indigency, constitutional issues arise. The courts have recognized the infirmity of imposing a fine as a sentence and then converting it into a jail term simply because the defendant is indigent and cannot forthwith pay the fine in full. 38 A.G. Op. 61 (1980).

This section does not change the law in any way but merely combines into one provision separate statutes dealing with execution of the death sentence. It should be noted that the commission has not considered the propriety of capital punishment, but has redrafted a law in conformity with what appears to be the present public policy of this state.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 387 in (3) near end before "pronounces" substituted "coroner or deputy coroner" for "licensed physician" and at end after "dead" deleted "according to accepted standards of medical practice"; in (6)(b) substituted present language designating the makeup of witnesses for an execution for former language that read: "The warden shall allow the execution to be observed by 12 witnesses, 3 of whom may be designated by the person to be executed"; inserted (6)(c) providing grounds for rejection of a witness by the department of corrections; inserted (8) providing that rejection of a witness is not grounds for staying an execution; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 491 in (2) substituted "the Montana state prison or the Montana women's prison" for "a state prison". Amendment effective April 27, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 92 in (3), after "inflicted by", deleted "hanging the defendant by the neck until he is dead or, at the election of the defendant, by" and deleted second sentence that read: "A defendant who wishes to choose execution by lethal injection shall do so at the hearing at which an execution date is set, and if he does not, the option to choose death by lethal injection is waived"; in (4), in second sentence, substituted "director of the department of corrections" for "warden of the state prison" and in third sentence substituted "director" for "warden" and after "judgment" deleted "method of execution"; in first sentence in (6), after "execution", deleted "carried out by lethal injection"; in (7), after "time", deleted "mode, and manner in which"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 19, 1997.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 92, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-19-103 and 46-23-301] applies to death warrants issued by a court on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 19, 1997.

1989 Amendment: In second sentence of (1) substituted "20" for "5"; inserted last sentence of (3) relating to time for choosing execution by lethal injection; inserted (4) relating to preparation, delivery, and contents of death warrant; in (5) substituted reference to subsection (6) for reference to subsection (5) and inserted last two sentences relating to anonymity of executioner and confidentiality of facts pertaining to his selection and training; and at beginning of (7) inserted "Within 20 days" and after "the warden shall" substituted "return the death warrant to the clerk of the court from which it was issued, noting on the warrant the time, mode, and manner" for "make a return upon the death warrant showing time, mode, and manner". Amendment effective April 15, 1989.

1987 Amendment: In (4), in second sentence, changed "subsection (4)" to "subsection (5)".

1983 Amendments — Applicability: Chapter 292 inserted (2) authorizing the Sheriff to deliver defendant to the State Prison and placing confinement costs on the state.

Chapter 411, in (3), after "by the neck until he is dead" inserted optional provision for death by lethal injection; in (4), substituted language requiring the prison warden to provide a suitable room for executions and all implements necessary, to select the person to perform the execution, and to supervise the execution for "A sentence of death must be executed within the walls or yard of a jail or some convenient private place in the county where the trial took place."; in (5), substituted language concerning an execution carried out by lethal injection and requiring witnesses for "The sheriff of the county must be present and shall supervise such execution which shall be conducted in the presence of a physician, the county attorney of the county, and at least 12 reputable citizens to be selected by the sheriff. The sheriff shall, at the request of the defendant, permit such priests or ministers, not exceeding two, as the defendant may name and only persons, relatives, or friends, not to exceed five, to be present at the execution together with such peace officers as he may think expedient to witness the execution. No other persons than those mentioned in this subsection can be present at the execution, nor can any person under age be allowed to witness the same."; and in (6), changed "sheriff" to "warden".

Section 7, Ch. 411, L. 1983, provided: "This act applies to death sentences whether first pronounced before or after its effective date. The legislature intends this act to apply retroactively under 1-2-109." Effective on passage and approval, April 7, 1983.

1981 Amendment: Added the last sentence of (1) relating to setting the execution date after a stay.

Case Notes

Abolition of Hanging — No Denial of Right to Attack Hanging as Unconstitutional: Execution by hanging does not violate the eighth amendment. Even if it did, the petitioner's execution would not thus be prevented because the alternative method, lethal injection, could be used, and he is not attacking that method. When the 1997 Montana Legislature abolished hanging, the eighth amendment claim became moot. Petitioner has no constitutionally protected interest in a choice of death penalty punishment. His claim that hanging, which he had selected, violated the eighth amendment and that the Legislature's abolishment of hanging denies him a vested right in that claim, a claim he asserts would have prevailed, resulting in the fact that he could not be executed by lethal injection, is denied. Abolition of hanging was not a bill of attainder intended to render the petitioner's claim moot. Langford v. Day, 134 F3d 1381 (9th Cir. 1998).

Criteria Met for Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Death Row Petition for Injunctive Relief: Pursuant to the version of this section that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended this section by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford then filed an original proceeding with the Montana Supreme Court, asserting that the state impermissibly truncated his ability to fully appeal his death sentence by removing hanging as a means of execution and that the state should be permanently enjoined from executing him under the current version of this section. After examining the applicable statutory criteria, the Supreme Court accepted jurisdiction of the petition for writ of injunction because: (1) the state was clearly a party to the action; (2) the public had an interest in establishing and maintaining the validity of state actions in a proceeding that attempted to curtail the state's ability to enact, amend, and enforce state legislation; and (3) Langford's imminent execution constituted sufficient emergency circumstances to render due consideration in the trial court and appeal to the Supreme Court an inadequate remedy. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997).

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Bill of Attainder: Pursuant to the version of this section that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended this section by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to this section constituted a bill of attainder in violation of Art. II, sec. 30, Mont. Const., inflicting punishment without a judicial trial. However, this section does not inflict punishment, but simply delineates the procedure by which a previously imposed sentence is carried out. Thus, the amendment to this section was not a bill of attainder. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997).

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Denial of Ability to Present Argument Regarding Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Pursuant to the version of this section that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended this section by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to this section violated numerous constitutional provisions by denying him the ability to present the cruel and unusual punishment argument to the federal courts. The Supreme Court found no merit in Langford's argument that the state Attorney General advised the Legislature to amend this section in order to deny Langford the grounds for appeal, because the Attorney General supported but did not initiate the legislation. Further, the court did not agree with Langford's assertion that the amendment rendered the time that Langford spent in pursuing the cruel and unusual punishment argument retroactively useless and chargeable to the state as a form of cruel and unusual punishment in itself, because the eighth amendment argument was not the only claim that Langford pursued. Therefore, the entire time could not be charged to the state as being related to the amendment to this section. Having concluded that Langford failed to establish any constitutional violations, his petition for writ of injunction staying his execution was denied. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997).

Deletion of Hanging as Form of Capital Punishment Not Ex Post Facto Application: Pursuant to the version of this section that was in effect at the time that Langford was sentenced for execution, he affirmatively elected that death be imposed by hanging rather than lethal injection. Langford appealed to the District Court for a declaration that execution by hanging was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The District Court denied the motion, holding that Langford's choice of hanging rendered the cruel and unusual punishment argument moot. Langford appealed to the appropriate federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, applying the same argument. During the pendency of Langford's federal habeas corpus proceedings, the Montana Legislature met and amended this section by removing the hanging option, rendering the federal proceedings moot and nonjusticiable. Langford asserted that the amendment to this section constituted an ex post facto law in violation of Art. II, sec. 31, Mont. Const., because it effectively removed his defense of arguing that hanging was cruel and unusual punishment. However, Langford was not asserting a defense to a crime with which he was charged; he had already pleaded guilty and been sentenced, and the validity of the convictions was not at issue. The Supreme Court found no ex post facto violation because Langford's purely conjectural assertions that he potentially would have a due process-type right to avoid execution under the earlier version of the statute did not create a current substantive right that would be infringed by an amendment altering only the procedure by which his sentence would be carried out. Langford v. St., 287 M 107, 951 P2d 1357, 54 St. Rep. 1522 (1997). See also McKenzie v. Day, 57 F3d 1461 (9th Cir. 1995).

State Not Required to Wait Five Years to Execute Convict: Upon the dissolution of Gollehon's stay of execution, the District Court set a new execution date within 90 days of the hearing dissolving the stay, as required by this section. Gollehon argued that the state could not execute him prior to the expiration of the 5-year period provided in 46-21-102 for petitioning for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court held that the provisions concerning postconviction relief do not override the statutory language requiring the setting of a new execution date upon the dissolution of a stay of execution. Gollehon v. District Court, 271 M 363, 897 P2d 1058, 52 St. Rep. 447 (1995), followed in State ex rel. Turner v. District Court, 271 M 392, 897 P2d 1060, 52 St. Rep. 498 (1995).

Authority of Replacement Judge to Reset Execution Date: McKenzie argued that the judge presiding over the resetting of McKenzie's execution date had no jurisdiction to do so because the original presiding judge or that judge's successor did not enter an order conferring jurisdiction. However, this section rather than 3-1-804 controls in this situation. This section reposes the act of setting the execution date and signing the death warrant in the court in which the defendant was sentenced. Because both judges preside in the same district, resetting of the execution by the subsequent judge was proper and the requirement in 3-1-804, which relates to the substitution of District Court Judges, did not apply. St. v. McKenzie, 271 M 32, 894 P2d 289, 52 St. Rep. 312 (1995).

No Discharge of Prisoner Sentenced to Die Based on Failure to Execute Death Warrant on Date Fixed: McKenzie contended that under the law in effect at the time that he was sentenced to death in 1975 (section 95-2303(b), R.C.M. 1947, a predecessor to this section), the execution had to be conducted within 60 days of sentencing and the sentencing court had no jurisdiction to reset the execution date if the 60 days elapsed. However, the section was amended in 1981 to require the court to set a new execution date upon dissolution of a stay of execution. Because the order resetting the execution date was merely a procedural, ministerial act that did not affect McKenzie's substantial rights, the controlling law was the law in effect at the time of the court's resetting the execution date. The Supreme Court also cited several out-of-state court precedents for the proposition that failure to execute a death warrant on the date fixed does not result in immunity to or discharge of a person sentenced to die but requires the fixing of a new execution date. Thus, the resentencing court did not err in resetting the execution date according to this section. St. v. McKenzie, 271 M 32, 894 P2d 289, 52 St. Rep. 312 (1995).

No Violation of Ex Post Facto Prohibitions: This section, imposing an obligation to set a date of execution at the time that sentence is pronounced, does not confer upon a state trial court any authority to reconsider a death sentence once it has been pronounced and therefore does not violate ex post facto prohibitions. McKenzie v. Day, 57 F3d 1461 (1995).

Failure to Choose Method of Execution as Waiver of Right to Election of Methods: Defendant chose not to speak in answer to the sentencing court's question concerning method of execution. Defendant's silence constituted a waiver of the right to election of methods, rendering moot any later arguments regarding whether execution by hanging can be considered cruel and unusual punishment. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993). See also St. v. Langford, 254 M 44, 833 P2d 1127 (1992).

Election of Hanging as Precluding Contention That Hanging a Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Langford sought a declaration that punishment by hanging was a cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.). However, he had been afforded an ample opportunity under this section to elect lethal injection over hanging as the form of execution but chose not to do so. Accordingly, he rendered moot any claim concerning the constitutionality of hanging as a method of execution. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Langford, 254 M 44, 833 P2d 1127, 49 St. Rep. 615 (1992).

1983 Amendments Not Bill of Attainder: Chapter 411, L. 1983, amended 46-19-103 to allow the defendant to choose death by lethal injection as an alternative to hanging. Section 7 makes the act applicable to death sentences whether first pronounced before or after its effective date, making the act specifically retroactive. The act is not a bill of attainder as argued by the defendant who was convicted before the effective date of the act and sentenced to death after its effective date. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Fitzpatrick, 211 M 341, 684 P2d 1112, 41 St. Rep. 1400 (1984).

Hanging Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: There is no evidence that shows that death from hanging, when properly carried out, is anything other than swift and immediate or that hanging results in any more suffering than that associated with other modes of execution. The Supreme Court has no power to change the legislatively settled provisions of the sentence in the absence of constitutional violation. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000 (1979).

CHAPTER 20
APPEALS

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Supreme Court Rules Governing Criminal Appellate Procedure — Certain Title 46, Ch. 20, Sections Superseded: A June 16, 1986, order of the Montana Supreme Court, which became effective on January 19, 1987, amended the Rules of Appellate Civil Procedure by deleting "Civil" from the title and extensively amending the rules to make them applicable to both civil and criminal appellate civil procedure. The court's order stated that certain Title 46, ch. 20, sections were superseded. The superseded sections are: 46-20-102, 46-20-201, 46-20-202, 46-20-203, 46-20-301, 46-20-302, 46-20-303, 46-20-304, 46-20-305, 46-20-306, 46-20-311, 46-20-312, 46-20-313, 46-20-314, 46-20-315, 46-20-316, 46-20-317, 46-20-318, 46-20-319, 46-20-401, 46-20-402, 46-20-403, 46-20-404, 46-20-405, 46-20-406, 46-20-407, 46-20-408, 46-20-409, 46-20-410, 46-20-501, 46-20-502, 46-20-503, 46-20-504, 46-20-511, 46-20-512, 46-20-513, 46-20-601, 46-20-602, 46-20-603, 46-20-604, 46-20-704, 46-20-705.

The advisory commission note preceding the rules as amended reads: "The procedure covering appeals in criminal cases to the supreme court of Montana from Montana district courts has heretofore been found in various statutes. It was decided that for convenience the rules governing procedure for appellate practice should be equally applicable to civil and criminal cases, the same as found in the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. Many of the proposed amendments are minor, designed to make them applicable to criminal cases as well as civil. In such cases, no further advisory commission notes appear necessary."

Interim Study of Delays: SJR 30 (1981) requested an interim study of delays in the administration of appeals of criminal cases in the criminal justice system of Montana and means by which the institutional causes of these delays could be lawfully eliminated and required a report of the findings of the study to the Legislature. The Legislative Council designated the Joint Subcommittee on Judiciary to conduct the study.

Chapter Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER CHAPTER 20

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), distinguishing Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997), and Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

Denial of Appeal Allowed When Right to Postconviction Relief Exercised — No Due Process Violation Found: Finney argued on appeal that he had been denied his right to effective assistance of counsel. Citing Evitts v. Lucey, 469 US 387 (1985), the Supreme Court held that when, as in this case, a criminal defendant was afforded a remedy in postconviction proceedings that have already been reviewed under a different part of the Supreme Court's opinion, there is no violation of the defendant's due process rights in denial of appeal. St. v. Finney, 281 M 58, 931 P2d 1300, 54 St. Rep. 58 (1997), distinguished in Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Trial Judge's Role: Trial judge has a duty to conduct the trial in a speedy and fair manner and is allowed wide latitude in doing so. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Failure to Request More Specific Instructions at Trial Level: On appeal, the defendant argued that more specific instructions were necessary. The defendant, however, did not request more specific instructions at trial. The defendant cannot on appeal hold the state or the trial court responsible for her failure to request more specific instructions. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982).

Deliberate Homicide — Sufficiency of Evidence to Support Guilty Verdict: In determining on appeal whether a criminal conviction is supported by substantial evidence, the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to the State. The defendant's confession was found to have been voluntary, other evidence placed the defendant near the scene at the probable time of the murder, the defendant was unable to explain his whereabouts at the probable time of the murder, and the defendant was unable to explain his wet shoes while every witness who had been with him in the hours before the murder by drowning said the defendant had not walked near any water. This and other evidence, all viewed in the light most favorable to the State, was held sufficient to support conviction for deliberate homicide. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted, Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated on, apparently, another ground and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Standing to Raise Issue on Appeal: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide in which the defendant was convicted of the lesser included offense of aggravated assault, the trial court denied defendant the opportunity to question prospective jurors on the death penalty. As defendant was not convicted of a crime for which he could be sentenced to death, under St. v. Johnson, 75 M 240, 243 P 1073 (1926), he had no standing to raise this issue on appeal. The trial court therefore did not abuse its discretion in refusing defendant's request. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER PART 3
RELATING TO RECORD ON APPEAL

Consequence of Failure to Order Transcript: Where defendant did not order the entire transcript, as required under subsection (2) of 46-20-302 (now superseded) if insufficiency of the evidence is to be argued on appeal, the defendant is precluded from asserting there was a failure of proof as to one element of the offense charged. St. v. Harvey, 219 M 402, 713 P2d 517, 43 St. Rep. 46 (1986).

Motion to Suppress Results of Breathalyzer Test Denied — Affirmed on Appeal — No Transcript Forwarded: Charged with driving under the influence of alcohol, defendant moved to suppress results of Breathalyzer test. The Justice of the Peace denied the motion. In a bench trial the Justice Court found defendant guilty. On appeal to the District Court, defendant renewed his suppression motion on a set of stipulated facts. Motion was denied and defendant was convicted by a jury of violating 61-8-406, but was acquitted of charges under 61-8-401. On appeal to the Supreme Court, defendant stated that no trial transcript was being forwarded since the appeal of the denial of the suppression motion could be reviewed upon the face of the stipulated facts. The state included excerpts of the trial transcript that buttressed the lower court's decision on the suppression motion. The Supreme Court approved the state's approach since the suppression motion denial was not final and could be reversed at any time. St. v. Sharp, 217 M 40, 702 P2d 959, 42 St. Rep. 1009 (1985).

Lost Trial Notes — New Trial Granted — No Double Jeopardy: The defendant did not oppose an order granting him a new trial because the court reporter lost his trial notes but alleged double jeopardy when he failed to get acquitted at the second trial. No valid double jeopardy claim existed because the defendant was not forced to accept retrial. He had available to him procedures under 46-20-304 (now superseded), albeit not totally sufficient, to appeal without benefit of an actual verbatim transcript. Allegations of violation of the right to a speedy trial were unfounded since the initial trial was timely. St. v. Hodgson, 184 M 394, 603 P2d 246 (1979).

Final Judgment Controlling Over Minute Entry: Absent special circumstances indicating otherwise, the final formal judgment as entered by the trial court controls over an inconsistent minute entry. St. v. Owens, 182 M 338, 597 P2d 72 (1979).

Record Not to Be Supplemented by Affidavits: Review is limited to the existing record, which cannot be supplemented or supplanted by affidavits filed for the first time on appeal. St. v. Tiedemann, 178 M 394, 584 P2d 1284, 35 St. Rep. 1705 (1978).

Motion for Partial Transcript: The denial of a motion for a partial transcript is proper when the movant fails to set forth the issues to be appealed. In any event, the motion is within the discretion of the court. (A 1983 amendment required a transcript of the entire proceedings.) St. v. Anderson, 171 M 188, 557 P2d 795 (1976).

Furnishing Transcript — Duty of Court Reporter: When a nonindigent defendant petitioned the court to order the official court reporter to supply him with one original copy of the transcript of his trial and to allow the defendant to supply additional copies required for appeal, the court held that the court reporter must furnish all copies because the court reporter is required to certify the correctness of each copy of the transcript. St. v. Merseal, 167 M 409, 538 P2d 1364 (1974).

Insufficient Financial Need: It would have been unconscionable to permit a proceeding in forma pauperis by a petitioner whose income for the previous year was $13,000 and who had a house, vehicles, and furniture worth over $11,000, even though the petitioner had only a small bank balance and owed over $800 in taxes. Petition of Allen, 156 M 163, 476 P2d 510 (1970).

Duty of Defense Counsel on Appeal: When the court-appointed counsel failed to advise the clerk's office as to what would be required for the record on appeal from a conviction of burglary and there was no record before the Supreme Court, the defendant had been denied his right to effective representation by counsel on his appeal and the cause was remanded to the District Court with directions to revoke appointment of the present counsel and appoint a competent and effective counsel to properly prosecute the appeal. St. v. Bubnash, 139 M 517, 366 P2d 155 (1961).

Copy of Order Constituting Judgment: An appeal by the State in a criminal prosecution from an order made at the close of the State's case in chief, directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, was not subject to dismissal on the ground that the record on appeal did not contain a copy of the order which had all the attributes of a judgment and constituted the judgment. St. v. Thierfelder, 114 M 104, 132 P2d 1035 (1943), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Labbitt, 117 M 26, 156 P2d 163 (1945).

Record on Appeal Sufficient: On an appeal under former law from an order sustaining a demurrer to the information, the record, consisting of the information, the demurrer and the ruling thereon, the notice of appeal, a copy of the minute entries, and the certificate of the Clerk of Court, was held sufficient; no bill of exceptions was necessary since no exception was required to the ruling on the demurrer. St. v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 106 M 182, 76 P2d 81 (1938).

Insufficient Record:

The merits of an appeal in a criminal case will not be considered when the papers constituting the record are included in a bill of exceptions and not certified as the record or identified in any way by the certificate of the Clerk of the District Court or the trial judge. St. v. Farriss, 34 M 424, 87 P 177 (1906).

When the record on appeal does not contain the judgment, the appeal is subject to dismissal on motion. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

The Supreme Court was without jurisdiction to consider an appeal when the record did not contain a copy of the notice of appeal. Butte v. Call, 23 M 94, 57 P 726 (1899).

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a "no review" window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the "no review" window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Standard of Review of Criminal Sentence Clarified — Supreme Court Review of Legality of Sentence Only: In an effort to clear up a prevalent inconsistency in Montana case law regarding the appropriate standard of review of criminal sentences, the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, i.e., whether the sentence is within the parameters provided by statute, which in turn implies de novo review—a sentence is either legal or it is not. The court overruled St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and any other Montana decision that suggests that the Supreme Court will also review criminal sentences for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), followed in St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002). However, see St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), wherein the Supreme Court fashioned a hybrid standard of review for offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions but no term of incarceration who are ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division. In reviewing those sentences, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division.

Pro Se Case Appeal Filed Without Briefs — General Review of Transcript on Court's Motion: Where the defendant made the defense of his deliberate homicide case difficult by failing to cooperate with his several attorneys, and after conviction was granted several extensions by the Supreme Court for filing a transcript and his first brief, but nevertheless failed to file a brief and specifications of error, the Supreme Court on its own motion reviewed the District Court transcript for typical kinds of errors and found: (1) that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction as the defendant was convicted on the basis of his own testimony; (2) that there were no errors in the jury instructions given on the evidence and the elements of the crime; (3) that assistance of counsel was adequate and that the failure of defendant's counsel to subpoena evidence or witnesses was not relevant to the crime charged; and (4) that the statutory penalties for deliberate homicide with a dangerous weapon did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983).

Suppression Question — Psychological Evaluation — Standard of Review: Where two expert witnesses present conflicting evidence during a suppression hearing as to results of psychological evaluations they performed of the defendant and the District Court finds one expert's testimony to be more credible than the other's, such determination will be disturbed on appeal only if it is not supported by substantial credible evidence. In re R.P.S., 188 M 317, 613 P2d 999 (1980), following St. v. Grimestad, 183 M 29, 598 P2d 198 (1979).

Objection of Defendant to Mistrial: The remedy of a criminal defendant lies in an appeal following his conviction or in a post-conviction proceeding except when the Writ of Habeas Corpus is applicable, and the Supreme Court will not suspend the rules to consider the validity of the granting of a motion for a mistrial, but the defendant must proceed in accordance with the rules to secure a prompt and fair trial. State ex rel. LaFlesch v. District Court, 165 M 302, 529 P2d 1403 (1974), overruled in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

Delay Charged to Defendant: When the appellant filed his transcript and subsequently received seven separate orders for extensions of time to file his brief, the court refused his application to vacate the hearing of the appeal. St. v. Cockrell, 130 M 552, 305 P2d 337 (1957).

Jurisdiction Over Appeals From Justices' Courts: The Supreme Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review the judgments or orders of the Justices' Courts. State ex rel. Estes v. Justice Court, 129 M 136, 284 P2d 249 (1955).

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, [sections] 121-1, and 121-2.

This chapter provides a complete, simplified and speedy method of review in all criminal cases. Subsection [(2)] establishes Notice of Appeal as the sole method of review in criminal cases. However, it is not designed to limit or affect any types of review incidental to the extraordinary writs or post-conviction writs or post-conviction relief provided in Chapter [21] of this code.

Case Notes

Failure of Counsel to Preserve Defendant's Request for Appeal Prejudicial Per Se — Out-of-Time Appeal Appropriate Remedy: Despite a request to do so, Tweed's counsel failed to file a timely appeal of Tweed's sexual abuse conviction. Counsel did not intentionally abandon the appeal; rather, the failure was unintentional and resulted from a filing oversight and miscommunication. Nevertheless, the error was prejudicial per se and constituted ineffective assistance of counsel in violation of Tweed's constitutional rights. The failure to timely appeal was excusable, and because postconviction proceedings were considered an inadequate remedy, the Supreme Court decided that an out-of-time appeal was the appropriate remedy and, being in possession of a sufficient record, proceeded to consider the merits of the appeal. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002), following St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Out-of-Time Appeal in Criminal Matters — Exclusive Jurisdiction With Supreme Court: Under this section, the only method for review in criminal cases is by notice of appeal. Time limits for filing an appeal are mandatory and jurisdictional. If a defendant takes no action to perfect an appeal within 90 days of judgment, the District Court loses its jurisdiction and the appeal is out-of-time. However, an out-of-time appeal is a remedy that may be available to a criminal defendant who, through no fault of the defendant, misses a deadline for filing an appeal. Although former Rule 21(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), precluded an out-of-time appeal in a civil case, the Supreme Court is not precluded from addressing a motion for an out-of-time appeal in a criminal case. Further, a District Court lacks jurisdiction to grant an out-of-time appeal. The Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction to grant a motion for an out-of-time appeal, and the motion is considered an original proceeding subject to the provisions of former Rule 17, M.R.App.P. (now superseded). Upon a showing that the failure to timely notice a criminal appeal was excusable under the circumstances, the Supreme Court may conclude that an out-of-time appeal is the appropriate remedy pursuant to former Rule 21(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded). In that event, the matter will be remanded to the District Court with instructions to vacate and reenter judgment to afford the defendant a second opportunity to act within the statutory timeframes for filing notice of appeal. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002).

Petition for Writ to Dismiss: The remedy of an original petition for a writ to dismiss a criminal action was not available on the grounds of double jeopardy after a motion for a mistrial had been granted over the objection of the defendant and the case had been set for a new trial, since the only review in criminal cases is by notice of appeal. State ex rel. LaFlesch v. District Court, 165 M 302, 529 P2d 1403 (1974), overruled in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

46-20-103. Scope of appeal by state.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, [section] 120-1.

The present Montana Code provides for limited areas of appeal by the state in criminal cases. Subsections [(2)(a) through (c)] merely incorporate into the new code, section 94-8104 (1), (2) and (3). Subsections [(2)(d) through (g)] expand the right of appeal by the state. The dismissing of a warrant, suppressing evidence or suppressing an admission or confession, as well as changing the venue of the trial, may result in the destruction of the state's case and should be made the basis of an appeal by the state.

Subsection 4 and (5) of 94-8104 were omitted. Subsection 94-8104(4) is adequately covered by subsection 1(b) (2) and (3). Subsection 94-8104(5) providing for an appeal from an order directing the jury to find for the defendant seems unnecessary. The present code does not give the judge power to direct a verdict nor does the new code intend to give the judge this power.

Section 94-7227 gives the court the power to advise the jury to acquit. This, in effect gives the judge the power to direct a verdict and avoid an appeal since the state cannot appeal from a judgment of acquittal. It seems preferable to omit this section from the code and require the judge to grant a new trial or dismiss the case if he desires to control the outcome of the case.

GENERAL

Improper Denial of State's Right to Appeal Justice's Court Suppression Motion: A Justice's Court granted Willis's motion to suppress that precluded the state from presenting statements made by Willis on the day of an accident on grounds that the state had unlawfully obtained the statements in violation of constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination. The state appealed the Justice's Court's ruling to the District Court, and the District Court granted Willis's motion to dismiss on grounds that the District Court lacked jurisdiction. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Regardless of whether the Justice's Court order suppressed evidence or a confession or admission, the state had a statutory right under 46-20-103 to appeal the Justice's Court's ruling. Trial de novo in District Court was the proper proceeding for the state's appeal pursuant to St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992), and St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987). St. v. Willis, 2008 MT 293, 345 M 402, 192 P3d 691 (2008). See also St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997).

Objection to Dismissal Not Prerequisite to State's Right to Appeal Dismissal: The state did not have to object in Justice's Court to the defendant's motion to dismiss in order to preserve the state's right to appeal the grant of the motion to the District Court. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Trial De Novo Not Prohibited: This section merely lists those general instances in which the state may undertake an appeal from a lower court to a higher court. Nothing in the statute may be construed to prohibit trial de novo in a court of competent jurisdiction. St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987).

Trial De Novo of Criminal Case on Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Review Justice's Court Order Suppressing Evidence: A criminal case on appeal from Justice's Court to District Court must be tried anew in the District Court pursuant to 46-17-311, regardless of which party appeals. Accordingly, a District Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review a Justice's Court order suppressing evidence. St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987), followed in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992).

Application for Writ of Supervisory Control: An application for a Writ of Supervisory Control is an original proceeding and not an appeal. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 173 M 221, 566 P2d 1282 (1977).

Nature of Right to Appeal — Construction:

The right of appeal in a criminal case, unknown to the common law, exists only by virtue of constitutional or statutory enactment. Statutes granting the right of appeal to the State in criminal actions must be strictly construed, and the right limited to the instances mentioned. If the right is not clearly and unequivocally conferred, an appeal does not lie, nor can the right, if conferred, be enlarged by construction of the statute. St. v. Peck, 83 M 327, 271 P 707 (1928).

The right of appeal by the State should be strictly construed and limited to those instances mentioned in the statute. St. v. Northrup, 13 M 522, 35 P 228 (1893); Territory v. Laun, 8 M 322, 20 P 652 (1889).

JUDGMENT OF ACQUITTAL

Acquittal for Mental Disease or Defect:

A judgment of acquittal on the ground of mental disease or defect excluding responsibility could not be directly appealed by the State. St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435, 35 St. Rep. 1496 (1978).

The State had no right of direct appeal of an acquittal by reason of mental defect excluding responsibility because the defendant was not free of control by the court as in the case of a dismissal. St. v. Hagerud, 174 M 361, 570 P2d 1131 (1977).

NONAPPEALABLE DISMISSAL

Dismissal for Insufficient Evidence Not Appealable: Where the defendants were charged with the theft of calves belonging to another and the charges were dismissed for insufficient evidence because the State did not prove the defendants' failure to give notice under 81-4-217, the dismissal of the charges could not be appealed by the State. Under the rationale of St. v. Cool, 174 M 99, 568 P2d 567 (1977) (citing U.S. v. Ball, 163 US 662 (1896), and Fong Foo v. U.S., 369 US 141, 7 L Ed 2d 629, 82 S Ct 671 (1962)), a dismissal for insufficient evidence under the circumstances of this case operates as an acquittal and an appeal constitutes a violation of the defendants' rights against double jeopardy. St. v. Greenwalt, 204 M 196, 663 P2d 1178, 40 St. Rep. 767 (1983).

State Not to Appeal Justice's Court Dismissal:

When a criminal cause in Justice's Court was dismissed because a witness subpoenaed by both parties testified for the prosecution and failed to appear for the defendant, the State had no right to appeal because 46-20-103 applies only to appeals from District Court and 46-17-311 allows appeals from Justice's Court only for the defendant. St. v. Sanchez, 187 M 434, 610 P2d 162 (1980).

At the close of all the evidence, the judge granted a defense motion for a directed verdict of acquittal grounded in alleged failure of the State to present evidence sufficient as a matter of law to give the case to the jury. The judge then dismissed the case. The State had no right to appeal under this section. The court's "dismissal" was an acquittal, whatever its label. Review of an acquittal, on error or otherwise, constitutes double jeopardy. St. v. Cool, 174 M 99, 568 P2d 567 (1977).

Dismissal of Appeal After Appeal to District Court From Justice's Court:

A District Court's order of dismissal of the complaint following an appeal from a conviction in a Justice's Court did not fall within the provisions of the former section and therefore was not an appealable order. St. v. Becko, 125 M 76, 230 P2d 768 (1951).

When the defendant was convicted in a Justice's Court and appealed to the District Court, in which court the action was dismissed on the defendant's motion, the State had no right of appeal under the former section. St. v. McCluskey, 125 M 20, 229 P2d 169 (1951).

The defendant was convicted in a Justice's Court of engaging in the business of plumbing without obtaining a license. He appealed to the District Court where, after trial, the trial court entered judgment that the statute in question was unconstitutional and discharged the defendant. The State appealed. The Supreme Court held that the judgment did not fall within any of the provisions of the former section granting the State the right of appeal in a criminal case, and the appeal was dismissed. St. v. Wright, 91 M 427, 8 P2d 646 (1932).

APPEALABLE ORDERS

District Court Retention of Criminal Jurisdiction — State's Appeal of Order Granting Driving Privileges Not Timely: A condition of Jivelekas's sentence for felony DUI and misdemeanor driving with a revoked or suspended license provided that Jivelekas could not drive unless approval was granted by the sentencing court or Jivelekas's supervising officer. Nearly 2 years after Jivelekas completed all terms of his sentence, he asked the District Court for approval to operate a motor vehicle in order to maintain full-time employment. The state contended that because 61-8-731 required that Jivelekas's probation officer authorize motor vehicle operation, the District Court did not have jurisdiction to consider Jivelekas's motion. The Supreme Court disagreed. Even if the District Court exceeded its statutory authority in imposing the sentence condition, the court still retained jurisdiction to entertain Jivelekas's motion. Additionally, the Supreme Court was precluded from addressing the merits of the state's argument because the state failed to file a timely appeal pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), so the appeal was time-barred. St. v. Jivelekas, 2005 MT 277, 329 M 204, 122 P3d 1248 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Order From Which Appeal Taken Not Required to Be Written: The District Court judge orally dismissed a criminal proceeding after he had ordered a legal intern from the courtroom because the judge considered the intern to be inappropriately attired and when the judge could not locate the appropriate criminal charge in the court file. This section authorizes the state to appeal any order or judgment that has the substantive effect of dismissing the case, whether or not the order is in writing. St. v. Schwictenberg, 237 M 213, 772 P2d 853, 46 St. Rep. 746 (1989).

Pretrial Order Allowing Use of Evidence of Other Crimes: A pretrial order denying a motion in limine to preclude the state from using evidence of other crimes pursuant to Rule 404(b), Montana Rules of Evidence (see Title 26, ch. 10), is appealable within the scope of 46-20-103. St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986). See also St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992). T.W. and Yarns were overruled in St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997), to the extent that a pretrial order excluding evidence based on the rules of evidence, such as relevancy, probative value, or statutory inadmissibility, does not constitute an order suppressing evidence sufficient to form a statutory basis for appeal pursuant to this section.

Voir Dire Not Always Required: The State contended it was error to grant a change of venue prior to voir dire of prospective jurors to determine if an impartial jury could be selected. In this case, defense counsel's affidavit stating facts supporting a finding of alleged prejudice, copies of newspaper accounts of previous Justice's Court trial, and written report of a criminologist regarding a survey of registered voters were sufficient reasonable grounds to support a finding of widespread prejudice. It was not necessary to voir dire prospective jurors prior to granting a change of venue. St. v. Paisley, 204 M 191, 663 P2d 322, 40 St. Rep. 763 (1983).

Right of State to Appeal Denial for a Change of Venue Not Enjoyed by Defendant — No Violation of Equal Protection: Armstrong argued that it is a violation of the equal protection of the law to allow the State to appeal the denial of a request for a change of venue but to refuse that same right to a defendant. The Supreme Court said that the State has no right to appeal following a conviction or acquittal. Therefore, the allowance to the State of an interlocutory appeal for review of orders respecting place of trial, prior to conviction or acquittal, serves a purpose, that the public interest be protected in the handling of criminal cases. There is a rational basis for these appeal provisions in the statute. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341 (1980).

Interlocutory Orders: The State may appeal from an interlocutory order, and such appeals are governed by this chapter. St. v. Bergum, 164 M 155, 520 P2d 653 (1974).

Order Sustaining Demurrer to Information: Under former law, an order sustaining a demurrer to an information constituted a judgment. The former statute authorized an appeal by the State from an adverse judgment on a demurrer to the indictment or information. St. v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 106 M 182, 76 P2d 81 (1938).

Order Arresting Judgment: Regarding the substance of things, an order arresting judgment is in its nature and results a judgment for the defendant. It is a denying of a judgment to the State and a discharge and acquittal of the defendant from any possible consequences that threatened to flow from the information. St. v. Northrup, 13 M 522, 35 P 228 (1893).

NONAPPEALABLE ORDERS

Admissibility of Preliminary Alcohol Screening Test Results for Probable Cause Purposes Only — Clarification and Effect of Orders Suppressing Evidence — Grant of Motion to Exclude Inadmissible Evidence Not Considered Order Suppressing Evidence: The state sought to have the results of a preliminary alcohol screening test admitted into evidence in a DUI case. The City Court denied the motion, and the state immediately appealed to District Court, contending that in denying the motion, the City Court had suppressed evidence and that the statutory 6-month limit on trial of misdemeanors in 46-13-401 was thus exhausted. The Supreme Court noted that the results of a preliminary alcohol screening test pursuant to 61-8-409 are not substantive evidence of the amount of alcohol present in a person's body but instead are an estimate of alcohol concentration only for the purpose of establishing probable cause to believe that a person is under the influence of alcohol prior to making an arrest. An order that suppresses evidence is an order that excludes evidence on the grounds that the evidence was illegally obtained and does not include a pretrial order that excludes evidence based on rules of evidence, such as relevancy, probative value, or statutory inadmissibility. Thus, the City Court order excluding preliminary alcohol screening test results was not an order suppressing evidence but rather an order determining that the results were not substantive evidence at all; therefore, there was no statutory basis under subsection (2)(e) of this section for appeal to District Court. Because City Court jurisdiction was not exhausted by some action authorizing appeal to the District Court, 46-13-401(2) was not satisfied and defendant, who made no move to postpone, was entitled to dismissal of the DUI charge with prejudice pursuant to 46-13-401(2) on grounds that he had not received a timely trial. St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997), following St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532 (1986), and St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), overruling inconsistent holdings in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428 (1986), and St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543 (1992), and followed, with regard to limited admissibility of preliminary breath test evidence, in St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003). See also St. v. Crawford, 2003 MT 118, 315 M 480, 68 P3d 848 (2003), and St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 334, 324 M 173, 103 P3d 503 (2004).

Admission of Evidence Under Rape Shield Law — Proper Use of Supervisory Control: The Attorney General petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control in a case in which the District Court had ruled that certain evidence of prior sexual conduct by the victim was admissible in a case charging sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court accepted original jurisdiction of the case, holding that it was a proper case for supervisory control because: (1) once the testimony on prior sexual conduct is given in open court, the injury that the rape shield law was intended to prevent has already occurred; and (2) under 46-20-103, evidentiary rulings under the rape shield law may not be appealed. State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 M 349, 922 P2d 474, 53 St. Rep. 678 (1996).

Refusal by Trial Court to Rule on Admissibility of Suppressed Evidence for Impeachment Purposes — No Error: The state asked the District Court to rule that defendant's statements that had been suppressed from the case in chief could nevertheless be used for impeachment because impeachment is a collateral use to which the exclusionary rule does not apply. When the District Court took the matter under advisement, the state sought to compel the Supreme Court to rule on the issue prior to trial. However, nothing in this section expressly guarantees the state the right to have a lower court suppression ruling in time to perfect an appeal. The power to grant or deny pretrial motions is within the sound discretion of the District Court. Absent a District Court ruling, the impeachment issue was not properly before the Supreme Court. St. v. Moore, 250 M 254, 818 P2d 835, 48 St. Rep. 913 (1991), distinguishing St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532 (1986).

Adverse Evidentiary Ruling Not Suppression of Evidence: A District Court order, sustaining objection to the admission of blood sample analyses in a DUI negligent homicide case because the state could not show a proper chain of custody of the samples, does not constitute a suppression of evidence under subsection (2)(e) of this section and therefore is not an appealable order. St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532, 43 St. Rep. 54 (1986), distinguished in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992).

Order Setting Aside Information: Under former law, an appeal could not be taken by the State from an order setting aside an information. St. v. O'Brien, 20 M 191, 50 P 412 (1897).

Order Made After Judgment: Under former law, the State could not appeal from an order of the District Court sustaining a defendant's plea of former acquittal and jeopardy after the reversal of a conviction for manslaughter under an indictment charging murder in the first degree. St. v. O'Brien, 19 M 6, 47 P 103 (1896).

Source: M.R.App.P.—[former] Rule 2 [now superseded].

Subsection [(7)] avoids an appeal that might not be necessary because the ultimate decision might be favorable to the defendant (e.g., an appeal from an order to suppress evidence).

[Subsection (2)] also broadens the scope of appeal in one respect. Under the present code it is necessary to make a motion for a new trial and then appeal from an adverse ruling if the grounds of appeal are also the grounds for a motion for a new trial. No such requirement is intended to be imposed by this code. All questions heretofore raised on such an appeal may be raised on appeal from the judgment regardless of whether a motion for a new trial has been made in the trial court. Also, in regard to the limitations on appeal imposed by this section it must be kept in mind that other post-conviction proceedings have been provided for in Chapter [21] Post Conviction Hearing. Both this Chapter and Chapter [21], Post Conviction Hearing, provide the defendant with the necessary machinery to obtain relief from an illegal conviction. It is the purpose of Subsection [(2)] to provide one complete, full and adequate review by enlarging the power of the reviewing court. This is accomplished by allowing the court to decide all questions raised by the entire proceeding, below, including an appeal from a motion for a new trial.

It is intended that this section be supplemented by the extensive post conviction remedy.

1983 Amendment: In (2), substituted "alleged error" for "order or decision"; and inserted last sentence making failure to timely object at trial a waiver of the objection.

GENERALLY

Date Defendant Sentenced In Absentia Considered Date of Legally Effective Sentence for Appeal Purposes: Clark was charged with a misdemeanor traffic violation but failed to appear for trial and was tried, convicted, and sentenced by the Municipal Court in absentia pursuant to 46-16-123 on June 12, 2006. A warrant was issued for failure to appear, and Clark appeared before a different Municipal Court on July 14, 2006, and was informed of the June sentence. Clark sought to appeal to District Court, but the District Court dismissed the appeal on grounds that it was untimely. On appeal to the Supreme Court, Clark argued that dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was in error because the period for filing a Municipal Court appeal should have begun on July 14 when he was informed of the June sentence, rather than June 12 when the sentence was actually imposed. The Supreme Court disagreed. A valid sentence was imposed on June 12 and was not subject to postponement or modification until Clark appeared on the bench warrant. By Municipal Court Rule, Clark had until June 26 to file an appeal, but the appeal was not filed until July 28 and was therefore untimely and was properly dismissed by the District Court. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 317, 346 M 80, 193 P3d 934 (2008). See also St. v. Bonamarte, 2006 MT 291, 334 M 376, 147 P3d 220 (2006).

Failure to Preserve Issue for Appeal by Failure to Object at Trial — Plain Error Review Inappropriate Absent Implication of Defendant's Fundamental Rights: At Price's trial for assault with a weapon, a stun gun, the trial court allowed evidence of Price's prior conviction for intimidation. Following conviction, Price appealed on grounds that the evidence was improperly introduced because the state failed to give notice of the intent to introduce other crimes evidence in violation of Price's due process rights. The state contended that Price waived the right to appeal the issue by failing to object to introduction of the evidence and by actively participating in its introduction. The Supreme Court declined to review the issue because Price failed to object to the evidence at trial and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal. Further, plain error review was inappropriate because Price's fundamental constitutional rights were not implicated by introduction of the evidence. St. v. Price, 2007 MT 269, 339 M 399, 171 P3d 293 (2007), followed in St. v. Stearns, 2008 MT 356, 346 M 348, 195 P3d 794 (2008).

Remand or Order to Lift Stay Unnecessary Upon Affirmation by Appellate Court — Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Municipal Court Appeal Affirmed but Remanded by District Court: A Municipal Court sentenced Costa for misdemeanor traffic offenses, then stayed imposition of sentence pending Costa's appeal to District Court. The District Court affirmed judgment and remanded to the Municipal Court for imposition of sentence. The question then arose as to whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to address the District Court's decision. The Supreme Court noted that the definition of remand is to send something back for further action; however, the Legislature did not intend to require an appellate court to formally remand in cases involving affirmed criminal judgments. In addition, it is unnecessary for an appellate court to direct that a stay pending appeal be lifted once a defendant has exhausted the right to appeal and the underlying judgment and sentence have been affirmed. Therefore, the District Court's remand was premature, unnecessary, and of no immediate consequence and had no effect on the Municipal Court's final judgment and sentence. The Municipal Court stayed Costa's sentence pending appeal, which presumably encompassed an appeal to the Supreme Court, so because the District Court's remand was unnecessary, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction over Costa's appeal. Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006).

No Supreme Court Jurisdiction to Hear Appeal Absent Final Judgment: Reeder was convicted of DUI in Municipal Court. Reeder appealed to District Court, raising 22 issues. The District Court found that Reeder's due process rights were not violated, but held that the Municipal Court erroneously admitted the results of an Intoxilyzer test without proper foundation and remanded for a new trial. Reeder appealed the District Court's decision and raised other issues not addressed by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that because Reeder did not currently stand convicted of a criminal offense and because no final judgment of conviction had been entered, the Supreme Court lacked jurisdiction to hear the case, so the appeal was dismissed. St. v. Reeder, 2004 MT 244, 323 M 15, 97 P3d 1104 (2004).

Record-Based Claims of Ineffective Counsel for Failure to Object Considered on Direct Appeal and Denied: Daniels claimed on direct appeal that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because defense counsel failed to investigate and interview certain witnesses in order to present a case in chief and failed to object to certain trial testimony. The state responded that Daniels could not demonstrate that counsel's actions were not objectively reasonable or that there was a reasonable possibility that counsel's errors caused a prejudicial result. The Supreme Court noted that Daniels' claims concerning failure to investigate were not record-based and thus not subject to review on direct appeal, pursuant to Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), and St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001). Regarding the record-based claims of failure to object, the court agreed with the state. The evidence in question was admissible, so counsel was not required to object and could not be considered ineffective for failing to do so. Absent a showing of counsel's deficient performance, Daniels' conviction was affirmed. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003).

District Court Review of Denial of Right to Speedy Trial in Justice's Court — Exception to Trial De Novo: As a general rule, the District Court must try all appeals from Justice's Court de novo and may not sit as a court of review. To ensure a defendant's adequate remedy at law, there is an exception to the general rule if the error complained of is lack of a speedy trial in Justice's Court because that error cannot be cured by trial de novo. Thus, the District Court may rule on a Justice's Court's denial of a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial in the event that the defendant timely appeals the Justice's Court conviction and sentence to the District Court and raises the speedy trial issue as part of the appeal. State ex rel. Wilson v. District Court, 270 M 449, 893 P2d 318, 52 St. Rep. 264 (1995).

Judgment and Sentence Prerequisite to Appeal to District Court — Misdemeanors: Except for misdemeanors listed in 3-5-302(2), a District Court is limited to appellate jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases. Imposition of sentence and entry of a final judgment by a Justice's Court or City Court are prerequisites to appeal to a District Court, and a party may not consent to subject matter jurisdiction or waive the want of jurisdiction. St. v. Hegeman, 248 M 49, 808 P2d 509, 48 St. Rep. 318 (1991), followed in St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), and St. v. Diesen, 1998 MT 163, 290 M 55, 964 P2d 712, 55 St. Rep. 655 (1998).

Right of State to Appeal Denial for a Change of Venue Not Enjoyed by Defendant — No Violation of Equal Protection: Armstrong argued that it is a violation of the equal protection of the law to allow the State to appeal the denial of a request for a change of venue but to refuse that same right to a defendant. The Supreme Court said that the State has no right to appeal following a conviction or acquittal. Therefore, the allowance to the State of an interlocutory appeal for review of orders respecting place of trial, prior to conviction or acquittal, serves a purpose, that the public interest be protected in the handling of criminal cases. There is a rational basis for these appeal provisions in the statute. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341 (1980).

Deliberate Homicide — Sufficiency of Evidence to Support Guilty Verdict: In determining on appeal whether a criminal conviction is supported by substantial evidence, the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to the State. The defendant's confession was found to have been voluntary, other evidence placed the defendant near the scene at the probable time of the murder, the defendant was unable to explain his whereabouts at the probable time of the murder, and the defendant was unable to explain his wet shoes while every witness who had been with him in the hours before the murder by drowning said the defendant had not walked near any water. This and other evidence, all viewed in the light most favorable to the State, was held sufficient to support conviction for deliberate homicide. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted, Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated on, apparently, another ground and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Guilty Plea: The issue of suppression of evidence is a matter of defense at trial and may become an issue upon appeal; but when a guilty plea has been entered, the defendant is convicted upon his plea of guilty and not upon the evidence. St. v. Turcotte, 164 M 426, 524 P2d 787 (1974).

Denial of Petition for Writ of Error Coram Nobis: Leave to file an appeal from a denial of a petition for a Writ of Error Coram Nobis by the District Court was denied by the Supreme Court since no leave to file an appeal is required under the law and if an appeal was available from the District Court order, the time therefor had not expired. Brown v. St., 140 M 289, 371 P2d 262 (1962).

Perfecting Appeal While New Trial Motion Pending: The act of the defendant in a criminal prosecution in perfecting an appeal from the judgment of conviction while his motion for a new trial was pending did not deprive the trial court of jurisdiction thereafter to pass upon the motion, or the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to consider the subsequent appeal from the order denying the new trial. St. v. Harkins, 85 M 585, 281 P 551 (1929).

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a "no review" window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the "no review" window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Standard of Review of Criminal Sentence Clarified — Supreme Court Review of Legality of Sentence Only: In an effort to clear up a prevalent inconsistency in Montana case law regarding the appropriate standard of review of criminal sentences, the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, i.e., whether the sentence is within the parameters provided by statute, which in turn implies de novo review—a sentence is either legal or it is not. The court overruled St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and any other Montana decision that suggests that the Supreme Court will also review criminal sentences for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), followed in St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002). However, see St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), wherein the Supreme Court fashioned a hybrid standard of review for offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions but no term of incarceration who are ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division. In reviewing those sentences, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division.

NONAPPEALABLE ISSUES

Sentence Pending — Appeal Premature: Defendant was convicted in Municipal Court of partner or family member assault and sentenced to 1 year with all but 30 days suspended. The sentence also included restitution, conditioned upon the state requesting it or the expiration of a 60-day period. Before either condition occurred, defendant appealed, and the record was transferred to the District Court. Defendant argued in District Court that the restitution order should be stricken, but the judgment and sentence were affirmed. However, the restitution portion was remanded to the Municipal Court. Defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held that because neither sentencing condition had occurred when defendant appealed to the District Court, defendant's sentence was not yet final, so the appeal to the District Court was premature and the District Court had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. Moreover, defendant could not cure the jurisdictional defect by ignoring the restitution issue on appeal to the Supreme Court. Because the restitution issue was still pending, defendant's judgment was not final, and the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to consider the appeal. The Supreme Court noted that defendant's notice of appeal should be considered timely and that defendant's right to appeal should not be prejudiced because of the District Court's error in taking premature jurisdiction over the case and deciding it in piecemeal fashion. St. v. Bonamarte, 2006 MT 291, 334 M 376, 147 P3d 220 (2006).

Generalized Motion In Limine Insufficient to Preserve Appeal of Issue of Admissibility of Specific Prior Bad Conduct Absent Objection: Vukasin's generalized motion in limine to exclude evidence of prior crimes and bad acts was granted. Vukasin later contended that the prosecution introduced improper witness testimony of prior violent conduct that was prejudicial and prevented a fair trial. The Supreme Court noted that while a motion in limine may preserve a specification of error for appeal, the mere act of filing the motion does not negate the obligation to object and to make the basis and grounds for the objection clear to the trial court and that a trial court will not be put in error when that court does not have the opportunity to rule on the admissibility of the evidence and to correct itself. Here, Vukasin made no objection when the evidence was introduced, nor was the broad motion in limine specific enough in itself as to the basis for an objection. The motion did not identify either the specific witness or testimony to which Vukasin later objected on appeal, so the trial court was not alerted by the motion that Vukasin was objecting to the testimony given. Thus, the motion was a generalized objection that did not preserve the evidentiary issue, so appeal of the issue was waived. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), and St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006). See also St. v. Stuit, 277 M 227, 921 P2d 866 (1996).

No Authority to Appeal Justice's Court Order Denying Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: The Feights got into a fight with a highway patrol officer at a high school basketball game and were charged with misdemeanor assault. They were informed of their rights in Justice's Court, waived their right to counsel, and pleaded guilty. More than a month later, they moved through counsel to withdraw their guilty pleas, claiming good cause under 46-16-105. The Justice's Court denied the motion, holding that the Feights had been given due process and had voluntarily, knowingly, and willingly entered guilty pleas. The Feights appealed the denial of their motion to withdraw their guilty pleas to District Court. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, contending that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to review denial of the motion to withdraw a plea. The District Court dismissed the appeal but remanded to Justice's Court with a recommendation that the Feights be allowed to withdraw their pleas. Instead, the Justice's Court reinstated judgment, and the Feights appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed. The statutes that provide for and determine the jurisdiction of a District Court to entertain an appeal from a Justice's Court include 3-5-303, 46-12-204, 46-17-203, and 46-17-311. However, none of these statutes provide authority for appeal to the District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Further, the specific language of these sections prevails over the general language in this section defining the scope of appeal by a criminal defendant. The Legislature has not created a statutory right of appeal from a Justice's Court denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and the Supreme Court refrained from creating one. St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115 (1994), and followed in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of 46-9-107. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and this section. The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 46-22-103. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweiler pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweiler granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that 46-22-103 does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Trieweiler. Justice Trieweiler determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Trieweiler also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of 46-9-107; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of this section. For these reasons, Justice Trieweiler vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

No Appeal, Based on Constitutionality of Offense Charged, From Judgment of Not Guilty by Reason of Mental Disease or Defect: Kaplan was charged with seven counts of stalking under 45-5-220, arising from her repeated contact with her former martial arts instructor. Kaplan moved to dismiss the charges on grounds that 45-5-220 is unconstitutional. Following a briefing, the motion was denied. By stipulation, Kaplan was subsequently found not guilty by reason of mental disease or defect. Because Kaplan was not convicted, there was no judgment of conviction from which to appeal. Therefore, the denial of her motion to dismiss, absent a judgment of conviction, was not itself an appealable order. The proper method of challenging a finding of mental disease or defect is found in 46-14-301 through 46-14-303. Appealing the constitutionality of the statute under which the person was charged is not an option. St. v. Kaplan, 275 M 108, 910 P2d 240, 53 St. Rep. 60 (1996), followed in St. v. Violette, 2009 MT 19, 349 M 81, 201 P3d 804 (2009).

Judgment as Including Sentence — Sentence Not Strictly Premised on Punishment: A defendant had 60 days under former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to appeal a final judgment. Although prior to the 1991 enactment of 46-1-202, "sentence" was interpreted as being the same as "punishment", 46-1-202 now defines a sentence as any judicial disposition of a criminal proceeding upon a plea, verdict, or finding of guilt. The judicial disposition is itself a sentence regardless of whether actual punishment is deferred or imposed immediately. This broader definition applies to deferment cases, but in double jeopardy cases, the narrower meaning premised on the punishment factor still applies. Therefore, a judgment that includes a deferred sentence is final for purposes of appeal, and an appeal filed more that 60 days after sentencing was dismissed as untimely. St. v. Rice, 275 M 81, 910 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 48 (1996), followed in Davis v. St., 2004 MT 112, 321 M 118, 88 P3d 1285 (2004).

Resetting Execution Date Not Considered Appealable Judgment — Setting Execution Date as Ministerial Rather Than Judicial Act: McKenzie was sentenced for deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping, and the death penalty was imposed in 1975. Despite the subsequent process of appeals spanning nearly 20 years, the 1975 sentence was never vacated by any court. The District Court held a hearing in 1995 to reset the execution date after the appeals proceedings, none of which were ultimately successful for McKenzie, had run their course. McKenzie claimed that the hearing constituted a resentence that reimposed the death sentence, which was beyond the jurisdiction of the District Court. The Supreme Court noted that setting the execution date was a ministerial function rather than a judicial act. Because McKenzie's substantial rights could not be implicated by that ministerial act, the District Court's order resetting the execution date could not be defined as a new judgment from which an appeal could lie. The District Court merely executed the judgment before it. Further, under St. v. Hanners, 254 M 524, 839 P2d 1267 (1992), once the valid judgment and sentence had been signed, the District Court had no jurisdiction to vacate the original judgment except as provided by law. Montana has no law allowing amendment of an original judgment at a hearing resetting an execution date. St. v. McKenzie, 271 M 32, 894 P2d 289, 52 St. Rep. 312 (1995).

Order Denying Application for Writ of Certiorari Proper Absent Final Judgment: Wilson appealed to the District Court regarding denial of her application for a writ of certiorari for review of a Justice's Court's ruling denying her motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial in connection with a DUI prosecution that was not completed. However, Wilson was entitled to an appeal only from a final judgment of conviction and from orders after a judgment that affected her substantial rights. Because she was never sentenced, there was no final judgment from which she could appeal. The District Court correctly determined that the speedy trial issue could be raised in connection with Wilson's appeal from Justice's Court to District Court and that denial of the application for a writ of certiorari was proper. State ex rel. Wilson v. District Court, 270 M 449, 893 P2d 318, 52 St. Rep. 264 (1995).

Defense Strategy Not Proper Basis for Appeal: A defendant's decisions in defense strategy do not form a proper basis for an appeal. St. v. Larson, 266 M 28, 878 P2d 886, 51 St. Rep. 638 (1994).

Alleged Error in Instruction Given at Defendant's Request: The Supreme Court would not consider an alleged error in an instruction that was given at defendant's request. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Order Denying Petition for Writ of Prohibition: An order of the District Court denying the petition of the defendant for a Writ of Prohibition to restrain a Justice's Court from further proceedings in a criminal action was not a judgment and could not be appealed. State ex rel. Aho v. Justice Court, 131 M 585, 313 P2d 542 (1957).

ISSUES PRESERVED FOR APPEAL

Only Record-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim on Appeal: Frasure claimed on appeal that her attorney provided ineffective assistance at trial by failing to object to the introduction of certain evidence. However, the Supreme Court will determine that there was ineffective assistance of counsel only if that conclusion can be based on the record on appeal or if there is no plausible justification for counsel's actions or inactions. Frasure failed to establish that her ineffective assistance claim was record-based, so the claim was dismissed without prejudice to the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 305, 323 M 479, 100 P3d 1013 (2004). See also St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Question Defendant's Mental Condition During Sentencing — Alleged Errors in Attorney Performance Properly Resolved in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: Watson petitioned for postconviction relief and claimed that defense counsel provided inadequate assistance at sentencing by not questioning whether Watson suffered from a mental disease or defect. The District Court denied the petition, determining that the ineffective assistance claim was record-based and should have been raised on direct appeal. In St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), the Supreme Court outlined a two-step process for determining whether ineffective assistance claims should have been raised on appeal or in a postconviction hearing. First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for a defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reasons for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expressed a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. Here, the record was devoid of any evidence as to why counsel did not question Watson's mental condition, so Watson could not have properly raised an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Therefore, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for an evidentiary postconviction hearing to determine whether counsel's act or omission was a trial strategy or tactical decision. Watson v. St., 2002 MT 329, 313 M 209, 61 P3d 759 (2002), following Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). See also Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002).

Motion In Limine Sufficient to Preserve Objection for Appeal: Defendant's motion in limine to exclude testimony regarding certain chemicals in his blood and bottles of prescription medication found in his car was sufficient to preserve the objection for appeal. The propriety of the admission of the evidence is a proper issue for the Supreme Court on appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998).

Alford Plea in Sexual Assault Case — Revocation of Suspended Sentence: In a sexual assault case, the defendant sufficiently raised the issue of the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination to warrant review on appeal. The defendant entered an Alford plea, and sexual offender evaluation and treatment were conditions of the suspended sentence. The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it revoked the defendant's suspended sentence for violations of the conditions of the suspended sentence, including sexual offender evaluation and treatment. St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908, 52 St. Rep. 745 (1995).

Denial of Motion for Mistrial: The part of the defendant's appeal claiming that the trial court erred in denying a motion of the defendant for a mistrial was properly before the Supreme Court when it was taken within the time allowed by statute. St. v. Tiedemann, 139 M 237, 362 P2d 529 (1961).

ISSUES NOT RAISED IN LOWER COURT

Failure to Object to Prosecutor's Comment During Closing Argument — Waiver of Issue on Appeal: Misner moved for a new trial on grounds that his counsel was ineffective by failing to object to the prosecutor's comments during closing arguments. The trial court determined that the comments were appropriate references to and reasonable inferences from the evidence, and the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. An attorney may argue and draw reasonable inferences from evidence if facts support the statements, and the prosecutor's inferences that Misner staged the crime scene were reasonable given the blood spatter evidence. There was no reasonable possibility that had Misner's counsel objected to the prosecutor's remarks in closing arguments, the result of the proceeding would have been different, so Misner was not prejudiced, and the ineffective assistance claim was without merit. St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007), following St. v. Grace, 2001 MT 22, 304 M 144, 18 P3d 1008 (2001).

Failure to Raise Legal Theory Regarding Juror Misconduct at Trial: After being convicted of two counts of incest, Rennaker raised for the first time on appeal a new legal theory regarding juror misconduct. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Courville, 2002 MT 330, 313 M 218, 61 P3d 749 (2002), held that even though Rennaker had raised the issue of juror misconduct in the trial court and submitted several affidavits from other jurors regarding that misconduct, his raising of the new theory, that the misconduct affected the jurors' impartiality or contaminated the jury pool, for the first time on appeal would not be considered by the court. St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Effect of Alford Plea on Subsequent Appeals — Request to Withdraw Alford Plea to Be Made in District Court: Hoots entered an Alford plea to DUI charges and later sought to withdraw the plea on appeal, contending that the plea was made only because Hoots was forced to plead guilty after the trial court denied a request for new counsel. However, Hoots did not request to withdraw the plea at any time during the District Court proceedings. Because a motion to withdraw an Alford plea must be made in District Court, the Supreme Court declined to address the issue on appeal. St. v. Hoots, 2005 MT 346, 330 M 144, 127 P3d 369 (2005), following St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908 (1995).

Ineffective Counsel Claims Insufficient to Invoke Plain Error Doctrine on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Novak contended that his counsel's failure to object to certain prejudicial, inadmissible evidence compromised his right to a fair trial and asserted that the Supreme Court should apply the plain error doctrine to review counsel's failure. The Supreme Court held that all of the alleged errors were encompassed in Novak's effective assistance of counsel claim, which could be raised in postconviction proceedings, but were insufficient to invoke the plain error doctrine on direct appeal. St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005).

Review of Legality of Imposing Restitution — Failure to Raise Issue Below: If a defendant appeals a sentence in a criminal case on the grounds that it is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, the issue may be reviewed even if no objection was made at the time of sentencing. Therefore, defendant's claim that an order to pay restitution as a condition to a suspended sentence was illegal was not waived by his failure to raise the issue below and would be reviewed on appeal. St. v. Eaton, 2004 MT 283, 323 M 287, 99 P3d 661 (2004).

Failure to Provide Proof of Entitlement to Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Ellenburg raised several issues on appeal, some of which were raised in District Court and some of which were not. The Supreme Court declined to address all issues that were not preserved for appeal. Several other issues were procedurally barred because Ellenburg either raised them on direct appeal or reasonably could have raised them on direct appeal. Postconviction relief was denied on the remaining issues because Ellenburg waived the right to appeal those issues by failing to provide any evidentiary support for the allegations. The petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), following St. v. Schmalz, 1998 MT 210, 290 M 420, 964 P2d 763 (1998), St. v. Niederklopfer, 2000 MT 187, 300 M 397, 6 P3d 448 (2000), and St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and followed in Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Failure of Trial Court to Hold Hearing Regarding Juror's Acquaintance With Witness — Waiver Absent Timely Objection — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: During voir dire at Davis's trial, several jurors indicated that they were acquainted with two witnesses but stated that their acquaintance would not affect their ability to sit as jurors. Immediately after the first witness was called, a juror stated to the court that he knew the witness. Without objection from Davis, the court noted the statement and the witness proceeded to testify. Following conviction, Davis appealed on grounds that the court should have held a hearing to determine whether the juror was biased and that failure to do so violated Davis's right to an impartial jury. The Supreme Court disagreed. Davis's failure to object at trial constituted a waiver of appellate review of the issue. Further, Davis did not meet the narrow criteria in St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), to warrant plain error review. Judgment was affirmed. St. v. Davis, 2003 MT 341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003), followed in St. v. Taylor, 2009 MT 161, 350 M 447, 208 P3d 422 (2009).

Failure to Raise Issue of Court Bias at Trial — Consideration of Issue Precluded on Appeal — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: Following conviction for felony stalking, defendant contended on appeal that there was bias against him at trial because the victim worked for the County Attorney's office where the District Court was located, so both the office and the District Court Judge should have recused themselves. However, the plain error doctrine did not apply under the limited exceptions in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), and because the issue was not raised at trial, the Supreme Court declined to address it for the first time on appeal. St. v. Adgerson, 2003 MT 284, 318 M 22, 78 P3d 850 (2003).

Admissibility of Jail Medication Sign-Out Sheet to Show Inmate Drug Availability — Jail Drug Sale Conviction Affirmed: Defendant was convicted of sale of dangerous drugs after a jail inmate testified that he observed defendant and another inmate taking drugs that could have come only from defendant's prescription in the jail medication box. Defendant contended that admission of the jail medication sign-out sheet was improper because the prosecution failed to qualify the officer as custodian of or knowledgeable of the record. The Supreme Court noted that after the District Court overruled defense counsel's nonspecific objection to the officer's direct testimony, counsel then failed to assert any new objection on the basis of inadequate foundation, hearsay, or other grounds. By remaining silent, defendant waived any objection to admission of the medication sign-out sheet and failed to preserve the issue for appeal. The medication sign-out sheet was properly admitted absent a timely objection. St. v. Vandersloot, 2003 MT 179, 316 M 405, 73 P3d 174 (2003).

Failure to Object at Trial Constituting Waiver of Right to Claim Prosecutorial Misconduct on Appeal: Azure argued on appeal that the state committed prosecutorial misconduct by introducing allegedly false evidence during Azure's homicide trial regarding threats that Azure allegedly made toward the victim's brother on the night of the shooting. However, Azure made no contemporaneous objection to the testimony during trial, which constituted a waiver of Azure's right to appellate review of the claim. St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002). See also St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271 (1992), and St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290 (1994).

No Review on Direct Appeal of Allegation of Improper Jury Impanelment Absent Objection at Trial: Azure appealed a conviction for deliberate homicide on grounds that the jury was unlawfully impaneled, citing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000). Azure noted that he was tried 2 months after Lamere, in the same judicial district, and that it was probable that the same improper jury impanelment used in Lamere was used in Azure's case, making Azure's trial illegal as well. Azure asked the Supreme Court to remand for factfinding on the issue, because no record was made as to how the jury was impaneled. The Supreme Court declined to remand. Remanding for a hearing is not a proper remedy for an appeal on direct review, because an evidentiary hearing can be accomplished only in a postconviction hearing. It could not be determined from the record what procedure was used to summon the jury, so the issue could not be reviewed. Further, review pursuant to the plain error doctrine was not available, because there was no record for the Supreme Court to review to determine whether an error occurred, let alone if the error met the criteria of plain error under the common law or 46-20-701. St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Failure to Object at Trial to Refusal to Allow Testimony of Additional Witnesses After Trial Commenced — No Interference With Constitutional Right to Present Defense: LaDue contended that failure to allow the testimony of two additional witnesses after the start of his trial on charges of attempted deliberate homicide interfered with his constitutional right to present a defense. However, LaDue did not raise the constitutional question at trial, thus failing to preserve the issue for appeal. Failure to raise the issue at trial constituted waiver of the right to appeal it. St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Propriety of Prosecutor Vouching for Credibility of Witness Not Open for Appellate Review: Grace argued that the prosecutor had improperly vouched for the credibility of one of the state's witnesses during closing arguments and that he should have been granted a new trial by the lower court. The Supreme Court held that Grace had not objected to the prosecutor's statements during the trial and therefore the issue could not be raised for the first time on appeal. St. v. Grace, 2001 MT 22, 304 M 144, 18 P3d 1008 (2001).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Object to Comments by Judge — Potential Reaction by Jury Held Not to Relieve Necessity for Objection — Plain Error Doctrine Not Applied: During Scarborough's trial for deliberate homicide, the District Court Judge made two statements that Scarborough later interpreted as improper comments on the evidence. However, Scarborough did not object to either comment during the trial. Later, on appeal, Scarborough argued that he decided not to object to the District Court's comments during the trial because he was afraid of alienating the jury. The Supreme Court held that the risk of alienating the jury does not excuse the defense from objecting to what the defense believes is improper comments from the District Court Judge. The Supreme Court held that because the comments were not objected to during the trial, the objection was waived. The Supreme Court also refused to apply the common-law plain error doctrine because, taking the totality of the circumstances into consideration, the Supreme Court did not believe that the conditions requiring the application of that doctrine were presented in the case. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Offer of Proof Necessary to Enable Supreme Court Review of Ruling on Admissibility of Evidence: At Raugust's trial, he attempted to question witnesses regarding his prearrest statements, but the prosecution objected on grounds of hearsay and the trial court sustained the objections. On appeal, Raugust argued that the statements were offered to prove his state of mind rather than for the truth of the matter asserted and that he was thus denied the opportunity to present a defense because of the exclusion of evidence reflecting a reasonable doubt as to his guilt. However, when an objection to evidence is sustained and the answer of a witness is not apparent, an offer of proof is necessary to enable the Supreme Court to review the ruling. Raugust made no offer of proof or argument at trial with respect to why he felt the objection should be overruled and therefore waived his argument on appeal by failing to make an offer of proof once the objections were sustained. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Jennings, 96 M 80, 28 P2d 448 (1934).

Failure to Object to Conduct of Psychological Evaluation or to Continuation of Sentencing Hearing — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Osterloth was convicted of felony sexual assault and was required to undergo a sexual offender evaluation by a therapist of his choice at county expense. His scheduled sentencing was continued to allow the evaluation. On appeal, Osterloth contended that the District Court erred by sentencing him without an evaluation prepared by a qualified therapist, pursuant to 46-18-111, and by continuing sentencing instead of conducting a sentencing hearing without delay, as required in 46-18-115. The Supreme Court noted that under this section, it is precluded from considering an alleged error unless a timely objection was made or the criteria of 46-20-701 are met. Osterloth did not object to the evaluation being conducted by his own evaluator or to the sentencing continuation, nor did he assert that he could satisfy any of the requirements of 46-20-701. Thus, Osterloth waived the right to have the Supreme Court consider these alleged errors on appeal. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

District Court Exceeding Scope of Appellate Review — Abuse of Discretion in Applying Particularized Suspicion of DUI to Traffic Stop Triggered by Report of Vandalism: Robertson was stopped after a vehicle of the description that he was driving was reported leaving the scene of a vandalism. He was subsequently convicted of DUI in City Court and appealed to District Court on grounds that his right to confront witnesses was denied and that the city had not sustained the necessary burden of proof to support the conviction. The District Court remanded to the City Court for dismissal on grounds that the arresting officer did not have a sufficient particularized suspicion to justify the investigative stop for DUI. However, the issue of a sufficient particularized suspicion was never raised or ruled on in City Court by either Robertson or the city. When a District Court exercises its power of appellate review, it must refrain from deciding issues not properly raised or objected to in the court below; thus, the District Court abused its discretion by exceeding the scope of its appellate review in addressing the issue of particularized suspicion, so the Supreme Court reversed the order of the District Court dismissing the City Court judgment against Robertson. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298

M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000). See also Missoula v. Asbury, 265 M 14, 873 P2d 936, 51 St. Rep. 383 (1994), and St. v. Herrera, 1998 MT 173, 289 M 499, 962 P2d 1180 (1998).

Failure to Object to Closing Comments — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Schmalz claimed that in closing arguments, the prosecutor argued a theory to the jury that was not supported by testimony, constituting prosecutorial misconduct, but Schmalz did not object to the comments during closing arguments. Failure to object resulted in failure to properly preserve the claim for appeal and resulted in the waiver of Schmalz's right to have the Supreme Court consider the claims regarding the prosecutor's closing argument. St. v. Schmalz, 1998 MT 210, 290 M 420, 964 P2d 763, 55 St. Rep. 889 (1998).

Evidence of Habit Disallowed — No Denial of Due Process and Right to Defense — Unspecific Objection — No Impairment of Substantial Rights by Comment of District Court on Merits of Defense: Huerta was tried on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile and attempted to present evidence that it was the habit of the juvenile's mother to punish him severely. The District Court prevented the evidence from going to the jury. Huerta claimed that the District Court had prevented Huerta from presenting his only defense and thereby prevented him from obtaining a fair trial, in violation of his right to due process under the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and his right to a defense under the sixth amendment. The Supreme Court noted that the claim of denial of a constitutional right was made for the first time on appeal and, citing St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477 (1995), and St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592 (1996), held that Huerta had not made a specific enough objection when he objected at trial to a "miscarriage of justice". The Supreme Court also held that the District Court erred when it commented before the jury that "Brenda . . . is not on trial here". However, the Supreme Court held, as it noted that it had in St. v. Cassill, 71 M 274, 229 P 716 (1924), that under the circumstances, Huerta had received a fair trial and that his substantial rights were not prejudiced by the remark of the District Court. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 283, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Defendant Must Argue Insufficiency of Evidence Prior to Appeal: Walsh argued that the evidence presented in his trial was insufficient to support his conviction on the charges of aggravated assault. The Supreme Court held that it would not consider Walsh's argument because he had failed to raise the issue of insufficient evidence at any time prior to filing his brief on appeal. St. v. Walsh, 281 M 70, 931 P2d 42, 54 St. Rep. 64 (1997), overruled in St. v. Granby, 283 M 193, 939 P2d 1006, 54 St. Rep. 558 (1997). Granby was followed in St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994, 54 St. Rep. 542 (1997).

In Camera Inspection of Note From Jury — Failure to Object as Precluding Appeal: Swan contended that he was deprived of his right to be present at all stages of trial because he was not present at an in camera hearing at which the trial court considered and answered a note from the jury inquiring whether an assault instruction applied to a felony aggravated assault charge as well as a felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charge. Both counsel were present for the discussion of the note, and neither objected to the court's answer. Swan's failure to object at the time that the note was discussed and to raise the objection in his motion for a new trial constituted the waiver of the objection when raised for the first time on appeal. St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933, 53 St. Rep. 1246 (1996).

Failure to Object and Failure to Invoke Exception — Waiver of Objection: Martin was charged with several counts of sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, and deviate sexual conduct. Martin sought to have the counts severed in such a manner that five separate trials would have been required, but the District Court refused to sever. Martin argued before the Supreme Court that he was prejudiced by action of the prosecutor. The Supreme Court held that because Martin had made no objection at trial to any of the alleged instances of misconduct and because he did not argue that he was entitled to raise the arguments pursuant to 46-20-701(2), the Supreme Court would not address the arguments of misconduct. St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996).

Claim First Made on Appeal That Judge Should Not Have Questioned Witness or Curtailed Line of Prosecution Questioning: In a prosecution for aggravated kidnapping and assault, the judge's questions to a witness who sold defendant bullets and curtailing of a line of questioning pursued by the prosecution would not be considered on appeal because they were not raised below. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Sexual Abuse — Failure of District Court to Consider Sentencing Alternatives — No Objection — Sentence Not Illegal or Violation of Due Process: Swoboda pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of children, was classified as a nondangerous offender, and was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections. On appeal, she claimed as error the District Court's failure to consider alternatives to incarceration. The Supreme Court noted that she had not objected at sentencing to the District Court's failure and declined to review the judgment. The Supreme Court noted that in the past, it had made an exception and reviewed such a failure of the District Court when the state conceded the failure of the District Court or when the sentence was illegal. Here, however, the Supreme Court noted that the sentence was not beyond the District Court's jurisdiction. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep 310 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that the failure of the District Court was not a manifest miscarriage of justice and would not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or the proceedings. St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996).

Failure to Object Bars Issues on Appeal — Designation as Dangerous Offender — Order for Alcohol Treatment — Failure to Advise Maximum Penalty: Hofman pleaded guilty to a felony and, at the conclusion of the sentencing hearing, was designated a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) and was ordered to undergo alcohol treatment. Hofman appealed the designation and the order and, in addition, alleged that the District Court failed to advise him of the maximum penalties for his offense. The Supreme Court held that Hofman's failure to raise these issues in the District Court precluded the issues from being raised on appeal. St. v. Hofman, 275 M 455, 913 P2d 1256, 53 St. Rep. 223 (1996).

DNA Evidence — General Objection in Motion In Limine Insufficient to Preserve Objection for Purposes of Appeal: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon DNA evidence that was combined with standard serological evidence to provide a combined statistical estimate of the probability that Weeks was the father of a child of his stepdaughter. Weeks objected to the combined evidence but not on a foundation basis. The state argued that Weeks waived any objection that he had to the combined evidence, but Weeks contended that his motion in limine preserved an objection to the evidence. The Supreme Court held that Weeks's motion in limine, which did not specify any reasons or authorities why the evidence should be excluded, did not contain an objection to the combined statistical evidence but simply concluded that the DNA evidence was prejudicial. The Supreme Court held that this objection was insufficient to preserve the issue for appeal. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995), followed in St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996).

Trial Court's Improper Questioning of Witness in Front of Jury Not Reversible Error: Kelly, convicted of kidnapping and unlawful sexual intercourse, argued that the trial court erred in questioning the minor victim as to competency in front of the jury. The Supreme Court held that no objection had been made during the trial and that the objection was therefore waived. The Supreme Court also held that although the trial court erred in questioning the child in front of the jury because a witness is presumed competent, there was other direct and corroborative evidence of Kelly's guilt. St. v. Kelly, 265 M 298, 876 P2d 641, 51 St. Rep. 522 (1994).

Claim of Error Not Within Exception — Waiver of Appellate Review: Defendant contended that the prosecutor's false comments precluded a fair trial. Unless claims of error fit within an exception to 46-20-701(2), appeal is improper. Appellate review was waived in this case because: (1) the right to object existed at the time of trial; (2) evidence was not suppressed; and (3) material and controlling facts upon which the claim was predicated were known to defendant and his attorney. St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), followed in St. v. Riley, 270 M 436, 893 P2d 310, 52 St. Rep. 258 (1995), and St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663, 52 St. Rep. 1069 (1995). St. v. Nelson was followed in St. v. Hofman, 275 M 455, 913 P2d 1256, 53 St. Rep. 223 (1996).

Failure to Object to Closing Argument Regarding Defendant's State of Mind — Waiver of Right to Appeal: Although the prosecution inappropriately used evidence in closing arguments to suggest defendant's state of mind, failure of defendant to contemporaneously object to the alleged error at trial precluded the Supreme Court from reviewing the issue on appeal. The trial court must first be allowed the opportunity, through objection by the parties, to correct the error at trial. St. v. Losson, 262 M 342, 865 P2d 255, 50 St. Rep. 1588 (1993), followed in St. v. Wild, 266 M 331, 880 P2d 840, 51 St. Rep. 872 (1994), and St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996).

Failure to Offer Voluntariness Instruction or Object to Lack of Voluntariness Instruction: Defendant who did not offer an instruction on voluntariness as an element of every crime or object to failure to give such an instruction was not entitled to review of the issue on appeal. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992), followed, with regard to failure to offer instruction on a lesser included offense, in St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933, 53 St. Rep. 1246 (1996).

Refusal to Consider, in Absence of Objection, Discussion of Other Bad Acts Before Jury: The Supreme Court would not consider the issue on appeal in absence of objection at trial to discussion before the jury regarding whether evidence of other bad acts, which the court barred, should be admitted. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Argument at Trial — Insufficient Record: The Supreme Court refused to consider a double jeopardy argument that was not raised in a timely fashion at trial, given that the record presented for review was insufficient to establish a double jeopardy defense. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992).

Failure to Object to Admissibility of Testimony — Issue Not Considered on Appeal: The Supreme Court declined to consider on appeal the issues of evidence and confrontation raised on testimony when no objection was raised to the testimony at trial. St. v. McCord, 251 M 317, 825 P2d 194, 49 St. Rep. 53 (1992), followed in St. v. Stuit, 277 M 227, 921 P2d 866, 53 St. Rep. 607 (1996).

Failure to Object to Tape Recorder in Jury Room — Appeal Right Waived: After the case was submitted to the jury, the jury requested a tape recorder to play the recording of a drug transaction. Defendant was consulted and had no objection. Failure to object to the action at trial precluded defendant's right to raise the issue on appeal. St. v. Moreno, 248 M 91, 809 P2d 574, 48 St. Rep. 339 (1991).

Not Taking Stand Due to Judge's Comments: The defendant appealed his conviction on the basis that he had not taken the stand because he had relied on certain comments of the trial court with respect to corroborative testimony. The Supreme Court held that the issue was not before it because the defendant had failed to object at the close of his trial. St. v. Kaczmarek, 243 M 456, 795 P2d 439, 47 St. Rep. 1319 (1990), followed in St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993).

No Prejudice Through Order in Companion Case: In a companion case involving defendant's brother, the trial court, over the brother's objection, ordered the production of statements made by individuals whom the brother intended to call as witnesses, pursuant to 46-15-323. Pursuant to an order in his own case, defendant was required to produce the same information. Defendant did not object to the order in his own case and was precluded from raising the issue on appeal. Further, defendant lacked standing to assert the privilege that was alleged by his brother; the defendant did not demonstrate any prejudice to him as a result of the order in the companion case. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Raising Issue in Postconviction Relief That Could Have Been Preserved for Appeal — Abuse of Process: Defendant sought to challenge jury instructions in a petition for postconviction relief after failing to object to the disputed instructions at trial. He offered no excuse for failing to object and did not argue that he could not have reasonably complied with the procedural requirements of 46-16-401 and this section. Because objections to the instructions could have been raised at trial, those grounds for relief could have reasonably been available for direct appeal. To allow defendant to raise an issue in postconviction relief that he could reasonably have preserved for direct appeal would constitute an abuse of process. St. v. Gorder, 243 M 333, 792 P2d 370, 47 St. Rep. 958 (1990), followed in St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995). Baker was followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Closing Argument — Prosecutor's Comments on Defendant Not Taking Stand: On appeal, defense counsel argued that the prosecutor's closing comments were directed at the defendant's failure to testify. The Supreme Court stated that it was incumbent on counsel to make his objection at the time of trial and that, as a general rule, the court does not entertain issues on appeal that were not raised at trial. St. v. Wiman, 236 M 180, 769 P2d 1200, 46 St. Rep. 279 (1989).

Untimeliness of Motion Waived by Failure to Object: A motion to suppress was filed the first day of trial, contrary to the 10-day notice requirement in 46-13-301. By failing to object to the timeliness of the motion at trial, any objection on appeal was waived under this section. In re J.W.K., 223 M 1, 724 P2d 164, 43 St. Rep. 1483 (1986).

Constitutionality Not Considered: Defendant alleged for the first time on appeal that 45-5-201 is unconstitutional because it fails to provide a parent, who may use reasonable and necessary force to restrain or correct his child under 45-3-107, with any guidance in determining what is or is not reasonable or necessary force. The Supreme Court refused to consider the allegation on appeal, since none of the exceptions of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) were found to apply. St. v. Probert, 221 M 476, 719 P2d 783, 43 St. Rep. 988 (1986).

Alleged Constitutional Violation: Concerning an alleged constitutional violation (failure to allow defendant to confront witnesses by allowing hearsay evidence) when the error was not objected to at trial, a party must show prejudicial error and must satisfy one of the three requirements listed in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) before the claim will be noticed on appeal. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986), followed in St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000). See also Forsyth v. Allison, 274 M 246, 908 P2d 205, 52 St. Rep. 1212 (1995).

Failure to Object to In-Court Identification of Defendant — Issue Waived on Appeal: Where, in a prosecution for deliberate homicide in which a prosecution witness identified the defendant in court and the defendant failed to object to the identification, the failure of the defendant to object at trial precludes him on appeal from predicating error on the admission of the identification. [But see 1983 amendment allowing consideration on appeal under circumstances set out in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987).] St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Failure to Object to Jury Instructions — Issue Precluded on Appeal: Where the defendant was convicted of felony murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery and either failed to object at trial to certain instructions to the jury or concurred in those instructions, the Supreme Court found the defendant was precluded from raising alleged errors in those instructions for the first time on appeal. [But see 1983 amendment allowing consideration on appeal under circumstances set out in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987).] The Supreme Court also found that the objections had no merit as the instructions objected to, or instructions substantially similar to them, had been approved in St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979). St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981). See also St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Independent Knowledge of Juror — Failure to Object: The fact that a juror had acted as a special prosecutor in a disbarment action against an attorney under a workers' compensation indictment and had used the defendant's disbarment, which dealt at length with the facts involved in the defendant's criminal case, as a model in drafting his pleadings did not require a reversal of the defendant's conviction when, at the conclusion of the trial, the juror met with the judge and counsel and told them what he knew and the defendant made no objection. The defense failed to meet its responsibility by its failure to properly object and thereby give the court an opportunity to remedy any alleged defects. [But see 1983 amendment allowing consideration on appeal under circumstances set out in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987).] St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

WAIVER OF ISSUE BY PARTY'S ACTION

Objectionable Testimony Elicited by Defendant's Own Actions — Right to Allege Error on Appeal Waived: Smith was charged with stealing his mother's credit card and using the card to withdraw money from her bank account and charge items for his personal use. Pretrial, Smith moved in limine to preclude witnesses at trial from testifying regarding Smith's prior criminal convictions, and the motion was granted. When his mother testified, Smith's counsel asked what efforts she made to locate Smith after discovering that her credit card was gone, and the mother responded that she had checked with Smith's parole officer to see if the officer knew where Smith was. Smith immediately moved for a mistrial, asserting that the comment violated the motion in limine, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the objectionable testimony was elicited by Smith's own actions, he waived the right to allege error on appeal because he actively participated in creating the error. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 18, 325 M 374, 106 P3d 553 (2005), following St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim Unfounded — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: The trial court instructed the jury that Gray could be convicted of assault on a peace officer if the state proved that Gray caused a reasonable apprehension of bodily harm in any of three police officers. Gray contended that the instruction erroneously allowed the jury to convict for assault of one or more of the officers without agreeing to one specific set of facts, in violation of the unanimity requirement that the jury must be in agreement as to the principal factual elements underlying the offense. Even though Gray's counsel acquiesced to the instruction, Gray contended that the fundamental right to a unanimous jury verdict is inviolate, so plain error review was appropriate. However, Gray not only failed to contemporaneously object to the instruction, but specifically asked the trial court to add the language that he argued on appeal was insufficient. The Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine, refusing to put the trial court in error for an action in which Gray acquiesced and actively participated. Additionally, Gray's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on his attorney's acquiescence and participation in the jury instruction for strategic purposes also failed. In light of the overwhelming evidence of guilt, Gray could not show that the trial outcome was prejudiced because of the lack of a specific unanimity instruction or that the result would have been different if the attorney had not engaged in the legal strategy. The conviction was affirmed. St. v. Gray, 2004 MT 347, 324 M 334, 102 P3d 1255 (2004), followed in St. v. Gallagher, 2005 MT 336, 330 M 65, 125 P3d 1141 (2005).

No Appellate Review of Trial Court's Refusal to Allow Expert Testimony Absent Contemporaneous Objection: During Olsen's arson trial, Olsen sought to introduce testimony from a chemical engineer who had concluded that a faulty junction box was the cause of the fire. After voir dire to determine the engineer's qualifications to testify, the District Court granted the state's motion to exclude the engineer's testimony on grounds that he lacked the necessary expertise to testify on the subject of forensic electrical engineering. Olsen made no offer of proof regarding the witness's qualifications to testify or the substance of the testimony, nor did Olsen object to the refusal to allow the testimony. Nevertheless, on appeal, Olsen contended that the trial court erred in disallowing the testimony. The Supreme Court held that Olsen's failure to make a contemporaneous objection at trial constituted waiver of the objection, so the issue was not subject to appellate review. St. v. Olsen, 2004 MT 158, 322 M 1, 92 P3d 1204 (2004).

Record Devoid of Reasons for Counsel's Conduct During Voir Dire — Ineffective Assistance Claim Improperly Raised on Direct Appeal: Defendant's claims of ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire could not be addressed without considering matters outside the record and were therefore inappropriate for direct appeal. The claims were thus dismissed without prejudice to defendant's pursuit of the claims in postconviction proceedings. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), following St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003).

Counsel Decision to Forego Certain Defense Considered Trial Strategy — Insufficient Record to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Hendricks contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel in his assault trial because his attorney failed to raise the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force. However, in a disclosure statement filed prior to the omnibus hearing, Hendricks's counsel specifically noted that the defense of justifiable use of force would not be asserted. On the morning of trial, counsel stated that no jury instructions on the defense of justifiable use of force would be offered. Thus, the decision not to raise the defense was made consciously and was not the result of ignorance or neglect and was presumed to be sound trial strategy falling within the realm of reasonable professional conduct absent evidence to the contrary. Absent a sufficient record to address the issue of ineffective assistance, the direct appeal was dismissed, requiring Hendricks to raise the issue by a postconviction relief proceeding, if at all. The Supreme Court clarified that it will no longer use the approach in St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), to determine effective assistance of counsel, but rather the procedure set out in St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003). St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003), followed in St. v. Webster, 2005 MT 38, 326 M 112, 107 P3d 500 (2005).

No Pretrial Determination Regarding Whether Statement Admissible for Impeachment Purposes — Waiver of Right to Object to Admissibility: At the time of arrest, Harris admitted an act of sexual intercourse with his adopted daughter. Prior to trial, Harris moved to suppress the statement on grounds that it was involuntary and obtained in violation of his fifth amendment rights under the United States Constitution. The District Court agreed that the statement could not be used, but expressly stated that its limited suppression order did not address whether it could be used by the state for impeachment purposes in the event that Harris testified, essentially reserving its ruling for a later time, as authorized in 46-13-104. Harris's testimony about the statement during direct examination brought the statement into evidence by his own volition, constituting waiver of the right to appeal the admissibility of the statement for use as impeachment. St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996), and St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Withdrawal of Proposed Instruction on Accountability — Waiver on Appeal: Sittner proposed a jury instruction stating that a defendant's knowledge that a crime is being committed, in conjunction with the defendant's presence during the crime, is insufficient to support a finding of guilt by accountability. The state's proposed instruction was that one may become an accomplice by being present and joining in the criminal act. Sittner withdrew his proposed instruction during settling of instructions, and the state's instruction was used. In the absence of a timely objection, Sittner's withdrawal of his proposed instruction constituted a waiver of the objection and precluded the raising of the issue on appeal, considering that none of the exceptions to the requirement for timely objection in 46-20-701 applied. St. v. Sittner, 1999 MT 103, 294 M 302, 980 P2d 1053, 56 St. Rep. 434 (1999).

REVIEW UNDER PLAIN ERROR DOCTRINE

Failure to Object to Prosecutor's Closing Arguments — Waiver of Objection: Defendant contended that he was denied a fair trial because of comments made by the prosecutor during closing arguments regarding defendant's credibility. However, defendant failed to object and preserve the issue for appeal, so the objection was waived. Nevertheless, defendant urged the Supreme Court to employ discretionary plain error review and reverse, but the court was not persuaded that the comments resulted in a manifest miscarriage of justice, undermined the fundamental fairness of the trial, or compromised the integrity of the judicial process, so plain error review was denied. St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009).

Trial Court's Comment on Defense Objection at Trial Not Compromising of Judicial Integrity — Plain Error Review Inappropriate: When the trial court sustained the state's objection to a prior hearsay statement of a witness, defense counsel objected and asked to put the objection on the record. The court replied, "Fine. So noted. You've asked the question, I've overruled it. You don't have to say anything more. The Supremes can read it." On appeal, defendant sought plain error review because the comment compromised the trial court's impartiality in front of the jury by assuming defendant's guilt and eventual conviction. The Supreme Court noted that trial courts should refrain from such comments in front of jurors but held that in this case, in context the comment was simply an explanation that no additional objection was necessary to preserve the objection for potential appellate review and did not compromise the integrity of the judicial process, so plain error review was not invoked. St. v. Skinner, 2007 MT 175, 338 M 197, 163 P3d 399 (2007).

No Clear Comment on or Infringement of Defendant's Right to Remain Silent — Plain Error Doctrine Not Invoked: Upshaw claimed that the testimony of a detective at trial regarding Upshaw's decision to exercise the right to remain silent violated the right to due process and the privilege against self-incrimination and that pursuant to Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976), the Supreme Court should invoke the plain error doctrine and reverse the conviction. The state asserted that the prosecutor did not commit a Doyle error by eliciting testimony of Upshaw's post-Miranda silence, but rather that the evidence came from a nonresponsive answer by the detective and that the prosecution did not deliberately seek to put the evidence before the jury or use the evidence to impeach Upshaw. The Supreme Court examined the record and determined that the brief comment on Upshaw's silence was confined to a minor portion of the detective's testimony and that the prosecutor did not pursue the issue, use the testimony to impeach Upshaw, or refer to the testimony in cross-examination or closing. To be plain, an error should firmly convince a person that the prosecutor's comments created an inference for the jury that, by remaining silent, Upshaw must be guilty. However, in this case, there was no such firm conviction. Thus, the court declined to invoke the plain error doctrine because there was no clear comment on or infringement of Upshaw's right to remain silent. St. v. Upshaw, 2006 MT 341, 335 M 162, 153 P3d 579 (2006), following St. v. Godfrey, 2004 MT 197, 322 M 254, 95 P3d 166 (2004).

Theory of Erroneous Jury Instruction Raised for First Time on Appeal — No Plain Error: At trial, the District Court instructed the jury to view with distrust the testimony of a witness who was legally accountable for the same crime as Daniels. Daniels objected to the instruction on grounds that the witness's testimony had changed and was no longer inculpatory, so the instruction was unnecessary. On appeal, Daniels argued that the instruction violated his right to a fair trial because it could have been construed to instruct the jury to distrust his exculpatory statements given to police immediately after his arrest, having implicated the witness in those statements. The Supreme Court found no prejudicial effect in the jury instruction, and Daniels could not argue on appeal a theory of error that was changed from the theory raised in trial court. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), followed in St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003).

Prosecutorial Comments During Closing Not Violative of Defendant's Right to Fair Trial: Raugust argued on appeal that the prosecutor's comments during closing arguments deprived Raugust of a fair trial, notwithstanding the failure of Raugust's attorney to object, which Raugust characterized as ineffective assistance of counsel. Under this section, review is barred of any alleged errors not objected to at trial, unless the error falls within the exceptions in 46-20-701(2), but Raugust nevertheless urged review under the plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court held that this case did not present the requisite exceptional case to invoke the plain error doctrine because the alleged errors were either misstatements of fact, taken out of context of the prosecutor's argument, constituted the state's analysis of the evidence, or were later cured by the jury instructions. Raugust's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel also failed because Raugust did not meet the first prong of the Strickland test by showing that his counsel's performance was deficient. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St.

Claim First Made on Appeal That Judge Who Decided Issue of Flight in Bail Hearing Should Not Have Tried Case Because Flight Was an Issue: Defendant claimed that the lower court judge should not have tried his case because whether he had fled the jurisdiction was a seriously disputed question at trial. The judge had previously decided during a bail hearing that defendant was a flight risk. Defendant's contention that the judge was not truly impartial was precluded by statute from being decided on appeal because it was not raised below. The common-law plain error doctrine is an exception to the statute, but it is a doctrine that will be invoked only in exceptional cases in which failure to review the claimed error might result in manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of fundamental fairness at trial, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. It was determined inapplicable in this case. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Common-Law Plain Error — Case-by-Case Review: Despite the passage of 46-20-701, Montana's plain error statute restricting the review of errors not objected to at trial, the doctrine of common-law plain error review by the Montana Supreme Court continues to exist to allow correction of errors not objected to at trial but that affect the fairness, integrity, and public reputation of judicial proceedings. The Supreme Court retains the inherent power and obligation to interpret the constitution, protect individual rights, prevent manifest injustice, and correspondingly review lower court decisions and actions for error. The power of such review is inherent in the appellate process itself. Thus, while acknowledging the constraints of 46-20-701, the Supreme Court will discretionarily review claimed errors that implicate a criminal defendant's fundamental constitutional rights even if no contemporaneous objection is made and notwithstanding the statutory criteria, in the class of cases when failure to conduct the review may result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of trial proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. The doctrine will be applied sparingly and on a case-by-case basis. Nevertheless, the necessity for contemporaneous objection to claimed error remains because 46-20-701 will be applied, except in the class of cases mentioned above. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), followed in St. v. Monaco, 277 M 221, 921 P2d 863, 53 St. Rep. 604 (1996), St. v. Prosecution Comment on Sexual Abuse in Opening Statement — Door Not Opened — Testimony Properly Excluded Under Rape Shield Law: Stuit was charged with sexual abuse of S.M., a minor. At trial, the District Court cautioned both the defense and prosecution that testimony concerning prior acts of abuse of S.M. would not be admitted. However, in an opening statement, the prosecution made reference to past sexual abuse of S.M. No objection was made by the defense at the time. Later, in a conference in chambers, the District Court noted that the statement came close to opening the door on the issue of past abuse, but ultimately ruled that the door had not been opened on the issue. The Supreme Court held that failure of defense counsel to make a contemporaneous objection waived the issue and that the doctrine of plain error did not apply under the statute. The Supreme Court also held that any evidence of prior abuse was inadmissible under the rape shield law. St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290, 51 St. Rep. 1238 (1994).

Alleged Court Error and Prosecutor Misconduct Not Objected to During Trial: Thompson argued that his conviction should be overturned because of errors by the District Court in instructing the jury and because of misconduct by the prosecutor during closing remarks. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had not objected during the trial and that the court would not implement the plain error doctrine because the defendant had made no showing that his rights had been substantially prejudiced. St. v. Thompson, 259 M 62, 853 P2d 1188, 50 St. Rep. 682 (1993). See also In re Petition of Slice, 271 M 337, 896 P2d 1125, 52 St. Rep. 472 (1995).

Failure to Object — No Plain Error in Admitting Mug Shot in Evidence: Absent proof that his substantial rights were prejudiced, appellant who did not object during the trial was not entitled to review of introduction into evidence of his mug shot, which he claimed indicated to the jury that he had a past criminal record. Even under the plain error doctrine, which provides a remedy to prevent manifest injustice when objection was not made below, reversal was not warranted. A mug shot is generally admissible, at the discretion of the judge, if disguised, as it was here, to remove law enforcement information. Appellant could not prove prejudice because eyewitnesses to the theft could not absolutely identify defendant from the mug shot, his own testimony showed that he in fact had a past criminal record, and his defense was that he was not the person who committed the theft. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Failure to Object to Judge Qualifying Ten-Year-Old Sexual Crime Victim as Witness in View of Jury — Not "Plain Error" — Mass of Damaging Evidence Precluding Any Prejudice: In the presence of the jury, the District Court Judge questioned the 10-year-old victim of a sexual crime and an aggravated assault about whether she was aware of the consequences of taking an oath and testifying. Defense counsel did not object. Although it would have been better to have conducted the questioning away from the jury and the questions should have been framed differently, any mistake did not warrant the application of the "plain error" rule of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) because the defendant was not prejudiced by the manner of qualifying the victim in light of all of the independent and highly damaging evidence against him. St. v. Smith, 208 M 66, 676 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 176 (1984).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — No Objection Raised to Improper Argument by Prosecution — Appealability: Although objection to the prosecutor's argument may not be raised on appeal if it has not been raised at trial, if it forms a basis for an effective assistance of counsel issue, it will be considered on appeal. [Under the 1983 amendment of this section, it will be considered only under circumstances set out under 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987).] If a prejudicial prosecutorial argument is alleged, it will not be presumed. Rather, it must be established from the record that a substantial right has been denied. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Violations Not Charged — Elimination From Probation Revocation Hearing Consideration: The District Court, sitting without a jury in probation revocation hearing, is presumed to be able to properly evaluate evidence and determine the credibility of witnesses without regard to incompetent evidence, and that ability was demonstrated where the judge eliminated from consideration all alleged probation violations not charged by petition and affidavit for revocation and therefore erroneously admitted at hearing. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981). See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 181 (1987).

Review of Jury Instruction Later Declared Unconstitutional in Other Case — Plain Error Rule: The giving of a jury instruction, without objection by the defendant, that was subsequently declared unconstitutional in another case did not justify the use of the plain error rule when the instruction did not go to the essence of the case and was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Hardy, 185 M 130, 604 P2d 792 (1980).

INADEQUATELY SUPPORTED CLAIMS

No Record as to Why Counsel Took Particular Actions in Providing Defense — Effective Assistance Claim Not Appropriate for Direct Appeal: Hamilton claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at a trial on incest charges, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to deliver on the promise that Hamilton would testify; (2) allowed a detective to testify regarding the veracity of Hamilton and the alleged victim; and (3) demeaned Hamilton and defense counsel in closing statements. The Supreme Court examined each claim but was unable to determine from the record why counsel took that particular strategy. Because the claims were not record-based, the effective assistance issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, and Hamilton's claim was dismissed without prejudice to raising the claim in postconviction relief proceedings. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007), following St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001).

Record-Based or Nonrecord-Based Information Determinative of Appropriateness of Direct Appeal or Petition for Postconviction Relief — Direct Appeal Dismissed When Record Insufficient to Substantiate Effectiveness of Counsel: In 1999, White moved for an evidentiary hearing to allow the development of facts that were not part of the record but that were necessary to sustain a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court declared by order that a petition for postconviction relief would be the proper avenue for White's nonrecord-based ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Nevertheless, in late 2000, White appealed, contending that the claim of prejudicial error resulting from her trial counsel's various failures to provide representation, such as the failure to call witnesses, make an opening statement, or offer a theory of the case at any stage of the proceedings, was supported by the record and proper for direct appeal. The general rule set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), is that when ineffective assistance claims are based on facts of record, they must be raised on direct appeal, while claims based on allegations not documented in the record must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The underlying principle of the rule is that a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance. The two distinct classifications of on-record and off-record actions tend to overlap at times, and though not easily distilled into a formula, the definitive question that decides whether actions are on-record or off-record is whether the record fully explains why counsel took the particular course of action. Generally, an alleged failure to object to the introduction of evidence, to the testimony of a witness, or to prosecutorial misconduct at trial is considered record-based and appropriate for direct appeal. Likewise, counsel's own conduct in presenting the case, such as improperly eliciting damaging testimony from a witness or rendering an improper opening statement or closing argument, may be pointed to as record-based. Decisions regarding the timing and number of objections and whether to offer no opening statement at all lie within counsel's tactical discretion, indicating that nonrecord-based information explaining the tactic may be involved. Similarly, counsel's failure to adequately investigate, to prepare a defense, to become familiar with critical areas of the applicable law, to offer a particular jury instruction, to object to the trial court's failure to consider sentencing alternatives, to object to the admission of evidence that is evidenced by the record, or to fully inform defendant of the consequences of various options and rights, even though the prejudicial results of the ineffectiveness appear on the record, may constitute a nonrecord-based claim. In White's case, the record supplied some indicia of why a certain objection was raised at a particular time, but was still insufficient to determine to what extent counsel's actions were purely tactical or resulted from deficient representation. Thus, the information was considered nonrecord-based and should have been raised by petition for postconviction relief, so White's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 296, 318 M 146, 79 P3d 289 (2003), St. v. St. Germain, 2007 MT 28, 336 M 17, 153 P3d 591 (2007), in which the Supreme Court declined to address a direct appeal of defense counsel's nonrecord-based reasons for making a double jeopardy argument and for failing to call a witness to testify in an incest case because the issues were appropriate for postconviction proceedings. See also St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009), in which an ineffective counsel appeal based on counsel's failure to request an accomplice instruction in a homicide trial was dismissed in favor of postconviction relief proceedings because plausible justifications existed for counsel's conduct that could not be addressed on appeal since the record did not resolve the factual questions surrounding counsel's actions.

Objection to Qualifications of Pathologist to Testify Regarding Gunshot Wound: At Clausell's deliberate homicide trial, objection was made to the testimony of a Board-certified clinical pathologist who offered opinions regarding a gunshot wound, on grounds that the pathologist was not a Board-certified forensic pathologist and therefore was not qualified to testify. However, the doctor had performed over 400 autopsies, including about 40 that involved gunshot wounds. Clausell did not offer any applicable legal theory that a clinical pathologist with such experience who is not a forensic pathologist is not qualified to testify in a homicide case, and the Supreme Court declined to adopt a rule to that effect. Further, Clausell failed to preserve any other objection at trial to the pathologist's testimony and was precluded from raising other issues regarding the testimony on appeal. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001), distinguishing In re K.H. & K.L.E., 1999 MT 128, 294 M 466, 981 P2d 1190 (1999).

PARTICULAR MATTERS NOT CONSTITUTING ERROR

Element of Crime Revealed Through Stipulation Entered for Strategic Reasons — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: At Auld's trial for witness tampering, defense counsel entered a stipulation revealing that Auld's parole officer, who was designated as a government employee, had or was about to engage in an investigation to determine if Auld had violated a rule by consuming alcohol. Auld asserted that counsel provided ineffective assistance by entering the stipulation and conceding an element of the offense of witness tampering. The Supreme Court found Auld's argument unavailing. Counsel entered the stipulation for strategic reasons so that the jury would not hear that Auld was on parole at the time that the offense took place, and Auld could not use trial tactics and strategic decisions as a basis for an ineffective assistance of counsel claim. St. v. Auld, 2006 MT 189, 333 M 125, 142 P3d 753 (2006). See also St. v. Grixti, 2005 MT 296, 329 M 330, 124 P3d 177 (2005), and St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006).

Counsel's Failure to Interview and Call Witnesses Within Range of Reasonable and Sound Professional Decisions — Failure to Prove Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Weaver contended that his defense counsel was ineffective in failing to interview and call certain witnesses and in not introducing an entomologist's report that might have created a reasonable doubt as to Weaver's role in a homicide. Under the first prong of the Strickland test, Weaver needed to overcome the strong presumption that counsel's defense strategies and trial tactics fell within a wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. The Supreme Court examined each of Weaver's contentions and determined that: (1) counsel's decision not to investigate potential witnesses did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness; (2) Weaver failed to meet the burden of showing that counsel's failure to interview potential witnesses constituted ineffective assistance to the extent that it resulted in prejudice raising a reasonable probability that the trial outcome would have been different; (3) counsel's decision not to call every witness that Weaver identified actually carried fewer risks and promoted Weaver's best interest at trial; and (4) failure to introduce the entomologist's report was tactical and the result of a conscientious, weighed decision made after consultation with Weaver and thus was not erroneous. Weaver's ineffective assistance claim failed. Weaver v. St., 2005 MT 158, 327 M 441, 114 P3d 1039 (2005), following Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005).

Prosecutor's Comments Not Affecting Outcome of Trial — Failure to Prove Prosecutorial Misconduct: Clausell's defense in a deliberate homicide trial was that the victim's death was a "tragic accident". Because of Clausell's defense, his counsel failed to object to numerous comments by the prosecutor that focused on rebutting the "tragic accident" theory. On appeal, Clausell contended that the prosecutor's statements constituted prosecutorial misconduct and that his attorney's failure to object to the comments or to move to suppress evidence of the search of Clausell's apartment amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed on both issues. Given that the state presented sufficient evidence of deliberate homicide and that the jury was admonished to consider only the evidence, Clausell failed to show that the prosecutor's comments affected the trial's outcome. Because no prosecutorial misconduct occurred, defense counsel's failure to object to the comments could not be considered ineffective assistance, and defense counsel's trial tactics, including failure to seek to suppress evidence that was in plain view, fell within the wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. Clausell failed to establish that his attorney's lack of objections fell below the objective reasonableness standard or that he was prejudiced to the point that a reasonable probability existed that the result of the trial would have been different had counsel not performed ineffectively. The deliberate homicide conviction was affirmed. Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005), followed in St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007). See also St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262 (1983).

Evidence of Other Crimes as Proof of Continuing Course of Conduct — Adequacy of Jury Instruction — Failure to Make Specific Objection: Defendant Howell contended that the District Court's instruction to the jury that it could consider evidence of other crimes as proof of a continuous pattern of conduct violated the Just notice and jury instructions. Although the phrase "continuing course of conduct" has never been specifically approved for use in a jury instruction, it has been used interchangeably with several of the Just requirements. Use of the phrase in this case was found to be surplusage that was improperly included in the instruction; however, its use was not prejudicial and constituted harmless error. Further, Howell's failure to object to the adequacy of the Just notice requirements waived any deficiency in the notice. St. v. Howell, 254 M 438, 839 P2d 7, 49 St. Rep. 759 (1992).

Sua Sponte Instruction on Lesser Included Offense Not Required by Law or Due Process: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in not giving an instruction of its own accord on the lesser offense of misdemeanor sexual assault following his trial for felony sexual intercourse without consent when a request for the instruction was never made by the defense. Although a defendant has a right to a lesser included offense jury instruction if requested, mandatory instruction on lesser offenses on the judge's own accord is inconsistent with Montana law and the public policy of allowing trial counsel to conduct the case according to strategy and could result in unfair surprise to both the defense and the prosecution. Moreover, a District Court's failure to instruct the jury sua sponte on a lesser included offense does not constitute deprivation of a defendant's right to due process. St. v. Sheppard, 253 M 118, 832 P2d 370, 49 St. Rep. 382 (1992), followed in St. v. Howell, 254 M 438, 839 P2d 87, 49 St. Rep. 759 (1992), and St. v. Leyba, 276 M 45, 915 P2d 794, 53 St. Rep. 7 (1996).

Screening of Child Witnesses at Trial — Conformity With Federal Constitution — Test — Failure to Raise State Constitutional Issue in Lower Court: Defendant argued that placement of a 6 ½-foot high by 10-foot wide opaque screen between himself and two child witnesses at his trial for sexual assault violated his constitutional rights to confront the witnesses against him. Defendant's failure to argue or object in the trial court on the basis of the Montana Constitution precluded consideration of the state issue on appeal. However, the Supreme Court cited Md. v. Craig, 497 US 836, 111 L Ed 2d 666, 110 S Ct 3157 (1990), and Coy v. Iowa, 487 US 1012, 101 L Ed 2d 857, 108 S Ct 2798 (1988), in finding that defendant's lack of opportunity for personal observation of the witnesses was not dispositive. Confrontation rights are not absolute but may give way to other competing interests so as to permit the use of certain procedural devices necessary to shield a child witness from the trauma of courtroom testimony. The test for determining necessity is: (1) the trial court must hear evidence and determine whether use of a procedure other than face-to-face confrontation is necessary to protect the welfare of the child witness; (2) the court must also find that the child would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally but by the presence of the defendant; and (3) there must be a finding that the emotional distress suffered by the child in the presence of the defendant is more than mere nervousness, excitement, or some reluctance to testify. Federal standards having been met in this case, use of the opaque screen was not violative of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Davis, 253 M 50, 830 P2d 1309, 49 St. Rep. 342 (1992).

Sufficient Evidence for Jury to Return Guilty Verdict: The defendant argued that there was insufficient evidence to support a guilty verdict for witness tampering. The Supreme Court held that the evidence that the defendant knew he was charged with two counts of domestic abuse (now partner or family member assault) and that he threatened his girlfriend that he or his friends would get her if she testified was sufficient to support the jury's findings. St. v. Matt, 245 M 208, 799 P2d 1085, 47 St. Rep. 1988 (1990). See also St. v. Hembd, 254 M 407, 838 P2d 412, 49 St. Rep. 788 (1992).

Comment on Defendant's Failure to Testify: The defendant appealed his conviction, alleging that the jury instruction provided by the prosecution commented on his refusal to testify and prejudiced his case. The Supreme Court held that even though the appeal was not timely, the court would hear it in order to preserve the substantial rights of the defendant. The court stated that the instruction would not have been prejudicial if requested by the defendant and that the third paragraph of the instruction relating to evaluating a testifying defendant's credibility should not have been given but was harmless error. St. v. Amsk, 243 M 39, 792 P2d 1109, 47 St. Rep. 1075 (1990).

Pro Se Case Appeal Filed Without Briefs — General Review of Transcript on Court's Motion: Where the defendant made the defense of his deliberate homicide case difficult by failing to cooperate with his several attorneys, and after conviction was granted several extensions by the Supreme Court for filing a transcript and his first brief, but nevertheless failed to file a brief and specifications of error, the Supreme Court on its own motion reviewed the District Court transcript for typical kinds of errors and found: (1) that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction as the defendant was convicted on the basis of his own testimony; (2) that there were no errors in the jury instructions given on the evidence and the elements of the crime; (3) that assistance of counsel was adequate and that the failure of defendant's counsel to subpoena evidence or witnesses was not relevant to the crime charged; and (4) that the statutory penalties for deliberate homicide with a dangerous weapon did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983).

Actions of Prosecutor Based on Provocation by Defense Counsel — No Error Found: Where, in a prosecution for deliberate homicide, the prosecuting attorney responded to certain evidentiary tactics of defense counsel by questioning him about his drinking habits, the court did not err in failing to caution the jury with respect to the alleged prejudicial comments of the prosecuting attorney. It has generally been held that an appellant may not predicate error upon the prosecuting attorney's actions where such were induced or provoked by the appellant's counsel. The defendant also failed to offer an appropriate cautionary instruction. Any irregularity did not affect the defendant's substantial rights. St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

RETROACTIVITY ISSUES

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999).

Conviction of Felony Nonsupport Prior to Legislative Creation of Felony Offense Considered Improper Ex Post Facto Application Warranting Reversal — Common-Law Plain Error Doctrine Applied: Price was convicted of felony nonsupport for failure to make payments from 1988 through 1996 and was given the maximum 2-year sentence; however, the felony nonsupport statute was not enacted until 1993. On appeal, Price contended that the manner in which the felony nonsupport statute was applied violated the fundamental constitutional right to be free from ex post facto laws. The state argued that because Price failed to object at trial, the issue could not be raised on appeal. The issue of whether Price was convicted of felony nonsupport that occurred before the statute was enacted brought into question the fundamental fairness of Price's trial. The Supreme Court held that because a fundamental right was at issue, the common-law plain error doctrine applied despite Price's failure to preserve the issue at trial. A jury instruction allowed the jury to find Price guilty based on acts committed from 1988 through 1996 and thus subjected Price to increased punishment for conduct that occurred prior to enactment of the felony statute. This was an unconstitutional ex post facto application of the felony nonsupport law, constituting reversible error. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 284, 312 M 458, 59 P3d 1122 (2002).

Retroactive Applicability of Judicial Rule Regarding Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: Retroactivity is a threshold matter that compels the evenhanded application of a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions to all similarly situated cases that are pending on direct appeal or not yet final. Therefore, all defendants whose cases meet those criteria are entitled to the retroactive application of a new judicial rule of criminal procedure. This standard applies irrespective of whether the new judicial rule constitutes a clear break from existing precedent and without regard to whether the rule was available to the District Court at the time that it ruled. Thus in the present case, the rule in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), that oral pronouncement of sentence controls over the written sentence for purposes of finality applied retroactively to Waters' appeal, even though the District Court did not have the Lane rule at the time of sentencing. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), following St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), overruling St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), Peterson v. Mont. Bank of Bozeman, N.A., 212 M 37, 687 P2d 673 (1984), and their progeny, and followed in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). See also Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989).

Exceptions to General Rule of Retroactivity — Guillaume Inapplicable to Case Finalized Before Adoption of New Constitutional Rule: Although Nichols' conviction, resulting in an enhanced penalty for use of a weapon, was finalized more than 5 years prior to the Supreme Court's decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), which created a new constitutional rule barring enhanced weapon sentences when the underlying offense requires proof of use of a weapon, Nichols nevertheless argued that the portion of his sentence precluded by Guillaume should be stricken from his sentence. The Supreme Court applied the retroactivity criteria in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), noting that two exceptions apply to the general rule of retroactivity. The first exception applies when the constitutional rule puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe; the second exception applies when the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute watershed rules of criminal procedure. Finding that Guillaume was not dictated by prior precedent and did not set out a watershed rule, the court held that the new rule did not require retroactive application to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when the Guillaume opinion was issued. Not only was Nichols' claim time-barred under the pre-1997 version of 46-21-102, his argument that the sentence should be reduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice also failed because miscarriage of justice refers to actual, not legal, innocence. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), followed in St. v. Baker, 1999 MT 251, 296 M 253, 989 P2d 335, 56 St. Rep. 987 (1999), and overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Substantial Change in Applicable Law — Teague Criteria: Byers filed for postconviction relief based on allegations that the Montana Supreme Court had reversed its position on the constitutionality of two sets of jury instructions regarding the mental element of the offense of deliberate homicide and voluntary intoxication subsequent to Byers' previous appeal. The U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), analyzing the retroactive application of judicial decisions to cases on collateral review, stated that a new rule will not be applied to cases coming before the court on collateral review after the date of the decision. A new rule was defined as a rule in which the result was not dictated by precedent at the time that the defendant's conviction became final. The Montana Supreme Court found that Byers' objection to jury instructions in his previous appeal had been overruled in St. v. Rothacher, 272 M 303, 901 P2d 82 (1995), amounting to a substantial change in applicable law that was not barred by Teague, but that the instructional error in Byers' trial was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The court declined to apply the new rule regarding instructions on voluntary intoxication set out in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), because that decision specifically precluded retroactive application and because it had been subsequently overruled by the U.S. Supreme Court, resulting in no substantial change in the applicable law. Byers v. Mahoney, 279 M 28, 929 P2d 202, 53 St. Rep. 624 (1996). The Teague criteria were applied in St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). The Teague criteria were also applied in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999).

Part 2
Initiation of Appeal

Part Case Notes

Timely Appeal Necessary: The Supreme Court was without jurisdiction to hear an appeal when a criminal defendant filed a notice of appeal more than 60 days after the rendition of judgment. State ex rel. Graveley v. District Court, 178 M 1, 582 P2d 775 (1978).

Copy of Transcript — Indigent:

When an indigent prison inmate's 60 days for appeal had expired, he could not get a copy of the trial and court record transcript. Ketcham v. St., 167 M 535, 541 P2d 68 (1975).

When a person convicted in the District Court petitioned the Supreme Court for a Writ of Mandate to compel the District Court to furnish a "copy of trial and court record transcript" for the purpose of appeal in forma pauperis, the Writ was denied when no timely application had been filed. State ex rel. Treat v. District Court, 124 M 234, 221 P2d 436 (1950).

Dismissal of Appeal: The motion of the Attorney General to dismiss appeals was well taken when the appeals were not taken within the time allowed by statute, no notice of appeal was filed or served, no proper record on appeal was filed, and no papers on the appeals were served upon either the County Attorney or the Attorney General. St. v. Martin, 147 M 548, 416 P2d 22 (1966).

Denial of Motion for Mistrial: The part of the defendant's appeal claiming that the trial court erred in denying a motion of the defendant for a mistrial was properly before the Supreme Court when it was taken within the time allowed by statute. St. v. Tiedemann, 139 M 237, 362 P2d 529 (1961).

Denial of Motion for New Trial: The motion of the State to strike the defendant's third specification of error, contending that there was no substantial evidence to support the verdict or judgment of conviction, was granted when the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the order denying the motion for a new trial. St. v. Tiedemann, 139 M 237, 362 P2d 529 (1961).

Excuse for Failure to Take Timely Appeal: When the District Court appointed counsel for the defendant and ordered preparation of the record for an appeal to the Supreme Court, all at public expense, the defendant having had no voice in the choice, in the interest of justice it was incumbent upon the Supreme Court to consider the contended errors although the court-appointed counsel failed to timely file the notice of appeal. St. v. Frodsham, 139 M 222, 362 P2d 413 (1961).

Insufficient Excuse for Failure to Take Appeal: Under a former statute allowing 6 months to appeal from a judgment, the death of defense counsel nearly a year after the trial and order of commitment was not a sufficient showing to justify an original Writ of Habeas Corpus in the Supreme Court. Dryman v. St., 139 M 141, 361 P2d 959 (1961).

Oral Request for Appeal Ineffective: A request stating an intention to appeal made orally in open court is wholly ineffectual to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction. State ex rel. Treat v. District Court, 124 M 234, 221 P2d 436 (1950).

Subsection [(1)] is in harmony with our present code. However, in subsection[s (2), (3), and (4)] the necessity of obtaining a certificate of a judge stating that there is probable cause for appeal, as required by the present code, as a prerequisite for staying execution of judgment has been omitted. This appears to be an unnecessary and time consuming procedural step.

Subsection [(4)] permits review even though defendant is admitted to probation. If defendant is admitted to probation the order so admitting him shall remain in effect or he must post bail.

Case Notes

Convicted Felon Allowed Preconviction Bail Not Automatically Entitled to Bail Pending Appeal: Prior to his conviction for deliberate homicide, Moore was allowed bail, and following conviction, he was designated a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for purposes of parole eligibility. After conviction, Moore was denied bail pending appeal. Moore petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of law pursuant to 46-9-107 and this section. The Supreme Court found that under 46-9-107, the District Court was required to order the detention of Moore unless it found that he was "not likely to flee". Since the District Court made the opposite finding based on evidence presented at the hearing, the Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in the District Court's order denying bail pending appeal. The Supreme Court also held that the phrase "[i]f an appeal is taken and the defendant is admitted to bail" contained in subsection (2) of this section referred to bail pending appeal and requires that the District Court stay the execution of its sentence if the defendant is admitted to bail pending appeal. Because Moore was not admitted to bail pending appeal, his sentence should not be stayed. Moore v. McCormick, 260 M 305, 858 P2d 1254, 50 St. Rep. 1054 (1993).

Probation Violator Subject to Provisions Regarding Release on Bail: A person who has been convicted, sentenced, and placed on probation and who has violated probation is subject to the provisions regarding release on bail. The provisions of 46-20-204, providing for a stay of execution and relief pending appeal of original conviction, do not apply. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Part 7
Action by Court

Part Case Notes

Failure to Request More Specific Instructions at Trial Level: On appeal, the defendant argued that more specific instructions were necessary. The defendant, however, did not request more specific instructions at trial. The defendant cannot on appeal hold the state or the trial court responsible for her failure to request more specific instructions. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982).

Adequacy of Jury Instructions — Definition of Statutory Term — Case-by-Case Determination: Defendant in a deliberate homicide case urged that a proposed jury instruction defining "forcible felony" was refused incorrectly. As in an earlier case, the Montana Supreme Court held that a definition of every term in an applicable statute need not be given but rather, by necessity, each case must be considered on its own facts as to the adequacy of instructions on every theory having support in the evidence presented. Here, the definition of "forcible felony" added nothing to the term being defined and the lack of the instruction could not prevent the defendant from fully presenting his case to the jury. Therefore, there was no error in refusing the proposed instruction. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Admission of Evidence of Prior Relationship Between the Defendant and the Victim's Girlfriend and Threats by Defendant Against Her: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case claimed on appeal that the trial court erred in admitting into evidence acts and statements of the defendant which occurred prior to the shooting. The evidence concerned the former romantic relationship of the victim's girlfriend with the accused, the ill feelings of the defendant toward the victim that developed after the defendant's relationship with the woman was replaced with the victim's relationship with her, and the ensuing threats made by the defendant toward the woman. Because the State had to prove that the defendant purposely or knowingly caused the victim's death, the evidence of the defendant's intent was relevant in general and specifically because the defendant here alleged that he shot the victim in self-defense. Although threats against a person other than the victim are not admissible generally, when the circumstances are such that the threat tends to show hostility toward the deceased, they are relevant. Although evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith, it may be admissible for other purposes such as proof of motive or intent or where such evidence forms a part of a single chain of facts is so intimately connected that the whole must be considered in order to interpret its several parts. Further, the challenged testimony was crucial to prove defendant's mental state at the time of the shooting, and as a result, the probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Change of Venue — Grounds for Denial — Trial Court's Discretion: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case had moved for a change of venue based on allegedly inflammatory pretrial publicity and general bias against him in the county where the victim was killed. The Supreme Court held that a motion for a change of venue is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and a denial is not reversible error in the absence of an abuse of discretion by the trial court. The Supreme Court also looked at the indicia of a denial of a fair trial resulting from prejudicial publicity (i.e., arousal of feelings of the community, threat to personal safety of the defendant, established opinion of members of the community as to the guilt of the accused, news articles beyond the objectivity of news printing and dissemination, and difficulty or failure in securing a fair and impartial jury from the community in which the news articles appeared). Having applied these indicators to the defendant's case and having considered the allegedly inflammatory news articles and broadcasts and the voir dire examination of prospective jurors, the Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion for a change of venue. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Defendant's Challenge of Jurors — Discretion of Judge in Ruling on Challenges: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case appealed his conviction in part on the basis that the trial court erred in denying his challenge to the jury panel as a whole and to one juror in particular. While noting that the right to a trial by an impartial jury is an unqualified one, the Supreme Court said that the pertinent inquiry was whether or not the jury empaneled was able to render an impartial judgment based solely upon the evidence presented at trial. Considering that each juror gave an assurance of impartiality and that the trial judge made cautionary remarks to the jury that they had a duty to lay aside their opinions and impressions, the Supreme Court held that under the circumstances the trial judge did not abuse his discretion by denying the defendant's challenge to the jury panel. With respect to the individual juror, the court noted that the judge had questioned the juror and that she had made it clear that she could put her emotions aside and judge the defendant fairly and solely upon the evidence presented at trial. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Jury Instruction on "Aggressor" — Self-Defense: An instruction defining "aggressor" and stating the unavailability of the defense of self-defense to an aggressor was appealed because there allegedly was no evidence presented in support of the instruction and, as given, allegedly was an incorrect statement of the law. The Supreme Court said that the trial judge must instruct the jury on every essential question presented by the evidence. Testimony that the defendant and a friend had made efforts to attract the victim's attention as he came out of the bar just before the shooting, coupled with the testimony of the defendant's prior acts of hostility towards the victim and his girlfriend, was sufficient to justify the aggressor instruction. Defendant's allegation that the jury instruction incorrectly stated the law also was rejected on appeal. The exceptions to the lack of availability of the defense of self-defense to an aggressor were inapplicable to the facts. Furthermore, the State had offered an instruction incorporating statutory language of 45-3-105, but the defendant rejected that proposed jury instruction. The reviewing court held that having objected to the very instruction he now asserts should have been included, defendant may not then predicate error on the absence of the qualifying instruction. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Jury Instruction on "Occupied Structure" — Coverage of Vehicles: On appeal from a conviction for deliberate homicide, the defendant claimed his proposed jury instruction on "occupied structure" was correct because the statutory definition includes "vehicle". However, the Chevrolet Blazer in which the defendant was sitting when he shot the victim was not covered by the definition, since the structure must be suitable for human occupancy or night lodging of persons or for carrying on business and the Blazer was not so suitable. A defendant is entitled to an instruction having support in the evidence presented but not if there is no such support. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Jury Instructions on Lesser Included Offenses — No Error When Omitted Instruction Not Offered by Appellant: On appeal, the defendant in a deliberate homicide case alleged error in the failure to give jury instructions on mitigated deliberate homicide and negligent homicide. The general rule is that an instruction is required where there is some evidence to support the lesser included offense. Both negligent homicide and mitigated deliberate homicide are to be considered lesser included offenses of deliberate homicide. Here, a lesser included offense instruction was offered by the State and objected to by the defense. The Montana Supreme Court reiterated its position that error may not be predicated upon the failure to give an instruction when the party alleging the error failed to offer the instruction. Failure to offer an instruction removes the cause of error, particularly when the defense counsel has objected to the instruction upon the ground that the defendant was either guilty of deliberate homicide or not guilty. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Jury Instructions on "Serious Bodily Harm" and "Serious Bodily Injury" — Applicability — Requirements: Defendant in a deliberate homicide case contended on appeal that the trial court failed to instruct the jury fully and fairly on the law of self-defense. The disagreement centered on the differences between "serious bodily harm" and "serious bodily injury", and the proper uses of instructions on the two terms. The Montana Supreme Court said that the test is whether the instructions given on justifiable force gave the defendant ample opportunity to expound to the jury in argument his theory with respect to the use of force as self-defense against an unlawful act. The court found the test had been passed in this case. Further, the court agreed that "harm" and "injury" are not necessarily synonymous and that there is no indication that the Legislature intended to integrate the definition of "serious bodily injury" into the self-defense statute. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Polygraph Test Results — Admissibility — Expert Testimony of Polygraphists: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case appealed the trial court's granting of a motion in limine to prevent the introduction of expert testimony regarding polygraph test results of a friend of the defendant who had accompanied the defendant as a passenger in the defendant's car on the night of the shooting. The defendant alleged three grounds for this part of his appeal: (1) the trial court erred in refusing to hear defendant's offer of proof on the polygraph; (2) that the trial court erred in ruling that the proposed testimony was inadmissible as a matter of law; and (3) the trial court erred in refusing admission of the particular polygraph-related testimony offered by the defendant. The Supreme Court said that if the trial judge's ruling that as a matter of law the testimony of the polygraph examiner was inadmissible was a correct ruling, it was not error for the District Court to refuse to consider the defendant's offer of proof or for it to refuse to admit into evidence this particular area of testimony and evidence. The Montana rule is that the results of polygraph examinations are not admissible as evidence in a criminal trial. The polygraph test results in this case do not fall into the same category as other scientific evidence that is admissible to assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue. Here only the friend's understanding of the defendant's motives could be established by the test, and that was not an issue in the case. For these reasons it was not error for the trial court to rule that as a matter of law the evidence was inadmissible. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Suppression Question — Psychological Evaluation — Standard of Review: Where two expert witnesses present conflicting evidence during a suppression hearing as to results of psychological evaluations they performed of the defendant and the District Court finds one expert's testimony to be more credible than the other's, such determination will be disturbed on appeal only if it is not supported by substantial credible evidence. In re R.P.S., 188 M 317, 613 P2d 999 (1980), following St. v. Grimestad, 183 M 29, 598 P2d 198 (1979).

Sandstrom Instruction — Plain Error Rule: The Sandstrom instruction was given to the jury in an action charging Martinez with theft. The instruction was not objected to at trial but was raised on appeal. The Supreme Court invoked the "plain error" rule because of the use of a constitutionally defective jury instruction and reversed the conviction. St. v. Martinez, 188 M 271, 613 P2d 974 (1980).

Improper Sentencings — Excess of Maximum — Failure to Prove Essential Element: Where the District Court sentenced defendant to 20 years for burglary and the maximum possible sentence was 10 years, the Supreme Court reduced the sentence to 10 years. The Supreme Court also reversed the 10-year sentence the defendant received upon his conviction for felony theft, as the State failed to prove the essential element that the value of the property taken exceeded $150. All other sentences received by the defendant, as well as the provision of the sentence for no parole or work furlough, were within the maximum allowed by law and as such were within the discretion of the sentencing judge and were not overturned. St. v. Sunday, 187 M 292, 609 P2d 1188 (1980).

Increased Sentence: The District Court may increase the sentence or punishment imposed by a Justice of the Peace after a trial de novo on a misdemeanor charge. St. v. Fissette, 159 M 501, 498 P2d 1208 (1972), following Colten v. Ky., 405 US 913, 32 L Ed 2d 584, 92 S Ct 1953 (1971).

Commission Comments

Source of Subsection (1): M.R.App.P., [former] Rule 14 [now superseded]. The language of the last sentence of [former] Rule 14 was changed to make it more consistent with the language presently used.

Source of Subsection (2): Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, [section] 121-9. This provision is consistent with present Montana law. Its purpose is to prevent a failure of justice where there are defects in the appeal but the substantial rights of the parties have not been affected. If error exists which affects the substantial rights of the accused, then the decision should be reversed even though not brought to the attention of the trial court. This is the present law. The object of this section is to get the problem settled in the state court rather than in a federal court.

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendment: Chapter 42 in (1), in first sentence, substituted "convicted person" for "respondent" and deleted the bracketed phrase "[convicted person]" inserted by the Code Commissioner and substituted "the convicted person" for "such respondent" and in second sentence substituted "convicted person" for "appellant" and deleted the bracketed phrase "[convicted person]" inserted by the Code Commissioner; in (2), (2)(b), and (2)(c) substituted "convicted person" for "defendant" and deleted the bracketed phrase "[convicted person]" inserted by the Code Commissioner; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 12, 1997.

Code Commissioner Clarification: Throughout the section, the Code Commissioner has inserted the bracketed references to the convicted person for purposes of clarity.

1983 Amendment: Substituted last sentence and (1), (2), and (3) relating to what defendant must establish before a claim alleging an error affecting jurisdictional or constitutional rights may be noticed on appeal for former sentence that read: "Defects affecting jurisdictional or constitutional rights may be noticed although they were not brought to the attention of the trial court."

GENERAL

Prosecutor's Closing Comments Not Improper or Prejudicial — No Prosecutorial Misconduct in Referencing Defendant's Evidence: Dewitz contended that the prosecutor committed misconduct in closing arguments by referencing a plea agreement entered by an alleged accomplice. However, the plea agreement was entered into evidence by defense counsel in an effort to show that the alleged accomplice was not credible, so Dewitz could not complain of the prosecutor's reference to evidence that Dewitz introduced. Nor did Dewitz demonstrate how the comments could be considered improper or prejudicial. The prosecutor's comments were not so egregious as to deprive Dewitz of a fair trial, so no misconduct occurred. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009).

Incarceration of Mentally Ill Defendant — No Plain Error Review for Alleged Due Process Violation: Following Rovin's parole violations, the District Court revoked Rovin's suspended sentence and imposed a sentence in the state prison, despite the fact that Rovin suffered from mental illness. Rovin argued for the first time on appeal that incarceration would fail to achieve rehabilitation and thus violated due process, that the Supreme Court should invoke plain error review to address the constitutional violation, and that failure to do so would be a manifest miscarriage of justice. The Supreme Court declined. Rovin failed to demonstrate that the due process claim met the elements for plain error review. The District Court considered sentencing alternatives but rejected community-based treatment over concerns for the safety of Rovin and the public. Rovin was represented at every stage of the proceedings, knowingly and voluntarily admitted the parole violations, and waived the right to appeal by failing to object at trial. Further, a mere assertion that failure to review a claimed error might result in a manifest miscarriage of justice is not sufficient to implicate plain error review. St. v. Rovin, 2009 MT 16, 349 M 57, 201 P3d 780 (2009), following St. v. Mackrill, 2008 MT 297, 345 M 469, 191 P3d 451 (2008).

Failure to Develop Legal Analysis Regarding Warrantless Recorded Telephone Conversation — Issue Not Considered on Appeal: Jones moved the District Court to suppress a tape-recorded telephone conversation that was conducted as part of a drug investigation, but the court denied the motion. On appeal, Jones asserted that the Supreme Court should apply its decision from two cases that were pending at the time of Jones's trial. However, Jones failed to present any legal analysis of the factors applicable to the issue of whether an unlawful search occurred or to discuss other precedents that might apply. The Supreme Court declined to conduct Jones's research or to develop legal analysis supporting Jones's position. Jones failed to establish District Court error, and denial of the motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 440, 347 M 512, 199 P3d 216 (2008), following St. v. Hicks, 2006 MT 71, 331 M 471, 133 P3d 206 (2006).

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008 MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999).

Length of Speedy Trial Interval When Dismissal Granted: The date that a court grants a speedy trial dismissal motion becomes the date of the case's disposition and the end date of the speedy trial interval for purposes of appeal. St. v. Billman, 2008 MT 326, 346 M 118, 194 P3d 58 (2008).

No Record as to Why Counsel Took Particular Actions in Providing Defense — Effective Assistance Claim Not Appropriate for Direct Appeal: Hamilton claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at a trial on incest charges, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to deliver on the promise that Hamilton would testify; (2) allowed a detective to testify regarding the veracity of Hamilton and the alleged victim; and (3) demeaned Hamilton and defense counsel in closing statements. The Supreme Court examined each claim but was unable to determine from the record why counsel took that particular strategy. Because the claims were not record-based, the effective assistance issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, and Hamilton's claim was dismissed without prejudice to raising the claim in postconviction relief proceedings. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007), following St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001).

Element of Crime Revealed Through Stipulation Entered for Strategic Reasons — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: At Auld's trial for witness tampering, defense counsel entered a stipulation revealing that Auld's parole officer, who was designated as a government employee, had or was about to engage in an investigation to determine if Auld had violated a rule by consuming alcohol. Auld asserted that counsel provided ineffective assistance by entering the stipulation and conceding an element of the offense of witness tampering. The Supreme Court found Auld's argument unavailing. Counsel entered the stipulation for strategic reasons so that the jury would not hear that Auld was on parole at the time that the offense took place, and Auld could not use trial tactics and strategic decisions as a basis for an ineffective assistance of counsel claim. St. v. Auld, 2006 MT 189, 333 M 125, 142 P3d 753 (2006). See also St. v. Grixti, 2005 MT 296, 329 M 330, 124 P3d 177 (2005), and St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006).

Motion to Correct Sentence Not Considered Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Plain Error Review of Nolo Contendere Plea Inappropriate: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. Pursuant to a subsequent plea agreement, Holt pleaded nolo contendere to the contested counts, but reserved the right to withdraw the plea if the agreed sentences were not imposed. Following conviction, Holt asked the Supreme Court to exercise plain error review, find that the plea agreement was violated, and allow Holt to withdraw the nolo contendere guilty plea. The court declined. Holt made no motion in trial court to review the guilty plea, so that issue was not properly before the Supreme Court. Holt's speculation that he would not have entered the plea agreement had he considered the possibility of good time did not implicate Holt's fundamental constitutional rights, and failure to apply plain error review did not result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. The Supreme Court refused to consider Holt's District Court motion to correct the sentence as a motion to withdraw the guilty plea and thus declined to consider Holt's argument that he be allowed to withdraw the nolo contendere plea based on plain error review. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), distinguishing St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

No Appellate Review of Trial Court's Refusal to Allow Expert Testimony Absent Contemporaneous Objection: During Olsen's arson trial, Olsen sought to introduce testimony from a chemical engineer who had concluded that a faulty junction box was the cause of the fire. After voir dire to determine the engineer's qualifications to testify, the District Court granted the state's motion to exclude the engineer's testimony on grounds that he lacked the necessary expertise to testify on the subject of forensic electrical engineering. Olsen made no offer of proof regarding the witness's qualifications to testify or the substance of the testimony, nor did Olsen object to the refusal to allow the testimony. Nevertheless, on appeal, Olsen contended that the trial court erred in disallowing the testimony. The Supreme Court held that Olsen's failure to make a contemporaneous objection at trial constituted waiver of the objection, so the issue was not subject to appellate review. St. v. Olsen, 2004 MT 158, 322 M 1, 92 P3d 1204 (2004).

Hybrid Standard of Supreme Court Review of Sentencing When Offender Ineligible for Review by Sentence Review Division: In St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937 (1999), the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, discarding the previous two-tiered approach of reviewing sentences for both legality and abuse of discretion, which was considered a carryover from the days before the creation of the Sentence Review Division when the court reviewed all sentencing challenges. However, Montoya created a "no review" window once the Sentence Review Division came into being, which left offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions, but no term of incarceration and thus no eligibility for Sentence Review Division consideration, without a remedy. Therefore, the court fashioned a hybrid standard of review to close the "no review" window. If an offender is sentenced to 1 year or more of actual incarceration and is eligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will apply the Montoya standard and review the sentence for legality only, but if the offender is ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), followed in St. v. Ruiz, 2005 MT 117, 327 M 109, 112 P3d 1001 (2005).

Failure of Trial Court to Hold Hearing Regarding Juror's Acquaintance With Witness — Waiver Absent Timely Objection — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: During voir dire at Davis's trial, several jurors indicated that they were acquainted with two witnesses but stated that their acquaintance would not affect their ability to sit as jurors. Immediately after the first witness was called, a juror stated to the court that he knew the witness. Without objection from Davis, the court noted the statement and the witness proceeded to testify. Following conviction, Davis appealed on grounds that the court should have held a hearing to determine whether the juror was biased and that failure to do so violated Davis's right to an impartial jury. The Supreme Court disagreed. Davis's failure to object at trial constituted a waiver of appellate review of the issue. Further, Davis did not meet the narrow criteria in St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), to warrant plain error review. Judgment was affirmed. St. v. Davis, 2003 MT 341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003), followed in St. v. Taylor, 2009 MT 161, 350 M 447, 208 P3d 422 (2009).

Right to Appeal Without Objection at Trial Applicable Only When Right Determined to Be Retroactive — Hall Decision on Flight Instruction Prospective Only: In St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929 (1999), the Supreme Court ruled that a jury instruction on the significance of flight should no longer be given because it could be an unnecessary comment on the evidence by the trial court. Although he did not raise a "Hall-type" objection to a flight instruction at trial, Nolan asserted that he was entitled to consideration of a Hall-related claim on appeal pursuant to this section because his constitutional right to a fair trial was violated by the giving of the flight instruction, constituting prejudicial error. The Supreme Court disagreed. One condition for application of this section is that the right asserted in the claim did not exist at the time of trial and has been determined to be retroactive in application. The ruling in Hall was prospective, not retroactive, and Nolan's trial occurred prior to the Hall decision; thus, Nolan did not meet the requirements of this section for raising a claimed constitutional error on appeal to which an objection was not made at trial. St. v. Nolan, 2003 MT 13, 314 M 47, 62 P3d 1118 (2003).

No Presumption of Prejudice:

Prejudice in a criminal case will not be presumed, but rather must appear from the denial or invasion of a substantial right from which the law imputes prejudice. St. v. Nelson, 2002 MT 122, 310 M 71, 48 P3d 739 (2002); St. v. Stuit, 277 M 227, 921 P2d 866, 53 St. Rep. 607 (1996); St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290, 51 St. Rep. 1238 (1994); St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994); St. v. Staat, 248 M 291, 811 P2d 1261, 48 St. Rep. 1041 (1991); St. v. Newman, 242 M 315, 790 P2d 971, 47 St. Rep. 711 (1990); St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988); St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987); St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981); St. v. Bubnash, 142 M 377, 382 P2d 830 (1963); St. v. Straight, 136 M 255, 347 P2d 482 (1959); St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918). Stuit was followed in St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999).

Where the trial court mistakenly granted challenges for cause to the prosecution but denied a similar challenge by defendant, the court held that prejudice will not be presumed where the record shows that the trial court's error affected neither constitutional nor jurisdictional rights of the defendant, and defendant on appeal has failed to demonstrate prejudice to his substantial rights resulting from the error. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

It ought no longer to be the rule in criminal cases in this state that, error being shown, prejudice will be presumed, as was held prior to 1895 when the codes were adopted. The former practice resulted in altogether too many reversals of criminal cases for technical errors which did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Byrd, 41 M 585, 111 P 407 (1910); St. v. Gordon, 35 M 458, 90 P 173 (1907).

Failure to Object at Trial Constituting Waiver of Right to Claim Prosecutorial Misconduct on Appeal: Azure argued on appeal that the state committed prosecutorial misconduct by introducing allegedly false evidence during Azure's homicide trial regarding threats that Azure allegedly made toward the victim's brother on the night of the shooting. However, Azure made no contemporaneous objection to the testimony during trial, which constituted a waiver of Azure's right to appellate review of the claim. St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002). See also St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271 (1992), and St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290 (1994).

No Review on Direct Appeal of Allegation of Improper Jury Impanelment Absent Objection at Trial: Azure appealed a conviction for deliberate homicide on grounds that the jury was unlawfully impaneled, citing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000). Azure noted that he was tried 2 months after Lamere, in the same judicial district, and that it was probable that the same improper jury impanelment used in Lamere was used in Azure's case, making Azure's trial illegal as well. Azure asked the Supreme Court to remand for factfinding on the issue, because no record was made as to how the jury was impaneled. The Supreme Court declined to remand. Remanding for a hearing is not a proper remedy for an appeal on direct review, because an evidentiary hearing can be accomplished only in a postconviction hearing. It could not be determined from the record what procedure was used to summon the jury, so the issue could not be reviewed. Further, review pursuant to the plain error doctrine was not available, because there was no record for the Supreme Court to review to determine whether an error occurred, let alone if the error met the criteria of plain error under the common law or this section. St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002).

Record-Based or Nonrecord-Based Information Determinative of Appropriateness of Direct Appeal or Petition for Postconviction Relief — Direct Appeal Dismissed When Record Insufficient to Substantiate Effectiveness of Counsel: In 1999, White moved for an evidentiary hearing to allow the development of facts that were not part of the record but that were necessary to sustain a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court declared by order that a petition for postconviction relief would be the proper avenue for White's nonrecord-based ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Nevertheless, in late 2000, White appealed, contending that the claim of prejudicial error resulting from her trial counsel's various failures to provide representation, such as the failure to call witnesses, make an opening statement, or offer a theory of the case at any stage of the proceedings, was supported by the record and proper for direct appeal. The general rule set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), is that when ineffective assistance claims are based on facts of record, they must be raised on direct appeal, while claims based on allegations not documented in the record must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The underlying principle of the rule is that a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance. The two distinct classifications of on-record and off-record actions tend to overlap at times, and though not easily distilled into a formula, the definitive question that decides whether actions are on-record or off-record is whether the record fully explains why counsel took the particular course of action. Generally, an alleged failure to object to the introduction of evidence, to the testimony of a witness, or to prosecutorial misconduct at trial is considered record-based and appropriate for direct appeal. Likewise, counsel's own conduct in presenting the case, such as improperly eliciting damaging testimony from a witness or rendering an improper opening statement or closing argument, may be pointed to as record-based. Decisions regarding the timing and number of objections and whether to offer no opening statement at all lie within counsel's tactical discretion, indicating that nonrecord-based information explaining the tactic may be involved. Similarly, counsel's failure to adequately investigate, to prepare a defense, to become familiar with critical areas of the applicable law, to offer a particular jury instruction, to object to the trial court's failure to consider sentencing alternatives, to object to the admission of evidence that is evidenced by the record, or to fully inform defendant of the consequences of various options and rights, even though the prejudicial results of the ineffectiveness appear on the record, may constitute a nonrecord-based claim. In White's case, the record supplied some indicia of why a certain objection was raised at a particular time, but was still insufficient to determine to what extent counsel's actions were purely tactical or resulted from deficient representation. Thus, the information was considered nonrecord-based and should have been raised by petition for postconviction relief, so White's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Earl, 2003 MT 158, 316 M 263, 71 P3d 1201 (2003), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 296, 318 M 146, 79 P3d 289 (2003), St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006), St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006), St. v. Upshaw, 2006 MT 341, 335 M 162, 153 P3d 579 (2006), St. v. Fender, 2007 MT 268, 339 M 395, 170 P3d 971 (2007), and St. v. Herman, 2008 MT 187, 343 M 494, 188 P3d 978 (2008). See also St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003), and St. v. Davis, 2003 MT 341, 318 M 459, 81 P3d 484 (2003). See also St. v. Adgerson, 2003 MT 284, 318 M 22, 78 P3d 850 (2003), for a similar application of the Hagen rule. See also St. v. St. Germain, 2007 MT 28, 336 M 17, 153 P3d 591 (2007), in which the Supreme Court declined to address a direct appeal of defense counsel's nonrecord-based reasons for making a double jeopardy argument and for failing to call a witness to testify in an incest case because the issues were appropriate for postconviction proceedings. See also St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009), in which an ineffective counsel appeal based on counsel's failure to request an accomplice instruction in a homicide trial was dismissed in favor of postconviction relief proceedings because plausible justifications existed for counsel's conduct that could not be addressed on appeal since the record did not resolve the factual questions surrounding counsel's actions.

Objection to Qualifications of Pathologist to Testify Regarding Gunshot Wound: At Clausell's deliberate homicide trial, objection was made to the testimony of a Board-certified clinical pathologist who offered opinions regarding a gunshot wound, on grounds that the pathologist was not a Board-certified forensic pathologist and therefore was not qualified to testify. However, the doctor had performed over 400 autopsies, including about 40 that involved gunshot wounds. Clausell did not offer any applicable legal theory that a clinical pathologist with such experience who is not a forensic pathologist is not qualified to testify in a homicide case, and the Supreme Court declined to adopt a rule to that effect. Further, Clausell failed to preserve any other objection at trial to the pathologist's testimony and was precluded from raising other issues regarding the testimony on appeal. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001), distinguishing In re K.H. & K.L.E., 1999 MT 128, 294 M 466, 981 P2d 1190 (1999).

Failure to Object at Trial to Refusal to Allow Testimony of Additional Witnesses After Trial Commenced — No Interference With Constitutional Right to Present Defense: LaDue contended that failure to allow the testimony of two additional witnesses after the start of his trial on charges of attempted deliberate homicide interfered with his constitutional right to present a defense. However, LaDue did not raise the constitutional question at trial, thus failing to preserve the issue for appeal. Failure to raise the issue at trial constituted waiver of the right to appeal it. St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Common-Law Plain Error — Defendant Must Demonstrate With Specifics That a Fundamental Constitutional Right Was Violated at Trial: Whipple claimed that the trial court erred in allowing five witnesses to testify as to the credibility of the testimony of two minors who testified that Whipple had sexually abused them. The Supreme Court stated that because claims of plain error are almost always raised for the first time on appeal, a defendant must do more than simply make a generalized claim that the defendant's rights were violated by the alleged error. See St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996). The Supreme Court stated that it would not exercise its power of common-law plain error review of alleged errors not objected to at trial because Whipple had not met his burden of demonstrating specifically how a constitutional right of his had been violated by an error of the trial court. St. v. Whipple, 2001 MT 16, 304 M 118, 19 P3d 228 (2001).

Stipulation to Not Mention Suspended Driver's License at DUI Trial — Mention of Expired Driver's License Cured by Jury Admonition: Brady was charged with DUI, fourth or subsequent offense, arising from circumstances surrounding a single-vehicle accident in which Brady swerved off the highway, hit a rock wall, and rolled the vehicle. The information also charged Brady with three misdemeanors: driving while his license was suspended or revoked, failure to provide proof of insurance, and failure to give notice of an accident by the quickest means. Shortly before voir dire, Brady stated that he would plead guilty to the misdemeanors and moved that the state's witnesses not mention any of the offenses to which Brady would plead guilty. The state did not object to the motion. The third witness for the state, a deputy who was at the wreck scene, testified that he found a wallet near the vehicle that contained an expired driver's license. Brady moved for mistrial on grounds that the state violated the judge's order not to mention an expired license. The state countered that the stipulation was that the state would not mention that the license was suspended, but that mention of an expired license was not covered. The District Court found that there was a difference between the jury knowing that Brady's license was suspended, which suggested criminal activity, and knowing that the license was expired, which is not in itself criminal. The court then admonished the jury to disregard the testimony regarding the expired license as irrelevant to the case. Brady was convicted of DUI and appealed on grounds that denial of his motion for a mistrial was reversible error because the state's witness deliberately violated an order in limine to which the state previously stipulated. Granting a mistrial is appropriate when a reasonable possibility exists that inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction. The strength of the evidence against the defendant, together with the prejudicial influence of the inadmissible evidence and whether a cautionary jury instruction could cure any prejudice, must be considered in determining whether a prohibited statement contributed to the conviction. A mistrial should be denied for technical errors of defects that do not affect the defendant's substantial rights and when the record is sufficient to establish guilt. The Supreme Court agreed that there is a difference between an expired license and a suspended license with regard to implications of guilt. Here, any potential prejudice that might have resulted from testimony about the expired license was sufficiently cured by the admonition to the jury, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for mistrial. St. v. Brady, 2000 MT 282, 302 M 174, 13 P3d 941, 57 St. Rep. 1178 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Partin, 287 M 12, 951 P2d 1002 (1997). Brady was followed in St. v. White, 2008 MT 129, 343 M 66, 184 P3d 1008 (2008), with regard to denial of a mistrial when technical errors or defects do not affect a defendant's substantial rights and when the record is sufficient to establish guilt.

Failure to Raise Sentencing Objections Before District Court — Issue Not Preserved for Appeal: Tucker pleaded guilty to attempted aggravated assault with a weapon. At the sentencing hearing, Tucker argued that one of the sentencing exceptions applied to him because his mental capacity was impaired because of his transsexualism combined with the stress of his fiance's custody battles. The District Court disagreed and added the minimum 2-year weapon enhancement to his sentence. At no time did Tucker complain to the court that its findings were inadequate under 46-18-223 or allege that the sentence was illegal, excessive, or improper. Instead, Tucker argued on appeal that the sentencing court erred as a matter of law in failing to state the reasons why the sentencing exception did not apply. The Supreme Court refused to remand for resentencing because Tucker failed to bring the allegations of sentencing error to the attention of the District Court in a timely manner. The purpose of the contemporaneous objection requirement is to give the District Court the first opportunity to correct any error. Failure to do so constitutes a waiver of the right to appeal the issue. St. v. Tucker, 2000 MT 255, 301 M 466, 10 P3d 832, 57 St. Rep. 1046 (2000).

Failure to Object to Conduct of Psychological Evaluation or to Continuation of Sentencing Hearing — Waiver of Right to Consideration on Appeal: Osterloth was convicted of felony sexual assault and was required to undergo a sexual offender evaluation by a therapist of his choice at county expense. His scheduled sentencing was continued to allow the evaluation. On appeal, Osterloth contended that the District Court erred by sentencing him without an evaluation prepared by a qualified therapist, pursuant to 46-18-111, and by continuing sentencing instead of conducting a sentencing hearing without delay, as required in 46-18-115. The Supreme Court noted that under 46-20-104, it is precluded from considering an alleged error unless a timely objection was made or the criteria of this section are met. Osterloth did not object to the evaluation being conducted by his own evaluator or to the sentencing continuation, nor did he assert that he could satisfy any of the requirements of this section. Thus, Osterloth waived the right to have the Supreme Court consider these alleged errors on appeal. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

Standard of Review of Criminal Sentence Clarified — Supreme Court Review of Legality of Sentence Only: In an effort to clear up a prevalent inconsistency in Montana case law regarding the appropriate standard of review of criminal sentences, the Supreme Court held that it will review a criminal sentence only for legality, i.e., whether the sentence is within the parameters provided by statute, which in turn implies de novo review—a sentence is either legal or it is not. The court overruled St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980), St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982), St. v. Graveley, 275 M 519, 915 P2d 184 (1996), St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997), and any other Montana decision that suggests that the Supreme Court will also review criminal sentences for an abuse of discretion. St. v. Montoya, 1999 MT 180, 295 M 288, 983 P2d 937, 56 St. Rep. 706 (1999), followed in St. v. Shreves, 2002 MT 333, 313 M 252, 60 P3d 991 (2002). However, see St. v. Herd, 2004 MT 85, 320 M 490, 87 P3d 1017 (2004), wherein the Supreme Court fashioned a hybrid standard of review for offenders with unreasonable sentencing conditions but no term of incarceration who are ineligible for review by the Sentence Review Division. In reviewing those sentences, the court will review a sentence for both legality and abuse of discretion, applying the two-tiered approach used prior to creation of the Sentence Review Division.

Withdrawal of Proposed Instruction on Accountability — Waiver on Appeal: Sittner proposed a jury instruction stating that a defendant's knowledge that a crime is being committed, in conjunction with the defendant's presence during the crime, is insufficient to support a finding of guilt by accountability. The state's proposed instruction was that one may become an accomplice by being present and joining in the criminal act. Sittner withdrew his proposed instruction during settling of instructions, and the state's instruction was used. In the absence of a timely objection, Sittner's withdrawal of his proposed instruction constituted a waiver of the objection and precluded the raising of the issue on appeal, considering that none of the exceptions to the requirement for timely objection in this section applied. St. v. Sittner, 1999 MT 103, 294 M 302, 980 P2d 1053, 56 St. Rep. 434 (1999).

Motion In Limine Sufficient to Preserve Objection for Appeal: Defendant's motion in limine to exclude testimony regarding certain chemicals in his blood and bottles of prescription medication found in his car was sufficient to preserve the objection for appeal. The propriety of the admission of the evidence is a proper issue for the Supreme Court on appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998).

Mistrial Determinations — Trial Court and Supreme Court Standards: The Supreme Court recently clarified the standard to be applied by a trial court considering the grant of a mistrial by stating that a mistrial should be granted either when there is a demonstration of a manifest necessity or when a party has been denied a fair and impartial trial. The Supreme Court now adopts the rule that the manifest necessity part of the standard should be applied only if the trial court considers the grant of a mistrial when the allegedly injured party does not request or consent to a mistrial and that the denial of a fair and impartial trial part of the standard applies when the allegedly injured party does request or consent to a mistrial. As to the Supreme Court's standard of review of the District Court's ruling, the Supreme Court will no longer apply the standard of clear and convincing evidence that the trial court's ruling is erroneous. The standard to be applied is whether the trial court abused its discretion, clarifying St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245 (1996), St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717 (1996), and St. v. Walker, 280 M 346, 930 P2d 60 (1996). St. v. Partin, 287 M 12, 951 P2d 1002, 54 St. Rep. 1474 (1997), followed in St. v. Clark, 1998 MT 221, 290 M 479, 964 P2d 766, 55 St. Rep. 919 (1998), St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999), and St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003). See also St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000), in which it was held that the District Court did not err when it denied defendant's motion for mistrial based on trial testimony that the court had previously excluded in its order in limine because the objectionable testimony was not prejudicial, St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), St. v. Dubois, 2006 MT 89, 332 M 44, 134 P3d 82 (2006), and St. v. White, 2008 MT 129, 343 M 66, 184 P3d 1008 (2008). Partin was distinguished, as to comments by the judge, in St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Evidence of Habit Disallowed — No Denial of Due Process and Right to Defense — Unspecific Objection — No Impairment of Substantial Rights by Comment of District Court on Merits of Defense: Huerta was tried on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile and attempted to present evidence that it was the habit of the juvenile's mother to punish him severely. The District Court prevented the evidence from going to the jury. Huerta claimed that the District Court had prevented Huerta from presenting his only defense and thereby prevented him from obtaining a fair trial, in violation of his right to due process under the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and his right to a defense under the sixth amendment. The Supreme Court noted that the claim of denial of a constitutional right was made for the first time on appeal and, citing St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477 (1995), and St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592 (1996), held that Huerta had not made a specific enough objection when he objected at trial to a "miscarriage of justice". The Supreme Court also held that the District Court erred when it commented before the jury that "Brenda . . . is not on trial here". However, the Supreme Court held, as it noted that it had in St. v. Cassill, 71 M 274, 229 P 716 (1924), that under the circumstances, Huerta had received a fair trial and that his substantial rights were not prejudiced by the remark of the District Court. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 283, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Issue of Untested Breath Test Solution Raised for First Time on Appeal: Appellant, convicted of DUI, raised for the first time on appeal a claim that a newspaper reported that untested ethyl alcohol, used to calibrate Intoxilyzers, was distributed to the Sheriff's office that tested him and that his conviction should be reversed because the solution used to calibrate the Intoxilyzer used on him was not approved as required by rule. He did not show that the untested solution was actually in use at the time that his breath sample was taken. He assumed that the solution was in use based on the news article. The statute providing for review of material and controlling facts that were not known to a defendant and that could not have been ascertained by the exercise of reasonable diligence was not applicable. Review of the issue would require the appellate court to conduct a hearing and act as a finder of fact, and the District Court had not decided the question of whether the untested solution was used for appellant's breath test. St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994, 54 St. Rep. 542 (1997).

Failure to Object and Failure to Invoke Exception — Waiver of Objection: Martin was charged with several counts of sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, and deviate sexual conduct. Martin sought to have the counts severed in such a manner that five separate trials would have been required, but the District Court refused to sever. Martin argued before the Supreme Court that he was prejudiced by action of the prosecutor. The Supreme Court held that because Martin had made no objection at trial to any of the alleged instances of misconduct and because he did not argue that he was entitled to raise the arguments pursuant to subsection (2) of this section, the Supreme Court would not address the arguments of misconduct. St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996).

Clarification of Manifest Necessity Doctrine: Recognizing that the manifest necessity doctrine had not been consistently applied since being invoked in St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940 (1981), the Supreme Court clarified the standard by which to review the denial of a motion for mistrial, holding that a mistrial motion will be granted only when there is either a demonstration of manifest necessity or when the defendant has been denied a fair and impartial trial. St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 947 (1996).

Evidence of Flight as Showing Guilt: Evidence of defendant's flight after an offense occurs may be admitted as a circumstance tending to show consciousness of guilt. Having found that the charged crimes occurred, the trial judge properly considered evidence of defendant's flight in reaching the conclusion that defendant was the one who committed the crimes. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Claim First Made on Appeal That Judge Should Not Have Questioned Witness or Curtailed Line of Prosecution Questioning: In a prosecution for aggravated kidnapping and assault, the judge's questions to a witness who sold defendant bullets and curtailing of a line of questioning pursued by the prosecution would not be considered on appeal because they were not raised below. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Claim First Made on Appeal That Judge Who Decided Issue of Flight in Bail Hearing Should Not Have Tried Case Because Flight Was an Issue: Defendant claimed that the lower court judge should not have tried his case because whether he had fled the jurisdiction was a seriously disputed question at trial. The judge had previously decided during a bail hearing that defendant was a flight risk. Defendant's contention that the judge was not truly impartial was precluded by statute from being decided on appeal because it was not raised below. The common-law plain error doctrine is an exception to the statute, but it is a doctrine that will be invoked only in exceptional cases in which failure to review the claimed error might result in manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of fundamental fairness at trial, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. It was determined inapplicable in this case. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Issues Not Raised on Appeal Barred by Statute — Scope of Bar: Brown was convicted of felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and the conviction was affirmed on appeal. Brown then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming ineffective assistance of his appellate counsel and that the introduction of certain evidence at trial violated his fourth and fifth amendment rights. In his petition for postconviction relief, Brown acknowledged that the constitutional issues were not raised on appeal but argued that the statutory bar should not apply because he tried to raise the issues, but neither his trial nor appellate counsels did so. Citing St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54 (1995), the Supreme Court held that because Brown's appellate counsel properly applied that law (concluding that issues not raised at trial could not be raised on appeal) and because the statutory language barring issues that "could reasonably have been raised on direct appeal" included issues not properly preserved at trial, Brown was precluded from raising those issues in a petition for postconviction relief. Brown v. St., 277 M 430, 922 P2d 1146, 53 St. Rep. 692 (1996). See also St. v. Beckman, 284 M 459, 944 P2d 756, 54 St. Rep. 977 (1997), and Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

General Objection to Judicial Notice Insufficient to Preserve Issue on Appeal: Loh was charged with criminal possession of a controlled substance and sought to have her confession suppressed. The District Court denied the motion to suppress, and Loh was tried on the charge. At the trial, the prosecution requested the District Court to take judicial notice of the testimony of several firefighters given at the suppression hearing. The District Court agreed, over Loh's objection, saying that judicial notice of that former testimony was the very purpose contemplated by Rule 201, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The Supreme Court held that the general objection made by Loh's counsel at the suppression hearing was an insufficient objection. The Supreme Court also noted that if there was error, it was harmless error and that Loh failed to make a further objection as to the sufficiency of any evidence offered at trial. St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Failure to Object Bars Issues on Appeal — Designation as Dangerous Offender — Order for Alcohol Treatment — Failure to Advise Maximum Penalty: Hofman pleaded guilty to a felony and, at the conclusion of the sentencing hearing, was designated a dangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) and was ordered to undergo alcohol treatment. Hofman appealed the designation and the order and, in addition, alleged that the District Court failed to advise him of the maximum penalties for his offense. The Supreme Court held that Hofman's failure to raise these issues in the District Court precluded the issues from being raised on appeal. St. v. Hofman, 275 M 455, 913 P2d 1256, 53 St. Rep. 223 (1996).

DNA Evidence — General Objection in Motion In Limine Insufficient to Preserve Objection for Purposes of Appeal: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon DNA evidence that was combined with standard serological evidence to provide a combined statistical estimate of the probability that Weeks was the father of a child of his stepdaughter. Weeks objected to the combined evidence but not on a foundation basis. The state argued that Weeks waived any objection that he had to the combined evidence, but Weeks contended that his motion in limine preserved an objection to the evidence. The Supreme Court held that Weeks's motion in limine, which did not specify any reasons or authorities why the evidence should be excluded, did not contain an objection to the combined statistical evidence but simply concluded that the DNA evidence was prejudicial. The Supreme Court held that this objection was insufficient to preserve the issue for appeal. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995), followed in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996).

Lack of Omnibus Hearing Not Prejudicial — Adequate Notice and Presentation of Case: Defendant claimed error because no omnibus hearing was held in his criminal case, which prejudiced his opportunities for preparation of a timely defense and led to surprise when the state attempted to introduce certain physical evidence at trial. One of the purposes of the omnibus hearing is to discuss the use of evidence regarding other bad acts. In this case, the acts were other sexual assaults defendant had purportedly committed. Twenty days before trial, the state gave notice to defendant, pursuant to St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), of its intent to use the evidence of other bad acts, which constituted ample notice and opportunity for defendant to prepare for that evidence. Defendant's claim of lack of ability to confront the witness failed because the Van Pelt exception to the rape shield law did not apply in this case because the defendant did not contend that the victim made accusations that had been adjudicated as false prior to trial. Defendant's argument of surprise also failed because even though he was not made aware at an omnibus hearing of the state's intent to introduce the rape victim's clothing as evidence, his objection to introduction of the evidence at trial was sustained and the evidence excluded. Defendant was not prejudiced by the lack of an omnibus hearing. St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994).

Evidence of Defense Witness's Prior Criminal History Not Admissible — Conviction Overturned: In a prosecution for accountability for aggravated kidnapping, the District Court allowed the state to cross-examine the defendant's witness as to the witness's prior criminal history. The Supreme Court found this to be reversible error on the grounds that there is a reasonable possibility that the inherently prejudicial and inadmissible evidence of the witness's criminal history might have contributed to the defendant's conviction. St. v. Bristow, 267 M 170, 882 P2d 1041, 51 St. Rep. 1010 (1994).

Refusal to Consider Validity of Complaint for Cruelty to Animals Raised for First Time on Appeal: Walter shot a dog on March 7, 1993, and was subsequently convicted of misdemeanor cruelty to animals under 45-8-211. Walter defended on the basis that his actions were the result of actions of the dog's owner and that the complaint was invalid because the owner was guilty of unclean hands. The Supreme Court noted that the validity of the complaint was not raised at the District Court level and that the Supreme Court would not consider the defense for the first time on appeal because none of the exceptions to this section applied to the case. St. v. Walter, 266 M 429, 880 P2d 1346, 51 St. Rep. 903 (1994).

Claim of Error Not Within Exception — Waiver of Appellate Review: Defendant contended that the prosecutor's false comments precluded a fair trial. Unless claims of error fit within an exception to subsection (2) of this section, appeal is improper. Appellate review was waived in this case because: (1) the right to object existed at the time of trial; (2) evidence was not suppressed; and (3) material and controlling facts upon which the claim was predicated were known to defendant and his attorney. St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), followed in St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290, 51 St. Rep. 1238 (1994).

Allegations of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Made on Direct Appeal — Review Confined to Record: Supreme Court review of a defendant's allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel in the context of a direct appeal is confined to the record. Claims requiring consideration of factual matters outside the record are therefore inappropriate on direct appeal. St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787, 50 St. Rep. 1511 (1993); In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156, 48 St. Rep. 702 (1991); St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548, 48 St. Rep. 424 (1991), citing St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990). See also Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Alleged Court Error and Prosecutor Misconduct Not Objected to During Trial: Thompson argued that his conviction should be overturned because of errors by the District Court in instructing the jury and because of misconduct by the prosecutor during closing remarks. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had not objected during the trial and that the court would not implement the plain error doctrine because the defendant had made no showing that his rights had been substantially prejudiced. St. v. Thompson, 259 M 62, 853 P2d 1188, 50 St. Rep. 682 (1993).

Alleged Error in Instruction Given at Defendant's Request: The Supreme Court would not consider an alleged error in an instruction that was given at defendant's request. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Failure to Offer Voluntariness Instruction or Object to Lack of Voluntariness Instruction: Defendant who did not offer an instruction on voluntariness as an element of every crime or object to failure to give such an instruction was not entitled to review of the issue on appeal. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Refusal to Consider, in Absence of Objection, Discussion of Other Bad Acts Before Jury: The Supreme Court would not consider the issue on appeal in absence of objection at trial to discussion before the jury regarding whether evidence of other bad acts, which the court barred, should be admitted. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Reserving for Postconviction Relief — Ineffective Assistance Claim That May Be Made on Appeal: On appeal, a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel with respect to any matters in the record may not be reserved and later made in a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Failure to State Specific Grounds for Objection to Instruction on Lesser Included Offense as Waiver of Appeal: At the settlement conference for jury instructions, the state proposed a series of instructions that sought to include sexual assault as a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent. Defense counsel objected to the giving of the instruction but did not state specific reasons for the objection. The absence of a proper objection constituted waiver of the objection for appeal purposes, and thus the lesser included offense issue was not preserved for appeal. St. v. Ogle, 255 M 246, 841 P2d 1133, 49 St. Rep. 932 (1992).

Review of Criminal Appeal Limited to Record: The Supreme Court's review of allegations on direct appeal is limited to what is contained in the record, and the court will limit its inquiry only to those matters contained in the record. St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058, 49 St. Rep. 506 (1992).

Failure to Object to Late Admission of Swab Test Results — No Prejudice: Defendant contended that the delay in processing powder residue swab tests, resulting in the lack of availability of the test results until the fourth day of trial, constituted negligent suppression of exculpatory evidence and violated due process. However, defendant neglected to object to the evidence during trial or to move for a stay in proceedings until the results could be analyzed by defense experts. Absent a demonstration of prejudice or evidence that the conduct prevented defense claims from being raised, dismissal of the case was not warranted. St. v. McCord, 251 M 317, 825 P2d 194, 49 St. Rep. 53 (1992).

Not Taking Stand Due to Judge's Comments: The defendant appealed his conviction on the basis that he had not taken the stand because he had relied on certain comments of the trial court with respect to corroborative testimony. The Supreme Court held that the issue was not before it because the defendant had failed to object at the close of his trial. St. v. Kaczmarek, 243 M 456, 795 P2d 439, 47 St. Rep. 1319 (1990).

No Prejudice Through Order in Companion Case: In a companion case involving defendant's brother, the trial court, over the brother's objection, ordered the production of statements made by individuals whom the brother intended to call as witnesses, pursuant to 46-15-323. Pursuant to an order in his own case, defendant was required to produce the same information. Defendant did not object to the order in his own case and was precluded from raising the issue on appeal. Further, defendant lacked standing to assert the privilege that was alleged by his brother; the defendant did not demonstrate any prejudice to him as a result of the order in the companion case. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

What Questions Constitute Prosecutorial Misconduct: Defendant contended that statements asked of a witness by the County Attorney on cross-examination constituted prosecutorial misconduct and resulted in prejudice. In determining that the questions did not comprise misconduct, the Supreme Court cited sec. 3-5.7(d) of the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice (1986), which states that "[i]t is unprofessional conduct for a prosecutor to ask a question which implies the existence of a factual predicate for which a good faith belief is lacking". St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Defense of Statute of Limitations — Cannot Be Raised for First Time on Appeal: The defendant was charged with felony theft, but the trial court reduced the charge to misdemeanor theft during the trial in light of evidence as to the value of the stolen property. On appeal, the defendant argued that the 1-year statute of limitations for trying him on the misdemeanor charge had run. The Supreme Court ruled that the defense of the statute of limitations was jurisdictional, had to be asserted at the trial, and was waived if not asserted before appeal. St. v. Larson, 240 M 203, 783 P2d 416, 46 St. Rep. 2055 (1989).

Constitutionality Not Considered: Defendant alleged for the first time on appeal that 45-5-201 is unconstitutional because it fails to provide a parent, who may use reasonable and necessary force to restrain or correct his child under 45-3-107, with any guidance in determining what is or is not reasonable or necessary force. The Supreme Court refused to consider the allegation on appeal, since none of the exceptions of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) were found to apply. St. v. Probert, 221 M 476, 719 P2d 783, 43 St. Rep. 988 (1986).

Alleged Constitutional Violation — Prerequisites: Concerning an alleged constitutional violation (failure to allow defendant to confront witnesses by allowing hearsay evidence) when the error was not objected to at trial, a party must show prejudicial error and must satisfy one of the three requirements listed in 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) before the claim will be noticed on appeal. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986), followed in St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028, 50 St. Rep. 335 (1993), and Forsyth v. Allison, 274 M 246, 908 P2d 205, 52 St. Rep. 1212 (1995).

Statement of Witness Outside Trial Record Not Fit for Direct Appeal — Remand: Defendant asserted ineffective assistance of trial counsel for failure to call a witness with exculpatory testimony. Since this allegation on appeal included a statement outside the trial record made by the witness in defense counsel's office, the court considered it an improper attempt to supplement the record on appeal and remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the issue of effective assistance of counsel, rather than considering the issue on direct appeal. St. v. Field, 215 M 361, 697 P2d 1339, 42 St. Rep. 431 (1985).

Invited Error: Section 45-5-104 is not ambiguous and does not fail to give a person notice of to what he must conform his conduct. The Supreme Court was disinclined to review a claim to that effect where the State charged and attempted to prove deliberate homicide and objected to any instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide or negligent homicide, and defense counsel convinced the judge to give instructions on those two offenses. Any errors alleged by defendant in that respect were thus invited. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Review of Sentence for Inequity:

Review of a sentence for mere inequity or disparity is for the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court, which will review only for legality of the sentence, under the abuse of discretion standard. St. v. Lloyd, 208 M 195, 676 P2d 229, 41 St. Rep. 263 (1984), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991). See also St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide and sentenced to 10 years and to an additional consecutive 5 years for the knowing use of a gun while committing the offense. At the time of sentencing, the court had discretion to make the 5 years run either consecutively or concurrently. Section 46-18-221, under which the 5 years was imposed, was later amended to require that a sentence under the section run consecutively. Defendant's contention on appeal that it was error to require the 5 years to run consecutively went to the equity of the requirement and not to its legality and should be directed to the Sentence Review Board rather than to the Supreme Court on appeal from the sentence. St. v. Hubbard, 200 M 106, 649 P2d 1331, 39 St. Rep. 1608 (1982).

Exhibits Attached to Brief on Appeal to Be Disregarded if Not Contained in Record: Where the defendant was convicted of forgery by the District Court and on appeal sought to challenge the adequacy of his counsel by attaching three exhibits to his appellate brief that were not included in the record on appeal, the Supreme Court held that the exhibits may not be considered on appeal, as the court may consider only those matters ascertainable from the record. St. v. Dess, 207 M 396, 674 P2d 501, 41 St. Rep. 31 (1984), followed in St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987).

Pro Se Appeal Filed Without Briefs — General Review of Transcript on Court's Motion: Where the defendant made the defense of his deliberate homicide case difficult by failing to cooperate with his several attorneys, and after conviction was granted several extensions by the Supreme Court for filing a transcript and his first brief, but nevertheless failed to file a brief and specifications of error, the Supreme Court on its own motion reviewed the District Court transcript for typical kinds of errors and found: (1) that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction as the defendant was convicted on the basis of his own testimony; (2) that there were no errors in the jury instructions given on the evidence and the elements of the crime; (3) that assistance of counsel was adequate and that the failure of defendant's counsel to subpoena evidence or witnesses was not relevant to the crime charged; and (4) that the statutory penalties for deliberate homicide with a dangerous weapon did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983).

Inadmissible Evidence — Prejudicial Error Test: The test of prejudicial error requiring reversal of a conviction due to admission of inadmissible evidence is whether there is a reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction. St. v. Gray, 202 M 445, 659 P2d 255, 40 St. Rep. 199 (1983), followed in St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987), and St. v. McKeon, 282 M 397, 938 P2d 643, 54 St. Rep. 404 (1997).

Federal Habeas Corpus Standard of Review Inapplicable to Appeals: In an appeal by the defendant from his conviction of aggravated assault against two police officers, the Supreme Court declined to review the record to determine, as urged by the defendant, that no rational trier of fact could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant's actions were not justified as a matter of self-defense. The cases raised by the defendant urging this standard of review are cases applicable to federal habeas corpus review of a state court conviction. Those cases and that standard of review are not applicable to an appeal to the Supreme Court. St. v. Warnick, 202 M 120, 656 P2d 190, 39 St. Rep. 2369 (1982).

Failure to Raise Issue Below — Presence of Victim During Defendant's Testimony: Defense counsel who did not object to the presence of sexual assault victim in the courtroom while defendant testified could not legitimately present for review the claim that trial court erred by permitting her presence. St. v. Lamb, 198 M 323, 646 P2d 516, 39 St. Rep. 1021 (1982).

Independent Knowledge of Juror — Failure to Object: The fact that a juror had acted as a special prosecutor in a disbarment action against an attorney under a workers' compensation indictment and had used the defendant's disbarment, which dealt at length with the facts involved in the defendant's criminal case, as a model in drafting his pleadings did not require a reversal of the defendant's conviction when, at the conclusion of the trial, the juror met with the judge and counsel and told them what he knew and the defendant made no objection. The defense failed to meet its responsibility by its failure to properly object and thereby give the trial court an opportunity to remedy any alleged defects. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Specific Objection to Evidence Required in Persistent Felony Offender Hearing: By failing to make a specific objection, the defendant waived his right to assert that the State's certificate of prior conviction without proof that he was the person named in the certificate was not competent evidence. The defendant was informed well in advance of the time he entered his guilty plea that he would be tried as a persistent felony offender. At the hearing to determine whether the defendant was a persistent felony offender, he had an opportunity to object to the State's lack of identification but failed to do so. St. v. Metz, 184 M 533, 604 P2d 102 (1979).

Deferred Sentence Conditioned on Repayment of Attorney's Fees — Objection Not Necessary: Lenihan pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary and received a deferred sentence. One of the conditions of his deferred sentence was that he pay the county $250 as reimbursement for his court-appointed attorney. Lenihan did not object to this condition when sentence was imposed but raised the issue on appeal. On appeal [under this section as it read prior to the 1983 amendment], the court said that it may review any sentence in a criminal case if it is alleged that such sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979).

Duty of Court and Defendant: It is up to the Supreme Court to decide whether an error affects the substantial rights of the defendant, and the defendant must demonstrate prejudice from the record. St. v. Bubnash, 142 M 377, 382 P2d 830 (1963); St. v. Straight, 136 M 255, 347 P2d 482 (1959).

Necessity of Transcript of Evidence: In order to give effect to a predecessor section to determine whether the erroneous instructions were merely technical errors or affected the substantial rights of the accused, it was necessary that the Supreme Court have before it a transcript of the evidence. St. v. Hay, 120 M 573, 194 P2d 232 (1948).

Curing Prejudice — Evidence of Similar Offenses: The withdrawal of evidence of similar offenses, on motion or by instruction, is ineffective to cure prejudice unless the Supreme Court on inspection of the record can say that the effect of the evidence was clearly removed; when a general objection was interposed, the failure to move to strike or withdraw it from the jury's consideration is immaterial. St. v. Simanton, 100 M 292, 49 P2d 981 (1935), overruled on related issue in St. v. Knox, 119 M 449, 175 P2d 774 (1946).

No Prejudice:

In criminal cases no judgment will be reversed for technical errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the defendant, and when the record is sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant, a new trial will not be granted, even though there was error, unless it clearly appears that the error complained of actually prejudiced the defendant in his right to a fair trial. St. v. Ray, 88 M 436, 294 P 368 (1930); St. v. Dixson, 80 M 181, 260 P 138 (1927).

A judgment of conviction will not be reversed unless the error prejudiced or tended to the prejudice of the defendant. St. v. Vanella, 40 M 326, 106 P 364 (1910); St. v. Rhys, 40 M 131, 105 P 494 (1909).

FAILURE OF PROOF ON APPEAL

Prosecutor's Comments on Credibility of Witnesses and Defendant's Failure to Present Evidence — Plain Error Review Declined: Lindberg claimed reversible error because the prosecutor, in closing arguments during Lindberg's trial on sex crimes, made personal comments regarding the credibility of witnesses and evidence presented by the defense, which Lindberg asserted shifted the burden to Lindberg to prove his innocence and violated the right to a fair trial. Because defense counsel did not object to the comments, Lindberg contended that the rights violation was reviewable under the plain error doctrine. Although not condoning the prosecutor's comments, the Supreme Court nevertheless declined to apply the plain error doctrine because, given the totality of the circumstances, the comments did not rise to a level sufficient to invoke plain error. The comments did not unconstitutionally shift the burden of proof to Lindberg. Failure to review Lindberg's claims would not have resulted in a manifest miscarriage of justice, so plain error review was unwarranted. St. v. Lindberg, 2008 MT 389, 347 M 76, 196 P3d 1252 (2008).

Failure of Defendant to Submit Photographs on Appeal — Review for Prejudice Precluded: Johnson asserted that the trial court erred by allowing the introduction of photographs showing injuries suffered by the victim during an alleged assault because the photographs were per se prejudicial because they were inherently inflammatory and because the existence of injury to the victim was not disputed. The Supreme Court noted that Johnson's failure to submit the photographs as part of the record on appeal inhibited the court's ability to review whether the photographs were prejudicial, and absent any explanation from Johnson of how or why the photographs prejudiced his case, Johnson failed to establish that the District Court abused its discretion in admitting the photographs at trial. St. v. Johnson, 2008 MT 227, 344 M 313, 187 P3d 662 (2008), following St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005).

Improper Admission of Coconspirator's Out-of-Court Statements and Confession — Reversible Error: In a videotaped interview with detectives, Steilman admitted that he and Francis had murdered a man to prove their worth to each other in conducting other criminal activity. Steilman was offered a plea agreement and was called to testify at Francis's trial. When called as a witness, Steilman refused to answer any questions on fifth amendment grounds, so the state sought the admission of the videotaped interview and Steilman's out-of-court statements to lay witnesses. The state contended that the statements to lay witnesses were admissible as statements of a coconspirator made in furtherance of a conspiracy and that the statements to police were admissible as admissions against Steilman's penal interests. The District Court allowed the statements, but not the videotape, although the videotape was subsequently shown to the jury pursuant to a motion by defense counsel, in response to the ruling on the admissibility of the out-of-court statements, in order to give the jury an opportunity to observe Steilman. Francis was ultimately convicted of deliberate homicide and appealed on grounds that admission of the out-of-court statements was reversible error. The state conceded on appeal that the statements to lay witnesses were inadmissible because statements made after attainment of the conspirator's object are not admissible unless the movant can prove that an express agreement existed among the coconspirators to continue to act in concert to cover up the crime after its commission, and the state offered no such proof. Moreover, the statements were not admissible as testimony regarding out-of-court statements made by Francis, or admissible as statements made by Steilman and adopted by Francis. The state also conceded on appeal that the statements made to police were not admissible as statements against Steilman's penal interests. Pursuant to St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688 (1997), the fact that portions of a declarant's confession are admissible because they are self-inculpatory does not necessarily make the collateral noninculpatory statements either credible or admissible, particularly when the declarant implicates another person, as in this case when Steilman's confession consisted mainly of blaming Francis. The Supreme Court then applied this section, in light of St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine whether admission of the out-of-court statements constituted structural error or trial error and whether the error was reversible. The error here was trial error. In order to be considered harmless, it was necessary that the state demonstrate that there was no reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence contributed to the verdict. The court agreed that there was sufficient cumulative admissible evidence regarding Francis's purposeful participation in the killing. However, the court was forced to conclude that there was also a reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted testimony of Steilman's out-of-court statements implicating Francis might have contributed to the conviction, so the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Francis, 2001 MT 233, 307 M 12, 36 P3d 390 (2001).

District Court Exceeding Scope of Appellate Review — Abuse of Discretion in Applying Particularized Suspicion of DUI to Traffic Stop Triggered by Report of Vandalism: Robertson was stopped after a vehicle of the description that he was driving was reported leaving the scene of a vandalism. He was subsequently convicted of DUI in City Court and appealed to District Court on grounds that his right to confront witnesses was denied and that the city had not sustained the necessary burden of proof to support the conviction. The District Court remanded to the City Court for dismissal on grounds that the arresting officer did not have a sufficient particularized suspicion to justify the investigative stop for DUI. However, the issue of a sufficient particularized suspicion was never raised or ruled on in City Court by either Robertson or the city. When a District Court exercises its power of appellate review, it must refrain from deciding issues not properly raised or objected to in the court below; thus, the District Court abused its discretion by exceeding the scope of its appellate review in addressing the issue of particularized suspicion, so the Supreme Court reversed the order of the District Court dismissing the City Court judgment against Robertson. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000). See also Missoula v. Asbury, 265 M 14, 873 P2d 936, 51 St. Rep. 383 (1994), and St. v. Herrera, 1998 MT 173, 289 M 499, 962 P2d 1180 (1998).

Prosecutor's Comments in Response to Defense Counsel's Opening Statement Not Prejudicial: Defense counsel told the jury in opening statements that a witness had made inconsistent statements, referring to a statement given to the investigator for the public defender's office. The investigator was never called, and the theory was not substantiated. The prosecutor referred to the theory in closing, noting that the defense had failed to present the evidence that defense counsel had referred to in opening. Although it is improper to comment on a criminal defendant's failure to testify, it is proper for a prosecutor to direct the jury's attention to facts in issue that could be controverted by persons other than the defendant. The prosecutor was entitled to comment on the theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support. The District Court did not err in refusing to grant a mistrial on grounds of prosecutorial comments because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 173, 979 P2d 206, 56 St. Rep. 370 (1999).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), and St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Assignment of Error in Denying New Trial — No Record, Not Argued: When an alleged error in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial was not argued and nothing appeared in the record to sustain it, the assignment did not merit consideration. St. v. Wong Sun, 114 M 185, 133 P2d 761 (1943).

Verdict Contrary to Law or Evidence: An alleged error in an instruction will not be reviewed on appeal when the only ground designated is that the verdict is contrary to the law and evidence. St. v. Gawith, 19 M 48, 47 P 207 (1896), overruled in St. v. Mason, 24 M 340, 61 P 861 (1900).

SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE

Defendant's Probationary Status Considered Inadmissible Trial Evidence of Prior Crimes — New Trial Warranted: At Derbyshire's trial on drug charges, defense counsel moved to exclude any references to the fact that Derbyshire was on probation or that the drug search was conducted by probation officers. The trial court denied the motion and allowed references to probation but gave cautionary instructions prohibiting the jury from using the information to assume that Derbyshire was more likely to be guilty of the offense. Derbyshire was convicted and appealed on grounds that probation references should have been disallowed because they constituted inadmissible evidence of prior crimes. The state did not comply with the requirement of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., inasmuch as Derbyshire was never notified that evidence of other crimes would be introduced. However, the state asserted that the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103 and therefore not subject to the procedural requirements of Rule 404(b). The District Court agreed with the state's theory and reasoned that the involvement of probation officers was part of the whole transaction and that the officers' status as probation officers was relevant to why they had certain knowledge and why they acted the way they did. Derbyshire contended that specific roles and titles of the officers who gathered the evidence were immaterial to the ultimate issue of whether Derbyshire possessed a dangerous drug with intent to distribute. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant may not be convicted based on the inference that because he committed crimes in the past he was more likely to have committed the crime charged, and that evidence of Derbyshire's status as a probationer constituted evidence that Derbyshire committed other crimes and thus was generally inadmissible unless an exception such as the transaction rule applied. However, in this case the transaction rule was inapplicable. The officers' status as probation officers and Derbyshire's status as probationer were neither part of nor evidence of the disputed issue of whether Derbyshire possessed a dangerous drug, nor were they "evidence of what transgressed immediately prior and subsequent to the commission of the offense charged" or inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense. Therefore, the District Court erred in denying Derbyshire's motion to exclude evidence of his status as a probationer. Further, the error was considered trial error rather than structural error, and although not presumptively prejudicial, the error was subject to harmless error review. In this case, there was a reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to Derbyshire's conviction, and the state failed to show that, qualitatively, there was no possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to Derbyshire's conviction. Absent a showing that the error was harmless, the conviction was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 M 114, 201 P3d 811 (2009), applying the prejudicial error analysis from St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

Failure to Argue Prejudicial Effect of Malfunctioning Breathalyzer Printer — No Error in Denial of Motion to Suppress: When Otto was tested with a Breathalyzer, the machine registered a 0.159 blood alcohol content but failed to print a card with the test results. Otto moved for dismissal of the Breathalyzer results because a complete test, including the printed results, was not accomplished. The dismissal motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Otto failed to argue prejudice based on the admission of the test results. Given ample additional evidence of Otto's intoxicated condition, failure to suppress the Breathalyzer results did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Otto, 2004 MT 338, 324 M 217, 102 P3d 522 (2004).

Defendant Present in Apartment Where Methamphetamine Lab Found — Totality of Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Arrest: Officers raided Savage's apartment, identified by an anonymous tip as a suspected methamphetamine laboratory. Nalder was also present, and although officers had no previous suspicions regarding Nalder, they arrested her after hearing a toilet running and observing her standing in the kitchen, which was adjacent to the bathroom, near what appeared to be a jar filled with a substance in the first stage of the methamphetamine-producing process. During an interview, Nalder admitted to flushing substances used to make methamphetamine down the toilet when she heard the officers announce themselves. Nalder was charged with tampering with physical evidence, but Nalder moved to suppress the statements and the charge on grounds that probable cause did not exist for her warrantless arrest. The motion was denied, and Nalder was convicted and appealed, contending error in denial of the motion to suppress based on certain findings that were allegedly incorrect. The Supreme Court affirmed. The trial court's finding that the officers announced their presence twice before entering the apartment, contrary to Nalder's claim that she did not hear any knocking, was supported by the evidence and not clearly erroneous because failure to hear did not constitute evidence contradicting the officers' testimony that they announced themselves. The trial court's finding that the officers broke down the door was not supported by substantial evidence and was thus erroneous, but the error was not prejudicial in light of the totality of the circumstances. Nalder correctly asserted that her mere presence at the scene did not justify arrest and that there must be some connection with criminal activity before her warrantless arrest was justified. However, considered in light of the totality of the circumstances and the trained officers' knowledge, there was sufficient probable cause for Nalder's arrest. The officers received extensive training in what to reasonably expect while raiding a methamphetamine laboratory, and evaluated in accordance with the officers' perceptions, they could reasonably believe that Nalder was committing, and had just committed, a crime. St. v. Nalder, 2001 MT 270, 307 M 280, 37 P3d 661 (2001).

Improper Admission of Coconspirator's Out-of-Court Statements and Confession — Reversible Error: In a videotaped interview with detectives, Steilman admitted that he and Francis had murdered a man to prove their worth to each other in conducting other criminal activity. Steilman was offered a plea agreement and was called to testify at Francis's trial. When called as a witness, Steilman refused to answer any questions on fifth amendment grounds, so the state sought the admission of the videotaped interview and Steilman's out-of-court statements to lay witnesses. The state contended that the statements to lay witnesses were admissible as statements of a coconspirator made in furtherance of a conspiracy and that the statements to police were admissible as admissions against Steilman's penal interests. The District Court allowed the statements, but not the videotape, although the videotape was subsequently shown to the jury pursuant to a motion by defense counsel, in response to the ruling on the admissibility of the out-of-court statements, in order to give the jury an opportunity to observe Steilman. Francis was ultimately convicted of deliberate homicide and appealed on grounds that admission of the out-of-court statements was reversible error. The state conceded on appeal that the statements to lay witnesses were inadmissible because statements made after attainment of the conspirator's object are not admissible unless the movant can prove that an express agreement existed among the coconspirators to continue to act in concert to cover up the crime after its commission, and the state offered no such proof. Moreover, the statements were not admissible as testimony regarding out-of-court statements made by Francis, or admissible as statements made by Steilman and adopted by Francis. The state also conceded on appeal that the statements made to police were not admissible as statements against Steilman's penal interests. Pursuant to St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688 (1997), the fact that portions of a declarant's confession are admissible because they are self-inculpatory does not necessarily make the collateral noninculpatory statements either credible or admissible, particularly when the declarant implicates another person, as in this case when Steilman's confession consisted mainly of blaming Francis. The Supreme Court then applied this section, in light of St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine whether admission of the out-of-court statements constituted structural error or trial error and whether the error was reversible. The error here was trial error. In order to be considered harmless, it was necessary that the state demonstrate that there was no reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence contributed to the verdict. The court agreed that there was sufficient cumulative admissible evidence regarding Francis's purposeful participation in the killing. However, the court was forced to conclude that there was also a reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted testimony of Steilman's out-of-court statements implicating Francis might have contributed to the conviction, so the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Francis, 2001 MT 233, 307 M 12, 36 P3d 390 (2001).

No Abuse of Discretion in Failure to Dismiss Case on Court's Own Motion for Insufficient Evidence: Brady was charged with DUI, fourth or subsequent offense, arising from circumstances surrounding a single-vehicle accident in which Brady swerved off the highway, hit a rock wall, and rolled the vehicle. After the state's case in chief, Brady moved for a directed verdict of acquittal, but the motion was denied. Brady was subsequently convicted and contended on appeal that the trial court erred when it did not dismiss the case on its own motion because the evidence was far from overwhelming, arguing that taken as a whole, the evidence was insufficient to submit to the jury because there was no direct or even circumstantial evidence that he had anything to drink, much less was intoxicated, at the time of the accident. However, there was circumstantial evidence of conduct before and after the accident that could have led the jury to believe Brady had been drinking. When circumstantial evidence is susceptible to differing interpretations, it is within the province of the jury to decide which will prevail. The jury apparently did not believe that the wreck happened because Brady's car malfunctioned, that his injuries accounted for his drunken behavior, or that his apparent intoxication when officers tracked him down at home after the accident was the consequence of a single beer that he drank after the accident. Taken in a light most favorable to the state, a reasonable juror could have found Brady guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and it was not error for the trial court to allow the evidence to go to the jury. St. v. Brady, 2000 MT 282, 302 M 174, 13 P3d 941, 57 St. Rep. 1178 (2000).

Victim's Unsupported and Self-Contradicted Word Against Defendant's — Sufficiency of Evidence: An aggravated kidnapping and assault prosecution essentially consisted of defendant's word against victim's. Defendant's claim on appeal that the evidence was insufficient to support the convictions because victim's testimony was not corroborated by other testimony or by physical evidence and was contradicted by her statements to police after the events in question was rejected on appeal. The trial judge believed victim to be more credible than defendant; prior inconsistent statements do not necessarily render testimony inherently noncredible; and the trial took place almost 4 years after the offenses, and the victim said that she had trouble remembering everything. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Allegation That Evidence Is Circumstantial and Susceptible of Different Interpretations: Allegation that evidence of guilt was circumstantial and susceptible of different interpretations relates to the weight of the evidence, not its sufficiency, and was properly refused as a basis for granting a motion of acquittal. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Test:

When sufficiency of the evidence or elements of the offense issues are presented on appeal, the standard of review applied by the Supreme Court will be whether, after review of the evidence in a light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992), overruling the portion of St. v. Cope, 250 M 387, 819 P2d 1280 (1991), that holds that a "clearly erroneous" standard is to be applied to judge-made findings of fact on the substantive elements of a criminal offense, but leaving intact the Cope standard for review of findings of fact on other issues in criminal proceedings, distinguishing Interstate Prod. Credit Ass'n v. DeSaye, 250 M 320, 820 P2d 1285 (1991), and followed, with regard to findings of fact regarding suppression hearing evidence, in St. v. Kaluza, 262 M 360, 865 P2d 263, 50 St. Rep. 1596 (1993). See also St. v. Riley, 252 M 469, 830 P2d 549, 49 St. Rep. 408 (1992), and St. v. Carter, 285 M 449, 948 P2d 1173, 54 St. Rep. 1235 (1997).

The applicable rule on review of the sufficiency of the evidence to support a criminal conviction is whether there is substantial evidence to support the conviction, viewed in a light most favorable to the state. Substantial evidence is such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion. St. v. Plouffe, 198 M 379, 646 P2d 533, 39 St. Rep. 1064 (1982), followed in St. v. Lapp, 202 M 327, 658 P2d 400, 40 St. Rep. 120 (1983). For application to civil proceedings, see Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986).

The "clearly erroneous" test does not apply to review sufficiency of the evidence to support a jury verdict in a criminal case, and a conviction must be affirmed if reasonable and prudent persons could have concluded that taken in the light most favorable to the government the evidence warranted a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. U.S. v. Kipp, 624 F2d 84 (9th Cir. 1980).

Sufficiency of Evidence When Self-Defense Claimed: On appeal, defendant convicted of aggravated assault argued that she met her burden of proof of self-defense, which she correctly stated as raising a reasonable doubt as to her guilt. The Supreme Court's function on appeal is not to determine whether she raised a reasonable doubt as to her guilt but whether the evidence was sufficient to support her conviction when viewed in the light most favorable to the state (see St. v. Lamb, 198 M 323, 646 P2d 516, 39 St. Rep. 1021 (1982)). Disputed questions of fact and the credibility of witnesses will not be considered on appeal (see St. v. DeGeorge, 173 M 35, 566 P2d 59 (1977)). Finding substantial evidence in the record, the court held that defendant was not justified in using force likely to cause death or serious bodily harm. St. v. Tonkovich, 221 M 8, 716 P2d 615, 43 St. Rep. 592 (1986).

Victim's Contradictory Statements — Sufficiency of Evidence: There was sufficient evidence to support the conviction of defendant for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) despite the victim's contradiction of her prior statements about the assault when the victim and her child arrived at the battered women's shelter with swollen lips and mouths and when the victim stated at the shelter and immediately thereafter that she and her daughter had been violently beaten by the defendant. St. v. Oman, 218 M 260, 707 P2d 1117, 42 St. Rep. 1565 (1985). See also St. v. Brown, 239 M 453, 781 P2d 281, 46 St. Rep. 1825 (1989).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Arson: Sufficient evidence supported appellant's arson conviction when evidence presented at trial indicated that appellant: (1) had been angered by his son's conveyance of the cabin; (2) had twice threatened to burn down the cabin; (3) had been seen driving from the direction of the cabin by a deputy sheriff soon after the fire was reported; (4) when followed by the deputy sheriff, drove in excess of 85 miles an hour until the deputy was able to stop him; and (5) had tires on his vehicle that matched tire tracks left at the cabin. St. v. Berklund, 217 M 218, 704 P2d 59, 42 St. Rep. 1147 (1985).

Inconsistent Statements of Victims — Sufficiency of Evidence: Inconsistencies in the testimony of the complaining witnesses did not make the evidence insufficient to support a conviction or show that it inherently lacked credibility. St. v. Anderson, 211 M 272, 686 P2d 193, 41 St. Rep. 1357 (1984).

Test for Sufficiency of Evidence — Proof of Felonious Intent: In an appeal from a conviction for criminal mischief and attempted burglary, the defendant argued that it was mere happenstance that he was found hiding in a packing crate with burglary tools near the scene of an attempted burglary, that there was no direct proof of his participation in the attempted burglary or of his felonious intent, and that the record therefore did not support his conviction. The Supreme Court followed the test for sufficiency of the evidence reviewed in St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983), and the rationale of St. v. Pascgo, 173 M 121, 566 P2d 802 (1977) (holding that circumstantial evidence may be used to prove criminal intent), and found that there was substantial evidence to uphold the conviction. St. v. Gladue, 209 M 235, 679 P2d 1256, 41 St. Rep. 669 (1984).

Sentence — Improper Vindictiveness Claim on Appeal: Defendant was convicted of negligent arson and given the maximum sentence. On appeal, counsel argued that since defendant was a 38-year-old man employed as a teacher, was a captain in the army reserve, and had no criminal record, the maximum sentence indicated judicial vindictiveness. In the absence of any evidence indicating vindictiveness on the part of the judge, it was improper to suggest its presence and the issue was summarily dismissed. St. v. Gray, 202 M 445, 659 P2d 255, 40 St. Rep. 199 (1983).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Negligent Homicide by Means of Vehicle — Identity of Driver: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide after a vehicle owned by defendant and his wife struck and killed a pedestrian. Defendant's wife first admitted having been the driver of the vehicle at the time of the accident but later withdrew her statement. Subsequently her husband was arrested, tried, and convicted of the crime. In reviewing the conviction on the issue of sufficiency of the evidence, the Supreme Court ruled the evidence sufficient and based its ruling on the following factors: (1) defendant's wife testified that he was the driver; (2) a witness saw defendant driving shortly before the accident; (3) witnesses testified that it appeared that the driver was a male and that the passenger had long hair; and (4) medical evidence on the location of the injuries defendant sustained in the accident indicated that defendant was the driver. St. v. Henricks, 201 M 157, 653 P2d 479, 39 St. Rep. 2022 (1982).

Lack of Record — Unlawfully Sequestered Witness: Supreme Court would not consider claim that prosecution unlawfully sequestered a subpoenaed witness who may have provided exculpatory testimony for defense where there was nothing on the record to which court could look. St. v. Lamb, 198 M 323, 646 P2d 516, 39 St. Rep. 1021 (1982).

Circumstantial Evidence — Review Standard:

A review of the evidence following conviction in a criminal trial, whether the evidence is wholly direct, wholly circumstantial, or a combination of the two, must begin with the principles: (1) that the correct test is whether there is substantial evidence supporting the conviction, viewed in the light most favorable to the state; and (2) that "substantial evidence" is such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conviction. A conviction based upon circumstantial evidence may require a greater degree of scrutiny but does not require a separate or unique evidentiary test on review. St. v. Johnson, 197 M 122, 641 P2d 462, 39 St. Rep. 419 (1982), followed in St. v. Green, 212 M 20, 685 P2d 370, 41 St. Rep. 1562 (1984), and St. v. Lias, 218 M 124, 706 P2d 500, 42 St. Rep. 1453 (1985).

Appellant alleged that to justify a conviction on circumstantial evidence, the facts and circumstances must not only be entirely consistent with the theory of guilt but must also be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion. The allegation did not set forth the full standard for review of a verdict based primarily upon circumstantial evidence; the court should inquire whether the facts and circumstances are of such a quality and quantity as to legally justify a jury in determining guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and if such be the case, the court cannot set aside the conviction. St. v. Johnson, 197 M 122, 641 P2d 462, 39 St. Rep. 419 (1982).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Assault With Dangerous Weapon: Evidence was not insufficient to convict for assault with a dangerous weapon where appellant had an altercation in the dark, and there was testimony that he struck victim, had a knife in hand shortly before he struck, and victim suffered a knife cut. U.S. v. Kipp, 624 F2d 84 (9th Cir. 1980).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Theft: In a theft proceeding, if the evidence shows that defendant was in possession of recently stolen property, either singly or jointly with others, an inference of guilt is warranted. Evidence of possession by the defendant is not rebutted merely by showing another's presence. Where this evidence is presented, there is sufficient evidence to send the case to the jury and the trial court may properly reject a motion to dismiss for failure to establish a prima facie case and the verdict, supported by substantial evidence, will be upheld on appeal. St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P2d 191 (1980).

SUBSTANTIAL RIGHTS AFFECTED

Defendant's Right to Be Present at In-Chambers Conference on Evidentiary Issues — Reversal Granted Absent Waiver of Right: At the close of the state's case in chief during Matt's deliberate homicide trial, the trial judge, prosecutor, and defense counsel met in the judge's chambers to discuss evidentiary matters and Matt's motion to dismiss for lack of evidence. Matt was not present during the conference, and defense counsel stated that Matt's presence was unnecessary because the issues were legal and Matt "doesn't get any of this anyway". Following conviction, Matt appealed on grounds that he had the right to be present at the conference because it was a critical stage of the trial. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The in-chambers conference was a critical stage of the trial, so Matt's right to be present applied. Defense counsel's statement that Matt did not need to be present was not a valid waiver of Matt's right to be present because there was no on-the-record personal waiver, so Matt did not knowingly and intelligently waive the right. Once it was established that Matt's fundamental right to be present was violated, prejudice was presumed. Although not all constitutional violations amount to reversible error, if the violation contaminates the framework within which the trial proceeds or if the constitutional right is so basic that its infraction cannot be treated as harmless, the violation is considered a structural error and reversal is automatic. If the violation does not fall within this category, the question is whether the violation was harmless, and the burden is on the state to demonstrate that there is no possibility that violation of the right to be present prejudiced the defendant. In this case, nothing discussed at the conference and ruled on by the District Court concerned or affected the framework within which Matt's trial proceeded or necessarily rendered the trial unfair, so the violation was not considered structural and subject to automatic reversal. Thus, the burden fell to the state to show that the violation was harmless and not prejudicial. The state did not provide a harmless error analysis on appeal and therefore did not meet its burden. The case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Matt, 2008 MT 444, 347 M 530, 199 P3d 244 (2008), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18 (1967), Ranta v. St., 1998 MT 95, 288 M 391, 958 P2d 670 (1998), St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 M 428, 41 P3d 305 (2001), St. v. Bird, 2002 MT 2, 308 M 75, 43 P3d 266 (2002), and St. v. McCarthy, 2004 MT 312, 324 M 1, 101 P3d 288 (2004), and followed in St. v. Godfrey, 2009 MT 60, 349 M 335, 203 P3d 834 (2009), regarding determination of trial error rather than structural error.

Exclusion of Defendant From Pretrial Meeting to Determine Whether Defendant Be Allowed to Proceed Pro Se Violative of Right to Be Present and Defend Oneself — Reversible Error: An alleged violation of the constitutional right to be present and appear at all criminal proceedings does not warrant automatic reversal. Rather, the Supreme Court considers the effect that a violation has on a defendant to determine whether a defendant has suffered any conceivable prejudice. In this case, Mann was excluded from a pretrial meeting to determine whether Mann would be represented by counsel or proceed pro se at trial on burglary and misdemeanor assault charges. This important determination implicated a substantial issue in the scope of the criminal proceedings, and excluding Mann from the meeting, at which Mann's counsel portrayed Mann in a negative light, violated Mann's right to be present and defend himself and right to effective assistance of counsel. Violation of these fundamental constitutional rights was sufficiently prejudicial to constitute reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 160, 332 M 476, 139 P3d 159 (2006).

Tainted Character Evidence Considered Prejudicial — New Trial Warranted: During Nolan's trial for resisting arrest, criminal endangerment, and bail-jumping, Nolan was asked why he did not appear on the original trial date and jumped bail instead. Nolan stated that he was taking pain medication for a bad tooth and overslept, and had just started a new job and did not want to miss work because he needed the money to pay the bills and feed his children, whom he loved. Over objection, the prosecutor pursued an extended series of questions regarding Nolan's job history and personal relationships, which revealed that Nolan had fathered a number of children by several women, none of whom he had married, and that he did not pay child support because none had been ordered. Other testimony related to Nolan's character, including rebuttal testimony from one woman that Nolan acted as pimp for her prostitution activities. The state contended that Nolan opened the door to the questioning by asserting that he was a decent man and member of the community who cared about his family. Nolan contended that the cross-examination and rebuttal evidence forced him to defend his lifestyle choices and impermissibly turned a bail-jumping trial into a trial of his morals. The Supreme Court agreed with Nolan. The state's right to a full cross-examination of a defendant's character traits, once placed at issue, is not limitless. Here, the prosecutor went beyond permissible cross-examination and rebuttal and ended up trying Nolan's character. Because trial error is not presumptively prejudicial, the Supreme Court reviewed the error under this section to determine whether the error prejudiced Nolan's case. The court concluded that the evidence was highly inflammatory and presented a significant possibility that the qualitative effect of the cross-examination and rebuttal contributed to Nolan's conviction. Because of the prejudice involved, Nolan's conviction was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings related to the charges. St. v. Nolan, 2003 MT 55, 314 M 371, 66 P3d 269 (2003).

Confession a Result of Exploitation of Unlawful Arrest — Miranda Warning Insufficient to Negate Cumulative Effect of Circumstances Leading to Confession: Officers had insufficient probable cause to arrest Van Dort, resulting in an unlawful arrest, and the Supreme Court then considered whether Van Dort's subsequent confession was legitimate. The state maintained that because Van Dort was given Miranda warnings, the confession should be admissible. Van Dort averred that the Miranda warnings alone were insufficient to sever the causal connection between the confession and the arrest. The court noted that as set out in St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94 (1985), which adopted the federal rule set out in Brown v. Ill., 422 US 590 (1975), the general principle is that a confession obtained as a result of an unlawful arrest is inadmissible; however, there must be a causal connection between the arrest and the confession. In determining whether a causal connection exists, the court considers: (1) the presence or absence of timely Miranda warnings; (2) whether there was an intervening independent act by the defendant or some third party; (3) the temporal proximity of the arrest and confession; and (4) the degree of the alleged constitutional violation. Miranda warnings will not, in all cases, attenuate the corruptive effect of a prior constitutional violation or remove the taint of a prior constitutional violation. In this case, the Miranda warnings did not sever the chain of causality between Van Dort's unlawful arrest and the confession and were insufficient to negate the cumulative effect of all the relevant circumstances leading to Van Dort's confession. The court distinguished Beach, holding that despite the issuance of Miranda warnings, Van Dort's confession was the result of the exploitation of the unlawful arrest and inadmissible as fruit of the poisonous tree, and the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of Van Dort's motion to suppress. St. v. Van Dort, 2003 MT 104, 315 M 303, 68 P3d 728 (2003).

Possibility That Statements Made During Custodial Interrogation, After Lawyer Requested, Contributed to Conviction — New Trial Warranted: Spang was charged in connection with a double homicide. He made statements to police after being read his rights at arrest and again 2 days later after requesting a lawyer. Spang moved to suppress the statements, but the motion was denied on grounds that Spang waived the right to counsel after voluntarily answering interrogators' questions on both occasions. Transcripts of the interrogations were made available to the jury, and Spang was subsequently convicted on two counts of intimidation by accountability, but appealed based on insufficiency of evidence. The Supreme Court reviewed the denial of the suppression motion to determine whether the trial court's findings of fact were clearly erroneous and whether they were correctly applied as a matter of law. Here, Spang's request for counsel was neither ambiguous nor equivocal, so cessation of questioning was required until Spang either reinitiated conversation with the officers or was provided an attorney. Because neither event occurred, the trial court erred when it denied Spang's motion to suppress the statements. To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), determining in this case that the error was trial error, because it occurred during presentation of the case to the jury and was amenable to qualitative assessment for prejudicial impact relative to other evidence introduced at trial. Under the cumulative evidence test, the state was required to show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence. Although there was other sufficient evidence tending to prove that Spang committed intimidation by accountability, qualitatively there existed a reasonable possibility that the statements that Spang made during the second interrogation contributed to his conviction because of the strong emphasis placed on those statements during trial. Therefore, the District Court committed reversible error when it admitted the statements during the state's case in chief. The case was remanded for a new trial, and the District Court was directed not to admit the statements made during the second interrogation. Statements from the first interrogation were admissible, however, because Spang had waived the right to counsel. Spang's argument that the first interrogation statements also be suppressed on unnecessary delay grounds failed, absent evidence that the delay between arrest and initial appearance influenced the voluntariness of those statements. St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979), and overruled, to the extent that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation, in St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Failure to Summon Jurors in Statutory Manner — Lamere Per Se Rule Retroactively Applied — Rule of Law Inapplicable Considering Substantial Change in Law: In St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359 (1998), Robbins moved to quash the jury panel because prospective jurors had been summoned by telephone instead of by mail or personal service, as required in 3-15-505. The motion was denied because Robbins failed to introduce any evidence that he was prejudiced, rendering the error harmless. The Supreme Court subsequently decided St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), holding that improper jury summons constituted denial of the fundamental right to a fair trial and thus was per se prejudicial. Robbins then petitioned for postconviction relief on grounds that Lamere should be retroactively applied. The District Court denied the petition, concluding that under the law of the case doctrine, Lamere was not retroactively applicable. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed.

The law of the case doctrine provides that when a decision is rendered by the Supreme Court, the decision is binding and cannot be relitigated in the trial court or on a subsequent appeal. However, a court may reconsider the issue in postconviction proceedings when there has been a substantial change in applicable law. Lamere specifically overruled the opinion in Robbins' 1998 direct appeal to the extent that a violation of 3-15-505 could be harmless error, which constituted a substantial change in the law, so the law of the case doctrine did not preclude the application of Lamere to Robbins' 2002 postconviction proceedings. Robbins was entitled to retroactive application of Lamere because the state's action in procuring the jury denied Robbins of a right that goes to the very integrity of the justice system, and is implicit in the concept of ordered liberty for purposes of coming within the exception to the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989). Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Plenary Review of Criminal Sentence by Supreme Court Even Though No Objection Made at Sentencing: Brister was sentenced to 20 years for felony sexual assault with 10 years suspended, served the 10-year prison sentence, and then was released and began the 10-year suspended sentence. About 6 years into the suspended sentence, Brister was arrested for felony theft and for violating various parole conditions. The District Court then revoked the suspended sentence and reimposed another 10-year suspended sentence to run consecutively with a 5-year felony theft sentence. The new suspended sentence included 26 additional conditions. Brister did not object to any of the conditions when they were imposed, but filed a motion objecting to the sentence 2 months later, claiming that the conditions were not and could not have been included in the original suspended sentence, and thus violated double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. The state maintained that Brister waived any objections to the conditions by failing to contemporaneously object when the sentence was pronounced, and that the appeal from the sentence was not timely filed. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under St. v. Lenihan, 184 M 338, 602 P2d 997 (1979), the court will review a sentence imposed in a criminal case if it is alleged that the sentence is illegal or exceeds statutory mandates, even if no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Further, Brister provided the District Court with an opportunity to correct any sentencing errors by filing an objection under 46-18-117 (now repealed), which allowed 120 days for correction of an illegal sentence, so Brister retained the right to appeal the purportedly illegal sentence. St. v. Brister, 2002 MT 13, 308 M 154, 41 P3d 314 (2002), overruling St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019 (2000), St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), and St. v. Smith, 2001 MT 111, 305 M 298, 27 P3d 39 (2001), to the extent that those cases held that failure to raise a contemporaneous objection to an illegal sentence at the time of hearing resulted in waiver of defendant's objection, and followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002). See also St. v. Southwick, 2007 MT 257, 339 M 281, 169 P3d 698 (2007).

Prejudicial Error in Failure to Accept Guilty Pleas: Peplow was charged with and convicted of DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, driving without insurance, failing to report an accident, and tampering with evidence. Prior to trial, Peplow tried to enter guilty pleas to the driving with a suspended or revoked license and driving without insurance counts, but the trial court ruled that it was not required to accept the pleas. Peplow appealed. The Supreme Court held that the tampering with evidence charge was not applicable and that Peplow had a right to plead guilty and thus the trial court erred in refusing the pleas. The Supreme Court then applied St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine whether denial of the pleas prejudiced Peplow's right to a fair trial. The court first determined that the error did not undermine the fairness of the entire trial proceeding, nor was it of constitutional dimensions, so it was considered a trial error rather than a structural error. Once a convicted person establishes that the evidence in question was erroneously admitted and has alleged prejudice, the state must then demonstrate that the error was not prejudicial, i.e., that the quality of the tainted evidence was such that there was no reasonable possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. Therefore, pursuant to Van Kirk, the Supreme Court was required to determine whether the evidence proving that Peplow drove with a suspended license and without insurance went to prove an element of either of the substantive charges of DUI or failing to report an accident. The court noted that if Peplow's guilty pleas had been properly accepted, the evidence in question would not have been admissible. Further, the jury was presented with ample admissible evidence that Peplow was under the influence, so it was not necessary that the state object to the guilty pleas in order to buttress the record at trial. However, the qualitative effect of the inadmissible evidence was such that there was a reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to the DUI conviction, so that conviction was reversed and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

Pervasive Misconduct of Plaintiffs' Counsel Preventing Fair Trial on Merits: At Josephson's trial for assault, plaintiffs' counsel attempted to put inadmissible matters before the jury by repeatedly asking objectionable questions and raising impermissible inferences. Although the trial court repeatedly admonished plaintiffs' counsel not to bolster with inadmissible evidence, attempt to introduce inadmissible hearsay, and ignore the court's rulings on certain issues, plaintiff's counsel blithely proceeded to do what he knew he should not. As set out in St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323 (1994), the repeated asking of questions that are clearly intended to keep the assumption of damaging facts that cannot be proved before the jury, in order to impress upon their minds the probability of the existence of the assumed facts upon which the questions are based, constitutes gross misconduct. In this case, despite the trial court's attempts to eliminate the prejudicial impact of the conduct with admonitions and curative instructions, the conduct of plaintiffs' counsel was so pervasive that it prevented Josephson from receiving a fair trial on the merits, raising the presumption of prejudice and warranting reversal of Josephson's conviction and a new trial. Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001). See also Durden v. Hydro Flame Corp., 1998 MT 47, 288 M 1, 955 P2d 160 (1998).

Failure to Summon Entire Panel by Telephonic Juror Summoning — New Trial Warranted: Of the 200-juror panel randomly drawn for Lamere's murder trial, over one-third of the prospective jurors were excluded from possible jury service by virtue of the manner in which a telephone-only notification method skewed the random nature and objectivity of the statutory jury selection procedures. By failing to summon the entire panel or array drawn for the trial, the purpose of juror notification was undermined. Jury duty cannot be lightly shirked, as a telephone summoning system allowed, without doing violence to the democratic nature of the jury system. Because the substantial failure to comply with the statutory requirements materially undermined the jury selection process, Lamere was granted a new trial. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Thiel v. S. Pac. Co., 328 US 217, 90 L Ed 1181, 66 S Ct 984 (1946), and applied retroactively in Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002). See also St. v. Groom, 49 M 354, 141 P 858 (1914), and State ex rel. School District v. Carroll, 87 M 45, 284 P 1008 (1930).

Substantial Compliance Standard Clarified With Regard to Statutory Process for Forming Jury: The objective statutory procedures established by the Legislature for the random selection of jurors are intended to protect a defendant's fundamental right to a fair and impartial jury and must be substantially complied with. Under Montana case law, the substantial compliance standard is not an absolute rule inasmuch as it permits minor deviations from statutory procedure. These technical deviations do not constitute a substantial failure to comply and therefore do not give rise to a presumption of prejudice. In clarifying the substantial compliance standard, the Supreme Court took guidance from federal case law developed under the federal Jury Selection and Service Act of 1968, 28 U.S.C. 1861, et seq. In order to establish a violation under the federal Act, a defendant must show that the government substantially failed to comply with the methods set forth by statute for jury selection. Substantial failure has been construed as a violation that contravenes one of two basic principles: (1) random selection of jurors; and (2) determination of juror disqualification, excuses, exemptions, and exclusion on the basis of objective criteria. A successful challenge to the jury panel may be founded only on a material departure from the law, a deviation amounting to more than a technical irregularity. Thus, a substantial or material statutory departure that affects the random nature or objectivity of the jury selection process establishes a violation independently of the departure's consequences in an individual case, while a technical or nonmaterial violation constitutes nonprejudicial error under the substantial compliance standard. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), overruling St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998).

Telephone Jury-Summoning Procedure Violative of Statutory Selection Process — Showing of Substantial Compliance, Not Prejudice, Required — Reversible Error: Lamere, charged with killing Brownlee, filed a pretrial motion to strike the jury panel, but the motion was denied. The question on appeal was whether the District Court erred in concluding that Lamere failed to show that the telephone-dependent summoning procedure used in Cascade County prejudiced Lamere's substantial rights to a jury drawn and summoned according to law. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), in holding that the method of summoning jurors by telephone failed to comply with statutes governing the impaneling of a jury because jurors were neither served by mail nor served personally by the Sheriff. However, to warrant reversal, Robbins also required a showing of actual prejudice in addition to a substantial failure to comply with statutory law in drawing a jury panel. The Supreme Court chose to return to the per se rule of reversal for failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, overruling the Robbins requirement of prejudice. The decision turned on the U.S. Supreme Court's contemporary distinction between trial error, to which harmless error review applies, and structural error, to which harmless error review is inapplicable (see Johnson v. U.S., 520 US 461, 137 L Ed 2d 718, 117 S Ct 1544 (1997), and its predecessors). In Lamere's case, the automatic rule of reversal prevailed because errors in the jury selection process are structural in nature, affecting the very framework within which a trial proceeds—errors that indelibly affect the essential fairness of the trial itself. A material failure to substantially comply with Montana statutes governing procurement of a trial jury may not be treated as harmless error because: (1) it precedes the presentation of evidence to the jury and cannot be analyzed as a mere trial error without resorting to speculation; (2) it precedes the trial process and cannot be quantitatively assessed for its prejudicial impact relative to the evidence introduced at trial; (3) it affects the very framework within which the trial proceeds; and (4) the impartiality of the jury goes to the very integrity of the justice system and because the right to an impartial jury is so essential to the concept of a fair trial that its violation cannot be considered harmless error. The substantial compliance standard vindicates not only the rights of the individual defendant but also the rights of the public in ensuring that the jury system remains inviolate, protecting a defendant's right to an impartial jury by encouraging reasonably strict compliance with statutory procedures intended to implement the fair cross-section guarantee of the sixth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), Satterwhite v. Tex., 486 US 249, 100 L Ed 2d 284, 108 S Ct 1792 (1988), and Ariz. v. Fulminante, 499 US 279, 113 L Ed 302, 111 S Ct 1246 (1991), and followed in St. v. Lopez, 2001 MT 97, 305 M 218, 26 P3d 745 (2001).

Prejudice Through Inadmissible Evidence — Fair Trial Denied: Generally, character evidence is inadmissible to prove conduct. The prosecution is allowed to rebut the accused's offer of a pertinent trait of character; however, the prosecution must present legitimate and relevant character evidence. An accused's entire life should not be searched in an effort to convict. In this case, the trial court improperly allowed cross-examination of Eklund's character witness regarding Eklund's prior murder charges when the witness was called to rebut the nonviolent character evidence. The danger of unfair prejudice of evidence of charges, not a conviction, clearly outweighed the probative value. After considering the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court determined that there was a reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence of Eklund's murder charge denied him a fair and impartial trial and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994).

Wearing "Women Against Rape" Buttons at Rape Trial — Risk to Fair Trial: If it occurred, the presence of at least 20 women wearing "Women Against Rape" buttons at a kidnapping and rape trial posed, for various reasons, an unacceptable risk to a fair trial. The case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing on whether the allegation was true and, if true, whether a fair trial was denied. Norris v. Risley, 878 F2d 1178 (9th Cir. 1989).

Reversible Error — Prosecutor's Unethical Conduct — District Court Abuse of Discretion: After a jury trial, defendant was convicted of assault. In his opening statement, defendant's attorney had said he would call two witnesses who would testify that defendant had acted in self-defense. The State did not object to this assertion. In cross-examining the victim, defendant's attorney laid the foundation for the impeachment testimony to come from the two witnesses alluded to in the opening statement. The State did not object to this line of questioning. However, after resting its case, the State filed a motion in limine requesting that the defense not be permitted to present the testimony of the two witnesses because of the defendant's failure to comply with the notice provisions of 46-15-301 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329). The District Court granted the State's motion. Later, in the State's rebuttal in closing argument, the State mentioned defendant's failure to produce the witnesses he had promised during the opening statement. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and ordered a new trial. The court ruled that reversal was required by the State's unethical argument to the jury. The Supreme Court further ruled that although no formal, written notice within the time limits required under 46-15-301 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329) had been given, the trial court abused its discretion in not permitting the defense witnesses to testify because the State knew the defendant intended to rely on self-defense and the State's motion in limine was filed too late under local court rules. Finally, the court ruled that the State by its failure to object earlier had waived its right to file the motion in limine. St. v. Keller, 204 M 1, 662 P2d 604, 40 St. Rep. 614 (1983).

Reasonable Possibility That Inadmissible Testimony Contributed to Conviction: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, aggravated burglary, and attempted sexual intercourse without consent, contended that a mistrial should have been granted when a witness made reference to the fact that defendant had been in the state penitentiary. Defendant's motion was denied, but the court struck the material from the record and gave the jury an instruction to ignore evidence stricken from the record. The Supreme Court, applying the test of whether there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction, therefore requiring reversal, held that there was no evidence defendant was denied a substantial right. There was no showing that the reference might have contributed to his conviction in the face of overwhelming evidence directly proving his guilt. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983). See also St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987).

Sandstrom Instruction With Statement Presumption Disputable — Intent Disputed: Reversal of mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was required where the court gave the following Sandstrom instruction: "The law also presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of any voluntary act committed by him. This presumption, however, is termed a disputable presumption and may be controverted by other evidence." The error was not harmless. The instruction obviously permitted the jury to presume intent without proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Intent was hotly contested and an important element of the crime charged, and because of the instruction the jury could disregard the defendant's claim that he intended only to fire a warning shot. Then, with the presumption of intent, the jury could have concluded that defendant used deadly force to intentionally kill the victim. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Effective Assistance of Counsel — No Objection Raised to Improper Argument by Prosecution — Appealability: Although objection to the prosecutor's argument may not be raised on appeal if it has not been raised at trial, if it forms a basis for an effective assistance of counsel issue, it will be considered on appeal [but see 1983 amendment changing the law]. If a prejudicial prosecutorial argument is alleged, it will not be presumed. Rather, it must be established from the record that a substantial right has been denied. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Presence of Accused at Trial: Under former law, the presence of the defendant at his trial was a matter that affected the substantial rights of both parties, and therefore the provision requiring the Supreme Court to give judgment on appeal without regard to technical errors or defects not affecting the substantial rights of the parties had no application. St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922).

SUBSTANTIAL RIGHTS NOT AFFECTED

No Prejudice Arising From Lesser Included Offense Instruction — Reversal Unwarranted: Potter was charged with aggravated assault. At trial, the District Court included two lesser included offense instructions for attempted aggravated assault and assault, and Potter objected to including the attempted aggravated assault instruction. The jury returned a guilty verdict on the aggravated assault charge. On appeal, Potter contended that the court erred by instructing the jury on attempted aggravated assault because attempted aggravated assault is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. However, the jury never reached the question of whether Potter committed the lesser offense, so Potter was not prejudiced by inclusion of the attempted aggravated assault instruction. Absent prejudice, the Supreme Court declined to reverse the conviction. St. v. Potter, 2008 MT 381, 347 M 38, 197 P3d 471 (2008).

Mere Allegations of Cumulative Error — Reversal Not Required: Tennell identified an amalgam of errors that he alleged warranted reversal under the doctrine of cumulative error, even if no single error was sufficient to warrant reversal. The Supreme Court noted that the doctrine requires a reversal when a number of errors, taken together, prejudices the right to a fair trial, but that prejudice must be established, not merely alleged. Although some error occurred in this case, Tennell did not establish that it was prejudicial, so the court declined to apply the cumulative error doctrine. St. v. Tennell, 2007 MT 266, 339 M 381, 170 P3d 965 (2007), following St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

Counsel Ready for Trial — Motion for Continuance Properly Denied: Molder asserted that a motion to continue trial should have been granted because his substitute counsel was unprepared for trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Sotelo, 209 M 86, 679 P2d 779 (1984), to determine whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying a continuance, including: (1) the length of the requested delay; (2) whether the state's case would be prejudiced; (3) reasons for the requested continuance; (4) whether defense counsel was diligent in preparing for trial; (5) whether defendant's right to a speedy trial would be violated; and (6) defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel. Despite Molder's assertion to the contrary, his counsel stated that a trial strategy was in place and that counsel was prepared for trial. The Supreme Court held that the trial strategy was reasonable, that Molder suffered no prejudice, and that Molder's substantial rights were not affected. Denial of the motion for continuance was affirmed. St. v. Molder, 2007 MT 41, 336 M 91, 152 P3d 722 (2007).

Failure of State to Provide Defendant With Exhibit List at Trial — Substantial Rights Not Affected: Despite the fact that the trial court had ordered the state to provide Hicks with an exhibit list 20 days before Hicks's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the state did not comply. On the first morning of trial, Hicks moved to exclude all of the state's proposed exhibits, but the motion was denied, and Hicks later appealed on grounds of unfair surprise and prejudice. However, Hicks did not refer to specific exhibits or analyze why the exhibits were prejudicial, and Hicks's mere conclusory statement was insufficient to establish that the defense was prejudiced. In addition, the state contended that Hicks knew about the exhibits well prior to trial, that he had been provided copies of the exhibits, and that he knew the state intended to introduce the exhibits, so Hicks could not argue surprise despite not being provided with an exhibit list. Hicks's substantial rights were not affected, and denial of the motion to exclude the exhibits was affirmed. St. v. Hicks, 2006 MT 71, 331 M 471, 133 P3d 206 (2006).

Only Error Curable by Resentencing — Cumulative Error Doctrine Inapplicable: Although Ferguson asserted many errors in his trial and sentencing, the only error found by the Supreme Court was that Ferguson was sentenced as a violent offender, and that error was cured by remand for resentencing Ferguson as a nonviolent offender. Therefore, because Ferguson was not prejudiced, the court declined to apply the cumulative error doctrine. St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

Counsel's Failure to Interview and Call Witnesses Within Range of Reasonable and Sound Professional Decisions — Failure to Prove Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Weaver contended that his defense counsel was ineffective in failing to interview and call certain witnesses and in not introducing an entomologist's report that might have created a reasonable doubt as to Weaver's role in a homicide. Under the first prong of the Strickland test, Weaver needed to overcome the strong presumption that counsel's defense strategies and trial tactics fell within a wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. The Supreme Court examined each of Weaver's contentions and determined that: (1) counsel's decision not to investigate potential witnesses did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness; (2) Weaver failed to meet the burden of showing that counsel's failure to interview potential witnesses constituted ineffective assistance to the extent that it resulted in prejudice raising a reasonable probability that the trial outcome would have been different; (3) counsel's decision not to call every witness that Weaver identified actually carried fewer risks and promoted Weaver's best interest at trial; and (4) failure to introduce the entomologist's report was tactical and the result of a conscientious, weighed decision made after consultation with Weaver and thus was not erroneous. Weaver's ineffective assistance claim failed. Weaver v. St., 2005 MT 158, 327 M 441, 114 P3d 1039 (2005), following Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005).

Prosecutor's Comments Not Affecting Outcome of Trial — Failure to Prove Prosecutorial Misconduct: Clausell's defense in a deliberate homicide trial was that the victim's death was a "tragic accident". Because of Clausell's defense, his counsel failed to object to numerous comments by the prosecutor that focused on rebutting the "tragic accident" theory. On appeal, Clausell contended that the prosecutor's statements constituted prosecutorial misconduct and that his attorney's failure to object to the comments or to move to suppress evidence of the search of Clausell's apartment amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed on both issues. Given that the state presented sufficient evidence of deliberate homicide and that the jury was admonished to consider only the evidence, Clausell failed to show that the prosecutor's comments affected the trial's outcome. Because no prosecutorial misconduct occurred, defense counsel's failure to object to the comments could not be considered ineffective assistance, and defense counsel's trial tactics, including failure to seek to suppress evidence that was in plain view, fell within the wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. Clausell failed to establish that his attorney's lack of objections fell below the objective reasonableness standard or that he was prejudiced to the point that a reasonable probability existed that the result of the trial would have been different had counsel not performed ineffectively. The deliberate homicide conviction was affirmed. Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005), followed in St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007). See also St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262 (1983).

Failure to Provide Notice That Arresting Officer Would Appear as Witness — No Error: At Boettiger's DUI bench trial in Justice's Court, the arresting officer testified regarding Boettiger's actions on the day in question. Boettiger was convicted and appealed to District Court, but the state did not provide Boettiger with written notice that the officer would again be a witness. Nevertheless, the District Court allowed the officer to testify over Boettiger's objection, and Boettiger's counsel subjected the officer to extensive cross-examination. Boettiger was again convicted and on appeal alleged error in the state's failure to list the officer as a potential witness. The Supreme Court did not condone the failure to provide notice but found that Boettiger knew that the officer would testify again and failed to demonstrate prejudice as a result of the officer's testimony. The Supreme Court disregarded the irregularity because it did not affect Boettiger's substantive rights, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Boettiger, 2004 MT 313, 324 M 20, 101 P3d 285 (2004), following St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307 (1997).

Error for Prosecutor to Comment on Defendant's Post-Miranda Silence Regardless When Warning Given: Following arrest on sexual assault and attempted sexual intercourse without consent charges, Godfrey received an acknowledgment of rights form from his attorney. Godfrey initialed the form and subsequently went over the form with the District Court during his initial appearance. Godfrey later complained that the state prosecutor violated Godfrey's due process rights by commenting at trial on Godfrey's silence, in violation of Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). The state contended that because Godfrey did not have his Miranda rights read to him by a police officer at the time of arrest, Doyle did not apply. The Supreme Court found the state's argument to be without merit and declined to distinguish between a situation when a defendant is advised of the right to remain silent by an arresting officer and a situation when a defendant is advised of the right by a court, or to distinguish between an oral warning and a written form. However, in this case, Godfrey's counsel did not object to the prosecutor's comments at trial, so the court had to decide whether the trial error was sufficiently prejudicial to trigger plain error review. After reviewing the record, the court concluded that it was not plain that the prosecutor's comments had created an inference for the jury that by remaining silent, Godfrey must have been guilty. Absent a clear comment on or infringement of Godfrey's fundamental right to remain silent and absent a contemporaneous objection by Godfrey's counsel to the prosecutor's comments, the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Godfrey, 2004 MT 197, 322 M 254, 95 P3d 166 (2004). See also St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), and St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033 (1996).

Record-Based Claims of Ineffective Counsel for Failure to Object Considered on Direct Appeal and Denied: Daniels claimed on direct appeal that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because defense counsel failed to investigate and interview certain witnesses in order to present a case in chief and failed to object to certain trial testimony. The state responded that Daniels could not demonstrate that counsel's actions were not objectively reasonable or that there was a reasonable possibility that counsel's errors caused a prejudicial result. The Supreme Court noted that Daniels' claims concerning failure to investigate were not record-based and thus not subject to review on direct appeal, pursuant to Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), and St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001). Regarding the record-based claims of failure to object, the court agreed with the state. The evidence in question was admissible, so counsel was not required to object and could not be considered ineffective for failing to do so. Absent a showing of counsel's deficient performance, Daniels' conviction was affirmed. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003).

Attorney's Actions Reasonable and Not Prejudicial — Strickland Test for Ineffective Assistance Not Met: Allen contended on appeal that he received ineffective assistance from trial counsel because counsel failed to: (1) conduct an adequate investigation of the underlying facts of the case; (2) call a witness at trial regarding Allen's possession of a gun; and (3) present evidence at the sentencing hearing that Allen had four rather than five prior felony convictions. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel and affirmed. Nothing in the record showed that counsel failed to investigate; in fact, counsel's investigative choices were reasonable. The decision not to call a witness to testify that Allen did not have a gun was also reasonable, given that the jury had already heard testimony from other witnesses that Allen did not have a gun before or after the offense, and counsel was not obligated to present cumulative evidence. Moreover, Allen failed to demonstrate how counsel's failure to investigate the number of Allen's prior felony convictions was prejudicial or would have affected the outcome of the trial because there was plenty of prior conviction information in Allen's record upon which to base the felony offender sentence, so even if the information was incorrect as to the number of convictions, it was not material to Allen's sentence. St. v. Allen, 2001 MT 266, 307 M 253, 37 P3d 655 (2001).

Improper for Prosecutor to Inform Jury of Potential Sentences During Closing Argument — Prejudice Because of Prosecutorial Misconduct Not Established: In closing arguments, the prosecutor commented to the jury that because Martin did not face a death penalty, he could argue that the judge could give him whatever sentence falls within the judge's power, ranging from probation to life in prison. The Supreme Court has held that it is improper to instruct the jury on possible sentences (see St. v. Zuidema, 157 M 367, 485 P2d 952 (1971)), and it is likewise considered misconduct for a prosecutor to inform a jury regarding possible sentences in closing arguments. However, the court will not presume prejudice from charges of prosecutorial misconduct, but will also consider whether the misconduct prejudiced the defendant's substantial rights. Martin asserted that the prosecutor raised the subject of the judge's sentencing discretion in order to influence the jury to find Martin guilty of all the greater offenses rather than any of the lesser included offenses, making a light sentence unlikely. Here, the Supreme Court reviewed the evidence and found it sufficient to support the jury's verdicts. In light of the surrounding circumstances, including the context in which the comments were made, Martin failed to establish prejudice from the sentencing-related remark by the prosecutor during rebuttal closing arguments. St. v. Martin, 2001 MT 83, 305 M 123, 23 P3d 216 (2001), followed in St. v. Roubideaux, 2005 MT 324, 329 M 521, 125 P3d 1114 (2005).

Admission of Murder by Schizophrenic Held Voluntarily Made — No Prejudice to Defense Case: Scarborough, a schizophrenic, was arrested for the murder of Willis and made incriminating statements in the back of a police car. He was taken to the police station where he was read his Miranda rights, waived those rights, and gave a recorded interview with a detective. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision not to suppress the statements made in the police car or the tape of the interview with the detective. After reviewing all of the evidence, the Supreme Court held that the single fact that raised doubts about the voluntariness of Scarborough's inculpatory statements is the fact that he is schizophrenic and was therefore subject to the suggestion by the arresting and interviewing officers that he had committed the crime rather than someone else. The Supreme Court reviewed the record of the circumstances of the confessions and held that they were not made because the police had suggested Scarborough's guilt to him. The Supreme Court also held that even if the confessions were involuntary, the admission of those confessions by the District Court did not prejudice Scarborough's defense because, as his defense, Scarborough admitted committing the murder but claimed that the murder was committed during an acute psychotic episode. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Jurors' Notes to Court During Deliberations Not Grounds for Mistrial: During deliberations, the jury sent several notes and questions to the court regarding one of the jurors, who was felt to be obstructing deliberations. Defendant's motion for mistrial based on breakdown in the deliberative process was denied. Following conviction, the juror in question prepared an affidavit alleging that he was unaware of the notes and would not have voted for a guilty verdict had he known about them. The District Court struck the affidavit, finding no juror misconduct, in effect denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court held that the notes constituted an entirely internal process and did not introduce an extraneous or outside element into deliberations, signal a breakdown in deliberations, or have any bearing on defendant's guilt or innocence. Even assuming that the notes had somehow affected the juror's vote, introduction of such testimony is prohibited under Rule 606(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and the affidavit was properly stricken. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Prosecutorial Comments During Closing Not Violative of Defendant's Right to Fair Trial: Raugust argued on appeal that the prosecutor's comments during closing arguments deprived Raugust of a fair trial, notwithstanding the failure of Raugust's attorney to object, which Raugust characterized as ineffective assistance of counsel. Under 46-20-104, review is barred of any alleged errors not objected to at trial, unless the error falls within the exceptions in subsection (2) of this section, but Raugust nevertheless urged review under the plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court held that this case did not present the requisite exceptional case to invoke the plain error doctrine because the alleged errors were either misstatements of fact, taken out of context of the prosecutor's argument, constituted the state's analysis of the evidence, or were later cured by the jury instructions. Raugust's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel also failed because Raugust did not meet the first prong of the Strickland test by showing that his counsel's performance was deficient. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827 (1999), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), and St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008).

Testimonial Privilege Not Extended to Nonclerical Church Member — No Prejudice in Admission of Member's Testimony: Testimonial privileges must be strictly construed because they contravene the fundamental principle that the public has the right to everyone's evidence; however, the clergy-penitent privilege in 26-1-804 will not be so strictly construed as to violate the right to freedom of religion in Art. II, sec. 5, Mont. Const. Here, Gooding claimed that testimony regarding his confessions of sexual molestation of his stepdaughter in the presence of the wife of a nonordained junior minister was privileged. However, nothing in the record indicated that the wife was a clergy member acting in a professional character, a counselor, or anything more than an ordinary confidant. The Supreme Court declined to extend the clergy-penitent privilege to nonclerical church members and, in light of overwhelming uncontradicted evidence of Gooding's guilt, affirmed his conviction regardless of the wife's testimony. St. v. Gooding, 1999 MT 249, 296 M 234, 989 P2d 304, 56 St. Rep. 977 (1999). See also St. v. MacKinnon, 1998 MT 78, 288 M 329, 957 P2d 23, 55 St. Rep. 331 (1998).

No Pretrial Determination Regarding Whether Statement Admissible for Impeachment Purposes — Waiver of Right to Object to Admissibility: At the time of arrest, Harris admitted an act of sexual intercourse with his adopted daughter. Prior to trial, Harris moved to suppress the statement on grounds that it was involuntary and obtained in violation of his fifth amendment rights under the United States Constitution. The District Court agreed that the statement could not be used, but expressly stated that its limited suppression order did not address whether it could be used by the state for impeachment purposes in the event that Harris testified, essentially reserving its ruling for a later time, as authorized in 46-13-104. Harris's testimony about the statement during direct examination brought the statement into evidence by his own volition, constituting waiver of the right to appeal the admissibility of the statement for use as impeachment. St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996), and St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Error in Requiring Summaries of Defense Witnesses' Testimony — Due Process Violated — No Prejudicial Error Found: When Huerta was tried on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile, he attempted to introduce testimony of 26 witnesses who would testify that the child's mother had the habit of severely punishing the child. In an effort to reduce delay caused by redundant testimony, the District Court required Huerta to summarize the testimony of all of the witnesses by affidavits. Huerta claimed that the required affidavits were ordered in violation of 46-15-328 and in violation of his due process rights because a similar burden was not placed upon the prosecution. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's order was in violation of 46-15-323(8), which specifically prohibits summaries of defense testimony, and in violation of Huerta's right of due process because Wardius v. Oreg., 412 US 470 (1973), and State ex rel. Carkulis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604 (1987), require reciprocal discovery. However, the Supreme Court also held that Huerta did not establish that the violation of his rights was reversible error pursuant to this section because he failed to show how the violations of statute and due process affected the outcome of the trial. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 483, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Failure to Use Different Test Solution Than That Used in Prior Test in Testing Breathalyzer That Failed Prior Certification Test: Administrative rules require the state to use a fresh ethyl alcohol testing solution in retesting and certifying a Breathalyzer when the results of a prior test of the Breathalyzer are outside the range specified by the rules. The state did not do so and used the same solution as that used in the prior test. However, DUI defendant was not prejudiced thereby because the evidence showed that the problem was clearly with the Breathalyzer, not the solution. St. v. Woods, 285 M 124, 947 P2d 62, 54 St. Rep. 1074 (1997).

Jury Request for Replay of Partial Testimony — Failure to Give Harris Instruction Not Prejudicial to Defendant: Henrich was charged with various crimes resulting from sexual assault upon his daughters. The jury requested that it be allowed to hear a recording of certain testimony, whereupon the District Court determined the relevant portion of the testimony and allowed part of a victim's testimony to be played to the jury during its deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that it was error for the District Court not to give the instruction required by St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991). However, the Supreme Court held that because the only testimony as to the issues concerned in the recording was given by the witness and the defendant, the jury's need to balance the statements in the recording against the defendant's denial of committing the offense was obvious and therefore the need for the Harris instruction was minimal. The Supreme Court therefore held that the defendant was not prejudiced by the playing of the recording. St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994).

Failure to Object to Alleged Prosecutorial Misconduct Not Violation of Right to Fair Trial: Defendant alleged that the state engaged in prosecutorial misconduct by eliciting inadmissible evidence with no factual basis, characterizing witnesses as liars, using misleading and inflammatory arguments, expressing personal opinions, and using the complaining witness's religious beliefs to enhance her credibility. The Supreme Court refused to exercise discretionary review in light of the fact that not one objection was made by defense counsel in any instance of claimed misconduct. Absent any record of error not objected to that demonstrated an infringement of the substantial rights of defendant, the right to a fair trial was not infringed. St. v. Ogle, 255 M 246, 841 P2d 1133, 49 St. Rep. 932 (1992), followed in St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996).

Interpretation of Law by Counsel in Jury's Presence: In response to a question from the jury, the County Attorney stated to the judge his interpretation of whether sexual gratification is a requirement of the crime of sexual intercourse without consent. While counsel should avoid stating their interpretation of the law in the presence of the jury, in this case the comments were a correct statement of the law and therefore did not adversely affect substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991).

Identification of Witness During Closing Argument as Defendant's Probation Officer — No Prejudice: In accord with an order in limine that no reference was to be made at trial to defendant's criminal record, the testimony of defendant's probation officer and records introduced in connection with her testimony were sanitized at trial. However, in closing, the prosecution referred to the testimony of the defendant's probation officer, which defendant contended on appeal was a violation of the Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), restriction on introduction of evidence of other crimes without formal notice. The Supreme Court, noting that several references had been made to defendant's criminal record by defendant's own witnesses by the time closing arguments were made, found that identification of the parole officer was not prejudicial to the defense. St. v. West, 245 M 298, 800 P2d 1047, 47 St. Rep. 2129 (1990).

Introduction of Two Prior DUI Convictions Not Prejudicial: The defendant argued that he was prejudiced by the introduction of two prior DUI convictions and that his attorney's failure to object constituted inadequate legal assistance. The Supreme Court found that although the lower court was mistaken in its belief that the prior convictions had to be introduced as an element of this offense, their admission did not prejudice the defendant, particularly in light of the substantial evidence against the defendant and an almost total absence of evidence on his behalf. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Prosecutor's Solicitation of Excluded Evidence: The defendant contended that he was denied a fair trial because the prosecutor elicited testimony from the arresting officer concerning statements made by the defendant at the time of his arrest that had been ruled inadmissible by the trial court. The Supreme Court ruled that the error in admitting the evidence was cured by the trial court's admonishing the jury to disregard the inadmissible statements. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Prosecution Comments on Witnesses in Opening and Closing — No Objection — No Effect on Substantial Rights: The prosecution in opening and closing made comments on the truthfulness and credibility of witnesses and other matters not related to the defendant's right not to testify. A lack of objection does not preclude consideration in the trial court of error that affects the defendant's substantial rights, but these matters were subject to free comment to the jury under the circumstances of this case and thus did not affect substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Harris, 209 M 511, 682 P2d 159, 41 St. Rep. 866 (1984).

Instructions Given and Instructions Rejected — Review of Both Precluded by Failure to Object: Defendant contended that jury instructions given by the District Court were improper and that rejected instructions should have been given. No objection to the instructions was raised at trial. Instructions cannot be challenged for the first time on appeal. The errors asserted did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant and were disregarded. St. v. Wurtz, 195 M 226, 636 P2d 246, 38 St. Rep. 1808 (1981).

PLAIN ERROR

Prosecutor's Repeated and Deliberate Use of Defendant's Invocation of Right to Silence — New Trial Warranted: During Wagner's trial for attempted deliberate homicide, the prosecutor repeatedly and deliberately used Wagner's invocation of the right to silence as evidence of Wagner's guilt. The prosecutor also referenced Wagner's failure to tell his version of events until trial and raised as further evidence of Wagner's guilt the fact that Wagner had requested to speak with an attorney and, after invoking his Miranda rights, had commented that he didn't want to dig himself a deeper hole. The Supreme Court found that Wagner's request to speak with an attorney and the comment that Wagner didn't want to dig himself a deeper hole were in fact an invocation of Wagner's right to remain silent. The prosecutor's conduct raised questions regarding the fundamental fairness of the trial by violating Wagner's right to due process and privilege against self-incrimination, constituting plain error, and the Supreme Court concluded that the constitutional violations entitled Wagner to a new trial. The case was reversed. St. v. Wagner, 2009 MT 256, 352 M 1, 215 P3d 20 (2009), following Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). See also St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033 (1996).

Issue Decided Prior to Appeal — No Substantial Reason for Plain Error Review: Foston appealed a drug conviction on grounds that plain error review was appropriate because officers improperly used warrantless electronic monitoring of drug transactions in violation of St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008). However, Foston made no warrant-based objection at trial, and Goetz was decided after Foston's conviction. The Supreme Court also noted that a motion to retroactively apply Goetz to Foston's case had previously been denied. The court therefore refused to grant plain error review absent any substantial reason provided by Foston why plain error review was warranted. St. v. Foston, 2009 MT 191, 351 M 85, 209 P3d 262 (2009).

Failure to Object to Prosecutor's Closing Arguments — Waiver of Objection: Defendant contended that he was denied a fair trial because of comments made by the prosecutor during closing arguments regarding defendant's credibility. However, defendant failed to object and preserve the issue for appeal, so the objection was waived. Nevertheless, defendant urged the Supreme Court to employ discretionary plain error review and reverse, but the court was not persuaded that the comments resulted in a manifest miscarriage of justice, undermined the fundamental fairness of the trial, or compromised the integrity of the judicial process, so plain error review was denied. St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009).

Involuntary Commitment — Failure to Appoint Friend of Respondent Reversible Error: In an involuntary commitment case, the District Court made no serious attempt to appoint a friend of respondent for the individual and committed the individual to the state mental hospital. The individual appealed. Because the case involved a substantial liberty interest and failure to review the error would compromise the integrity of the judicial process, the Supreme Court reviewed the case under the plain error doctrine and remanded. The District Court essentially ignored the statutory requirement in 53-21-122 to appoint a friend of respondent, constituting reversible error. In re Mental Health of J.D.L., 2008 MT 445, 348 M 1, 199 P3d 805 (2008), followed in In re Mental Health of A.S.F., 2008 MT 450, 348 M 45, 199 P3d 808 (2008).

Delay in Bringing Defendant Before District Court on Petition to Revoke Suspended Sentence Implicated Due Process Rights: Defendant made a threshold showing that plain error review of his claim was appropriate for a delay of 26 months in bringing him before the court on a petition to revoke a suspended sentence. However, delay was only one of several factors for the court to consider in the totality of circumstances approach to unreasonableness of delay, and thus the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing. St. v. West, 2008 MT 338, 346 M 244, 194 P3d 683, (2008).

Failure to Preserve Issue for Appeal by Failure to Object at Trial — Plain Error Review Inappropriate Absent Implication of Defendant's Fundamental Rights: At Price's trial for assault with a weapon, a stun gun, the trial court allowed evidence of Price's prior conviction for intimidation. Following conviction, Price appealed on grounds that the evidence was improperly introduced because the state failed to give notice of the intent to introduce other crimes evidence in violation of Price's due process rights. The state contended that Price waived the right to appeal the issue by failing to object to introduction of the evidence and by actively participating in its introduction. The Supreme Court declined to review the issue because Price failed to object to the evidence at trial and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal. Further, plain error review was inappropriate because Price's fundamental constitutional rights were not implicated by introduction of the evidence. St. v. Price, 2007 MT 269, 339 M 399, 171 P3d 293 (2007).

Plain Error Review of Effective Assistance Claim Denied When Error Not Plain: Defendant sought to have the Supreme Court review whether it was error for defense counsel to withdraw a juror challenge, resulting in ineffective assistance of counsel. The court could not plainly determine from the record if the withdrawal was erroneous, given possible tactical reasons for the withdrawal. Absent a record-based showing that the alleged error was plain, plain error review was inappropriate. St. v. Tennell, 2007 MT 266, 339 M 381, 170 P3d 965 (2007).

Absence of Record Prevents Review of Defendant's Claim of Lack of Speedy Trial Under Plain Error Doctrine: The state charged Lewis with certain drug-related crimes on May 19, 2004, and on October 12, 2004, informed the trial court that it intended to charge Lewis with an additional offense, whereupon the trial court vacated the trial date. The state did not amend the charges until March 10, 2005, and Lewis was convicted after a 3-day trial in June of 2005. Lewis did not assert the right to a speedy trial until appeal. The Supreme Court agreed that the right to a speedy trial is not necessarily waived by failure to assert the right at trial and that the Supreme Court could review the issue under the plain error doctrine. However, the Supreme Court held that the review must be based upon the facts of the case, and in the present instance, no record existed upon which to review the matter. St. v. Lewis, 2007 MT 16, 335 M 331, 151 P3d 883 (2007).

Valid Designated Representative Allowed to Remain in Court During Trial and to Testify — Former State Employee Not Considered Proper Designated Representative at Trial: The trial court granted the state's motion to exclude all witnesses pursuant to Rule 615, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The state designated former employee Weaver as its representative, and Weaver was allowed to remain in the courtroom at the counsel table while other witnesses testified. Plaintiffs were unaware until Weaver began to testify that Weaver was no longer employed by the state and contended that Weaver should not have been permitted to testify as a fact witness after all witnesses had been excluded, citing St. v. Claric, 271 M 141, 894 P2d 946 (1995), and St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004). The Supreme Court clarified Rule 615, M.R.Ev., noting that the plain language of the rule provides that both a natural person who is a party and a designated representative of a party who is not a natural person may remain in the courtroom notwithstanding the exclusion of other witnesses. Thus, Claric and Flowers were overruled to the extent that those cases held that a valid designated representative may not both remain in the courtroom and testify. However, the rule also provides that an appropriate designated representative is an officer or employee of a party who is not a natural person. Weaver was no longer a state employee and thus did not qualify as a proper representative at retrial. Faulconbridge v. St., 2006 MT 198, 333 M 186, 142 P3d 777 (2006).

Alleged Error Must Be Plain to Trigger Plain Error Review: English argued that the Supreme Court should apply plain error review to consider whether certain trial testimony violated English's constitutional right to remain silent. However, English could not point to how the allegedly offensive testimony affected the fairness of the trial or resulted in a miscarriage of justice, especially because part of the testimony was elicited by English's own counsel, who had the opportunity to object to any erroneous testimony but declined to so do. A fundamental aspect of the plain error doctrine is that the alleged error must be plain. In this case, if there was any error, it was not plain, and the Supreme Court declined to invoke the doctrine to address English's constitutional issues. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Ineffective Counsel Claims Insufficient to Invoke Plain Error Doctrine on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Novak contended that his counsel's failure to object to certain prejudicial, inadmissible evidence compromised his right to a fair trial and asserted that the Supreme Court should apply the plain error doctrine to review counsel's failure. The Supreme Court held that all of the alleged errors were encompassed in Novak's effective assistance of counsel claim, which could be raised in postconviction proceedings, but were insufficient to invoke the plain error doctrine on direct appeal. St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005).

Failure of Counsel to Ensure Impartial Jury During Voir Dire Constituting Ineffective Assistance — Reversible Structural Error: A potential juror disclosed in a juror questionnaire that her daughter was a paralegal at the County Attorney's office. Defense counsel failed to take note of the disclosure, to question the juror regarding any potential bias during voir dire, or to challenge the juror for cause. Defense counsel acknowledged the error on the record. The juror was picked for the panel, and Lamere was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the two-pronged Strickland test for ineffective assistance, and because the error was on the record, the court reviewed the ineffective assistance claim de novo on direct appeal. The court concluded that counsel failed to ensure that Lamere received a fair trial by an impartial jury and that counsel's performance fell below the reasonably required level, satisfying the first Strickland prong. In addition, counsel's deficient performance constituted a structural error that undermined the fairness of the entire trial and thus was presumed to be prejudicial, satisfying the second Strickland prong. Lamere did not receive effective assistance during voir dire, the verdict was reversed, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Lamere, 2005 MT 118, 327 M 115, 112 P3d 1005 (2005). See also St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002).

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim Unfounded — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: The trial court instructed the jury that Gray could be convicted of assault on a peace officer if the state proved that Gray caused a reasonable apprehension of bodily harm in any of three police officers. Gray contended that the instruction erroneously allowed the jury to convict for assault of one or more of the officers without agreeing to one specific set of facts, in violation of the unanimity requirement that the jury must be in agreement as to the principal factual elements underlying the offense. Even though Gray's counsel acquiesced to the instruction, Gray contended that the fundamental right to a unanimous jury verdict is inviolate, so plain error review was appropriate. However, Gray not only failed to contemporaneously object to the instruction, but specifically asked the trial court to add the language that he argued on appeal was insufficient. The Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine, refusing to put the trial court in error for an action in which Gray acquiesced and actively participated. Additionally, Gray's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on his attorney's acquiescence and participation in the jury instruction for strategic purposes also failed. In light of the overwhelming evidence of guilt, Gray could not show that the trial outcome was prejudiced because of the lack of a specific unanimity instruction or that the result would have been different if the attorney had not engaged in the legal strategy. The conviction was affirmed. St. v. Gray, 2004 MT 347, 324 M 334, 102 P3d 1255 (2004), followed in St. v. Gallagher, 2005 MT 336, 330 M 65, 125 P3d 1141 (2005).

Plain Error in Allowing Youth's Extrajudicial Statements When Youth Not Advised of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination: A youth asserted for the first time on appeal that the Youth Court improperly admitted extrajudicial statements that the youth made regarding the youth's whereabouts when a burglary and criminal mischief were committed. Despite the state's contention that the arguments should not be considered because they were not raised at trial, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered the argument under the plain error doctrine because the youth was not notified while in custody of the fundamental right to counsel and the right to avoid self-incrimination, nor were the youth's parents notified as required. The youth's rights under the Montana Youth Court Act and the constitution were simply ignored in this case, so in order to avoid a question of the fundamental fairness of the trial by admission of constitutionally infirm extrajudicial statements, the Supreme Court reversed the trial court's decision to admit the statements. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

No Plain Error in Presenting Different Stories of Same Witness for Jury's Consideration: At Daniels' trial for robbery, witnesses presented inconsistent testimony regarding Daniels' involvement. The state was entitled to point out the inconsistencies to the jury, and the jury was entitled to choose which version to believe. There was no fundamental unfairness or error in presenting different stories of the same witness for the jury's consideration, and thus Daniels was not entitled to consideration on appeal under the plain error doctrine. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003).

Theory of Erroneous Jury Instruction Raised for First Time on Appeal — No Plain Error: At trial, the District Court instructed the jury to view with distrust the testimony of a witness who was legally accountable for the same crime as Daniels. Daniels objected to the instruction on grounds that the witness's testimony had changed and was no longer inculpatory, so the instruction was unnecessary. On appeal, Daniels argued that the instruction violated his right to a fair trial because it could have been construed to instruct the jury to distrust his exculpatory statements given to police immediately after his arrest, having implicated the witness in those statements. The Supreme Court found no prejudicial effect in the jury instruction, and Daniels could not argue on appeal a theory of error that was changed from the theory raised in trial court. St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), followed in St. v. Rinkenbach, 2003 MT 348, 318 M 499, 82 P3d 8 (2003).

Conviction of Felony Nonsupport Prior to Legislative Creation of Felony Offense Considered Improper Ex Post Facto Application Warranting Reversal — Common-Law Plain Error Doctrine Applied: Price was convicted of felony nonsupport for failure to make payments from 1988 through 1996 and was given the maximum 2-year sentence; however, the felony nonsupport statute was not enacted until 1993. On appeal, Price contended that the manner in which the felony nonsupport statute was applied violated the fundamental constitutional right to be free from ex post facto laws. The state argued that because Price failed to object at trial, the issue could not be raised on appeal. The issue of whether Price was convicted of felony nonsupport that occurred before the statute was enacted brought into question the fundamental fairness of Price's trial. The Supreme Court held that because a fundamental right was at issue, the common-law plain error doctrine applied despite Price's failure to preserve the issue at trial. A jury instruction allowed the jury to find Price guilty based on acts committed from 1988 through 1996 and thus subjected Price to increased punishment for conduct that occurred prior to enactment of the felony statute. This was an unconstitutional ex post facto application of the felony nonsupport law, constituting reversible error. St. v. Price, 2002 MT 284, 312 M 458, 59 P3d 1122 (2002).

Prosecutor's Comment Alleging Uncontradicted Evidence Erroneous When Defendant Who Asserted Right to Remain Silent Was Only Person Who Could Offer Contradictory Evidence — Error Harmless: Harrington was arrested for DUI, was read his Miranda rights, and chose to remain silent. Harrington contended that his due process rights and privilege against self-incrimination were violated by testimony elicited and statements made by the prosecution during trial. Although Harrington failed to preserve the issues in the District Court, the Supreme Court applied the plain error doctrine pursuant to its discretionary power enunciated in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), considering the totality of the circumstances and evaluating the nature of the constitutional rights implicated, rather than the sufficiency of the evidence. The court decided that because no comment was made that Harrington at any time refused to give a statement or refused to testify and because the prosecutor did not insinuate that an innocent person would have given a statement or testified, no Doyle error occurred (see Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976)). However, the prosecutor did comment during rebuttal that there was no evidence to contradict the state's case, which was error as an improper reference to Harrington's decision not to testify because Harrington was the only person who could have offered contradictory testimony (see St. v. Hart, 154 M 310, 462 P2d 885 (1969)). To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001). The error was considered a trial error rather than a structural error, and because the error concerned comment rather than evidence, the court went on to determine whether it was harmless and contributed to the conviction. In this case, the single comment that the evidence was uncontradicted was an isolated one, and there was no reasonable possibility that it contributed to Harrington's conviction given the fact that during closing, the prosecutor focused on the driving errors Harrington made before being stopped, the videotape of Harrington's field sobriety tests, the arresting officer's expertise, and the results of the preliminary breath test. Harrington's constitutional rights were not prejudiced by the improper reference to his decision not to testify. Columbus v. Harrington, 2001 MT 258, 307 M 215, 36 P3d 937 (2001).

Common-Law Plain Error — Defendant Must Demonstrate With Specifics That a Fundamental Constitutional Right Was Violated at Trial: Whipple claimed that the trial court erred in allowing five witnesses to testify as to the credibility of the testimony of two minors who testified that Whipple had sexually abused them. The Supreme Court stated that because claims of plain error are almost always raised for the first time on appeal, a defendant must do more than simply make a generalized claim that the defendant's rights were violated by the alleged error. See St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996). The Supreme Court stated that it would not exercise its power of common-law plain error review of alleged errors not objected to at trial because Whipple had not met his burden of demonstrating specifically how a constitutional right of his had been violated by an error of the trial court. St. v. Whipple, 2001 MT 16, 304 M 118, 19 P3d 228 (2001).

Prosecutor's Comments on Defendant's Post-Miranda Silence — Violation of Right to Due Process and Privilege Against Self-Incrimination Reviewable Under Plain Error Doctrine: At trial for deliberate homicide, the prosecutor commented on the defendant's post-Miranda silence in the opening statement, introduced testimony regarding the defendant's refusal to make a statement, and commented twice during the closing statement about the defendant's silence. The defense counsel did not comment or object at trial. The defendant did not testify at trial. The Supreme Court held that the defendant's due process rights and the privilege against self-incrimination were violated by the prosecutor's comments and that the issue was reviewable under the common-law plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 927 P2d 1033, 53 St. Rep. 1282 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Baker, 2000 MT 307, 302 M 408, 15 P3d 379, 57 St. Rep. 1297 (2000).

Appeal From Failure to Grant Self-Defense Instruction — Failure to Object: Assault defendant who failed to object to or offer other instructions regarding the "no aggressor" rule contained in the court's self-defense instructions could not, on appeal, raise the issue of failure to instruct on exceptions to that rule. The issue would not be addressed under the common-law plain error rule because declining review did not rise to the level of a manifest miscarriage of justice, did not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial, and did not compromise the integrity of the judicial process. St. v. Gonzales, 278 M 525, 926 P2d 705, 53 St. Rep. 1015 (1996).

Sexual Abuse — Failure of District Court to Consider Sentencing Alternatives — No Objection — Sentence Not Illegal or Violation of Due Process: Swoboda pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of children, was classified as a nondangerous offender, and was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections. On appeal, she claimed as error the District Court's failure to consider alternatives to incarceration. The Supreme Court noted that she had not objected at sentencing to the District Court's failure and declined to review the judgment. The Supreme Court noted that in the past, it had made an exception and reviewed such a failure of the District Court when the state conceded the failure of the District Court or when the sentence was illegal. Here, however, the Supreme Court noted that the sentence was not beyond the District Court's jurisdiction. Citing St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep 310 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that the failure of the District Court was not a manifest miscarriage of justice and would not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial or the proceedings. St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996).

Common-Law Plain Error: Despite the clear language of 1-1-108 precluding application of the common law in cases in which the law is declared by statute, the doctrine of common-law plain error review by the Montana Supreme Court continues to exist to allow correction of errors not objected to at trial but that affect the fairness, integrity, and public reputation of judicial proceedings. The doctrine continues in spite of the passage of this section, Montana's plain error statute restricting the review of errors not objected to at trial. Although failing to address the applicability of 1-1-108, the Supreme Court nevertheless retained the inherent power and obligation to interpret the constitution, protect individual rights, prevent manifest injustice, and correspondingly review lower court decisions and actions for error on a selective case-by-case basis, as inherent in the appellate process, despite the statutory restrictions and legislative intent of this section. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), contrasted in St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296, 53 St. Rep. 478 (1996), and followed in St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999), St. v. Pizzichiello, 1999 MT 123, 294 M 436, 983 P2d 888, 56 St. Rep. 499 (1999), and St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999). See also Seyferth v. St., 277 M 377, 922 P2d 494, 53 St. Rep. 698 (1996).

Common-Law Plain Error — Case-by-Case Review: Despite the passage of this section, Montana's plain error statute restricting the review of errors not objected to at trial, the doctrine of common-law plain error review by the Montana Supreme Court continues to exist to allow correction of errors not objected to at trial but that affect the fairness, integrity, and public reputation of judicial proceedings. The Supreme Court retains the inherent power and obligation to interpret the constitution, protect individual rights, prevent manifest injustice, and correspondingly review lower court decisions and actions for error. The power of such review is inherent in the appellate process itself. Thus, while acknowledging the constraints of this section, the Supreme Court will discretionarily review claimed errors that implicate a criminal defendant's fundamental constitutional rights even if no contemporaneous objection is made and notwithstanding the statutory criteria, in the class of cases when failure to conduct the review may result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of trial proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. The doctrine will be applied sparingly and on a case-by-case basis. Nevertheless, the necessity for contemporaneous objection to claimed error remains because this section will be applied, except in the class of cases mentioned above. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996), followed in St. v. Monaco, 277 M 221, 921 P2d 863, 53 St. Rep. 604 (1996), St. v. Herrera, 1998 MT 173, 289 M 499, 962 P2d 1180, 55 St. Rep. 703 (1998), in which the Supreme Court refused to apply the plain error doctrine, St. v. Improper Comments by Prospective Jurors During Voir Dire — Prejudicial Effect Warranting Reversal: Comments made in the presence of the entire jury panel indicating that certain potential jurors not only knew the defendant but also were aware of the defendant's high propensity for violence were prejudicial, thereby poisoning the perspective of the entire jury panel in such a way that the court could not rectify the problem through admonishment or curative jury instructions and constituting reversible error. This opinion was narrowly drawn and reserved only for the most egregious and prejudicial juror comments—comments that indicate a bias that the juror cannot lay aside or comments that, when made in the presence of other prospective jurors, amount to inadmissible opinions about the defendant's character or propensities. The Supreme Court suggested that District Courts advise prospective jurors, before voir dire commences, not to volunteer the substance of any comments or opinions that they may have about the parties but rather to notify the court that they have information or an opinion about a party. The trial judge can then explore the substance of that information in camera and avoid any taint to the entire jury panel. St. v. McMahon, 271 M 75, 894 P2d 313, 52 St. Rep. 353 (1995), following principles established in Putro v. Baker, 147 M 139, 410 P2d 717 (1966), and followed in St. v. Hardaway, 1998 MT 224, 290 M 516, 966 P2d 125, 55 St. Rep. 936 (1998).

Prosecution Comment on Sexual Abuse in Opening Statement — Door Not Opened — Testimony Properly Excluded Under Rape Shield Law: Stuit was charged with sexual abuse of S.M., a minor. At trial, the District Court cautioned both the defense and prosecution that testimony concerning prior acts of abuse of S.M. would not be admitted. However, in an opening statement, the prosecution made reference to past sexual abuse of S.M. No objection was made by the defense at the time. Later, in a conference in chambers, the District Court noted that the statement came close to opening the door on the issue of past abuse, but ultimately ruled that the door had not been opened on the issue. The Supreme Court held that failure of defense counsel to make a contemporaneous objection waived the issue and that the doctrine of plain error did not apply under the statute. The Supreme Court also held that any evidence of prior abuse was inadmissible under the rape shield law. St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290, 51 St. Rep. 1238 (1994).

Limited Applicability of Plain Error Doctrine: Arlington contended that the prosecutor suppressed a victim's claim form, filed by the victim with the Department of Justice crime victims unit in order to obtain benefits, and that the suppression constituted plain error for which a new trial was warranted. Notwithstanding the fact that the issue was not raised at trial, the Supreme Court noted the limited applicability of the plain error doctrine, which exists to prevent manifest injustice by providing a remedy when a party's substantial rights have been infringed. The doctrine will be invoked only when necessary to ensure a fair and impartial trial. In this case, there was nothing in the claim form that was even remotely exculpatory as regards the criminal charges filed against Arlington or that would assist in his defense. Given that the claim form was a public document available to Arlington for the asking and that Arlington did not preserve a claim of error by including it in the record once it was obtained, there was no evidence of prosecutorial misconduct or prejudice, much less plain error. St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Petition to Revoke Filed After Period of Suspension — Question of Jurisdiction Properly Raised and Sentence Voided: The County Attorney's office petitioned for revocation of Voegele's suspended sentence 2 days after the term of the suspended sentence had expired. While Voegele rightfully asserted that allowing the tardy revocation petition was prejudicial to his punishment, he acknowledged that he was precluded from challenging the District Court's jurisdiction under subsection (2) of this section. However, the Supreme Court found that until Voegele obtained new counsel on appeal, no one was aware that the suspended sentence had expired. Under the plain error doctrine, the power of discretionary review was applied to address the arithmetic jurisdictional error and prevent manifest injustice. Voegele was therefore not barred from raising the jurisdictional issue, and the Supreme Court held that the imposition of sentence was void for lack of jurisdiction because the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was filed after the sentence had expired. St. v. Voegele, 243 M 222, 793 P2d 832, 47 St. Rep. 1183 (1990), following St. v. Wilkins, 229 M 78, 746 P2d 588 (1987). See also St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Use of Expert Testimony to Identify Victim of Sexual Abuse — Not Plain Error: Defendant argued that even though no objection was made at trial, the admission of expert testimony indicating a child had been sexually abused was improper because it was not scientifically reliable and constituted plain error. However, defendant presented no evidence that the testimony was prejudicial as to his guilt or innocence or that the alleged error met any of the criteria of subsection (2) of this section. Further, when expert testimony in child abuse cases has not been objected to at trial as improper, the Supreme Court will not entertain the issue on appeal. St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111, 47 St. Rep. 1143 (1990), following St. v. Eiler, 234 M 38, 762 P2d 210 (1988).

Anonymous Tip — Hearsay — Plain Error: In the prosecution of defendant for conspiracy to commit arson and attempted criminal mischief, admission of the contents of an anonymous tip was error as the tip was hearsay. However, because defendant did not object to admission of the tip at trial, the inquiry of whether admission constituted reversible error extends only to determining whether the admission was plain error affecting substantial rights of the defendant under Rule 103, M.R.Ev. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986).

Violation of Order Granting Motion In Limine: The "plain error" rule does not apply when only nonsubstantial rights of appellant are affected by testimony entered in violation of a motion in limine. St. v. Lias, 218 M 124, 706 P2d 500, 42 St. Rep. 1453 (1985).

Standard Self-Defense Instruction Given — Second Instruction Tailored to Facts Improper: In aggravated assault trial, the 9th instruction fully set forth the elements of self-defense and the 10th instruction related to self-defense by one assaulted with fists, as defendant claimed he had been. The 10th instruction was repetitious and may have placed undue emphasis on the requirements for self-defense. On remand following reversal on another issue, the court recommended that the repetitious instruction not be given. St. v. White, 202 M 491, 658 P2d 1111, 40 St. Rep. 235 (1983).

Instructions — Elements of Crime — Plain Error Not to Instruct: The jury was not instructed on the statutory elements of the crime. The jury's instructions on the defendant's civil remedy, an agister's lien, permitted the inference, from his failure to pursue the civil remedy, that he was guilty of theft. In granting a new trial, the Supreme Court noted that the issue of jury instructions not offered or objected to at trial, usually a nonappealable issue, was reviewed here to determine if the jury was properly instructed. The failure to instruct on the elements of the crime constituted "plain error". Instructing the jury that each element of the crime had to be proved was insufficient if the elements were not given to the jury as well. St. v. Lundblade, 191 M 526, 625 P2d 545, 38 St. Rep. 441 (1981). However, in St. v. Smith, 228 M 258, 742 P2d 451, 44 St. Rep. 1503 (1987), the Supreme Court noted that due to the 1983 amendment of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987), Lundblade is no longer authority under the theory of plain error not to instruct on elements of a crime.

NO ERROR FOUND

Any Defect Cured — No Mistrial: During a homicide trial, the judge grew dissatisfied with the pace of the trial and admonished counsel before retiring for the day. Hixon moved for a mistrial asserting that the judge's comments on "wasting time" deprived him of his right to a fair trial. Hixon contended that the judge's assertion that his statements were directed toward the state and his general apology the next day did not rectify the wrong done. Outside the presence of the jury the judge explained to counsel that his comments were directed towards the prosecution, given that the state had moved at an extremely slow pace. The next day the judge apologized to the jury for his comments and instructed the jury that no comment he made was intended in any way to express his opinion about the facts of the case or the verdict they should reach. The Supreme Court held that where the trial judge strikes improper statements from the record with an accompanying cautionary instruction to the jury, any error committed is presumed cured. There was no indication that Hixon was prejudiced by the judge's statements. St. v. Hixon, 2008 MT 365, 346 M 427, 197 P3d 918 (2008).

Prosecutor's Inaccurate Description of DNA Evidence — Curative Jury Instruction — No Error Requiring New Trial: Defendant contended that a new trial was warranted because the prosecutor inaccurately stated that the victim's and defendant's DNA were found together at the scene of an alleged sexual assault. The trial court agreed that the evidence was mischaracterized and gave a curative instruction that the jury was to disregard any statement that mixed DNA was found and denied defendant's motion for a new trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed on this point. Given the curative instruction, defendant did not demonstrate that the trial court acted arbitrarily without conscientious judgment or exceeded the bounds of reason in denying the new trial motion. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Statute Prohibiting Impeding Traffic Not Vague or Fundamentally Unfair: Benders argued that 61-8-311, which prohibits driving in a manner that impedes traffic, is unconstitutionally vague and fundamentally unfair. The Supreme Court held that none of the circumstances of Benders' case were applicable to the constitutional claim, but considered whether the claim warranted review under the plain error doctrine on the issue of unfairness. The fairness issue was based on the assertion that it was unfair to convict Benders of impeding traffic when there was no finding that Benders had violated a minimum speed limit. However, the relevant determination under 61-8-311 is not the speed of the vehicle, but the effect of the slow speed on the flow of traffic. Therefore, Benders failed to demonstrate that the statutory language was vague, much less that it amounted to a fundamental unfairness resulting in plain error. The challenge to the constitutionality of 61-8-311 failed. St. v. Benders, 2006 MT 275, 334 M 231, 146 P3d 751 (2006).

Definition of Sexual Contact Allowing Two Means of Satisfying Mental State, Not Two Separate Offenses: Following trial for sexual assault, Clark asserted that the District Court erred in failing to instruct the jury that it was required to unanimously find that Clark had subjected his stepdaughter to sexual contact for purposes of either 45-2-101(67)(a) or (67)(b) and that failure to do so should be reviewed under the plain error doctrine. The Supreme Court held that the definition allows for two means of satisfying the purposely or knowingly element of sexual contact, rather than articulating two separate offenses. Therefore, the District Court did not err in instructing the jury as to any unanimity required regarding the elements of sexual contact, and the Supreme Court declined to implement the plain error doctrine to discuss the issue. St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1 (1995), and St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713 (1998).

Prosecutor's Closing Statement Considered in Context — Burden of Proof Not Shifted: In closing argument, the prosecutor told the jury that this was a case in which the jury had to decide between two conflicting stories, rather than a case in which a defendant chose to remain silent and the jury had to decide whether the prosecution met its burden of proof. Defense counsel immediately objected based on the prosecutor's implication that the state did not have to prove the elements of the crime. The prosecutor then reiterated that the state did have the burden of proving the elements of the crime. Taken in context, the closing statement did not impermissibly shift the burden of proof and deny defendant a fair trial, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Roubideaux, 2005 MT 324, 329 M 521, 125 P3d 1114 (2005), following St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21 (1981), and followed in St. v. Kolb, 2009 MT 9, 349 M 10, 200 P3d 504 (2009).

No Prejudice in Property Valuation When Less Than Full Restitution Required: The total losses incurred by individuals and businesses in a fire started by Gilbert was $5,721,684.57. In calculating the value of a building destroyed in the fire for establishing restitution, the District Court used replacement value rather than actual value. Gilbert contended that failure to use actual value was reversible error under St. v. Pritchett, 2000 MT 261, 302 M 1, 11 P3d 539 (2000). The Supreme Court agreed that actual value should have been used but that Gilbert failed to show that any prejudice resulted from the error. Gilbert's presentence investigation report adequately documented Gilbert's financial resources and future ability to pay restitution, and Gilbert was ordered to pay only $24,000 in restitution, which was but a minuscule fraction of the losses. Any error by the District Court in using replacement value for the building did not prejudice Gilbert because he was not required to pay full restitution. St. v. Gilbert, 2004 MT 368, 324 M 530, 106 P3d 127 (2004), following St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 126, 321 M 280, 90 P3d 426 (2004).

No Prejudice Warranting New Trial on Grounds of Cumulative Error: Larson contended that he was denied a fair trial and was entitled to a new trial because of the cumulative errors argued in his appeal. The doctrine of cumulative error requires reversal of a conviction when a number of errors taken together prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial. However, in this case, the Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine after reviewing all the issues on appeal. There was no prejudice shown, there was no abuse of judicial discretion, none of the evidentiary rulings were erroneous, and there was sufficient evidence to support the conviction. Larson's mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice were insufficient to satisfy the doctrine, and Larson's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004).

No Prejudice in Change of Venue: The trial court granted Bar-Jonah's motion for a change of venue from Great Falls to Butte. Even though the venue change was requested by Bar-Jonah, following conviction, he asserted that pretrial publicity in Butte precluded a fair trial. The Supreme Court found that Bar-Jonah failed to demonstrate prejudice by the decision to hold the trial in Butte and declined to reverse the judgment absent a showing that any error in changing the venue was prejudicial. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Jury Instruction Disallowing Evidence of Intoxication in Determining State of Mind Not Error — Full and Fair Instructions on Law: Following Raugust's criminal trial, the court instructed the jury that it could not consider evidence of intoxication for any purpose, pursuant to 45-2-203. Raugust maintained on appeal that the instruction was in error because depriving him of the ability to admit intoxication evidence lessened the state's burden of proof and confused the jury, in violation of his due process rights. However, the error urged on appeal was not contained in the objection made to the instruction during the final settling of jury instructions, constituting waiver of the argument on appeal. Moreover, the plain error doctrine did not apply because review under that doctrine was requested for the first time on appeal. Here, the jury was instructed regarding: (1) the elements of each offense charged and the state's burden of proving each element beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) the definition of the applicable mental states—purposely and knowingly; (3) the fact that the existence of a mental state may be inferred from the acts of the accused and from the facts and circumstances connected with the offense; (4) the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence; (5) witness credibility; and (6) the need for a unanimous verdict. Read as a whole, these instructions fairly and fully instructed the jury on the law applicable to the case, and giving the instruction disallowing the defense of intoxication was not erroneous. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994 (1997).

Evidence of Victim's Character and Prior Violent Act Inadmissible as Element of Self-Defense: Sattler claimed that his homicide of Martinson was in self-defense and sought to introduce evidence of a prior act of violence that was committed by Martinson 8 years before his death as proof of Martinson's aggressiveness and Sattler's need to use force in his defense. However, nothing in 45-3-102 relates directly to the question of the identity of the aggressor as an essential element of the justifiable use of force defense. Further, evidence of the prior act did not support any claim that the force used against Martinson was reasonable based on Sattler's knowledge of Martinson's history of violence. Also, the act was remote in time, and the lapse of time between the prior act and Martinson's death rendered the probity of the act minimal at best. Refusing to admit the evidence would not have resulted in prejudicial and reversible error or affected Sattler's substantial rights in light of the other evidence of record. Thus, reversal was not warranted. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998), distinguished in Red Lodge v. Nelson, 1999 MT 246, 296 M 190, 989 P2d 300, 56 St. Rep. 955 (1999). See also St. v. Benton, 251 M 401, 825 P2d 565 (1992).

Judge's Questions About Foreigner's Immigration Status as Showing Racial Bias: The District Court erred in asking Ahmed, a resident and native of Bangladesh and a student at MSU-Bozeman, about his immigration status in a trial for aggravated kidnapping and assault but cured the error by sustaining an objection and striking the questioning from the record. Ahmed offered no specific evidence that the questioning showed racial bias by the judge, and the Supreme Court would not presume bias from the mere posing of the questions. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Racial Bias of Judge Who Illegally Made Deportation Condition of Parole Not Shown by Mere Unsupported Speculation: Upon an aggravated kidnapping and assault conviction of a native of Bangladesh, the court ordered deportation as a condition of parole. This was an illegal condition but did not alone show the judge was racially biased against defendant. A claim of bias was not upheld when it was supported by mere speculation or conjecture by defendant. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Impeachment of Verdict With Juror Testimony That .357 Magnum Handgun Cannot Be Rapidly Fired — Defense Claim That Victim Shot Himself: The trial court properly refused to allow defendant to impeach the verdict with juror testimony that one juror told the others that he knew that a .357 magnum handgun could not be fired rapidly. Defendant argued that this allowed the jury to conclude that defendant's theory that the victim shot himself was inherently incredible. Rule 606, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), does not allow inquiry into the internal mechanisms of a jury's decisionmaking process. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Judge's Failure to Inform Defense of Juror Contact With Defendant: It was not error for the judge to fail to immediately notify the defense counsel after the bailiff told the judge that a juror had told the bailiff that, during the trial, she served defendant coffee at a cafe in which she was a waitress. Defendant was given a hearing on the matter after trial and could not show prejudice. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Waitress-Juror's Statements to Jury That She Served Defendant and Report of Dream — Not Juror Misconduct: There was no juror misconduct or prejudice to defendant when a juror told other jurors that she twice served defendant as a waitress during the trial, that he made her uncomfortable, and that she had a dream in which they found defendant guilty and in which he had a gun and shot his counsel, grabbed her, and ran off with her. Therefore, a new trial was properly denied. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Failure to Object — No Plain Error in Admitting Mug Shot in Evidence: Absent proof that his substantial rights were prejudiced, appellant who did not object during the trial was not entitled to review of introduction into evidence of his mug shot, which he claimed indicated to the jury that he had a past criminal record. Even under the plain error doctrine, which provides a remedy to prevent manifest injustice when objection was not made below, reversal was not warranted. A mug shot is generally admissible, at the discretion of the judge, if disguised, as it was here, to remove law enforcement information. Appellant could not prove prejudice because eyewitnesses to the theft could not absolutely identify defendant from the mug shot, his own testimony showed that he in fact had a past criminal record, and his defense was that he was not the person who committed the theft. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

No Prejudice in Permitting Jury to Hear Discussion on Evidence Later Held Inadmissible: Defendant contended he was highly prejudiced when the trial court allowed the jury to hear discussion on admissibility of a transcript of a tape recording and on a motion to dismiss, pointing out that no jury instruction was given regarding the problem. The Supreme Court, noting that the transcript was not admitted into evidence, found no reason to believe that the jury would understand that it could consider material not in evidence. An instruction would only have told the jury to disregard what it had not seen; therefore, there was no prejudice in the jury's witnessing of the exchange regarding the transcript. St. v. Moreno, 248 M 91, 809 P2d 574, 48 St. Rep. 339 (1991).

Disallowance of Cumulative Character Evidence Not Reversible Error — Offer of Proof: Defendant was not allowed to impeach a witness directly through introduction of character evidence. Defendant was allowed to make an offer of proof, but he made no statement as to what facts were to be proved or that an alternative manner would be less objectionable. The evidence defendant attempted to present was cumulative in that it came out in various forms, directly and indirectly, throughout the trial after the witness testified. The exclusion of the character evidence affected no substantial right and was not reversible error. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Evidence Overwhelming to Sustain Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Conviction: On appeal of his conviction of mitigated deliberate homicide, defendant claimed that the shooting that was the basis of his conviction was accidental. The Supreme Court affirmed the conviction, ruling that the evidence was overwhelming that the shooting was not an accident since all of the witnesses except defendant and his wife testified that defendant had the gun in both hands, arms extended. The gun was pointed toward the decedent immediately after the shot was fired. St. v. Sage, 221 M 192, 717 P2d 1096, 43 St. Rep. 738 (1986).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), and St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Robbery With Gun Apparently Under Coat — Sentence of Thirty Years Permissible: Defendant claimed that his 30-year sentence for robbery of a convenience store was disproportionate to the facts (which included a finding that he had his hand under his coat and the store clerk believed he had a gun). The sentence was within the permissible statutory range, there was no clear abuse of discretion, and the sentence was properly reviewable in the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court. St. v. Lewis, 220 M 418, 715 P2d 1064, 43 St. Rep. 492 (1986), following St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — No Show of Prejudice — No Reversible Error: Appellant failed to object at the time the court informed the parties that it would not give the omnibus instruction or reread the preliminary jury instructions and would instead send the preliminary instruction with the final instructions to the jury. Because of the failure to make a timely objection and failure upon appeal to show any prejudice affecting substantial rights, there was no reversible error. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986). See also St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Six and a Half Weeks to Prepare for Burglary-Theft Trial — Sufficient Time: There was nothing to indicate that, when counsel for defendant convicted of two counts of burglary and one of theft had 6 ½ weeks to prepare for trial, the attorney had insufficient time to adequately prepare and nothing to indicate that effective assistance of counsel was denied. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

Prosecutorial Discretion — Deputy's Prior Representation: The Lemmons were divorced after 20 years of marriage. Leroy was seeing Donna Myers, and Koralyn was seeing John Sweeting. Myers and Sweeting had just ended a personal and business relationship. Sweeting asked Koralyn to get a briefcase out of Leroy's truck. The briefcase actually belonged to Myers. Leroy and Myers returned to the truck and found the briefcase missing. They concluded Koralyn had taken it since the truck was not broken into. Leroy and Myers went to Koralyn's home. She heard them drive up and put a gun in the waistband of her pants. Leroy and Koralyn fought, and Leroy struck her in the head with the gun. Leroy and Myers put Koralyn on the floor of the truck and went to the Sheriff's department. The Sheriff was not immediately available, so Leroy and Myers left, with Koralyn still on the floor of the truck, to find Sweeting. A high speed chase ensued in which the cars rammed together and gunshots were exchanged. The chase ended when Leroy's transmission caught fire. The charges arising from the pursuit were dropped. Leroy was charged with aggravated assault and kidnapping. He was convicted of assault and unlawful restraint. Leroy contended the County Attorney abused his discretion in not acting on his complaints against Koralyn and for not disqualifying the office since a deputy had represented Koralyn in the divorce. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the abuse of discretion issue had not been raised at trial and could not be raised on appeal. The court also stated that selectivity in enforcement is not a violation of the U. S. Constitution if the selection is not based on an unjustifiable or arbitrary classification. The court construed DR 5-105(D) to concern conflicts in representation, not prosecution. Also, the court stated that it was not established that the County Attorney would have been disqualified from the prosecution for representing Koralyn, let alone a deputy. St. v. Lemmon, 214 M 121, 692 P2d 455, 41 St. Rep. 2359 (1984), followed, with regard to the broad applicability of prosecutorial discretion, in St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881, 56 St. Rep. 481 (1999).

Criminal Mischief for Damage to One's Own Property to Defraud Insurer — Relevance of Pictures of Property: Defendant was charged with criminal mischief in that he purposely drove his pickup over a steep bank to wreck it so he could collect from his insurance company. Later the pickup was vandalized. Pictures of the pickup taken after the vandalism were properly admitted as proof of defendant's motive, and their probative value was substantial and was not outweighed by prejudice to defendant, who claimed that they should not have been admitted because they were evidence of other crimes as well as the one with which he was charged and that he had not been charged with vandalism. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

Issue Created by Complainant's Counsel: Defendant convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide could not successfully claim prejudicial error occurred when the issue of his failure to obtain a concealed weapon permit arose, for the issue was created by his own counsel during opening argument. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Discretion of Court — Different Sentences for Co-Offenders: On appellate review, undermining the legality of a sentence requires a showing that the judge abused his discretion in the sentencing process. There was no abuse of discretion where defendant and another were separately convicted of the same burglary, the other person was offered and accepted a bargain for a 3-year deferred sentence, and defendant was offered a bargain for a 10-year sentence with 5 years suspended, refused it, and was tried, convicted, and sentenced to 10 years. There was a strong possibility that his alibi defense was frivolous, and he had a prior felony record. St. v. White, 200 M 123, 650 P2d 765, 39 St. Rep. 1619 (1982).

Inquiry as to Time Served — Letter to Warden From Judge: Letter written by judge who revoked suspended sentence to warden of penitentiary, inquiring as to prison time to be credited against sentence, was not prejudicial. The evidence indicated the letter was written at defendant's instigation and that defendant complimented the judge on judge's efforts in defendant's behalf. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Failure to Object to Jury Instructions — Issue Precluded on Appeal: Where the defendant was convicted of felony murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery and either failed to object at trial to certain instructions to the jury or concurred in those instructions, the Supreme Court found the defendant was precluded from raising alleged errors in those instructions for the first time on appeal. The Supreme Court also found that the objections had no merit as the instructions objected to, or instructions substantially similar to them, had been approved in St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 1134 (1979). St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Instruction That Rape Easily Charged and Difficult to Prove Allowable: Where the record showed evidence corroborating the victim's testimony and no evidence of any desire for revenge, the District Court did not err in not giving the following instruction: "You are instructed that no charge can be more easily made and none is more difficult to disprove than that of rape. The jury is instructed that they must examine the complainant's testimony with caution and be satisfied with all aspects thereof beyond a reasonable doubt." St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Sexual Assault — Resistance — Proper Instruction: In a sexual intercourse without consent case, the jury was instructed that the victim need only resist to the extent that is reasonable and that continued resistance is not necessary to show that the act was done without consent. That was a correct statement of the law, and the District Court properly refused defendant's proposed instructions. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Prosecutor's Remarks on Lack of Defense Case Held Permissible: The defendant appealed his conviction for theft and alleged that the prosecution's closing statement included impermissible remarks. The County Attorney's comments in part referred to the fact that the defense presented no case at all. Certainly the prosecution, as an adversary for the state, cannot be prohibited from arguing the strength of its case to the jury. The manifest fact that the defense presented no testimony of its own may be detrimental to the defendant, but that fact cannot deny the prosecution its right to stress the strength of its own evidence. St. v. Dolan, 190 M 195, 620 P2d 355, 37 St. Rep. 1860 (1980).

Suppression of Confession — Voluntariness — Waiver of Right to Counsel After Making Request: To determine whether a confession should have been suppressed, it had to be determined whether the confession was voluntary and whether there was an unconstitutional denial of the right to counsel. In so doing, the following questions had to be answered: What was the totality of the circumstances? Was there effective assertion of the right to counsel, and if so, was there an effective waiver later? Since the evidence answered a large number of the requisite questions about the circumstances, the decision of the trial court was held not to have clearly contravened the weight of the evidence and its holding of voluntariness was upheld. Since any indication by a defendant in any manner that he wishes to consult with an attorney suffices, and evidence showed the defendant had met this requirement, the trial court erred in concluding that there was ineffective assertion of the right to counsel. After adopting the rule that a defendant can validly waive the right to counsel after making a request for counsel, the Supreme Court found the trial court properly found that the State had carried its "heavy burden" of showing waiver of counsel. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted in Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Voluntariness of Confession — Burdens of Proof — Harmless Error: A trial judge can properly require a party moving for suppression of evidence (involuntary confession) to initiate suppression hearing proceedings. The rationale for such a procedure is the requirement that the movant establish a prima facie case that a constitutional infringement has occurred. Once this has been accomplished, the ultimate burden of proving the propriety of the State's action (obtaining a confession) shifts to the State, notwithstanding 46-13-301(4), which is unconstitutional in that it requires defendant to prove that a confession or admission was involuntary. Thus, the District Court did not err in requiring appellant to present his evidence first at the suppression hearing but did err in putting the ultimate burden on the defendant at the hearing. The Supreme Court, however, upheld the District Court's denial of the motion to suppress because its error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979). [Annotator's Note: A 1981 amendment requires the state to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the confession or admission was voluntary. Certiorari was granted in Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and the judgment vacated and the case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981). The court affirmed its original decision on remand, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).]

Motion to Suppress Not Timely — Waiver: The defendant's failure to make a timely motion to suppress evidence waived the search and seizure issue for appeal, notwithstanding his objection to the introduction of the evidence seized. St. v. Gallagher, 162 M 155, 509 P2d 852 (1973).

Absence of Prospective Juror: The failure of a properly notified juror to be present when the jury was impaneled did not invalidate the trial as the defendant had the right only to reject jurors and not to select any particular juror. St. v. Moran, 142 M 423, 384 P2d 777 (1963).

Waiver of Error — Approval of Instructions on Subject: Objection to references by the County Attorney as to the nature of the trial, an appeal from Justice's Court, claimed as prejudicial error in the District Court, was waived by counsel for the defendant when he approved instructions to be given by the District Court which included reference to Justice's Court proceedings and thereafter obtained a deletion from the instructions of the phrase which read "and was found guilty following a jury trial". St. v. Gilbert, 139 M 204, 362 P2d 221 (1961).

Objection That Facts Do Not Constitute an Offense — When Taken: Under former law, the objection that the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense could be taken by demurrer, at the trial under a plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment. St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920).

Verdict Contrary to Law or Evidence: An alleged error in an instruction will not be reviewed on appeal when the only ground designated is that the verdict is contrary to the law and evidence. St. v. Gawith, 19 M 48, 47 P 207 (1896), overruled in St. v. Mason, 24 M 340, 61 P 861 (1900).

HARMLESS ERROR

Harmless Error for Detective Nonexpert to Testify Regarding Genuineness of Handwriting: The District Court allowed a detective to testify in Dewitz's trial regarding handwriting samples that the detective believed were from Dewitz. However, the detective was not a handwriting expert and was not familiar with Dewitz's writing outside the litigation, so the testimony was improperly admitted. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court concluded that the error was harmless, based on the existence of other admissible evidence that proved the same facts. Thus, Dewitz's right to a fair trial was not prejudiced. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009).

Failure of State to Disclose Findings of Forensics Expert in Homicide Trial — Harmless Error: Morrisey retained a forensics expert to testify during Morrisey's homicide trial. The state had a forensics expert as well, and Morrisey moved for disclosure of the state's expert's findings. The state declined to disclose the findings on grounds that its expert would not be called as a witness during the state's case in chief, but only to rebut Morrisey's expert. The trial court denied Morrisey's discovery motion. Following trial, Morrisey appealed on grounds that the state violated 46-15-322 by failing to disclose its expert's conclusions. The Supreme Court agreed that under 46-15-322(1)(c), the prosecution was required to disclose the written report of the state's expert who examined the evidence, regardless of whether the expert was a witness in the state's case in chief, and noted that by refusing the disclosure request, the prosecution bound itself not to call the expert as a witness. When the state subsequently called its expert to give an opinion on the evidence, that testimony was objectionable. However, Morrisey had the opportunity to cross-examine the state's expert at length, so any error in allowing the expert's testimony was not prejudicial and was considered harmless. The trial court was affirmed. St. v. Morrisey, 2009 MT 201, 351 M 144, 214 P3d 708 (2009).

Admission of Officer's Personal Observation Testimony Cumulative and Harmless: At Foston's trial for distribution of dangerous drugs, the trial court, pursuant to Rule 803, M.R.Ev., admitted testimony by an officer that conversations overheard between Foston and a confidential informant were consistent with drug transactions. Foston appealed on grounds that the testimony constituted plain error. The Supreme Court noted that the testimony was admissible under Rule 701, M.R.Ev., as a statement of the officer's personal observation. The court further found that even without the officer's testimony, there was ample evidence from which the jury could conclude that Foston was selling drugs, so the testimony was cumulative and harmless if it was error at all. St. v. Foston, 2009 MT 191, 351 M 85, 209 P3d 262 (2009).

Defendant's Absence From In-Chambers Trial Conferences Not Considered Prejudicial — No New Trial Based on Lack of Fair Trial: At Price's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, Price was excluded from 11 in-chambers conferences. Price contended that his absence from the conferences violated his right to be present at all criminal proceedings against him and that he was therefore denied a fair trial. The Supreme Court assumed for purposes of analysis that the conferences constituted critical stages of the trial and that Price did not validly waive the right to be present at the conferences. Nevertheless, the court concluded that failure to include Price in the conferences at worst constituted trial error, rather than structural error that would require automatic reversal, so the court examined the record to determine whether Price was prejudiced and concluded that he was not. The record was not ambiguous as to what occurred at the conferences, and nothing that occurred at the conferences concerned or affected the framework within which Price's trial proceeded or necessarily rendered the trial fundamentally unfair. The one conference at which Price particularly contended that his presence should have been required was one in which a juror expressed concern regarding possible bias toward Price. However, Price's concern was irrelevant when the juror was removed from the jury. After review of the complete trial record, the court concluded that Price's absence from the conferences did not cause any conceivable prejudice depriving Price of a fair trial. Absent reversible error, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Price, 2009 MT 129, 350 M 272, 207 P3d 298 (2009). See also St. v. Kennedy, 2004 MT 53, 320 M 161, 85 P3d 1279 (2004), St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 160, 332 M 476, 139 P3d 159 (2006), and St. v. Matt, 2008 MT 444, 347 M 530, 199 P3d 244 (2008).

Error for District Court to Impose Parole Conditions for Felony DUI — Error Harmless Given That No Parole Available: The District Court sentenced Kampf to 13 months with the Department of Corrections for felony DUI, followed by a suspended term of 2 years with the Department. The court then attached 25 conditions on the sentence during any term of parole or probation. Kampf contended that the court was without authority to impose conditions on any time period when Kampf might be released on parole. Citing St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), the Supreme Court agreed. Other than in limited and expressly authorized instances, such as for sexual and violent offenders, sentencing courts do not have a residual or inherent authority to generally impose parole conditions. Felony DUI is not a sexual or violent offense, so the District Court had no authority to impose parole conditions. However, pursuant to 61-8-731, the imposition or execution of the 13-month sentence for felony DUI may not be deferred or suspended and the offender is not eligible for parole, so even though Kampf's sentence containing parole conditions was illegal, the error was harmless because parole was unavailable. St. v. Kampf, 2008 MT 198, 344 M 69, 186 P3d 223 (2008).

Trial Error in Admitting Written Witness Statements Based on Failure to Show That Prior Statements Made Before Alleged Motive to Fabricate — Error Harmless: At McOmber's trial for felony solicitation to issue a bad check, the trial court admitted a written statement and a police interview transcript made by a testifying witness. Admission of the evidence as a prior consistent statement was error because the state failed to show that the statements were made before the witness's alleged motive to fabricate occurred. However, pursuant to the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), the error was trial error rather than structural error and was therefore subject to harmless error review. Upon review, the Supreme Court concluded that the state had demonstrated, qualitatively and in comparison with the witness's testimony, that there was no possibility that the erroneously admitted prior consistent statements contributed to McOmber's conviction, so the error was harmless, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. McOmber, 2007 MT 340, 340 M 262, 173 P3d 690 (2007).

Prosecutor's Closing Comments Improper but Not Egregious — Failure of Counsel to Object Not Ineffective Assistance: On appeal, defendant argued that the prosecutor's comments that the prosecutor did not put any stock in the defense theory was an impermissible expression of personal opinion about the defendant's credibility and that defense counsel erred by failing to object to the comments. The Supreme Court agreed that the comments were improper, but did not conclude that the comments rose to a level of egregiousness that prejudiced defendant or that rendered the trial unfair, so any error by defense counsel in failing to object was harmless. St. v. Tennell, 2007 MT 266, 339 M 381, 170 P3d 965 (2007).

Enhanced Sentence for Use of Weapon — Apprendi Applied Retroactively Under Harmless Error Test — Enhanced Sentence Without Unanimous Jury Finding Harmless Error: After Adams received an enhanced sentence for use of a weapon during an aggravated assault, Adams appealed on grounds that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding that a weapon was used and that the enhanced sentence violated due process because there was no separate jury finding that a weapon was used, as required by Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000). The 2001 Legislature updated the law to address the Apprendi requirement, but as it read in 1997 during Adams's sentencing, 46-1-401 did not require a separate jury finding, so Adams argued that 46-1-401 was therefore unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held that Apprendi imposes a new obligation on the state and is thus a new rule that applies retroactively to cases pending on direct appeal or not final at the time that the new rule was issued, so Apprendi applied retroactively to Adams's direct appeal. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence on both issues. First, there was uncontroverted evidence that a weapon was involved in the crime. Second, the Supreme Court applied Neder v. U.S., 527 US 1 (1999), to determine the proper test to apply when a trial court fails to instruct the jury to make a finding of materiality. Under Neder, the proper test is the harmless error test, i.e., whether it appears beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained. Thus, in this case, the question was whether, beyond a reasonable doubt, Adams would have received an enhanced sentence based on the display or use of a weapon had the question been submitted to the jury. Given evidence that a gun was used was uncontroverted, the result would have been the same, so any error in failing to present the question to the jury was harmless. Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007), applying St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001).

Failure of Trial Court to Rule on Motion to Dismiss Not Violative of Due Process Rights — Plenary Review of Constitutional Question: Following a sentencing hearing, Smerker simultaneously filed notice of appeal to the Supreme Court and a motion to dismiss a felony DUI charge on grounds that two prior misdemeanor DUI violations were constitutionally invalid and could not be used to enhance the current charge to a felony. The sentencing court declined to rule on the motion to dismiss, which Smerker contended was a violation of due process rights. The Supreme Court disagreed. Smerker's arguments were based on documentary evidence related to the prior offenses, and the Supreme Court is in as good a position as a District Court to judge the weight of documentary evidence. Therefore, the Supreme Court exercised plenary review of the constitutional validity of the prior convictions. Because the Supreme Court could adequately address the issue, the District Court's failure to rule on the motion to dismiss did not affect Smerker's substantial due process rights. St. v. Smerker, 2006 MT 117, 332 M 221, 136 P3d 543 (2006).

Personal Possession of Pipe Insufficient Probable Cause to Search Vehicle — Evidence in Plain View in Vehicle Sufficient Probable Cause for Subsequent Search of Residence: When Griffin was lawfully arrested for driving without a license, the arresting officer found a pipe in Griffin's pocket that, in the officer's opinion, contained drug residue. The officer then obtained a search warrant for Griffin's truck. When approaching the truck, the officer observed items in plain view in the open truck bed that could be used to manufacture methamphetamine. Pursuant to another search warrant based on the evidence in the truck bed, officers searched Griffin's residence and found a drug lab that was booby-trapped with explosives. Griffin moved to suppress all the evidence because the first search warrant was issued without probable cause. The motion was denied, but on appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the only evidence supporting the vehicle search warrant—the existence of a pipe on Griffin's person and the fact that Griffin recently exited the truck—provided insufficient probable cause for a warrant to search the truck. Just because a person has a pipe in a pocket that contains untested white residue does not mean that the person's vehicle will contain evidence of a drug offense. However, in this case, the majority of evidence seized from the truck was in plain view in the truck bed. Griffin had no expectation of privacy regarding items in plain view, nor was a warrant required to seize the items in the truck bed. Therefore, any error in issuing the search warrant for the truck was harmless and not prejudicial. Additionally, the lawfully seized evidence in the truck bed was sufficient to support a finding of probable cause for issuance of another warrant to search Griffin's residence. Denial of Griffin's motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Griffin, 2004 MT 331, 324 M 143, 102 P3d 1206 (2004).

Admission of Allegedly Erroneous Evidence Regarding Charge for Which Defendant Acquitted — Harmless Error: Teters was charged with sexual intercourse without consent and with intimidation. The trial court allowed Teters' wife to testify that Teters was abusive, and Teters asserted on appeal that admitting the testimony was erroneous. The Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine whether the alleged error was fundamental and automatically reversible or trial error and reversible if found to be prejudicial. The alleged error here was trial error. Part two of the Van Kirk test requires a showing of a reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted evidence contributed to the conviction. In this case, the wife's testimony related only to the intimidation charge, and Teters was acquitted of intimidation, so any error in allowing the testimony was harmless. St. v. Teters, 2004 MT 137, 321 M 379, 91 P3d 559 (2004).

Exclusion of Testimony by Newspaper Editor and Reporter — Harmless Error: Defendant subpoenaed a newspaper editor and a reporter who had interviewed defendant's assault victim, but the District Court quashed the subpoenas pursuant to the Media Confidentiality Act, Title 26, ch. 1, part 9. Defendant contended that the District Court's action deprived him of the right to compel the attendance of witnesses and that his constitutional right should prevail over the media shield statutes. However, the state met its burden of showing that defendant was not prejudiced by the trial error because defendant was able to introduce the same evidence during cross-examination of the victim and made no additional offer of proof demonstrating the additional evidence that defendant sought to introduce through the editor and reporter. The media testimony would have added little or nothing to the report in the newspaper and other evidence introduced at trial. Absent a reasonable possibility that excluding the testimony contributed to defendant's conviction, quashing of the subpoenas was affirmed. St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004), followed in St. v. Kolb, 2009 MT 9, 349 M 10, 200 P3d 504 (2009).

Allowing Investigating Officer Witness to Remain in Courtroom — Harmless Error: Defendant requested that all witnesses be excluded from the courtroom during trial, but the trial court allowed a police officer who investigated the crime and who was a state witness to remain in the room when all other witnesses were excluded. Although it was error to allow the officer to remain and hear the testimony of the other witnesses, the Supreme Court applied St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), in determining that the trial error in this instance was harmless because the officer's presence did not prejudice defendant's case. St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), overruled in Faulconbridge v. St., 2006 MT 198, 333 M 186, 142 P3d 777 (2006), to the extent that a valid designated representative may not both remain in the courtroom and testify.

Character Evidence Improperly Admitted — Harmless Error: Defendant was charged with manufacture of dangerous drugs and sex crimes. The drug charge was severed, and defendant was convicted. When the sex crimes came to trial, the District Court allowed evidence of defendant's drug use. Defendant contended that the evidence was improperly admitted as bad character evidence because the state failed to meet the procedural requirements of the modified Just rule. The state asserted that the evidence was not admitted as character evidence, but rather admitted pursuant to the transaction rule because the drug use explained the circumstances surrounding the alleged sex offenses. The Supreme Court held that although the challenged evidence may have been relevant to explain the transaction, the evidence was improperly admitted in this case because the District Court had earlier determined that the charges were sufficiently distinct to warrant separate trials, so admission of drug use evidence in the sex crimes trial somewhat undermined the benefit that defendant gained from the earlier granting of the request for severance. Having defended against the drug charges in the first trial, defendant was faced with the evidence again. However, the Supreme Court then went on to apply the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine if admission of the evidence prejudiced defendant's right to a fair trial and found that the error was harmless. The evidence of drug use did not go to the proof of an element of the sex crimes, and only brief mention was made of drug use in closing arguments and then only in conjunction with other admissible evidence related to the transaction. Thus, the impact of the tainted evidence was minimal, and given other ample evidence upon which the state could develop its case, there was no reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence contributed to the conviction, which was therefore affirmed. St. v. Insua, 2004 MT 14, 319 M 254, 84 P3d 11 (2004).

Failure to Notify Defendant of State's Intent to Use Evidence of Alleged Violations at Probation Revocation Hearing Considered Due Process Violation — Harmless Error: At a hearing on the revocation of Pedersen's suspended sentence, the District Court allowed the state to introduce drug test results, even though drug use was not alleged prior to the hearing. Pedersen asserted that the failure to notify him that the drug test results would be used was a due process violation. The Supreme Court agreed. Even though a revocation hearing is not subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence, the hearing must be fundamentally fair, and minimum due process rights, including notice, extend to a revocation hearing. Thus, because Pedersen was not notified in advance, the District Court erred in admitting the drug test results. However, the error was harmless. The District Court's findings did not reference the drug test results, nor did the court rely on the results in revoking the suspended sentence, relying instead on the abundant evidence of Pedersen's violation of four other probation conditions. Therefore, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence revocation. St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003). See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299 (1987).

Jury Instruction Regarding False Exculpatory Statements Not to Be Given — Fabrication Instruction Improper but Not Prejudicial: During Nelson's trial on five felony charges, the trial court gave the jury an instruction allowing consideration of any showing of fabrication by Nelson as a circumstance tending to prove a consciousness of guilt, although not proof of guilt itself. Nelson argued that the instruction allowed improper comment on his credibility by interjecting argument into the court's instructions. The Supreme Court agreed. Citing the Ninth Circuit Model Jury Instruction Committee's recommendation, the court held that an instruction concerning false exculpatory statements should not be given, and expressly disapproved the use of such instructions in future trials. If evidence permits an adverse inference on statements by a defendant, counsel should be allowed to make arguments accordingly. General instructions on credibility of witnesses should suffice in most instances, obviating the need for more specific instructions. Here, in addition to the fabrication instruction, the trial court also provided a general jury instruction regarding the credibility of witnesses. The jury was free to reject Nelson's story and was entitled to accept all or part of the other key witnesses' testimony, so Nelson was not prejudiced by the giving of the fabrication instruction. St. v. Nelson, 2002 MT 122, 310 M 71, 48 P3d 739 (2002). See also St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929 (1999).

Improper Admission of Testimony by Highway Patrol Officer Regarding Effect of Prescription Medication on Driving Ability — Harmless Error: During Nobach's DUI trial, the District Court allowed testimony from a highway patrol officer regarding the effect of prescription medications on Nobach's driving ability, without specifically determining whether the testimony would be considered expert or lay opinion. The officer opined that Nobach's ability to drive safely was diminished as a result of the consumption of drugs. Following conviction, Nobach appealed on grounds that the testimony was an expert opinion that was improperly allowed without the requisite foundation. The state contended that the testimony was a lay opinion, and cited St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787 (1993), and St. v. Carter, 285 M 449, 948 P2d 1173 (1997), for the proposition that a lay witness may give an opinion regarding intoxication based on the witness's personal observations. The Supreme Court first distinguished Bradley and Carter because the type of intoxication in those cases involved alcohol, while in Nobach's case, the officer concluded that drugs were involved only when alcohol use was ruled out by the administration of a Breathalyzer test. The court was not convinced that lay people are sufficiently knowledgeable about common symptoms of drug consumption and its effect on driving ability to offer lay testimony on the subject based on personal observation. The officer's opinion testimony was thus considered expert testimony rather than lay testimony, requiring an adequate foundation under Rule 702, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The officer's training and experience did not provide a sufficient foundation for admitting the expert testimony, so the District Court abused its discretion in allowing it. However, because the abuse was trial error rather than structural error, the error did not warrant automatic reversal. Rather, the question was whether the finder of fact was presented with admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence and, if so, whether the tainted evidence would have contributed to the conviction qualitatively by comparison. In this case, the state provided other expert testimony from a pharmacist that tended to prove the same facts as the officer's testimony, and because the officer's testimony would not have contributed to Nobach's conviction, the error was harmless and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Nobach, 2002 MT 91, 309 M 342, 46 P3d 618 (2002).

Unredacted Reference to Expiration Date of Felony Sentences — Harmless Error: At Bauer's incest trial, the District Court barred mention by the prosecution of Bauer's two prior felony convictions, but did rule that the fact of Bauer's lengthy prior prison incarceration and status as a probationer at the time of the incest were admissible as part of the transaction. To comply with the ruling, the state redacted the portions of two travel permits that listed Bauer's actual felony offenses; however, the state failed to black out the dates that the felony sentences would expire. The trial court ordered the state to redact the sentence expiration dates as well, and offered to instruct the jury to disregard any reference to Bauer's prior felony convictions on the travel permits. Defense counsel contended that a corrective instruction would only draw more attention to the prior felonies, and moved for a mistrial instead. The motion was denied and Bauer appealed. The Supreme Court applied the two-part analysis in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001) to determine if the error prejudiced Bauer's right to a fair trial. The erroneous presentation to the jury of the unredacted dates did constitute trial error, however, it was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt and did not contribute to Bauer's conviction or prejudice his right to a fair trial. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying Bauer's motion for a mistrial. St. v. Bauer, 2002 MT 7, 308 M 99, 39 P3d 689 (2002).

Prosecutor's Comment Alleging Uncontradicted Evidence Erroneous When Defendant Who Asserted Right to Remain Silent Was Only Person Who Could Offer Contradictory Evidence — Error Harmless: Harrington was arrested for DUI, was read his Miranda rights, and chose to remain silent. Harrington contended that his due process rights and privilege against self-incrimination were violated by testimony elicited and statements made by the prosecution during trial. Although Harrington failed to preserve the issues in the District Court, the Supreme Court applied the plain error doctrine pursuant to its discretionary power enunciated in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), considering the totality of the circumstances and evaluating the nature of the constitutional rights implicated, rather than the sufficiency of the evidence. The court decided that because no comment was made that Harrington at any time refused to give a statement or refused to testify and because the prosecutor did not insinuate that an innocent person would have given a statement or testified, no Doyle error occurred (see Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976)). However, the prosecutor did comment during rebuttal that there was no evidence to contradict the state's case, which was error as an improper reference to Harrington's decision not to testify because Harrington was the only person who could have offered contradictory testimony (see St. v. Hart, 154 M 310, 462 P2d 885 (1969)). To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001). The error was considered a trial error rather than a structural error, and because the error concerned comment rather than evidence, the court went on to determine whether it was harmless and contributed to the conviction. In this case, the single comment that the evidence was uncontradicted was an isolated one, and there was no reasonable possibility that it contributed to Harrington's conviction given the fact that during closing, the prosecutor focused on the driving errors Harrington made before being stopped, the videotape of Harrington's field sobriety tests, the arresting officer's expertise, and the results of the preliminary breath test. Harrington's constitutional rights were not prejudiced by the improper reference to his decision not to testify. Columbus v. Harrington, 2001 MT 258, 307 M 215, 36 P3d 937 (2001).

Improper Admission of Rape Examination Evidence as Not Probative of Issue of Consent — Error Harmless in Light of Other Admissible Evidence on Consent: At defendant's trial for sexual assault, the District Court admitted the testimony of a nurse practitioner regarding the mechanics of completing a rape kit. Defendant maintained on appeal that the evidence was not probative of the ultimate issue of consent, and the Supreme Court agreed. The evidence was irrelevant and admitted erroneously. However, the jury was presented with enough cumulative admissible evidence on the issue of consent as to render introduction of the inadmissible rape examination evidence harmless. Qualitatively, and in comparison to the victim's testimony concerning the examination, there was no reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted evidence contributed to defendant's conviction or resulted in prejudice. St. v. Detonancour, 2001 MT 213, 306 M 389, 34 P3d 487 (2001).

Clarification of Harmless Error Analysis in Determining Whether Trial Court Error Resulted in Prejudice — Structural Error Versus Trial Error — Cumulative Evidence Test Versus Overwhelming Weight of Evidence Test: When determining whether trial court error has prejudiced a defendant, the Supreme Court has applied slightly different standards in various cases, resulting in some inconsistency and confusion over the proper test to be applied in a harmless error analysis. Over time, the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" test expressed in St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980) (affirmed in In re Petition of Brodniak v. St., 239 M 110, 779 P2d 71 (1989), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162 (1996)), eclipsed the more substantive inquiry of whether erroneously admitted evidence might have contributed to a conviction, resulting in an inclination to simply tally the quantity of the admissible evidence of guilt instead of evaluating the qualitative impact that the inadmissible evidence might have had on the finder of fact—an approach that the court found unacceptable. In order to preserve the substantial rights of the accused and the fundamental fairness of the criminal trial and to provide consistent guidance to practitioners, the Supreme Court found it appropriate to formally adopt an approach to harmless error issues that first defined the type of error in question and that second, depending on the type of error, set a uniform standard against which the error must be analyzed to determine if the error was sufficiently prejudicial to warrant reversal, completing the analysis begun in St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000). The first step is to analyze whether the claimed error is structural error or trial error. Structural error is the type that affects the framework within which the trial proceeds, such as errors in jury selection, total deprivation of the right to counsel, and lack of an impartial judge, and is automatically reversible without additional analysis or review. Trial error is the type that typically occurs during presentation of the case to a jury. It is not presumptively prejudicial and is thus subject to harmless error review pursuant to this section. Once a convicted person raises and establishes that evidence was erroneously admitted and has alleged that there is a reasonable possibility that the evidence might have contributed to a conviction, the state must demonstrate that the error was not prejudicial. To determine whether that reasonable possibility exists, the Supreme Court abandoned the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" test in McKenzie, Brodniak, and Fuhrmann in favor of the "cumulative evidence" test set out in Harrington v. Calif., 395 US 250 (1969). In making its proof under the cumulative evidence standard, the state must show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence and demonstrate that the quality of the tainted evidence was such that there was no possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. If the only evidence tending to prove an element of the crime is tainted, then reversal will be compelled. If the tainted evidence does not go to the proof of an element of the crime and there is no other evidence that proves the same facts as the tainted evidence, then the tainted evidence will be considered harmless only if there is no possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. In the present case, the trial court erred in admitting evidence related to Van Kirk's performance on a horizontal gaze nystagmus test; however, there was other admissible cumulative evidence that proved that same fact of Van Kirk's DUI as the tainted evidence, so Van Kirk's right to a fair trial was not prejudiced and the DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), followed in St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001), St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004), St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006), and St. v. Russette, 2008 MT 413, 347 M 285, 198 P3d 791 (2008). See also Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006).

DUI Test Result Improperly Admitted Without Establishing Requisite Basis for Reliability — Harmless Error: The City Court abused its discretion when it allowed horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) field test results into evidence without first establishing the requisite scientific basis for the test's reliability, as required by Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998). However, in this case, Robertson failed two other field sobriety tests, refused to perform the tests again after having already failed them, refused to submit to a Breathalyzer test, smelled of alcohol, had slurred speech, and exhibited an obvious lack of balance after getting out of his vehicle—all of which constituted other overwhelming evidence of guilt of DUI, rendering the error in allowing HGN test results harmless. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000).

Harmless Error Statute Inapplicable to Structural Errors: This section, although applicable to the review of most constitutional rights, does not apply to structural errors, such as an error in the jury selection process, because these types of errors cannot be assessed by the Supreme Court against the record for prejudicial impact. A structural error precedes the trial process and therefore cannot be quantitatively weighed against the evidence introduced at trial to determine whether the defendant was prejudiced by the error. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967). See also Dvorak v. Huntley Project Irrigation District, 196 M 167, 639 P2d 62, 38 St. Rep. 2176 (1981).

Telephone Jury-Summoning Procedure Violative of Statutory Selection Process — Showing of Substantial Compliance, Not Prejudice, Required — Reversible Error: Lamere, charged with killing Brownlee, filed a pretrial motion to strike the jury panel, but the motion was denied. The question on appeal was whether the District Court erred in concluding that Lamere failed to show that the telephone-dependent summoning procedure used in Cascade County prejudiced Lamere's substantial rights to a jury drawn and summoned according to law. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), in holding that the method of summoning jurors by telephone failed to comply with statutes governing the impaneling of a jury because jurors were neither served by mail nor served personally by the Sheriff. However, to warrant reversal, Robbins also required a showing of actual prejudice in addition to a substantial failure to comply with statutory law in drawing a jury panel. The Supreme Court chose to return to the per se rule of reversal for failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, overruling the Robbins requirement of prejudice. The decision turned on the U.S. Supreme Court's contemporary distinction between trial error, to which harmless error review applies, and structural error, to which harmless error review is inapplicable (see Johnson v. U.S., 520 US 461, 137 L Ed 2d 718, 117 S Ct 1544 (1997), and its predecessors). In Lamere's case, the automatic rule of reversal prevailed because errors in the jury selection process are structural in nature, affecting the very framework within which a trial proceeds—errors that indelibly affect the essential fairness of the trial itself. A material failure to substantially comply with Montana statutes governing procurement of a trial jury may not be treated as harmless error because: (1) it precedes the presentation of evidence to the jury and cannot be analyzed as a mere trial error without resorting to speculation; (2) it precedes the trial process and cannot be quantitatively assessed for its prejudicial impact relative to the evidence introduced at trial; (3) it affects the very framework within which the trial proceeds; and (4) the impartiality of the jury goes to the very integrity of the justice system and because the right to an impartial jury is so essential to the concept of a fair trial that its violation cannot be considered harmless error. The substantial compliance standard vindicates not only the rights of the individual defendant but also the rights of the public in ensuring that the jury system remains inviolate, protecting a defendant's right to an impartial jury by encouraging reasonably strict compliance with statutory procedures intended to implement the fair cross-section guarantee of the sixth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000), following Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), Satterwhite v. Tex., 486 US 249, 100 L Ed 2d 284, 108 S Ct 1792 (1988), and Ariz. v. Fulminante, 499 US 279, 113 L Ed 302, 111 S Ct 1246 (1991), followed in St. v. Lopez, 2001 MT 97, 305 M 218, 26 P3d 745 (2001), and applied retroactively in Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Testimonial Tape-Recorded Interview Improperly Submitted to Jury — Error Harmless Because of Cumulative Nature of Evidence: Following an automobile accident in which his girlfriend was killed, Bales was interviewed by a highway patrol officer who taped the interview, during which Bales failed the HGN test and made allegedly prejudicial statements. Over Bales' objection, the District Court admitted the tape as an exhibit that the jury could listen to during deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that because the jury had not requested the playing of the tape, 46-16-504 applied, rather than 46-16-503. The Supreme Court found that the tape had a testimonial character and, citing St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), for the common-law rule against submitting testimonial materials to the jury for unsupervised and unrestricted review during deliberations, held that the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the tape to go to the jury. However, allowing the jury to hear the tape did not unduly emphasize that testimony to the exclusion of other witnesses, nor were statements on the tape inconsistent with statements given by the witnesses at trial. Rather, the tape was merely cumulative of other evidence and did not prejudice Bales, so the error was harmless. St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), and overruling it to the extent that it is inconsistent with St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury. See also St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992), and St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993).

Improper Admission of Hearsay Regarding Rape Victim's Prior Statements — Harmless Error: Four requirements must be met before a witness may testify as to a declarant's prior testimony. It was undisputed that in Mensing's trial for rape, the first three requirements were met: (1) the victim testified at trial; (2) the victim was available for cross-examination about her prior statements; and (3) the victim's statements to which arresting officers were testifying were consistent with the victim's testimony. However, the fourth requirement, that the statements must rebut an express or implied charge of fabrication, improper influence, or motive, was not met. Mensing made none of the requisite charges against the victim, and as a result, the officers' testimony regarding the victim's testimony was inadmissible hearsay and was improperly admitted. However, the hearsay statements were separately admitted through the victim's testimony, and Mensing had an opportunity to cross-examine regarding the statements at issue. Therefore, although the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the officers' testimony regarding prior consistent statements made by the victim, the error did not prejudice Mensing and was harmless. St. v. Mensing, 1999 MT 303, 297 M 172, 991 P2d 950, 56 St. Rep. 1220 (1999), following St. v. Veis, 1998 MT 162, 289 M 450, 962 P2d 1153 (1998).

Exclusion of Witnesses Constituting Abuse of Discretion — Harmless Error: Berg's counsel failed to previously disclose witnesses by timely filing a witness list with the District Court pursuant to 46-15-323. The court imposed the harshest sanction available by excluding Berg's witnesses, and Berg contended that he was entitled to a new trial because the court erred by excluding his witnesses. Berg's failure to disclose was not willful, nor would the state have been unduly prejudiced or surprised by Berg's noncompliance because the witnesses were known to the state, being among the same witnesses that the state intended to call. Thus, the District Court abused its discretion in imposing such a harsh sanction, and a less severe sanction should have been imposed. However, the exclusion of Berg's witnesses was not so prejudicial that Berg was deprived of a fair trial. The jury was provided with the essence of the witnesses' testimony through the cross-examination of one of the state's witnesses, so the exclusion of Berg's witnesses was harmless error. St. v. Berg, 1999 MT 282, 296 M 546, 991 P2d 428, 56 St. Rep. 1138 (1999), followed in St. v. Dezeeuw, 1999 MT 331, 297 M 379, 992 P2d 1276, 56 St. Rep. 1323 (1999).

Abuse of Discretion in Admission of Testimony That, Based on Shell Casing Pattern, Shots Fired From Van — Harmless Error: The District Court abused its discretion in admitting expert testimony from a police officer regarding whether shots were fired from a van. The testimony was based on the ejection pattern of shell casings at the scene of a shooting. There was an insufficient foundation to qualify the officer as an expert because he lacked specialized knowledge that would distinguish him from a lay person in opining whether the shots came from a van. Citing this section, the Supreme Court held nevertheless that, in light of testimony from several eyewitness that the shots were indeed fired from a van, the abuse of discretion was harmless error and should be disregarded. St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999).

Irrelevant Testimony Improperly Admitted but Not Prejudicial — Conviction Affirmed: The trial court improperly admitted witness testimony that was unrelated to the crime and clearly irrelevant. However, after evaluating the testimony under the totality of the circumstances in the context of the trial record, the Supreme Court concluded that admitting the testimony did not constitute undue prejudicial error and affirmed the conviction. St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358, 55 St. Rep. 344 (1998).

Admission of Psychiatrist's Opinion of Defendant's State of Mind During Theft Not Error With Respect to Conviction for Murder: Santos appealed his murder convictions on the basis that the state's expert witness commented on his mental state during the theft committed in conjunction with the murders. He also stated that the commission comments to 46-14-213 prohibit expert testimony before a jury on the ultimate issue of the defendant's mental state or mental capacity. The Supreme Court held that the admission of testimony concerning Santos's mental state during the theft was error but was harmless error with respect to his murder convictions. The Supreme Court also held that the commission comments to 46-14-213 go beyond the scope of the statutory language, that the statute is clear on its face, and that an expert witness may give an opinion on mental state or mental capacity. St. v. Santos, 273 M 125, 902 P2d 510, 52 St. Rep. 865 (1995).

Prison Officer's Recitation of Prison Policy as Harmless Error: Defendant objected to the testimony of a prison officer who had discovered a potentially dangerous weapon in defendant's cell on grounds that the officer's statement that the object had been sharpened was speculative and that the description of the object as evidence, tagging it, and taking steps to preserve it called for a legal conclusion that the officer was not qualified to make. Admission of the speculative statement was error but was cured by the court's striking it from the record and admonishing the jury to disregard it. The officer's descriptive testimony was a mere recitation of prison policy that was not related to the controlling facts of the case and did not cast defendant or his actions in a negative light. Because no reasonable possibility existed that the improperly admitted evidence contributed to the verdict, any error was harmless. St. v. Birthmark, 253 M 526, 833 P2d 1103, 49 St. Rep. 583 (1992).

Comment on Defendant's Failure to Testify: The defendant appealed his conviction, alleging that the jury instruction provided by the prosecution commented on his refusal to testify and prejudiced his case. The Supreme Court held that even though the appeal was not timely, the court would hear it in order to preserve the substantial rights of the defendant. The court stated that the instruction would not have been prejudicial if requested by the defendant and that the third paragraph of the instruction relating to evaluating a testifying defendant's credibility should not have been given but was harmless error. St. v. Amsk, 243 M 39, 792 P2d 1109, 47 St. Rep. 1075 (1990).

Prosecutor's Remarks Improper — Evidence of Guilt Overwhelming: The prosecutor's remarks concerning defendant's delayed notice of a theory of self-defense and concerning his silence were improper and unnecessary to the case, but the evidence of defendant's guilt was so overwhelming that the improper comments can be classified as harmless error beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989).

Exhibit Offered Into Evidence by Trial Judge — Harmless Error: Although there is no provision in Montana law that permits the trial court to offer its own exhibits, the court offered a document into evidence. If this was error, it was harmless because the document had been read into evidence in full by the prosecutor. St. v. Hibbs, 239 M 308, 780 P2d 182, 46 St. Rep. 1705 (1989).

Overwhelming Evidence — Totality of Circumstances: In an earlier opinion in this criminal matter, the Supreme Court held that it was harmless error for the trial court to admit evidence of the state's expert witness concerning his belief that the rape victim was not malingering and the statistical percentages of false rape accusations. In response to defendant's argument that the court did not apply the proper harmless error test, the Supreme Court held that the analysis of the issue of an expert's comment on a witness's credibility centers on the rules of evidence, not on a constitutional analysis. The overwhelming evidence rule is one method of ascertaining whether there is a reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence contributed to the verdict. When assessing the prejudicial effect of an error, the court will examine the totality of the circumstances in which the error occurred. The overwhelming evidence in this case supports the guilty verdict. In re Petition of Brodniak v. St., 239 M 110, 779 P2d 71, 46 St. Rep. 1550 (1989), followed in St. v. Birthmark, 253 M 526, 833 P2d 1103, 49 St. Rep. 583 (1992), St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992), St. v. Williams, 262 M 530, 866 P2d 1099, 50 St. Rep. 1672 (1993), and in St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994). Bower was followed in St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000).

Unanimity Among Appellate Members — No Prerequisite to Finding of Harmless Error: Defendant argued that, as a matter of law, evidence cannot be overwhelming for purposes of a harmless error analysis if one or more members of the appellate tribunal are not convinced that it is. The Supreme Court held that unanimity among the appellate tribunal has never been a prerequisite to a finding of harmless error when using the overwhelming evidence test, even if the test is used to determine the magnitude of constitutional error. In re Petition of Brodniak v. St., 239 M 110, 779 P2d 71, 46 St. Rep. 1550 (1989).

Victim's Version of Facts Not Inherently Incredible: The victim testified that her estranged husband broke into her house and attempted to get into bed with her. She went to another room with him so he would not see her boyfriend who was in her bed. She testified that her husband assaulted and raped her after she left the bedroom. The defendant's jury conviction was affirmed on appeal, with the Supreme Court ruling that the weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses are exclusively in the province of the trier of fact and the court would uphold the verdict if there was substantial evidence to support it. St. v. Urness, 239 M 58, 778 P2d 419, 46 St. Rep. 1510 (1989).

Misrepresentation of Statute by Prosecutor — Not Prosecutorial Misconduct or Suppression of Evidence: Defendant claimed that the prosecution misrepresented the immunity statute to the court in an effort to prevent testimony by a witness, which amounted to a suppression of evidence. The Supreme Court found the prosecutor was incorrect in his interpretation, due to a statutory amendment, but that neither the court nor defense counsel was aware of the amendment either; therefore, the innocent misstatement of the law did not rise to the level of a knowing, bad faith scheme or action constituting misconduct. St. v. Dannels, 226 M 80, 734 P2d 188, 44 St. Rep. 472 (1987).

Negligent Suppression of Evidence — Harmless Error: In an appeal involving the negligent suppression of evidence, the court agreed with appellant that the state acted improperly in suppressing four taped witness statements during discovery and a possibly incriminating statement made by appellant during his arrest and in endorsing an additional witness on the first day of trial. However, the court found that the suppressed evidence was either repetitive of other testimony or minimally supportive of a self-defense theory, and that since the defense knew of the additional witness' connection with and importance in the case, it could not convincingly claim surprise at the endorsement. Therefore, all errors were held to be harmless and not grounds for reversal. St. v. Wallace, 223 M 454, 727 P2d 520, 43 St. Rep. 1908 (1986), followed, with regard to application of harmless error rule to admissibility of hearsay testimony, in St. v. Alexander, 265 M 192, 875 P2d 345, 51 St. Rep. 474 (1994).

Robbery by Person With Hand Under Coat — Testimony About Abdominal Illness: Defendant put a hand under his coat during a robbery and the store clerk testified he believed defendant had a gun. Defendant testified he was holding his hand on a place where he had severe abdominal pain. It was error to sustain the state's objection to the relevance of testimony of defendant's mother as to the nature of his illness, but the error was harmless because there was abundant testimony by defendant, his brother, and his sister on the matter of his physical condition. St. v. Lewis, 220 M 418, 715 P2d 1064, 43 St. Rep. 492 (1986).

Admission of Death Certificate With Hearsay Statement That Decedent Was Passenger — Harmless Error: In a negligent homicide case, defendant contended decedent was driving. The trial court admitted a death certificate with a statement in it that decedent was a passenger in the truck that crashed. While the death certificate was admissible to prove the victim's death, the statement about the victim being a passenger was based on hearsay and should have been excised. However, the Supreme Court held that failure to do so was harmless error in light of the testimony by other witnesses that established a substantial basis for concluding that decedent was a passenger. St. v. Gould, 216 M 455, 704 P2d 20, 42 St. Rep. 946 (1985).

Withholding of Informants' Names — Harmless Error: Defendant moved for a continuance when, with a trial date set for August 2, the informants' names were not revealed to defendant's attorney until late July 30 and the County Attorney knew defendant's attorney would be out of town on August 1. The District Court denied defendant's motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court held that although the Sheriff and police acted improperly in refusing to comply with the District Court's order to disclose the informants' names, this was harmless error in this case and was not grounds for a continuance. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the continuance because the informants could provide nothing that would refute the state's case. The Supreme Court stated that it did not condone the actions of the law enforcement agencies or the County Attorney. St. v. Warnick, 216 M 102, 699 P2d 1049, 42 St. Rep. 675 (1985).

Misleading Jury as to Effect of Acquittal of Defendant: In his closing argument in a trial on the charge of sexual intercourse without consent, the prosecutor told the jury that in order to find the defendant not guilty, the jury would have to tell the alleged victim that she was a drug pusher, slut, and liar. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected defendant's claim that the statements were so inflammatory and prejudicial that he had been denied his right to a fair trial, ruling that the prosecutor's error did not affect defendant's substantial rights. St. v. Sanderson, 214 M 437, 692 P2d 479, 42 St. Rep. 94 (1985).

Admission of Defendant's Spontaneous Remarks — Motion to Strike During Cross-Examination: Defendant was charged with and convicted of sexual intercourse without consent. During his trial, the arresting officer was asked if defendant had made any statements. Defense counsel objected on the grounds of hearsay. The court was prepared to accept the evidence under the "excited utterance" exception to the hearsay rule. The officer testified defendant said, "Which bitch did it?". No immediate objection was raised, but during cross-examination defense counsel made a motion to strike, which was denied. The prosecution made no further reference to the statement. On appeal, the Supreme Court relied on Poindexter & Orr Livestock Co. v. Oreg. Short Line Ry., 33 M 338, 83 P 886 (1905), which held that "the practice, whether in civil or criminal cases, of deliberately permitting evidence to be given without objection in the first instance, and then moving to strike it on grounds which might readily have been availed of to exclude it when offered, is not to be tolerated". The court said that even if it were to focus on the allegations of prejudice, there was no reasonable possibility that the evidence might have contributed to the conviction. St. v. Bauer, 210 M 298, 683 P2d 946, 41 St. Rep. 1066 (1984).

Judge Asking Attorney Witness if He Practiced Criminal Law — No Prejudicial Error: A witness for defendant charged with felonious issuing of a bad check testified that as defendant's attorney he told defendant not to pay the check, which the bank had returned unpaid, because the auto had a defect and defendant might have a setoff under the Uniform Commercial Code. The trial judge asked the witness-attorney if he practiced criminal law. The question was not prejudicial error. St. v. Lloyd, 208 M 195, 676 P2d 229, 41 St. Rep. 263 (1984).

Judge Calling Testimony "Self-Serving" — No Plain Error: At trial of defendant for felonious issuing of a bad check in payment for an auto, defendant sought to have one of his attorneys testify that defendant did not pay the check, which the bank had returned unpaid, because the auto had a defect and the attorney had advised defendant not to pay the check as he might have a setoff under the Uniform Commercial Code. The prosecution objected to the questioning and the court called the testimony "self-serving", but allowed it. Any error in the judge's comment need not be considered on appeal as no objection was made below. The plain error doctrine would not be invoked because any prejudice was so slight that there was no reversible error. Any technical error was rendered harmless by judge's instruction to disregard his comment. St. v. Lloyd, 208 M 195, 676 P2d 229, 41 St. Rep. 263 (1984).

Failure to Object to Judge Qualifying Ten-Year-Old Sexual Crime Victim as Witness in View of Jury — Not "Plain Error" — Mass of Damaging Evidence Precluding Any Prejudice: In the presence of the jury, the District Court Judge questioned the 10-year-old victim of a sexual crime and an aggravated assault about whether she was aware of the consequences of taking an oath and testifying. Defense counsel did not object. Although it would have been better to have conducted the questioning away from the jury and the questions should have been framed differently, any mistake did not warrant the application of the "plain error" rule of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) because the defendant was not prejudiced by the manner of qualifying the victim in light of all of the independent and highly damaging evidence against him. St. v. Smith, 208 M 66, 676 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 176 (1984).

Parole Status of Defendant — Prosecution Questions Eliciting:

On the first day of trial, the prosecutor agreed to caution his witnesses to avoid mention of defendant's parole status. The prosecutor breached his promise by twice asking one of his witnesses a question eliciting the answer that defendant was on parole. The court cautioned the jury to disregard the testimony. As a matter of law, the Supreme Court could not hold that failure to grant motion for mistrial was an abuse of discretion. Prejudice would not be presumed. Defendant failed to show that a substantial right was denied and that there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to his conviction. The evidence supporting conviction was substantial, if not overwhelming, and defendant's version of the events was simply incredible. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

If intent was a disputed issue at trial, a reviewing court could not rationally conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that an unconstitutional Sandstrom instruction was harmless error and could not have tainted a jury verdict, even if the evidence of intent was overwhelming. The appropriate inquiry is whether any reasonable juror could have given the presumption raised by the instruction persuasion-shifting or conclusive effect. [Annotator's Note: See McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981), apparently holding to the contrary.] In re Hamilton, 721 F2d 1189 (9th Cir. 1983).

Admission of Pre-Miranda Statement Not Prejudicial — Untimely Motion to Suppress: The defendant made the same damaging statements to the police before and after Miranda warnings were given. A motion to suppress the prior damaging statements was denied because of the motion's untimeliness under 46-13-301. Although the Supreme Court has the power under this section to overturn a conviction if the substantial rights of the defendant have been prejudiced, the slight cumulative effect of admitting the prior statements and the untimeliness of the motion to suppress do not warrant a consideration of the constitutionality of admission of the prior statements. St. v. Hart, 200 M 185, 650 P2d 768, 39 St. Rep. 1673 (1982).

Expert Testimony on Ultimate Issue: In a prosecution for sexual intercourse without consent, the County Attorney asked a doctor if he had formed a clinical impression of the victim. The doctor replied that it was his impression that the woman had been raped. The doctor's statement was admissible under Rule 704, Montana Rules of Evidence, since he was qualified by experience and personal observation. Further, the statement was not sufficiently prejudicial to constitute reversible error. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Prosecutorial Comment on Presumption of Intoxication: In negligent homicide trial of defendant involved in auto collision while he was driving after drinking, a forensic scientist testified that blood taken from defendant 2 hours after the accident had a .17 blood alcohol content and that at that level one's driving ability would be obviously impaired and speech, hearing, balance, judgment, reaction time, and other motor skills would be affected. The trial judge ruled that because the charge was negligent homicide he would not instruct the jury on the statutory presumption that one with a .10 blood alcohol content level is under the influence. Prosecutor twice disregarded the ruling, stating in the cross-examination of a witness and in his closing argument that .10 is the legal rate of intoxication. Prosecutor used an improper and unacceptable tactic, but defendant was not prejudiced as there was already sufficient evidence as to what a .17 blood alcohol content level meant. St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177, 39 St. Rep. 1072 (1982).

Right of Confrontation — Harmless Error: A sheriff testified as to statements made by a defendant to the sheriff that incriminated codefendants. Because the defendant did not testify at trial, the codefendants' rights of confrontation were violated. However, because there was overwhelming independent admissible evidence of the facts contained in the defendant's statements, the error was harmless. St. v. Powers, 198 M 289, 645 P2d 1357, 39 St. Rep. 989 (1982).

Sandstrom Instruction — Overwhelming Evidence of Intent: Petitioner was convicted of deliberate homicide by shooting victim four times in the head. Federal District Court found it to be a violation of due process that a Sandstrom instruction that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts" had been given at trial, and granted habeas corpus. The circuit court reversed on appeal, stating that it was inconceivable that any rational juror could have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that petitioner shot victim four times in the head without also being convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that he did so "knowingly or purposefully" (the mental element of deliberate homicide in Montana). Thus the error was harmless, for the jury would beyond a reasonable doubt have reached the same conclusion even absent the instruction. McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir 1981), reversing McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Harm to Credibility of Probationer — Alleged Error Versus Weak Alibi Testimony: Defendant's assertion that admission in probation revocation hearing of inadmissible probation violations had a detrimental impact on his credibility was pure fantasy. The record on appeal disclosed that if anything affected his credibility, it was his own testimony and that of his alibi witnesses that he was not present at the time and place of the alleged assault on his mother-in-law (one of the bases for petition for probation revocation) in the face of her positive identification of him as her assailant. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Evidence of Offenses Not Charged — Probation Revocation: Admission in evidence, in probation revocation hearing, of alleged probation violations not contained in the petition to revoke was error but did not affect defendant's substantial rights and must be disregarded where two of the alleged violations were not made a basis of revocation of probation and, although the third was, the State introduced no evidence on the matter and all evidence on it was introduced by defendant. Defendant could not predicate reversible error on testimony he himself introduced. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981). See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 181 (1987).

Police Officer — Foundation for Testimony: Defendant was charged with intimidation. He had threatened the victim, who took his license plate number and reported it to the police. At the trial an officer testified that a license check had been run and that the car was registered to the defendant. Defendant objected that no foundation had been laid to establish that the officer had personally made the license check and that the testimony was hearsay. The Supreme Court agreed, saying the State should have introduced a certified copy of the car's registration record. The Supreme Court also held that the evidence of ownership was a small part of the case against defendant and that the admission of the testimony did not affect defendant's substantial rights. The error was disregarded. St. v. Wurtz, 195 M 226, 636 P2d 246, 38 St. Rep. 1808 (1981).

Mistrial Properly Denied — Testimony Violating Order In Limine Reaching Jury by Other Means: Where, in a prosecution for burglary and forgery, the prosecution technically violated an order in limine prohibiting the prosecution from soliciting any testimony from any witness regarding statements made by one Anna Doney, the District Court did not err in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a mistrial. The testimony elicited in violation of the order in limine was also put before the jury when Anna Doney was called as a rebuttal witness for the state. Thus, the error caused by the testimony objected to was merely technical and did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Wilson, 193 M 318, 631 P2d 1273, 38 St. Rep. 1040 (1981).

Sandstrom Instruction — Permissive Inference or Conclusive Presumption: A "Sandstrom-type" instruction was given at petitioner's trial, which resulted in his conviction on seven counts of armed robbery and one count of assault. No objection to the instruction was made at the trial, but the Supreme Court reviewed the instruction under the "plain error" rule [however, see 1983 amendment changing the law]. Petitioner contended that the instruction either shifts the burden of proof on the issue of intent from the State to the defendant or constitutes a presumption against the defendant, either of which is constitutionally impermissible under Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979). The instruction given was a permissive inference and not a conclusive presumption. The questioned instruction was not a "naked" presumption as in Sandstrom; the instructions as a whole made it abundantly clear that the State bears the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt every essential element of the crimes of which defendant was charged. The court found that the error, if any, was harmless. Parker v. Crist, 190 M 376, 621 P2d 484, 37 St. Rep. 2048 (1980).

Errors in Jury Instructions on Accomplice Testimony, Oral Admissions, and Intent Minimized by Other Instructions and Nature of Evidence: Appealing his conviction for theft, a defendant alleged errors in the trial court's jury instructions. Error was claimed in the rejection of cautionary instructions regarding accomplice testimony and oral admissions. The reviewing court agreed that the cautionary instructions should have been given but disagreed with the contention that the error was reversible. They noted that the instructions were elaborate and misleading and lacked the simple language of 26-1-303(4). The error was minimized by other instructions. The defendant also alleged error in the giving of the Sandstrom instruction on intent. The reviewing court found the instruction harmless here because the evidence of intent was overwhelming and the essential issue of the case was the identity of the gunman, not his intent. St. v. Dolan, 190 M 195, 620 P2d 355, 37 St. Rep. 1860 (1980).

Admission of Statements by Defendant: The Supreme Court found no substantial prejudicial effect on the defendant arising from the introduction of statements made by the defendant and admitted by the trial court as a verbal act exception. St. v. McGuinn, 177 M 215, 581 P2d 417 (1978).

Denial of Discovery: A motion to discover papers went unruled upon, and no objection was made. Therefore, the substantial rights of the defendant were not violated, and a conviction will not be overturned due to harmless error. St. v. Armstrong, 172 M 296, 562 P2d 1129 (1977).

Hearsay: When the defendant voluntarily testified and admitted he had fired shots at the victim, the admission of testimony by a witness that someone said "Grady did it" was harmless error. St. v. Grady, 166 M 168, 531 P2d 681 (1975).

Comments on Defendant's Past Record:

Remarks of the prosecutor referring to the defendant's association with the drug culture, although offensive, were reasonably founded on the testimony and evidence, and such remarks did not deny the defendant a fair trial. St. v. Flamm, 165 M 128, 526 P2d 119 (1974).

A statement by prosecuting attorney in closing argument that the perpetrators of the crime were "thick as thieves" was not construed as a comment on the past record of the defendant but merely as an argument that the defendant was guilty of the robbery with which he was charged in that prosecution and did not affect any substantial right of the defendant. St. v. Romero, 161 M 333, 505 P2d 1207 (1973).

Remarks About Request for Counsel: The testimony of the police officer that the defendant did not want to talk to the police but asked to call his lawyer, although irrelevant and improper, was harmless error when the State presented overwhelming evidence of guilt and the defendant himself testified at trial. St. v. Flamm, 165 M 128, 526 P2d 119 (1974).

Remark in the Presence of Jurors: A statement of opinion made in the presence of other jurors by a prospective juror who was never seated that she was convinced that the defendants were guilty was not a sufficient showing of prejudice to require a new trial. St. v. Rhodes, 164 M 455, 524 P2d 1095 (1974).

Invitation to Juror to Participate in Experiment: The prosecuting attorney's invitation to a juror to participate in an experiment not supported by the evidence was harmless error because the juror did not participate and the trial court immediately sustained the defendant's objection. St. v. Thompson, 164 M 415, 524 P2d 1115 (1974).

Inaccurate Instructions: Instructing the jury on assault by willfully inflicting grievous bodily harm when the defendant had been charged with assault with intent to prevent or resist his lawful detention or apprehension was harmless error because the evidence conclusively demonstrated the defendant's guilt of the offense charged. St. v. Jones, 161 M 117, 505 P2d 97 (1973).

Witness' Remarks: When the trial court on the defendant's motion directed the state's witnesses not to reveal the victim's pregnancy, the fact that one witness mentioned the pregnancy to the jury did not provide a basis for a mistrial since no substantial right was affected. St. v. Bentley, 155 M 383, 472 P2d 864 (1970).

Improper Questions by Prosecution: In a prosecution under former law for first degree assault, questions posed by the prosecution relating to potential criminal bribery, if error, were technical errors that did not provide a basis for a reversal in view of the facts that the questions posed were not evidence, they were answered in the negative, and the trial court had instructed the jury not to consider the remarks of counsel. St. v. Gallagher, 151 M 501, 445 P2d 45 (1968).

Anonymous Witnesses on Indictment: Under former law, if a person went to trial under an indictment on which the witnesses' names were designated as Richard Roe and John Doe and was convicted, the Supreme Court was required to sustain the conviction if possible and the burden was on the defendant to show prejudice. State ex rel. Porter v. District Court, 124 M 249, 220 P2d 1035 (1950).

Erroneous Instruction: Erroneous instructions are not cause for reversal in the absence of any prejudice. St. v. Hay, 120 M 573, 194 P2d 232 (1948).

Instructions to Jury: On an appeal from a judgment of conviction for forgery, while it was error to advise the jury, in an instruction as to the purpose for which testimony of other like acts had been admitted, that testimony had been admitted relating to certain "forgeries", since whether or not a forgery had been committed was the fact to be determined by the jury, in view of other portions of the charge carefully safeguarding the rights of the defendant, the inadvertent use of the term "forgeries" could not have worked to his prejudice. St. v. Daems, 97 M 486, 37 P2d 322 (1934).

Refusal to Strike Testimony: In a prosecution for the larceny of two calves, the refusal of the trial court to strike the testimony of a cattleman that two cows, the condition of the bags of which indicated that they had lost their calves but a short time theretofore, were acting as though they were looking for them, was held not reversible error under the circumstances, among them that the defendant killed the calves after being charged with their theft and thus blocked the test proposed by the stock inspector to get the cows and see whether they would claim the calves. St. v. Grimsley, 96 M 327, 30 P2d 85 (1934).

Challenge to Juror: In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, a juror answered voir dire questions propounded by the State by admitting that he was a close friend of the defendant but could try him as if he were a stranger but that he would like to be excused. He then stated that he would not convict the defendant even if he believed him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Thereafter, however, on examination by the defendant's counsel, he again asserted that he would vote for conviction regardless of his friendship for the defendant if proper under the law and the evidence. The court's ruling excusing the juror may not be held reversible error even though it be conceded that technical error was committed in sustaining the challenge on an improper ground. St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931).

Improper Admission of Judgment Roll: While the trial court erred in permitting the State in a perjury trial to introduce the judgment roll in the cause in which the alleged false testimony was given, containing papers not properly part thereof under statute, the procedure amounted to a mere irregularity which could not in any manner have prejudiced the defendant. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930).

Leading Questions: Alleged error in overruling objections to several questions claimed to have been leading but which were of no special importance and merely explanatory in character was not grounds for a new trial. St. v. Wong Fong, 75 M 81, 241 P 1072 (1925).

Judge's Remarks: A remark of the trial judge in passing upon an objection to a question asked a witness for the defense in a criminal cause to the effect: "I don't think that is very material; let him answer", while improper, was a technical error and nonprejudicial when considered in connection with the particular circumstances. St. v. Sedlacek, 74 M 201, 239 P 1002 (1925); St. v. Cassill, 71 M 274, 229 P 716 (1924).

Introduction in Evidence of Rape Victim's Clothing: In a prosecution for attempted rape, the introduction in evidence of the clothing worn by the prosecuting witness, though immaterial, was not reversible error when there was no evidence that the articles were muddy, torn, and bloodstained, as claimed, and thus likely to inflame the minds of the jurors and when the original exhibits were not certified to the Supreme Court for inspection. Prejudice cannot be presumed but must be made to appear affirmatively. Lindeberg v. Howe, 67 M 195, 215 P 230 (1923); St. v. Prouty, 60 M 310, 199 P 281 (1921).

Admission of Evidence: An erroneous ruling of the court in admitting evidence which could not affect the substantial rights of the parties must be disregarded. Church v. Zywert, 58 M 102, 190 P 291 (1920).

Technical Error — Defective Information: The Supreme Court will not reverse a judgment of conviction on account of technical errors or defects in the information when the defendant was fully advised of the nature of the charge against him to enable him to prepare to meet that charge and his substantial rights were not affected by the defect. St. v. Wehr, 57 M 469, 188 P 930 (1920).

Unresponsive Answer of Witness: Though refusal to strike out an unresponsive answer in which the witness volunteers a statement of facts from which the complaining party has probably suffered prejudice will result in a reversal of the judgment, such refusal is harmless error when the objectionable statement was volunteered on cross-examination after having been twice before made on his direct examination. St. v. Jones, 48 M 505, 139 P 441 (1914).

Prejudice to Substantial Right: A judgment of conviction will not be reversed for error in the trial proceedings unless it has prejudiced or tended to prejudice the defendant in respect to a substantial right. St. v. Rhys, 40 M 131, 105 P 494 (1909).

Presence of Jurors When Verdict Delivered: When the record did not show that the jurors were not all present when the verdict was delivered and from the minutes no other fair inference could be drawn than that they were actually present at the time, the omission from the minutes of a statement that their names were called prior to delivery of the verdict was not an error that prejudiced the defendant in his substantial rights. St. v. De Lea, 36 M 531, 93 P 814 (1908).

Information Defective in Form With Immaterial Averments: An information charging an attempt to obtain money by false pretenses, though defective in form and containing immaterial averments, is sufficient to sustain a conviction when it is apparent that the defendant has suffered no prejudice. St. v. Phillips, 36 M 112, 92 P 299 (1907).

Technical Error: A judgment will not be reversed for a purely technical error in giving an instruction. St. v. Tracey, 35 M 552, 90 P 791 (1907).

This section is designed to reduce the number of appeals, retrials, and delays in each case by giving the Supreme Court the power to do complete justice in every case. It will also aid in reducing expense and the massive compilation of records which results in numerous appeals of the same case.

Subsections (1), (2) and (5) are part of our present code.

Subsections (3) and (4) broaden the power of the Supreme Court so that it may more effectively give a complete answer to the parties before it.

Case Notes

Exclusion of Defendant From Pretrial Meeting to Determine Whether Defendant Be Allowed to Proceed Pro Se Violative of Right to Be Present and Defend Oneself — Reversible Error: An alleged violation of the constitutional right to be present and appear at all criminal proceedings does not warrant automatic reversal. Rather, the Supreme Court considers the effect that a violation has on a defendant to determine whether a defendant has suffered any conceivable prejudice. In this case, Mann was excluded from a pretrial meeting to determine whether Mann would be represented by counsel or proceed pro se at trial on burglary and misdemeanor assault charges. This important determination implicated a substantial issue in the scope of the criminal proceedings, and excluding Mann from the meeting, at which Mann's counsel portrayed Mann in a negative light, violated Mann's right to be present and defend himself and right to effective assistance of counsel. Violation of these fundamental constitutional rights was sufficiently prejudicial to constitute reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Mann, 2006 MT 160, 332 M 476, 139 P3d 159 (2006).

Supreme Court Reduction of Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent to Sexual Assault — Relevance of Testimony of Victims Regarding Belief That Massage Therapist's Actions Were Criminal: Stevens was convicted of two counts of sexual intercourse without consent after having sexual contact with two female patients at his massage clinic. The Supreme Court determined that there was insufficient proof that the offenses were committed without consent and, without addressing whether sexual assault was a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent, reduced the offenses to sexual assault. Even though Stevens was not specifically charged with sexual assault, there was no question that he was reasonably apprised of the sexual assault charges against him. Stevens offered a jury instruction, which was given without objection, stating that sexual intercourse without consent necessarily included the offense of sexual assault. Evidence clearly showed that Stevens had sexual contact with the victims, and testimony from the victims regarding whether they considered sexual contact by a massage professional to be criminal was relevant and admissible, tending to make the existence of a material element of the crime, namely whether the crime was committed without consent, more likely than without the evidence. St. v. Stevens, 2002 MT 181, 311 M 52, 53 P3d 356 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Black, 270 M 329, 891 P2d 1162 (1995).

Modification of Conviction From Sexual Intercourse Without Consent to Sexual Assault: Defendant was convicted under 45-5-503 of sexual intercourse without consent. On appeal, he claimed that penetration had not been proved at trial. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed the conviction. The victim had testified indirectly on the issue, but her testimony was ambiguous, and she was not asked to explain her statements. The Supreme Court stated that the fact that this is a delicate subject does not eliminate the requirement that the state prove each element of its case beyond a reasonable doubt. The court further ruled that it would be a violation of the constitutional protection against double jeopardy to remand for a new trial. The state had its opportunity to prove its case and failed to do so. Under its authority set forth in 46-20-703 to reduce the offense of which a defendant has been convicted to a lesser included offense because the record contains evidence establishing all of the elements of sexual assault, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for entry of judgment finding the defendant guilty of the crime of sexual assault. St. v. Lundblade, 221 M 185, 717 P2d 575, 43 St. Rep. 732 (1986).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), and St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Robbery With Gun Apparently Under Coat — Sentence of Thirty Years Permissible: Defendant claimed that his 30-year sentence for robbery of a convenience store was disproportionate to the facts (which included a finding that he had his hand under his coat and the store clerk believed he had a gun). The sentence was within the permissible statutory range, there was no clear abuse of discretion, and the sentence was properly reviewable in the Sentence Review Division, not the Supreme Court. St. v. Lewis, 220 M 418, 715 P2d 1064, 43 St. Rep. 492 (1986), following St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

New Trial Denied — Alleged Perjury Unproven — Testimony on Count of Which Defendant Acquitted: Appellant contended that certain testimony was blatant perjury. Perjury could not be discerned from the face of the testimony, and appellant offered no other evidence to support his claim. Furthermore, the testimony was on a count of which appellant was found not guilty and was immaterial to the two counts of which he was found guilty. A new trial requested on the ground of the testimony was properly denied. St. v. Harris, 210 M 382, 682 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 1107 (1984).

Pro Se Appeal Filed Without Briefs — General Review on Court's Own Motion: Where the defendant made the defense of his deliberate homicide case difficult by failing to cooperate with his several attorneys, and after conviction was granted several extensions by the Supreme Court for filing a transcript and his first brief, but nevertheless failed to file a brief and specifications of error, the Supreme Court on its own motion reviewed the District Court transcript for typical kinds of errors and found: (1) that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction as the defendant was convicted on the basis of his own testimony; (2) that there were no errors in the jury instructions given on the evidence and the elements of the crime; (3) that assistance of counsel was adequate and that the failure of defendant's counsel to subpoena evidence or witnesses was not relevant to the crime charged; and (4) that the statutory penalties for deliberate homicide with a dangerous weapon did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Graham, 206 M 49, 669 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 1499 (1983).

Double Jeopardy — Remand Order Not Required to Specify New Trial: A defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting another in witness tampering and aggravated assault. The conviction was reversed, and the defendant was rearraigned on the original charges. The defendant was convicted of lesser included offenses. On appeal, the defendant alleged double jeopardy. He argued that the failure to order specifically and expressly a new trial precluded further action. A remand order need not order a new trial for one to occur. The remand order in this case was supported by the opinion of the Supreme Court, which stated that in ordering dismissal the court did not mean to preclude a refiling of charges. On review, the Supreme Court said it was clear its intention was to leave the door open to retrial, and accordingly a new trial was granted. Therefore, the defendant's double jeopardy rights were not violated by his second trial. St. v. Cardwell, 191 M 539, 625 P2d 553, 38 St. Rep. 451 (1981).

Duty of District Court on Remand: In 1971 Olson was acquitted by reason of insanity of two counts of rape. He was committed to the state hospital but walked away from the hospital shortly after his arrival. In 1977 Olson was arrested and returned to the state hospital. He petitioned for his discharge, and the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court with instructions to make specific findings. On remand, the District Court set aside the 1971 acquittal on the basis that it was procured by Olson's fraud upon the court. Olson appealed this decision, and the Supreme Court found that the District Court cannot vacate an earlier District Court judgment and further instructed the District Court to determine Olson's present dangerousness as directed in the Supreme Court's original opinion. St. v. District Court, 184 M 346, 602 P2d 1002 (1979).

Reduction of Sentence: The sentence of a defendant who pleaded guilty to grand larceny to 4 years in the state prison was reduced to 1 year by the Supreme Court when the trial court passed sentence upon receipt of private reports without allowing the defendant or his counsel to learn of the representations in the reports and have a hearing to present evidence to refute such representations. Kuhl v. District Court, 139 M 536, 366 P2d 347 (1961).

Degree Presumed Correct:

Under former law, when the judgment was silent as to the degree of burglary of which the defendant was convicted and the sentence imposed was such as might be imposed for first degree burglary only, the Supreme Court would presume, when no appeal was taken, that the trial court ascertained that the defendant was guilty of burglary in the first degree. State ex rel. Williams v. Henry, 119 M 271, 174 P2d 220 (1946).

Under former law, in the absence of testimony it was presumed on appeal that the trial court in a burglary case had evidence before it justifying a finding that, if guilty at all, the defendant was guilty of an attempt to commit burglary in the nighttime, which constituted the first degree of the offense, and that the punishment inflicted was proper. St. v. Mish, 36 M 168, 92 P 459 (1907).

Lack of Agreement as to Grounds for Retrial: When on appeal in a homicide case three of the Justices of the Supreme Court, a majority, are of the opinion that the trial court committed error resulting in the denial of a fair trial to the defendant but are unable to agree as to any one of the grounds urged by him in his assignment of errors being sufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment, a retrial will be ordered. Under such circumstances it is immaterial that the majority do not agree as to any particular error set forth in his assignment of errors—a mere procedural requirement—the real question being whether or not the defendant had a fair trial. St. v. Le Duc, 89 M 545, 300 P 919 (1931).

Reduction of Degree of Offense: Under former law, the Supreme Court had the power to reduce a verdict of murder in the first degree to make it fit the crime established by the evidence, murder in the second degree. St. v. Gunn, 89 M 453, 300 P 212 (1931).

Review of Ruling on Motion for New Trial: Upon an appeal from an order granting or denying a motion for a new trial, the Supreme Court sits as a court of error and review, not as a court of original jurisdiction or as an appellate court that is clothed with authority to try the motion de novo. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

Modification of Judgment — Costs of Prosecution: A judgment of conviction for a crime that erroneously included payment by the defendant of the costs of prosecution is not on that account void as a whole, but it may be modified by striking therefrom the provision as to costs and, as so modified, be allowed to stand. St. v. Stone, 40 M 88, 105 P 89 (1909).

Case Notes

Remand or Order to Lift Stay Unnecessary Upon Affirmation by Appellate Court — Supreme Court Jurisdiction of Municipal Court Appeal Affirmed but Remanded by District Court: A Municipal Court sentenced Costa for misdemeanor traffic offenses, then stayed imposition of sentence pending Costa's appeal to District Court. The District Court affirmed judgment and remanded to the Municipal Court for imposition of sentence. The question then arose as to whether the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to address the District Court's decision. The Supreme Court noted that the definition of remand is to send something back for further action; however, the Legislature did not intend to require an appellate court to formally remand in cases involving affirmed criminal judgments. In addition, it is unnecessary for an appellate court to direct that a stay pending appeal be lifted once a defendant has exhausted the right to appeal and the underlying judgment and sentence have been affirmed. Therefore, the District Court's remand was premature, unnecessary, and of no immediate consequence and had no effect on the Municipal Court's final judgment and sentence. The Municipal Court stayed Costa's sentence pending appeal, which presumably encompassed an appeal to the Supreme Court, so because the District Court's remand was unnecessary, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction over Costa's appeal. Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006).

Mandate on Remand Binding: When the Supreme Court reversed the conviction of the defendant and remanded the case to the District Court with directions that, if the defendant had a new trial, the District Court should first make inquiry into the defendant's insanity but, if the prosecution was dismissed, the District Court should deliver the defendant to the court of another county which had continuing jurisdiction over the defendant so that the latter court could inquire into his mental condition and make such disposition of the defendant as is required by law, and thereafter the prosecution was dismissed, the trial court then was compelled to deliver the defendant to the other District Court and the County Attorney could not file a new information. The trial court was bound to follow the mandate of the Supreme Court as found in the remittitur and mandamus will lie to require that the District Court follow such mandate. State ex rel. Kitchens v. District Court, 130 M 57, 294 P2d 907 (1956). (Dissenting opinion, 130 M 57, 294 P2d 907 (1956).)

Supreme Court's Loss of Jurisdiction: When the Supreme Court reversed a conviction and the remittitur went down in due course and was filed with the lower court, the Supreme Court at that time lost jurisdiction in the case. Specifically it lost any jurisdiction it may have had theretofore to alter in any particular either the opinion or the mandate which followed upon that opinion, certainly unless the remittitur was first recalled. State ex rel. Kitchens v. District Court, 130 M 57, 294 P2d 907 (1956).

Dismissal of Amended Information — Retrial Under Original Information: A defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting another in witness tampering and aggravated assault. The conviction was reversed. The defendant was rearraigned on the original charges and convicted of lesser included offenses. The defendant alleged the filing of an amended information left the original information of no effect. He argued that when the amended information was dismissed there was no information then existing and that he was thereafter illegally detained. The Supreme Court disagreed, saying then when an unauthorized or otherwise improper amended information is quashed or dismissed, further proceedings may be had on the original information. St. v. Cardwell, 191 M 539, 625 P2d 553, 38 St. Rep. 451 (1981), following St. v. Thompson, 392 S. W. 2d 617 (Mo. 1965).

CHAPTER 21
POSTCONVICTION HEARING

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes

No Evidence of Prejudicial State Involvement in Parole Proceedings — Postconviction Petition Properly Denied: As part of a plea agreement, the state agreed to not involve itself in Maldonado's parole proceedings. Maldonado contended that the state breached the plea agreement when the County Attorney sent a letter to the Board of Pardons and Parole recommending against Maldonado's parole. The District Court concluded that the state's action was harmless, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed. Although the Board did receive the County Attorney's letter and one Board member met with a Deputy County Attorney, the state withdrew the letter of opposition, and the Board member who met with the Deputy County Attorney recused herself. Maldonado failed to present any evidence that the state's actions figured into the decision of the Board of Pardons and Parole or that Maldonado was prejudiced in any way, and the District Court did not err in denying Maldonado's request for postconviction relief on this issue. Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Alleging Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Filed in District Court — Immunity of Attorney Assisting in Proceedings — Gillham Clarified: At the time of the decision in In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100 (1985), petitions for postconviction relief were addressed to the Supreme Court. Because the postconviction procedure has changed, pursuant to 46-21-105, petitions for postconviction relief are now initially filed in District Court. Thus, the Supreme Court clarified that petitions for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel may now be filed in the District Court where the postconviction proceeding is pending. The court affirmed that an attorney ordered to respond to a Gillham order issued by a District Court is not subject to a disciplinary proceeding before the Commission on Practice or subject to charges of malpractice. The immunity extends to all information, testimony, or documents necessarily provided in response to the allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007).

Boot Camp Confessions — No Classic Penalty Situation Compelling Self-Incriminating Statements: Woods volunteered for boot camp. A qualification for successful completion of the camp was full disclosure of past crimes in order to receive a sentence reduction. Unsuccessful completion of boot camp required a return to prison. In an anger management class at boot camp and later to several other persons, Woods made self-incriminating statements regarding a prior double homicide, and Woods was subsequently arrested based on the statements. Woods asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney failed to raise the classic penalty situation to explain that use of his statements were violative of his right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court noted that the classic penalty situation did not apply because Woods volunteered for boot camp and volunteered the statements. However, the statements were uncoerced, so the information upon which the state relied for its homicide investigation was not compelled by any threat of penalty from the state, and because no classic penalty situation existed, Woods could not argue ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to argue that it did. Woods did not invoke self-incrimination protection at boot camp, and the privilege against self-incrimination could not be considered self-executing. Thus, Woods's petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. St. v. Woods, 2005 MT 186, 328 M 54, 117 P3d 152 (2005), following St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), and distinguishing Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Counsel's Act or Omission Not Considered Trial Strategy Reviewable on Direct Appeal: Lucero contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not adequately explain the nature and terms of the state's plea bargain offer. Applying the Strickland test for ineffective assistance claims, the Supreme Court noted that before an ineffective assistance claim will be considered on direct appeal, the record must adequately document the reason why counsel acted in a particular manner, and if the record does not supply the reason, the claim is more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief. However, the claimed act or omission in this case was not considered trial strategy because counsel's communication of the oral plea offer to Lucero was obligatory, not strategic. Thus, the question was not why counsel acted in a particular manner but whether counsel acted and, if so, whether counsel acted adequately, and review of an obligatory action may be reviewed on direct appeal. Lucero was fully informed of the offer and chose to go to trial anyway. Counsel's conduct in communicating the plea offer did not fall below the standard of reasonable representation,. Lucero's claim failed to meet the first prong of the Strickland test and was properly denied. St. v. Lucero, 2004 MT 248, 323 M 42, 97 P3d 1106 (2004). See also Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997), St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), and St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003).

Admission by Counsel That Defendant Resisted Arrest When Defendant Charged With Assaulting Peace Officer — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Audet was charged with assaulting a peace officer and resisting arrest. At the time of trial, Audet told the court that he wished to plead guilty to the resisting arrest charge but to go to trial on the assault charge, even though his attorney had advised otherwise. The court entered not guilty pleas for both counts. Counsel informed the jury in opening and closing statements that Audet was not contesting the resisting arrest charge, but lacked the purposeful and knowing elements required to commit officer assault. The prosecutor then convinced the jury that Audet had essentially conceded the mental state by conceding guilt for resisting arrest, and Audet was convicted on both counts. On appeal, Audet contended that counsel's conduct constituted ineffective assistance, warranting reversal. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test and dismissed the claim. The record did not reveal why counsel chose to concede the resisting arrest charge to the jury, so the court was unable to determine whether the decision constituted an unreasonable defense strategy that would overcome the presumption that counsel's actions fell within the range of reasonable professional conduct. Pursuant to St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), Audet's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice to the ineffective assistance issue being raised in a postconviction relief proceeding. St. v. Audet, 2004 MT 224, 322 M 415, 96 P3d 1144 (2004). See also St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003).

Appointed Counsel — No Ineffective Assistance of in Postconviction Relief Proceedings: Kallowat contended that he received ineffective assistance from his appointed counsel who failed to represent him in postconviction relief proceedings and to follow Kallowat's instruction to file an appeal in federal court. The Supreme Court disagreed. Kallowat was appointed two different attorneys, one of whom withdrew because of an excessive workload, and another who withdrew citing no discernible basis entitling Kallowat to relief, so Kallowat was allowed to proceed pro se. There was no error in allowing counsel to withdraw. Further, attorneys in criminal cases are required to represent a client only until final judgment is rendered, including appeals to the Montana Supreme Court, so counsel was not required to represent Kallowat in appealing to the federal courts. Thus, Kallowat's argument that he did not receive effective assistance of counsel failed. Kallowat v. St., 2004 MT 152, 321 M 501, 92 P3d 1176 (2004).

Actual Innocence Standard Applied to Postconviction Claim Based on Incomplete DNA Results at Trial — Burden of Postconviction Statute of Limitations Met: Pope's petition for postconviction relief was denied by the District Court as barred by the 5-year statute of limitations in the 1993 version of 46-21-102 (now 1 year) and because the issues were not raised on direct appeal. The court concluded that the jurisdictional bar could be overcome only by a clear miscarriage of justice and that the exception did not apply unless Pope did not commit the offense. The court relied on an inadmissible confession that Pope committed the crime, reasoning that even if the confession was not admissible at trial, it could be considered in a postconviction proceeding because it refuted Pope's claim of innocence. Pope contended that the exception applied because newly available DNA evidence tended to show that he did not commit the crime. The Supreme Court reversed. Based on Murray v. Carrier, 477 US 478 (1986), a petitioner must demonstrate that a constitutional violation at trial has probably resulted in conviction of an individual who is actually innocent and the claim must be supported by new evidence that indicates that the individual is innocent. Montana case law provides that the miscarriage of justice must be so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity and that the exception does not apply unless the defendant did not commit the crime from which relief is sought. Further, under Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), actual innocence requires that no reasonable, properly instructed juror would have found the defendant guilty. Schlup also allows review only of the record and new evidence to determine what a reasonable juror would find, so the District Court improperly relied on the failed plea confession to determine that Pope was not actually innocent. Pope correctly pointed out that the use of "and/or" language in the jury instructions made it impossible to determine whether Pope was convicted of raping one or two women. Thus, Pope satisfied the Schlup actual innocence burden in light of the complete DNA report, and when coupled with the error of using "and/or" language in the alternative charge, the jury instructions, and the verdict, waiver of the time bar in 46-21-102 was required by the clear miscarriage of justice, warranting reversal. St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003).

Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Voir Dire Dismissed on Direct Appeal — Chastain Overruled: Following a felony DUI conviction, Herrman appealed, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire. Counsel failed to remove several jurors for cause, but later removed the jurors by peremptory challenge, effectively causing the loss of peremptory challenges to which Herrman was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that jury impartiality goes to the very integrity of the justice system and that the presence of even one juror who cannot fairly assess the credibility of witnesses must be presumed prejudicial and result in reversal. Herrman cited St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57 (1997), for the proposition that ineffective assistance occurred because counsel failed to develop information in the record demonstrating an individual juror's bias and to exercise challenges for cause against those jurors expressing bias. However, the Supreme Court overruled Chastain because it was a mistake to determine that counsel was ineffective during voir dire based on the lack of a reason apparent on the record. Although lawyers will state their reasons on the record for challenging a juror for cause, they do not state their reasons for not challenging a juror. Herrman's lawyer might have had tactical reasons for not challenging certain jurors for cause, but those reasons were not on the record, so the Supreme Court could not address Herrman's ineffective assistance claims without considering matters outside the record. Contentions based on matters outside the record are more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief. Thus, Herrman's direct appeal was dismissed to allow a petition for postconviction relief that could address why counsel did not challenge certain jurors for cause. St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), followed in St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003), and, with regard to lack of a record regarding defense counsel's trial tactics as necessitating a postconviction hearing in lieu of direct appeal, in St. v. Henderson, 2003 MT 285, 318 M 31, 78 P3d 848 (2003). Herrman was also followed in St. v. Olsen, 2004 MT 158, 322 M 1, 92 P3d 1204 (2004). See also St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001), and St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief.

The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), distinguishing Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997), and Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

"Motion to Vacate Conviction" Construed as Motion for Postconviction Relief and Not Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Attorney Conflict of Interests — Petition Previously Denied: Howard filed a motion for postconviction relief in 1993, asserting that his attorney in his 1981 trial for felony theft had a conflict of interests because the attorney also represented a codefendant. The Supreme Court denied his petition as time-barred under 46-21-102. Howard then filed with the District Court a "Motion to Vacate Conviction", which the District Court construed as another petition for postconviction relief and also denied as time-barred. The Supreme Court held that it was proper for the District Court to construe the "Motion to Vacate Conviction" as another motion for postconviction relief. Despite Howard's argument that his motion did not meet the formal prerequisites for a motion for postconviction relief and that motions to withdraw a guilty plea are allowed after judgment by virtue of 46-16-105, the Supreme Court held: (1) that it had not always strictly enforced the requirements for a motion for postconviction relief, especially for persons appearing pro se; (2) that the content of Howard's motion was of the type usually made in motions for postconviction relief; and (3) that although other means of review of a sentence other than postconviction relief may sometimes be necessary because of exigent circumstances, the circumstances of Howard's situation, in which he waited over 10 years to challenge his conviction the first time, did not demonstrate those exigent circumstances. The Supreme Court held that this petition, like Howard's first petition for postconviction relief, was time-barred by 46-21-101. St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

Denial of Appeal Allowed When Right to Postconviction Relief Exercised — No Due Process Violation Found: Finney argued on appeal that he had been denied his right to effective assistance of counsel. Citing Evitts v. Lucey, 469 US 387 (1985), the Supreme Court held that when, as in this case, a criminal defendant was afforded a remedy in postconviction proceedings that have already been reviewed under a different part of the Supreme Court's opinion, there is no violation of the defendant's due process rights in denial of appeal. St. v. Finney, 281 M 58, 931 P2d 1300, 54 St. Rep. 58 (1997), distinguished in Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Failure to Give Mandatory Accomplice Jury Instruction — Harmless Error — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In petitioner's trial on the charge of attempted deliberate homicide, his lawyer withdrew a previous request, in a jury instruction mandated by 26-1-303, that testimony of an accomplice must be viewed with distrust. Petitioner's theory of defense was that his alleged accomplices had fabricated their testimony. The judge did instruct the jury that testimony of accomplices must be corroborated. In a proceeding for postconviction relief, the Supreme Court ruled that the court's failure to give the mandatory instruction was harmless error and that the withdrawal by petitioner's lawyer of the request for the mandatory instruction was not ineffective assistance of counsel under Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984). In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100, 42 St. Rep. 1508 (1985).

Action for Postconviction Relief Exclusive Means of Establishing District Court Jurisdiction to Modify Sentence: Once a valid sentence has been pronounced by a District Court, that court lacks jurisdiction to modify the sentence upon postjudgment motion by the defendant. The District Court can only modify the sentence if the defendant files a motion for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21. To reduce duplication of effort, the Supreme Court considered defendant's postjudgment motion to be a motion for postconviction relief. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985), followed in St. v. George, 224 M 495, 730 P2d 412, 43 St. Rep. 2363 (1986), In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988), and in St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151, 50 St. Rep. 1135 (1993).

Motion Filed After Notice of Appeal — Treated as Petition for Postconviction Relief: A motion to withdraw a guilty plea that was filed after a notice of appeal had been filed was treated as a petition for postconviction relief under this chapter because the notice of appeal had removed jurisdiction from the District Court. St. v. Laverdure, 212 M 31, 685 P2d 375, 41 St. Rep. 1570 (1984).

State Immune From Suit for Illegal Imprisonment When Imprisonment Later Declared Contrary to Statute: In 1979, petitioner was convicted of issuing a bad check. Her sentence was deferred, and she was placed on probation for 3 years. In 1982, petitioner's deferral was revoked because she was convicted of another crime. As a result of the revocation, she was sentenced to serve 5 years in prison. Later in 1982, the Supreme Court, relying on its interpretation of 53-30-105 (as it read prior to its amendment in 1981) (now repealed) in Crist v. Segna, 191 M 210, 622 P2d 1028, 38 St. Rep. 150 (1981), ordered petitioner's release because at the time of her imprisonment she had accumulated sufficient good time credit on probation that her deferred sentence would have been fully served. Petitioner then sued for damages for illegal imprisonment. The Supreme Court held that the State was immune from suit under 2-9-112 because the sentence imposed on petitioner for her violation of probation was a judicial act. Knutson v. St., 211 M 126, 683 P2d 488, 41 St. Rep. 1258 (1984).

District Judge Who Had Represented Petitioners in Same Criminal Case — Disqualification Required: A petition for postconviction relief was filed in the District Court before a judge who, 7 years earlier, had been involved as defense counsel in the preliminary stages of the criminal prosecution. The petition was denied, and petitioners appealed. The Supreme Court ruled that the District Judge had committed error in not disqualifying himself. The case was remanded for a postconviction hearing before another District Judge. St. v. Hintz, 205 M 295, 667 P2d 434, 40 St. Rep. 1280 (1983).

Fully and Finally Litigated Issues Not Considered: An issue that has been fully and finally litigated in the proceeding leading to the judgment of the conviction will not be relitigated in postconviction hearings. An issue is considered fully and finally litigated when the Supreme Court of this state has ruled on the merits of the question. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981).

Applicability of Postconviction Procedure to Capital Convictions Following Automatic Sentence Review: A defendant sentenced to death is entitled to an automatic sentence review under 46-18-307, et seq. This automatic review does not stand in the place of postconviction relief, and after the automatic review, a defendant may petition for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981); Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Competence of Trial Judge to Preside Over Petition When He May Be Called as Witness: Coleman argued that the sentencing judge would likely be called to testify in his hearing for postconviction relief and the sentencing judge should therefore recuse himself as presiding judge over his petition for postconviction relief. Coleman never made clear what testimony he hoped to elicit from the District Judge. The Supreme Court is of the view that the postconviction court judge should only recuse himself if the petitioner shows that the judge is the source of material evidence otherwise unobtainable. A trial judge's familiarity with a case does not automatically make him a material witness in postconviction proceedings. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Remedy Civil in Nature: Montana's postconviction remedy contained in Title 46, ch. 21, is civil in nature and independent of the criminal action. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Res Judicata — When Previously Litigated Issues Barred: Res judicata cannot be applied in such a manner as to deprive Coleman of the right to file a postconviction petition and to use postconviction procedure. However, res judicata can be used to bar the rehearing of issues already litigated if: (1) the same ground presented in the subsequent application was determined adversely to the applicant on the prior application; (2) the prior determination was on the merits; and (3) the ends of justice would not be served by reaching the merits of the subsequent application. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981), following Sanders v. U.S., 373 US 1, 10 L Ed 2d 148, 83 S Ct 1068 (1963), and followed in St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268, 45 St. Rep. 1192 (1988), and in Walker v. McCormick, 260 M 301, 858 P2d 373, 50 St. Rep. 1053 (1993).

Initiating Proceedings

Part Case Notes

Failure of Counsel to Object to Introduction of Inconsistent Prior Statements on Confrontation Grounds Not Considered Ineffective Assistance: Jenkins was convicted of deliberate homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery after having been implicated in the crimes based in part on statements made to police and at trial by his wife, Mary. Mary suffered from dementia related to Alzheimer's disease and periodic memory lapses. As a result, in some pretrial interviews, she answered questions with declarative statements while in other interviews, even when asked the same or similar questions, she responded that she didn't know or couldn't remember. Nevertheless, at a pretrial hearing, it was determined that she knew the difference between truth and falsity, could express herself in court, and was competent to testify. At trial, she exhibited the same behavior. On direct examination, the prosecutor asked many of the same questions asked during the pretrial interviews, and although she answered some questions definitively, most of her testimony was that she didn't know or couldn't remember. On cross-examination, she often retracted the definitive answers she gave on direct examination, saying again that she could not remember. Following her testimony, the trial court allowed the prosecution to introduce the content of Mary's pretrial interviews through the testimony of the interviewing officers pursuant to the prior inconsistent statement exception to the hearsay rule, as set out in Rule 801(d)(1)(A), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). Jenkins objected on evidentiary grounds, but not on confrontation grounds, so the issue was not preserved for appeal. In a petition for postconviction relief, Jenkins claimed that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because his attorney should have objected on confrontation grounds. The District Court denied the petition, holding that there was no confrontation clause violation and that even if the objection had been made, it would not have affected the outcome of the trial. Jenkins then appealed the denial of the petition for postconviction relief. The state contended that Jenkins' right to confront witnesses was satisfied by his opportunity to cross-examine Mary and demonstrate to the jury her poor and unreliable memory. The Supreme Court concurred. The implications of admitting prior inconsistent statements was addressed in Calif. v. Green, 399 US 149 (1970), in which it was held that the confrontation clause is not violated by admitting a declarant's out-of-court statements as long as the declarant is testifying as a witness and is subject to full and effective cross-examination. Further, under U.S. v. Owens, 484 US 554 (1988), the confrontation clause guarantees only an opportunity for effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in a way that the defendant might wish. Even though Mary suffered from memory lapses, she was competent, appeared at trial, and was subjected to unrestricted cross-examination, giving Jenkins ample opportunity to demonstrate her inability to recall past events and giving the jury the opportunity to observe her testimony and judge the reliability of her memory as it pertained to both her in-court and out-of-court statements. Jenkins failed to show that an objection on confrontation grounds would have been sustained, therefore failing to demonstrate that his defense was prejudiced by his trial counsel's failure to preserve the issue for appeal. Jenkins was thus not denied effective assistance of counsel and his petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. St. v. Jenkins, 2001 MT 79, 305 M 95, 23 P3d 201 (2001).

46-21-101. When validity of sentence may be challenged.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Established procedure has assumed that the proper place for filing a challenge to a lower court sentence is in the District Court of the same county. Subsection (2) merely puts this practice into statute form. Subsection (3) is derived from the first sentence of 46-21-103. The Commission felt that the occasion for filing of a postconviction petition directly in the Supreme Court would be very rare. However, the Supreme Court preferred not to eliminate this option completely but preferred to restrict it to cases in which the petitioner is in custody.

Uniform State Law — Note on Commission Comments: The following states have enacted the Uniform Post-Conviction Procedure Act: Arkansas, Idaho, Iowa, Maryland, Minnesota, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, and South Dakota.

The commission comments summarize the Uniform Commission Comments and distinguish Montana changes to the U.P.C.A.; thus the Uniform Commission Comments are not set forth.

Source: Uniform Post-conviction Procedure Act, section 1.

This section defines the scope of the remedy and is similar to the one provided for by the federal statute, 28 U.S.C. 2255. The aim of this section is to bring together and consolidate into one simple statute all the remedies, beyond those that are incident to the usual procedures of trial and review, which are at present available for challenging the validity of a sentence of imprisonment. This section has attempted to provide an expeditious remedy without violating Article I, Section 9 of the U.S. Constitution, and similar provisions in the state constitution [Montana Constitution, Article II, section 19], that: "The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended . . ." This has been effected by providing a single remedy which does not restrict a prisoner's rights of collateral attack, which preserves and simplifies the procedures under the writ of coram nobis, and which affords a remedy in lieu of, and fully as broad as habeas corpus.

The scope of the post-conviction remedy is more expansive than the Uniform Post Conviction Act or any post-conviction remedy heretofore enacted or proposed by any state. Because, by this petition anybody adjudged guilty of an offense in a court of record, even though not incarcerated, may attack the validity of his conviction.

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendment: Chapter 378 in (1), near end after "imposed the sentence", deleted "or the supreme court"; in (2), at end of first sentence, inserted "may not be filed unless the petitioner has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law"; deleted (3) that read: "(3) If the person is in custody, the person may elect to file the petition directly with the supreme court"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 9(1), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Except as provided in subsection (2), [sections 3 through 6] [amending 46-21-101, 46-21-102, 46-21-105, and 46-21-201] apply to proceedings in which the conviction becomes final:

(a) after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]; or

(b) during the 12 months prior to [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997] if a petition under Title 46, chapter 21, is filed within the 12 months after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]."

1991 Amendment: Inserted (2) concerning District Court in which petition must be filed; inserted (3) concerning direct filing with Supreme Court; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: Near middle inserted "that a suspended or deferred sentence was improperly revoked"; and at end inserted "or revocation order".

1981 Amendment: Deleted "or any justice of the supreme court" following "the supreme court" near the end of the section.

Case Notes

Illegal Revocation of Sentence — Habeas Corpus Relief Warranted: The state petitioned to revoke Borgen's suspended sentence, and the District Court granted the petition and resentenced Borgen to incarceration for an additional 14 years. Borgen petitioned for habeas corpus relief. The Supreme Court determined that after an illegal weapon enhancement sentence was subtracted from Borgen's original sentence, the total time remaining on Borgen's suspended sentence was about 9 years, 1 month. However, the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was not filed until 9 years, 8 months after sentencing. Because the legal portion of Borgen's sentence had expired before the petition to revoke was filed, revocation of Borgen's sentence was facially illegal, and Borgen's incarceration constituted a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice warranting habeas corpus relief. Therefore, the Supreme Court granted Borgen's petition, vacated the sentence revocation, and ordered that Borgen be released from custody. Borgen v. Sorrell, 2009 MT 143, 350 M 339, 217 P3d 1022 (2009). See also Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006).

What Constitutes Similarly Situated Case for Purposes of Retroactive Application of New Rule — Issue Required to Be Raised in Trial Court: As a general principle, in order for a case to be similarly situated for purposes of retroactive application of a newly announced rule, the issue addressed by the new rule should be raised by the movant at the trial court level and properly preserved for appeal. The only exception would be a challenge under the common-law plain error doctrine or if unique circumstances apply, such as those in St. v. Carter, 2005 MT 87, 326 M 427, 114 P3d 1001 (2005). Here, Foster-DeBerry contended that the new rule regarding suppression of telephone and transmission recordings announced in St. v. Goetz & St. v. Hamper, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), should retroactively apply to Foster-DeBerry's case, which was pending when the Goetz-Hamper rule was announced. However, Foster-DeBerry never filed a motion to suppress or raised the legal issues addressed in Goetz-Hamper in trial court, and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal, so Foster-DeBerry was not entitled to retroactive application of the Goetz-Hamper rule. Further, Foster-DeBerry did not argue for application of the plain error doctrine, so the Supreme Court declined to apply it. St. v. Foster-DeBerry, 2008

MT 397, 347 M 164, 197 P3d 1004 (2008), following Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 US 314 (1987), and St. v. Zivcic, 598 NW2d 565 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999).

Application for Extraordinary Relief From Montana Supreme Court Only Recourse for Defendant Who Wishes to Challenge Decision of the Sentence Review Division: The District Court lacked jurisdiction to review decisions of the Sentence Review Division because it is a division of the Montana Supreme Court. Jordan v. St., 2008 MT 334, 346 M 193, 194 P3d 657, (2008).

Defendant's Failure to Discover Alleged Error in Sentencing Process Until Time for Appeal Expired — Postconviction Proceeding Not Barred: Phillips sought postconviction relief on grounds that his tribal court juvenile record had been illegally requested by the state and incorporated into the presentence investigation report and sentencing proceedings in violation of due process. The state asserted that the matter could have been raised on direct appeal and was thus inappropriate for postconviction relief. However, by the time that Phillips discovered the alleged error, the time for appeal of his conviction had passed, so the Supreme Court held that the claim was not procedurally barred from postconviction consideration. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Postconviction Claim That Counsel Failed to Investigate Case Properly Denied in Light of Voluntary Plea: After entering a nolo contendere plea on a sexual offense, Hardin filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that he received ineffective assistance because defense counsel failed to investigate the case prior to the plea. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that after voluntarily and knowingly entering a guilty plea, a defendant can challenge only the voluntary character of the plea. In this case, when Hardin entered the plea, he signed a plea agreement form and a plea of guilty and waiver of rights form, acknowledging that the plea was entered knowingly, that he understood that he was waiving his rights, and that he was satisfied with the attorney's services. Absent any allegation or evidence in the record that the plea was not entered voluntarily and knowingly, the postconviction claim of ineffective assistance of counsel was properly denied. Hardin v. St., 2006 MT 272, 334 M 204, 146 P3d 746 (2006).

Sentencing Judge to Preside Over Postconviction Proceedings: A District Court judge was substituted for the original judge early in Jordan's criminal proceedings and ultimately sentenced Jordan. When Jordan petitioned for postconviction relief, the original judge handled the proceedings and dismissed Jordan's petition. The Supreme Court held that the sentencing judge should preside over postconviction proceedings. Substitution of a trial judge does not suddenly evaporate in subsequent postconviction proceedings involving the same parties, witnesses, and factual background as the underlying case from which a judge was previously removed. In this case, the original judge's substitution in Jordan's criminal action also prevented the original judge from presiding over Jordan's postconviction proceedings. The postconviction claim was remanded for consideration by the sentencing judge. Jordan v. St., 2007 MT 165, 338 M 113, 162 P3d 863 (2007), following Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624 (1981).

Only Record-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim on Appeal: Frasure claimed on appeal that her attorney provided ineffective assistance at trial by failing to object to the introduction of certain evidence. However, the Supreme Court will determine that there was ineffective assistance of counsel only if that conclusion can be based on the record on appeal or if there is no plausible justification for counsel's actions or inactions. Frasure failed to establish that her ineffective assistance claim was record-based, so the claim was dismissed without prejudice to the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 305, 323 M 479, 100 P3d 1013 (2004). See also St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003).

Person Pleading Guilty in Justice's Court Not Entitled to Appeal to District Court for Trial De Novo: Fyant pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to failure to provide proof of insurance and received a suspended sentence and a $350 fine with the understanding that all or part of the fine would be suspended upon a finding by the court of an inability to pay on the part of Fyant. Fyant offered proof of the inability to pay, but the Justice's Court made no finding regarding her ability to pay and refused to suspend the fines. Fyant filed an appeal with the District Court on the grounds that the sentence was illegal. The Supreme Court held that according to 46-17-203, a person who pleads guilty in Justice's Court waives the right of trial de novo and that Fyant failed to take advantage of the other methods of postconviction relief available to her. St. v. Fyant, 2004 MT 298, 323 M 408, 104 P3d 434 (2004).

Criteria of Effective Assistance of Defense Counsel — Prejudice From Ineffective Counsel Warranting Withdrawal of Alford Plea: In a petition for postconviction relief from a drug conviction, Henderson contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel and should be allowed to withdraw his Alford plea, but the District Court denied the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the Strickland test to determine whether Henderson's counsel was ineffective. The first part of the test requires that defendant show that counsel's performance was deficient. The overarching duty of a criminal defense counsel is to advocate on behalf of the defendant and to meet, test, and refute the prosecution's case. Henderson met the first Strickland requirement by showing that counsel performed no investigation, research, or analysis, filed no pretrial motions, and spent only 4 hours on the case, which included clerical work, appearing in court with Henderson on two occasions, and an hour persuading Henderson to plead guilty. The sum of counsel's actual legal work was asking the County Attorney to propose a plea bargain and then signing the prosecution's first offer. Counsel's utter failure to advocate for Henderson in a meaningful way constituted deficient performance. The second Strickland requirement is a showing by defendant of a reasonable probability that but for counsel's deficient performance, the result of the proceeding would have been different. Henderson also met this test by showing that the decision to enter the Alford plea was clearly influenced by counsel's lack of effective assistance and that, but for the ineffective assistance, he would not have entered the plea. Thus, the lack of effective assistance in this case constituted sufficient good cause to authorize Henderson to withdraw the Alford plea and proceed to trial. The Supreme Court granted the petition for postconviction relief and remanded for trial. St. v. Henderson, 2004 MT 173, 322 M 69, 93 P3d 1231 (2004).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Required to Be Filed in Sentencing Court — General Provisions Regarding Substitution of Judge Inapplicable in Postconviction Proceedings: Harris moved to substitute the judge in a proceeding for postconviction relief, citing 3-1-804, which allows each adverse party one substitution of a District Judge in civil and criminal proceedings. The motion was denied, and Harris appealed. The Supreme Court held that the general provisions of Title 3, ch. 1, part 8, do not apply to the substitution of a District Judge in postconviction proceedings because the more specific provisions of this section require that petitions for postconviction relief be filed in the court that imposed the sentence. Harris v. St., 2003 MT 258, 317 M 406, 77 P3d 272 (2003).

Prison Behavior Modification Plans Violative of Excessive Sanction Protection and Equal Protection — State Directed to Revise Incarceration Procedures: Walker, an inmate with diagnosed mental illness, alleged that conditions at the state prison violated constitutional sanctions against excessive punishment and equal protection guarantees because of his mental condition. Although Walker had been released from the state prison when his petition for postconviction relief was considered by the Supreme Court, the case was not moot, as the state contended, because the prison programs remained in place. The court went on to consider whether behavior modification programs used at the prison unconstitutionally exacerbated inmates' mental health conditions and concluded that they do. The plain meaning of the dignity clause in Art. II, sec. 4, Mont. Const., commands that the intrinsic worth and basic humanity of persons may not be violated, and if the particular conditions of confinement cause serious mental illness to be greatly exacerbated or deprive inmates of their sanity, those conditions then cross into the realm of psychological torture. Thus, prison behavior modification programs and living conditions in maximum security constitute an affront to the inviolable right to human dignity and constitute cruel and unusual punishment when they exacerbate an inmate's mental health condition. The prison was directed to conform the operations of its administrative segregation units to the requirements of this opinion. Walker v. St., 2003 MT 134, 316 M 103, 68 P3d 872 (2003). See also Campbell v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 146, 306 M 45, 29 P3d 1034 (2001).

One-Year Limitation on All Postconviction Proceedings, Including Second or Subsequent Petitions — Exception: Defendant contended that the 1-year period of limitation in 46-21-102 applies only to an initial or original petition for postconviction relief, not to a second or subsequent petition. The Supreme Court disagreed. The 1-year period of limitation applies to the initiation of all postconviction proceedings, including those initiated by a second or subsequent petition. Further, under 46-21-105, in order to avoid dismissal, a second or subsequent petition must also demonstrate good cause why its claims were not asserted in the original petition. A narrow exception to the 1-year limitation period is allowed under 46-21-102(2), which provides that a petition that alleges newly discovered evidence may be filed 1 year after the evidence was discovered or reasonably should have been discovered. St. v. Root, 2003 MT 28, 314 M 186, 64 P3d 1035 (2003).

Failure of Counsel to Properly Withdraw or Preserve Direct Appeal — Denial of Postconviction Petition Erroneous: Adams filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because his original court-appointed attorney failed to move to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial and because his subsequently appointed trial counsel offered a lesser included instruction on aggravated assault to the jury and failed to appeal to the Supreme Court following Adams' conviction, despite Adams' request to do so. The petition was denied on grounds that Adams failed to file an appeal within 60 days of judgment as required by former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and Adams appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under 46-8-103, appointed counsel is required to continue representation until final judgment, including appellate review, unless counsel is relieved by court order. Adams' counsel failed to comply with the requirements of 46-8-103 and effect a valid withdrawal, so the right to appeal was not preserved. When a defendant would have appealed but for counsel's deficient performance, the error is prejudicial. Thus, denial of Adams' petition for postconviction relief on procedural grounds was reversible error, and on remand, Adams was allowed to raise the issues that would have been raised on direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal, as well as the issues raised in the petition for postconviction relief that were not previously raised. St. v. Adams, 2002 MT 202, 311 M 202, 54 P3d 50 (2002), following In re Petition of Hans, 1998 MT 7, 288 M 168, 958 P2d 1175 (1998), and St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Contrary Instructions Regarding Appeal Process From Justice's Court — Appeal to District Court Considered Petition for Postconviction Relief: Boucher pleaded guilty to DUI in Justice's Court, signing a form stating that the plea was voluntary and constituted waiver of the right to appeal to District Court. Despite the waiver, the written judgment stated that Boucher could appeal to the District Court within 10 days. Boucher subsequently learned that his driving privileges would be revoked in Washington as a result of the guilty plea, so he moved to withdraw the guilty plea following conviction. The motion was denied, and Boucher appealed to District Court, but that court held that the guilty plea was voluntary and dismissed the appeal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because under 46-17-203, entry of a guilty plea in Justice's Court waives a defendant's right to a trial de novo in District Court. Further, 46-17-311 procedurally requires adjudication of a matter by trial in a Justice's Court or City Court as a prerequisite to an appeal in District Court. Boucher then appealed to the Supreme Court, which exercised subject matter jurisdiction by considering Boucher's appeal to District Court as a petition for postconviction relief. Under this section, a defendant who asserts the illegality of a sentence and has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law may petition for postconviction relief with the District Court in the county where the court of limited jurisdiction is located. A petition for postconviction relief is not another form of appeal from a criminal case, but a separate civil proceeding aimed at vacating, setting aside, or correcting a sentence, and is available to a defendant whose sentence is imposed by a court of limited jurisdiction. Here, the District Court correctly determined that Boucher had no right to appeal the Justice's Court's denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea. However, given the contrary instructions concerning the appeals process issued by the Justice of the Peace, the fact that the Justice's Court is not a court of record, and the nature of Boucher's constitutional challenge to the validity of his plea, the District Court held an evidentiary hearing to establish a factual basis for ruling on the issues, and those proceedings constituted the functional equivalent of a postconviction hearing. Boucher was eligible to pursue postconviction relief given the absence of an appellate remedy and the constitutional claims asserted, and the District Court erred in finding that it had a lack of subject matter jurisdiction. St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002), following St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468 (1994), and St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002).

Issue of Counsel's Effective Use of Peremptory Juror Challenges More Appropriate When Raised as Petition for Postconviction Relief Rather Than on Direct Appeal When Record Silent: Russell was convicted of attempted deliberate homicide and appealed claiming ineffective assistance of counsel during jury selection. Russell contended that counsel failed to challenge for cause a relative of the victim and used two peremptory challenges to strike jurors who were outside the jury pool. Under the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, challenged actions of counsel are presumed to be matters of trial strategy and a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel rendered adequate assistance and made all significant decisions in the exercise of reasonable professional judgment. Pursuant to St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), when the record does not illuminate the basis for the challenged acts or omissions of counsel, a claim of ineffective assistance is more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief so that a supplemental record may be made. Here, the record was silent as to why Russell's counsel acted or failed to act regarding the juror challenges. Thus, the Supreme Court declined to discuss the issue on direct appeal. St. v. Russell, 2001 MT 278, 307 M 322, 37 P3d 678 (2001).

Requirement for Unanimous Verdict on at Least One Criminal Act Before Finding Guilt for Multiple Act Count — Continuous Course of Conduct Exception: In St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713 (1998), the Supreme Court held that a specific unanimity instruction to the jury was required when different criminal acts were charged in one count. When a genuine possibility exists that different jurors will conclude that a defendant committed disparate illegal acts subsumed under the single count, the special instruction serves to direct the jurors to reach a unanimous verdict on at least one specific criminal act before finding guilt for the multiple act count. Harris contended that the failure to give the unanimity jury instruction violated his due process rights and warranted retroactive application of Weaver and reversal of his conviction of incest. However, Weaver also established a continuous course of conduct exception to this rule when the criminal acts are so closely connected that they form part of one and the same transaction and thus one offense. In Harris's case, the criminal conduct occurred over a multiple-year period; however, the persistent illegal acts were so frequently perpetuated and so closely connected as to be viewed as a single, continuous, running offense. There was no possibility of jury confusion regarding Harris's incessant criminal acts. The conduct fell within the Weaver exception, so no unanimity instruction was necessary. The absence of District Court error on the issue mirrored the Supreme Court's refusal to invoke the plain error doctrine on appeal, so Harris was held to have received due process. St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001). Weaver was followed in St. v. Dasen, 2007 MT 87, 337 M 74, 155 P3d 1282 (2007).

Effect of 1997 Amendment on Supreme Court Authority to Resolve Postconviction Claims: Prior to 1997, it was allowable for a petition for postconviction relief to be filed either with the District Court that imposed the sentence or directly with the Supreme Court. The 1997 amendments to this section eliminated a postconviction petitioner's right to file a petition for postconviction relief directly with the Supreme Court, thereby removing Supreme Court authority to resolve issues cognizable only as postconviction claims under the court's original jurisdiction. Henceforth, if inmate petitions are for habeas corpus relief or other relief and are properly before the Supreme Court as an original proceeding, those petitions will be addressed and resolved accordingly. However, to the extent that the Supreme Court receives petitions that include claims cognizable or potentially cognizable only pursuant to postconviction proceedings, those petitions will be forwarded, pursuant to this section, for filing in the District Court that imposed the sentence, with a filing date identical to the date on which the petition was filed with the Supreme Court. Schrapps v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 214, 306 M 402, 36 P3d 338 (2001).

Question Whether Parole Denied for Failure to Satisfy Additional Treatment Conditions — Remand: Ringewold pleaded guilty to two counts of felony assault and was sentenced to a total of 14 years' commitment to the Department of Corrections. The next day, Ringewold was placed in the state hospital. The placement order allowed Ringewold to petition for a conditional release from the hospital, but did not specify any conditions. About 17 months later, Ringewold petitioned for release from the hospital. The state agreed that a hearing on the petition was proper, but argued that if it was found that Ringewold no longer suffered from a mental disease or defect that presented a risk to Ringewold or others, it was appropriate to remand Ringewold to the Department. The District Court ordered an independent mental evaluation, but it was never performed. Ringewold then filed another petition for release, but about the same time, the hospital staff determined that Ringewold would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment and transferred him to the state prison pursuant to 46-14-312. At the request of counsel, Ringewold was transferred back to the state hospital, with the state conceding that hospital placement was proper and that Ringewold should be allowed to petition for release pursuant to 46-14-312. About 4 months later, the Department Director sought an order transferring Ringewold back to the prison on grounds that Ringewold continued to suffer from a dangerous mental disorder but would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment for the disorder. At a conditional release hearing about 9 months later, the District Court orally resentenced Ringewold to 8 years in prison. The court specified that the total sentence not exceed more than the original sentence, but the court also conditioned Ringewold's parole on completion of an anger management course, moral reconation therapy, and chemical dependence treatment. In a written amended judgment about 1 month later, the District Court reimposed the original 14-year sentence and restated the parole conditions. Ringewold appealed. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence was legally effective and constituted final judgment. However, it was not possible to determine from the record whether the additional conditions added to the sentence improperly lengthened Ringewold's sentence, so the case was remanded for supplementation of the factual record to determine if Ringewold was being denied consideration for parole because of failure to satisfy the additional treatment conditions and, if so, to strike the conditions from the amended judgment, because under those circumstances, the practical effect of the conditions would be to lengthen the sentence in violation of 46-14-312. St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Record-Based or Nonrecord-Based Information Determinative of Appropriateness of Direct Appeal or Petition for Postconviction Relief — Direct Appeal Dismissed When Record Insufficient to Substantiate Effectiveness of Counsel: In 1999, White moved for an evidentiary hearing to allow the development of facts that were not part of the record but that were necessary to sustain a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court declared by order that a petition for postconviction relief would be the proper avenue for White's nonrecord-based ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Nevertheless, in late 2000, White appealed, contending that the claim of prejudicial error resulting from her trial counsel's various failures to provide representation, such as the failure to call witnesses, make an opening statement, or offer a theory of the case at any stage of the proceedings, was supported by the record and proper for direct appeal. The general rule set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), is that when ineffective assistance claims are based on facts of record, they must be raised on direct appeal, while claims based on allegations not documented in the record must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The underlying principle of the rule is that a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance. The two distinct classifications of on-record and off-record actions tend to overlap at times, and though not easily distilled into a formula, the definitive question that decides whether actions are on-record or off-record is whether the record fully explains why counsel took the particular course of action. Generally, an alleged failure to object to the introduction of evidence, to the testimony of a witness, or to prosecutorial misconduct at trial is considered record-based and appropriate for direct appeal. Likewise, counsel's own conduct in presenting the case, such as improperly eliciting damaging testimony from a witness or rendering an improper opening statement or closing argument, may be pointed to as record-based. Decisions regarding the timing and number of objections and whether to offer no opening statement at all lie within counsel's tactical discretion, indicating that nonrecord-based information explaining the tactic may be involved. Similarly, counsel's failure to adequately investigate, to prepare a defense, to become familiar with critical areas of the applicable law, to offer a particular jury instruction, to object to the trial court's failure to consider sentencing alternatives, to object to the admission of evidence that is evidenced by the record, or to fully inform defendant of the consequences of various options and rights, even though the prejudicial results of the ineffectiveness appear on the record, may constitute a nonrecord-based claim. In White's case, the record supplied some indicia of why a certain objection was raised at a particular time, but was still insufficient to determine to what extent counsel's actions were purely tactical or resulted from deficient representation. Thus, the information was considered nonrecord-based and should have been raised by petition for postconviction relief, so White's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Earl, 2003 MT 158, 316 M 263, 71 P3d 1201 (2003), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), St. v. St. Germain, 2007 MT 28, 336 M 17, 153 P3d 591 (2007), in which the Supreme Court declined to address a direct appeal of defense counsel's nonrecord-based reasons for making a double jeopardy argument and for failing to call a witness to testify in an incest case because the issues were appropriate for postconviction proceedings. See also St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009), in which an ineffective counsel appeal based on counsel's failure to request an accomplice instruction in a homicide trial was dismissed in favor of postconviction relief proceedings because plausible justifications existed for counsel's conduct that could not be addressed on appeal since the record did not resolve the factual questions surrounding counsel's actions.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance Not in Record — Claim Must Be Brought by Petition for Postconviction Relief: When the record does not provide for the basis for the challenged acts or omissions of counsel, a defendant claiming ineffective assistance must raise that claim by petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Weaver, 2001 MT 115, 305 M 315, 28 P3d 451 (2001), following St. v. Black, 270 M 329, 891 P2d 1162 (1995), St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611 (1995), and St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001). See also St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Pretrial Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the pretrial phase, applying the two-pronged test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) object to the procedure and use of Dawson's psychiatric evaluation; (2) advise him of his rights during the evaluation process; and (3) conduct an adequate pretrial investigation. On the first point, the procedure followed and the use of the psychiatric evaluation were consistent with the statutory procedure in effect at the time, and counsel had no reason to question it. On the second point, Dawson satisfied the deficiency prong of the Strickland test because he should have been informed of the potential consequences of participating in the evaluation; however, there was no evidence that Dawson was prejudiced at trial or sentencing. Dawson's version of the crimes was consistent with his defense theory, and at no time did he admit killing the victims, so counsel's failure to advise him of his Miranda rights was not prejudicial. On the third point, Dawson could not establish prejudice as a result of counsel's failure to obtain complete records and staff notes of the evaluation, to investigate Dawson's possible epilepsy, or to investigate or pursue Dawson's drug use—at trial or at sentencing as a mitigating factor. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at the pretrial phase. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000). See also St. v. Armfield, 214 M 229, 693 P2d 1226 (1984), St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110 (1985), and Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997).

Out-of-Time Appeal Based on Claim of Ineffective Counsel Denied: An out-of-time appeal is a remedy that may be available to a defendant involved in a criminal proceeding who, through no fault of the defendant, misses a deadline for filing an appeal. Here, Garner moved for an out-of-time appeal on grounds of ineffective counsel. The trial court denied the motion after finding substantial factual evidence that Garner was fully advised of his right to appeal the postconviction relief order, as well as of the 60-day deadline for filing notice of appeal. The ineffective assistance argument was without merit, and the trial court was affirmed. St. v. Garner, 1999 MT 295, 297 M 89, 990 P2d 175, 56 St. Rep. 1180 (1999).

Presumption of Ineffective Counsel — Irreconcilable Conflict — Error in Failure to Investigate Timely Request for Substitution of Counsel: Generally, a defendant must establish both parts of the two-part test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984), to prevail in showing ineffectiveness of counsel: (1) that counsel made errors so serious that counsel was not functioning as the counsel guaranteed by the constitution; and (2) that counsel's deficient performance prejudiced the defense and deprived defendant of a fair trial. However, in some cases, counsel's performance is so deficient that a presumption of ineffectiveness arises and the second part of the test becomes unnecessary. Only when surrounding circumstances justify a presumption of ineffectiveness can a constitutional claim of ineffective counsel be sufficient without inquiry into counsel's actual performance at trial. Here, a presumption of ineffectiveness could have arisen by an actual conflict of interest or by an irreconcilable conflict, but in either case, once the presumption was established, the second part of the test did not need to be satisfied. To establish an irreconcilable conflict, defendant must show a complete collapse of the attorney-client relationship. New counsel should be appointed if defendant shows by material facts that there is a total lack of communication or ineffective assistance of counsel, but bare unsupported allegations are insufficient to justify appointment of new counsel. In the present case, Wilson filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court found that it had erred by denying a hearing when Wilson requested substitution of counsel but denied the petition on grounds that Wilson had received a fair trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied St. v. Vessey, 967 P2d 960 (Utah Ct. App. 1998), holding that when reviewing an error in failing to investigate a defendant's timely request for substitution, the question is not whether the defendant received effective assistance of counsel at a subsequent trial, but whether the conflict with counsel was sufficient that it required substitution of counsel at the time that the request was made. In Wilson's case, it could not be determined whether the District Court gave adequate consideration to the merits of Wilson's substitution request based on the facts at the time that the request was made or whether denial of the petition for postconviction relief was based simply on the court's observation of counsel at the time of trial. The order denying the petition was vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings. Wilson v. St., 1999 MT 271, 296 M 465, 989 P2d 813, 56 St. Rep. 1096 (1999), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001). See also St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), St. v. Jones, 278 M 121, 923 P2d 560, 53 St. Rep. 864 (1996), and St. v. Gallagher, 1998 MT 70, 288 M 180, 955 P2d 1371, 55 St. Rep. 284 (1998), which was overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a criminal defendant has a right to a "meaningful attorney-client relationship", in St. v. Gallagher, 2001 MT 39, 304 M 215, 19 P3d 817A (2001). See also St. v. Molder, 2007 MT 41, 336 M 91, 152 P3d 722 (2007), in which it was held that because no request for new counsel was made, a separate hearing to consider a continuance motion was unnecessary. Molder was followed in St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to 46-23-1031. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000), and St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001).

Retroactive Applicability of Judicial Rule Regarding Oral Pronouncement of Sentence: Retroactivity is a threshold matter that compels the evenhanded application of a new rule for the conduct of criminal prosecutions to all similarly situated cases that are pending on direct appeal or not yet final. Therefore, all defendants whose cases meet those criteria are entitled to the retroactive application of a new judicial rule of criminal procedure. This standard applies irrespective of whether the new judicial rule constitutes a clear break from existing precedent and without regard to whether the rule was available to the District Court at the time that it ruled. Thus in the present case, the rule in St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), that oral pronouncement of sentence controls over the written sentence for purposes of finality applied retroactively to Waters' appeal, even though the District Court did not have the Lane rule at the time of sentencing. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), following St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), overruling St. v. Redding, 208 M 24, 675 P2d 974, 41 St. Rep. 147 (1984), Peterson v. Mont. Bank of Bozeman, N.A., 212 M 37, 687 P2d 673 (1984), and their progeny, and followed in St. v. Simpson, 1999 MT 259, 296 M 335, 989 P2d 361, 56 St. Rep. 1032 (1999). See also Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989).

Exceptions to General Rule of Retroactivity — Guillaume Inapplicable to Case Finalized Before Adoption of New Constitutional Rule: Although Nichols' conviction, resulting in an enhanced penalty for use of a weapon, was finalized more than 5 years prior to the Supreme Court's decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), which created a new constitutional rule barring enhanced weapon sentences when the underlying offense requires proof of use of a weapon, Nichols nevertheless argued that the portion of his sentence precluded by Guillaume should be stricken from his sentence. The Supreme Court applied the retroactivity criteria in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), noting that two exceptions apply to the general rule of retroactivity. The first exception applies when the constitutional rule puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe; the second exception applies when the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute watershed rules of criminal procedure. Finding that Guillaume was not dictated by prior precedent and did not set out a watershed rule, the court held that the new rule did not require retroactive application to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when the Guillaume opinion was issued. Not only was Nichols' claim time-barred under the pre-1997 version of 46-21-102, his argument that the sentence should be reduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice also failed because miscarriage of justice refers to actual, not legal, innocence. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), followed in St. v. Baker, 1999 MT 251, 296 M 253, 989 P2d 335, 56 St. Rep. 987 (1999), and overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Guilty Plea Constituting Waiver of Nonjurisdictional Defects and Defenses: Gordon was charged in Montana with the murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery of an Idaho man. Gordon sought a ruling on a motion to require enforcement of the second of two plea agreements entered into with Idaho authorities regarding a sentence that might be imposed if Gordon's implicity was proved in the homicide or if he was not truthful in the ongoing investigation. The state argued that Idaho could not bind Montana to a pretrial agreement in which Montana had not participated and contended that Idaho had previously voided the second plea agreement because of Gordon's untruthfulness. The District Court denied the motion. Gordon subsequently entered a plea agreement with Montana. The court obtained Gordon's understanding of the rights that he would give up by pleading guilty, including the right to an appeal. The court accepted Gordon's guilty plea to aggravated kidnapping and dismissed the other charges, ultimately imposing an 80-year sentence as recommended in the state plea agreement. On appeal, Gordon asserted that his constitutional rights were violated when the District Court did not sentence him pursuant to the second Idaho plea agreement. Citing St. v. Wheeler, 285 M 400, 948 P2d 698, 54 St. Rep. 1213 (1997), the Supreme Court held that after a criminal defendant pleads guilty of the offense charged, only the voluntary and intelligent character of the guilty plea may be attacked and that independent claims relating to prior deprivations of constitutional rights may not be raised. A voluntary and intelligent guilty plea constitutes a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects and defenses. St. v. Gordon, 1999 MT 169, 295 M 183, 983 P2d 377, 56 St. Rep. 654 (1999).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), distinguishing Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997), and Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

Counsel's Abandonment of Appeal — Postconviction Claims: All claims foreclosed from appeal because of counsel's abandonment of appeal may be raised in a postconviction petition. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997). In a subsequent proceeding, the state and Hans disagreed as to which claims were properly before the Supreme Court as part of the second amended petition for postconviction relief. Clarifying the 1997 Hans I decision, the court held that under this case scenario, Hans was entitled to raise two types of issues: (1) those issues that could have been raised in a direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal; and (2) those issues properly raised in a petition for postconviction relief under this section that had not already been raised. In the future, a defendant whose counsel has abandoned an appeal should raise, in one petition for postconviction relief, the claim that counsel was ineffective in abandoning the appeal, all claims that could have been raised on direct appeal, and all claims that would normally be appropriate in a petition for postconviction relief, including challenges to the validity of the sentence and other ineffective assistance claims. In this case, Hans's objections to sentencing procedures were not properly preserved but were properly brought under the postconviction relief proceeding pursuant to this section. Those objections, as well as the ineffective assistance claims not raised in the first petition for postconviction relief, were not subject to dismissal as requested by the state. Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Right to Miranda Warning When Defendant Requests Psychiatric Exam — Duty to Inform Defendant of Consequences of Participation in Evaluation: The defendant alleged that counsel failed to provide effective counsel based on lack of communication, adequacy of advice regarding mitigated deliberate homicide, adequacy of advice regarding mental illness, requesting and agreeing to the dissemination of mental health evaluations, ineffectiveness of the investigation and preparation for trial, and abandonment of the appeal. The Supreme Court denied the petition for postconviction relief except to allow the defendant to amend the petition to address appealable sentencing issues. The defense counsel's acquiescence to dissemination of the mental health report pursuant to 46-14-202 is not grounds for a finding of ineffective assistance of counsel. Subsequently decided case law cannot be used to judge an attorney's conduct at the time of representation. A defendant has no constitutional right to be informed of Miranda rights when, through the defendant's attorney, the defendant requests a psychiatric exam. Counsel has a duty to inform a defendant of the consequences of participation in a psychiatric evaluation. In this case, the defendant was not prejudiced by the defense counsel's alleged failure to inform the defendant of the right to remain silent during the mental health evaluation. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Postconviction Relief Denied — Counsel Not Ineffective — Guilty Plea Properly Entered — Mental Health Evaluators' Failure to Advise Defendant of Rights Not Violation of Due Process — Petition Allowed on Appealable Sentencing Issues: The defendant, who was 14 years old at the time of a school shooting incident, pleaded guilty to four counts and was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 100 years. The defendant petitioned for postconviction relief based on the claims of ineffective assistance of counsel; that the guilty plea was not entered knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently; and that the defendant was denied due process because the mental health evaluators did not advise the defendant of the right to counsel, of the right not to submit to evaluation, and that statements could be used against him. The Supreme Court denied the petition for postconviction relief except to allow the defendant to amend the petition to address appealable sentencing issues. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997). Reconsideration of the second petition for postconviction relief was denied in Hans v. St., 1998 MT 255, 291 M 227, 967 P2d 396, 55 St. Rep. 1052 (1998).

"Motion to Vacate Conviction" Construed as Motion for Postconviction Relief and Not Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Attorney Conflict of Interests — Petition Previously Denied: Howard filed a motion for postconviction relief in 1993, asserting that his attorney in his 1981 trial for felony theft had a conflict of interests because the attorney also represented a codefendant. The Supreme Court denied his petition as time-barred under 46-21-102. Howard then filed with the District Court a "Motion to Vacate Conviction", which the District Court construed as another petition for postconviction relief and also denied as time-barred. The Supreme Court held that it was proper for the District Court to construe the "Motion to Vacate Conviction" as another motion for postconviction relief. Despite Howard's argument that his motion did not meet the formal prerequisites for a motion for postconviction relief and that motions to withdraw a guilty plea are allowed after judgment by virtue of 46-16-105, the Supreme Court held: (1) that it had not always strictly enforced the requirements for a motion for postconviction relief, especially for persons appearing pro se; (2) that the content of Howard's motion was of the type usually made in motions for postconviction relief; and (3) that although other means of review of a sentence other than postconviction relief may sometimes be necessary because of exigent circumstances, the circumstances of Howard's situation, in which he waited over 10 years to challenge his conviction the first time, did not demonstrate those exigent circumstances. The Supreme Court held that this petition, like Howard's first petition for postconviction relief, was time-barred by this section. St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

Review of Decision of Sentence Review Division: A petition for postconviction relief or other extraordinary writ is appropriate for the purpose of challenging a decision of the Sentence Review Division. St. v. Torres, 277 M 514, 922 P2d 1180, 53 St. Rep. 826 (1996).

Substantial Change in Applicable Law — Teague Criteria: Byers filed for postconviction relief based on allegations that the Montana Supreme Court had reversed its position on the constitutionality of two sets of jury instructions regarding the mental element of the offense of deliberate homicide and voluntary intoxication subsequent to Byers' previous appeal. The U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), analyzing the retroactive application of judicial decisions to cases on collateral review, stated that a new rule will not be applied to cases coming before the court on collateral review after the date of the decision. A new rule was defined as a rule in which the result was not dictated by precedent at the time that the defendant's conviction became final. The Montana Supreme Court found that Byers' objection to jury instructions in his previous appeal had been overruled in St. v. Rothacher, 272 M 303, 901 P2d 82 (1995), amounting to a substantial change in applicable law that was not barred by Teague, but that the instructional error in Byers' trial was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The court declined to apply the new rule regarding instructions on voluntary intoxication set out in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260 (1995), because that decision specifically precluded retroactive application and because it had been subsequently overruled by the U.S. Supreme Court, resulting in no substantial change in the applicable law. Byers v. Mahoney, 279 M 28, 929 P2d 202, 53 St. Rep. 624 (1996). The Teague criteria were applied in St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999). The Teague criteria were also applied in St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999).

Failure to Appoint New Counsel During Posttrial Hearing on Counsel's Effectiveness: Finley contended that the District Court denied him his right to counsel's undivided loyalty under 46-21-201 by failing to appoint new counsel to represent him at a posttrial hearing regarding his counsel's effectiveness, at which his counsel confronted him concerning the sufficiency of his allegations of ineffectiveness and then took the stand to rebut those allegations. Section 46-21-201 was not in effect at the time of the hearing and thus did not apply; however, under this section, a postconviction hearing is a separate proceeding that is available after sentencing and applies when there is no adequate remedy of appeal. Further, under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., the right to counsel is composed of two correlative rights—the right to counsel of reasonable competence and the right to counsel's undivided loyalty. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), in holding that when a defendant and counsel have a conflict so great that it results in a total lack of communication or that if counsel fails to render effective assistance, new counsel should be appointed. The potential for substantial prejudice to Finley existed at the posttrial hearing, qualifying the hearing as a critical stage in the proceedings. It was error for the trial court to fail to appoint new counsel, at least for purposes of the competency hearing. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996).

Jury Misconduct Alleged in Newspaper and Not in Evidence in Record: Alleged jury misconduct was disclosed by a newspaper article the day after the trial. The related issue that counsel was ineffective for failure to challenge the misconduct could not be considered on direct appeal because the evidence of misconduct was not part of the District Court trial record. The issue had to be raised in a petition for postconviction relief, and the District Court erred in denying the petition on the grounds that the issue could have been and was not raised on direct appeal. St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611, 52 St. Rep. 947 (1995).

Lower Court's Ruling on Untimely Motion Upheld: The state argued that the trial court should have summarily dismissed Barrack's motion for a new trial because it was filed late and that the trial court should not have treated the motion as a petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court noted that at the time that the trial court incorrectly treated the untimely motion for a new trial as a petition for postconviction relief, Barrack could still have filed a timely appeal and may have been lulled into a position in which he did not timely pursue his appeal rights. The Supreme Court held that under the unique facts of the case, it would affirm the lower court's decision to rule on the untimely motion but that its decision could not be read as enlarging the scope of postconviction relief or as diminishing a defendant's obligation to timely file any motions. St. v. Barrack, 267 M 154, 882 P2d 1028, 51 St. Rep. 983 (1994).

Postconviction Relief From City Court Allowed — Plain Meaning Rule Followed: Christensen was convicted in Plentywood City Court of several traffic violations and, following conviction, filed a petition for postconviction relief in District Court. The District Court dismissed the petition based upon its conclusion that postconviction relief could be had only from judgments of a court of record. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that subsection (2) of this section clearly provides for postconviction relief from judgments of a City Court and that the statute is clear and unambiguous and should be followed. St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468, 51 St. Rep. 542 (1994).

Claim That Another Offense More Applicable Than Offense to Which Defendant Pleaded Guilty — Nonjurisdictional Claims — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Hagan pleaded guilty to and was convicted of a charge of attempted sexual intercourse without consent. In a petition for postconviction relief, Hagan alleged that the conviction was improper and violated his constitutional rights because the victim was his natural daughter and thus the only crime with which he could have been charged, convicted, and sentenced was incest. The District Court dismissed the request based on its conclusion that Hagan's claims were jurisdictional, citing Sword v. St., 746 P2d 423 (Wyo. 1987). The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that U.S. v. Cortez, 973 F2d 764 (9th Cir. 1992), described jurisdictional claims in the context of waiver as "those cases in which the district court could determine that the government lacked the power to bring the indictment at the time of accepting the guilty plea from the face of the indictment or from the record". In this case, Hagan's claims were nonjurisdictional because at the time of accepting the guilty plea, the state did have the power to bring charges against Hagan based on his alleged conduct and nothing to the contrary was evident from the face of the information. Because the validity of Hagan's plea was not in question, he was precluded from seeking postconviction relief on the bases raised in the petition. The nonjurisdictional claims were waived when Hagan entered a guilty plea. Hagan v. St., 265 M 31, 873 P2d 1385, 51 St. Rep. 230 (1994). The applicability of the jurisdictional defect claim was followed in St. v. Cech, 2007 MT 184, 338 M 330, 167 P3d 389 (2007), in which it was decided that a defendant did not waive a double jeopardy claim when pleading guilty because the trial court had before it the record of defendant's conviction in another state that was sufficient for the court to determine whether the government lacked the power to bring the charges at issue. See also Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238 (1996).

Failure to Challenge Sentence Validity — Petition for Modification Properly Denied: Defendant did not dispute that her sentence for robbery was within the statutory maximum or that the District Court abused its discretion in imposing sentence, but rather alleged a conflict of interest and ineffective assistance of counsel. This did not provide a basis for postconviction relief under this section, and the petition for modification of the sentence was properly denied. St. v. Bull Coming, 253 M 71, 831 P2d 578, 49 St. Rep. 376 (1992).

Attorney's Performance Not Deficient: In evaluating ineffective assistance of counsel claims, the Supreme Court uses the two-part test set forth in Strickland v. Washington, 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984). First, counsel's performance must be deficient. To assess deficient performance, the court employs the "reasonably effective assistance test" of whether a defendant's counsel acted within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. Second, counsel's deficient performance must have so prejudiced defendant as to deprive him of a fair trial. The standard for evaluating prejudice is whether a reasonable probability exists that but for counsel's deficient performance, the trial's outcome would have been different. However, in evaluating a defense counsel's performance, the court will not second guess trial tactics and strategy. In this case, substantial evidence supports the trial court's conclusion that another lawyer would not have obtained a more favorable result for defendant considering the amount of evidence the state presented against him. St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182, 47 St. Rep. 328 (1990), followed in St. v. Biehle, 251 M 257, 824 P2d 268, 49 St. Rep. 47 (1992), and St. v. Weaver, 2001 MT 115, 305 M 315, 28 P3d 451 (2001). See also Eiler v. St., 254 M 39, 833 P2d 1124, 49 St. Rep. 611 (1992).

Judge's Remarks on Defense Counsel's Conduct of Trial — No Showing of Bias: Defendant argued that the trial court judge's observations regarding the manner in which defense counsel conducted the defense indicated an unwillingness or inability by the judge to impartially consider that defense counsel ineffectively represented defendant. However, the mere fact that the trial judge articulated his observations does not, without more, constitute bias. The remarks came at the end of the hearing for postconviction relief after all evidence had been presented. St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182, 47 St. Rep. 328 (1990), distinguishing St. v. Musgrove, 187 M 549, 610 P2d 710 (1980).

Prosecutor's Solicitation of Excluded Evidence: The defendant contended that he was denied a fair trial because the prosecutor elicited testimony from the arresting officer concerning statements made by the defendant at the time of his arrest that had been ruled inadmissible by the trial court. The Supreme Court ruled that the error in admitting the evidence was cured by the trial court's admonishing the jury to disregard the inadmissible statements. St. v. Kolberg, 241 M 105, 785 P2d 702, 47 St. Rep. 120 (1990).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel at Trial and on Appeal — Not Established: The defendant argued that his trial and appeal attorneys did not argue his case fully. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and held that the attorneys had presented the strongest arguments in the defendant's favor and had performed in a competent manner. In re Petition of Martin, 240 M 419, 787 P2d 746, 46 St. Rep. 2213 (1989).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005), St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005), and St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Right to Jury Trial — Not Applicable to Suspended Sentence Revocation Proceedings: Since a trial by jury under the seventh amendment to the U.S. Constitution and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., is guaranteed only in "criminal prosecutions", it does not apply in proceedings for revocation of a suspended sentence. St. v. Watts, 221 M 104, 717 P2d 24, 43 St. Rep. 670 (1986).

Action for Postconviction Relief Exclusive Means of Establishing District Court Jurisdiction to Modify Sentence: Once a valid sentence has been pronounced by a District Court, that court lacks jurisdiction to modify the sentence upon postjudgment motion by the defendant. The District Court can only modify the sentence if the defendant files a motion for postconviction relief under Title 46, ch. 21. To reduce duplication of effort, the Supreme Court considered defendant's postjudgment motion to be a motion for postconviction relief. Dahlman v. District Court, 215 M 470, 698 P2d 423, 42 St. Rep. 550 (1985), followed in St. v. George, 224 M 495, 730 P2d 412, 43 St. Rep. 2363 (1986), In re Petition of Arledge, 232 M 450, 756 P2d 1169, 45 St. Rep. 1188 (1988), and in St. v. Fertterer, 260 M 397, 860 P2d 151, 50 St. Rep. 1135 (1993).

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Burden of Proving Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — No Prejudice Shown: Where the defendant alleged, in his petition for postconviction relief, that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel at trial because his attorney: (1) failed to invoke the spousal privilege on the defendant's behalf; (2) failed to interview a witness and call other witnesses; (3) was absent from a presentence investigation report interview; and (4) failed to object to alleged misconduct by the prosecutor, the Supreme Court found, under the rationale of St. v. LaValley, 203 M 393, 661 P2d 869, 40 St. Rep. 527 (1983), and Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983), that the defendant had an especially heavy burden of proving ineffective assistance of counsel when that issue was raised for the first time in a petition for postconviction relief and could have been previously raised on direct appeal. The court found that the defendant failed to show how he was prejudiced by the alleged acts constituting ineffective assistance. St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20, 40 St. Rep. 1786 (1983), overruled, to the extent that it stands for the proposition that the Supreme Court can review issues in postconviction proceedings that could have been raised on direct appeal, in Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995). See also St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182, 47 St. Rep. 328 (1990).

Abuse of Postconviction Relief to Raise Issues That Should Have Been Raised Earlier: After a second conviction on charges of homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery, the Supreme Court affirmed the conviction of the defendant, who then filed a petition for postconviction relief on the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel, which was eventually denied by the District Court. On appeal of the denial of that petition, the Supreme Court held that the defendant's failure to raise the issue of ineffective counsel in earlier proceedings would not bar the court from considering that issue but stated that the fact that the issue was not raised at a pretrial hearing, during trial, or on appeal would be considered by the court as an element bearing on the merits of the defendant's claims. The language of 46-21-101 clearly intends that postconviction relief be available to convicted persons who have not had their conviction reviewed on appeal and that it is an abuse of the postconviction relief process to use it to raise an issue which should have been raised earlier in the proceedings. Fitzpatrick v. St., 206 M 205, 671 P2d 1, 40 St. Rep. 1598 (1983).

Whether Relief Moot When Sentence Already Served:

Because of the violation of the conditions of his probation, the defendant's deferred imposition of sentence for selling dangerous drugs was revoked and the defendant was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment by the District Court of the Fifth District. He was subsequently sentenced to 40 years' imprisonment by the District Court of the Fourth District for a robbery which was one of the grounds for revocation of the deferred sentence on the drug conviction. After the defendant had fully served his 10-year sentence, he appealed from the denial of a petition for postconviction relief in regard to the 10-year sentence. The Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the petition, holding that no challenge may be made to a sentence which has been fully served, under the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in Lane v. Williams, 455 US 624, 71 L Ed 2d 508, 102 S Ct 1322 (1982), that the record did not show that he received a greater sentence on the robbery charge due to the 10-year drug charge sentence, and that the defendant's appeal was therefore moot. St. v. Jelle, 201 M 111, 651 P2d 1257, 39 St. Rep. 1989 (1982).

A petition for postconviction relief is not moot when the sentence for the conviction has been served unless there is no possibility of any resulting negative collateral legal consequence arising from the conviction. St. v. Standley, 192 M 54, 626 P2d 248, 38 St. Rep. 522 (1981), citing, to the same effect, White Sulphur Springs v. Voise, 136 M 1, 343 P2d 855 (1959).

Two-Judge Disqualification Unavailable to Postconviction Petitioner: Although a postconviction petition filed under this chapter is civil in nature, the petitioner is not entitled to two substitutions of presiding judges as allowed in 3-1-801 (now replaced by 3-1-802). An applicant for postconviction relief is directed by the more specific provisions of this chapter to bring the petition in the Supreme Court or in the court that sentenced him. A specific statute controls over a general statute. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Venue in Sentencing Court for Postconviction Relief: Venue for a petition for postconviction relief properly lies in the court that imposes the sentence for the conviction under this section. Thus where a defendant petitions for postconviction relief in Silver Bow County from a rape conviction issued in Silver Bow County for the purpose of altering consideration of his criminal record in a sentencing for another, later conviction issued in Yellowstone County, it was error for the District Court in Silver Bow County to dismiss the petition for postconviction relief filed in Silver Bow County. St. v. Standley, 192 M 54, 626 P2d 248, 38 St. Rep. 522 (1981).

Petition for Postconviction Relief — No Time Limitation: Petitioner applied for postconviction relief 8 ½ years after he was sentenced. The County Attorney contended that he was barred by laches from attempting to withdraw his guilty plea. The postconviction hearing statutes are an attempt by the Legislature to consolidate all of the common-law statutory remedies normally available to challenge a sentence. The Legislature did not intend to impose an absolute time constraint on the filing of an application for postconviction relief [until 1981, when a limit of 5 years from the date of conviction was set], and therefore laches does not apply. The length of delay may be considered, however, in viewing the good faith and credibility of the moving party. Petitioner claimed ineffective assistance of counsel and wished to withdraw his guilty plea. Nothing in the record indicated ineffective counsel, and the long delay makes the situation even less favorable to the petitioner. The application for postconviction relief was denied. In re McNair, 189 M 321, 615 P2d 916 (1980).

Effective Counsel — Knowing and Intelligent Waiver of Time to Consult: The District Court did not err in refusing postconviction relief on the basis of ineffective counsel where defendant's past criminal record and the hearing transcript reflect that defendant was aware of "stand-in" counsel at a sentencing hearing yet knowingly and intelligently refused an opportunity to take the time necessary to talk with counsel. St. v. Haynie, 186 M 374, 607 P2d 1128 (1980).

Objection That Facts Do Not Constitute Offense — When Taken: Under former law, the objection that the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense could be taken by demurrer, at the trial under a plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment. St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920).

1997 Amendment: Chapter 378 in (1), at beginning of introductory clause, inserted exception clause, after "within" substituted "1 year" for "5 years", and at end inserted "becomes final. A conviction becomes final for purposes of this chapter when"; inserted (1)(a) through (1)(c) outlining conditions of finality of a conviction; inserted (2) limiting an appeal based on newly discovered evidence to 1 year after final conviction or reasonable discovery of the evidence; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 9(1), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Except as provided in subsection (2), [sections 3 through 6] [amending 46-21-101, 46-21-102, 46-21-105, and 46-21-201] apply to proceedings in which the conviction becomes final:

(a) after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]; or

(b) during the 12 months prior to the [effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997] if a petition under Title 46, chapter 21, is filed within the 12 months after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]."

1991 Amendment: Inserted reference to 46-21-101; and made minor change in style.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "within 5 years of the date of the" for "after".

Case Notes

Second Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Procedurally or Time Barred: After a 1995 petition for postconviction relief was denied, Beach filed in 2008 for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence, but the District Court, without a hearing, denied the petition on grounds that it was procedurally and time barred. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The 2008 petition claimed that the newly discovered evidence was only recently available and thus could not have been raised in the 1995 petition. Since nothing indicated a lack of diligence on Beach's part in locating the new evidence, the Supreme Court granted Beach the benefit of the doubt as to whether he acted with sufficient alacrity in locating the new evidence, so the 2008 petition was not procedurally barred. To determine whether Beach would be entitled to a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, the court applied the criteria in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), regarding a trial court's consideration of what impact new evidence might have when looking prospectively at a new trial with a new jury. The court concluded that the District Court abused its discretion by denying the petition without holding an evidentiary hearing on the new evidence. The case was remanded to allow a hearing to evaluate whether the evidence was actually newly discovered and whether a reasonable jury would have found Beach guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The newly discovered evidence must be material to the issues at trial and neither cumulative nor merely impeaching, and in order to prevail on a substantive innocence claim, Beach was required to show by clear and convincing evidence that but for a procedural error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty. Beach v. St., 2009 MT 398, 353 M 411, 220 P3d 667 (2009). See also Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999), and St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003).

District Court's Subject Matter Jurisdiction Not Circumscribed by Statutory Time Bar: This section constitutes a rigid, categorical time prescription that governs postconviction petitions, and the statutory 1-year time bar on filing postconviction petitions does not circumscribe a District Court's subject matter jurisdiction. However, a District Court is not precluded from raising the timeliness of a petition sua sponte, nor does the court's decision to raise the timeliness issue on its own initiative invoke due process considerations. The court must afford the parties fair notice and an opportunity to present their positions before acting sua sponte to dismiss a petition as untimely and must determine whether the interests of justice would be better served by addressing the merits or dismissing the petition as time barred. Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), overruling In re Petition of Gray, 274 M 1, 908 P2d 1352 (1995), St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and other cases to the extent that they have held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Required Before Request for Counsel Considered: Davis filed a motion requesting counsel to prepare postconviction proceedings. While the motion was pending, the time for filing a postconviction petition expired. The District Court denied the motion for counsel on grounds that the time for a postconviction petition had run. Although the court erred in its conclusion because 42 days remained for filing a petition when the motion for counsel was filed, the Supreme Court nevertheless affirmed because Davis was required to file a petition for postconviction relief before the motion for appointment of counsel could be considered. Absent a valid petition, the motion for counsel was properly denied. Davis v. St., 2007 MT 207, 339 M 1, 167 P3d 892 (2007).

Failure of Counsel to Perfect Direct Appeal — Remand: Following conviction in Municipal Court for partner or family member assault, Woeppel's trial counsel filed a notice of appeal to District Court. Woeppel obtained new counsel, but counsel failed to file a brief to perfect the appeal, and the appeal was dismissed. The new counsel ultimately withdrew because of a conflict of interest, and Woeppel's next new counsel filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds that Woeppel was denied effective assistance of counsel and was denied the right to confront witnesses in the underlying case because the conviction was based on hearsay testimony. The petition was denied, and Woeppel appealed. The Supreme Court noted that trial counsel's notice of appeal objectively indicated Woeppel's intent to appeal and that it was only because appellate counsel failed to file a brief that the appeal was dismissed, resulting in prejudice to Woeppel. Denial of the petition for postconviction relief was reversed, and the case was remanded for consideration of any claims that Woeppel could have made on direct appeal, including the claim that because the conviction was based on hearsay, Woeppel's right to confront witnesses was violated. Woeppel v. Billings, 2006 MT 283, 334 M 306, 146 P3d 789 (2006).

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Bar Against Appeal Unconstitutional — Habeas Corpus Relief Granted: Lott was sentenced in 1992 for aggravated kidnapping, sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated burglary, and felony assault, and each sentence was enhanced by 10 years for use of a dangerous weapon. The 5-year limit on appealing the sentences that was in effect at sentencing (now a 1-year limit) expired, so Lott was procedurally barred from challenging the sentences. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), that application of the weapons enhancement to a felony offense that itself required proving use of a weapon constituted a double jeopardy violation. Guillaume was held to apply retroactively in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), so Lott's sentence was unconstitutionally enhanced with regard to the aggravated burglary and felony assault convictions. The state asserted that Lott was procedurally barred from raising the issue in a habeas corpus petition because Lott did not raise the issue on direct appeal or in a petition for postconviction relief. After analyzing habeas corpus and postconviction relief in Montana, the Supreme Court noted the constitutional guarantee that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended and concluded that as applied to a facially invalid sentence, the procedural bar in 46-22-101 unconstitutionally suspends the writ. Even if Lott had filed a direct appeal or petition for postconviction relief, the double jeopardy argument would have been unavailing because Guillaume and Whitehorn were not decided until well after both filing dates had expired. In order to avoid a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice, the Supreme Court granted Lott's petition for habeas corpus and remanded for resentencing pursuant to Guillaume and Whitehorn. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006), followed in St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007), and St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Procedural Bar Unconstitutionally Suspends Writ of Habeas Corpus: In 1992, the District Court enhanced Lott's sentence for aggravated burglary and felony assault because Lott used a dangerous weapon during the crimes. Under St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), and St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), the enhanced penalties were invalid because applying the weapons enhancement penalty to a felony offense that itself requires proving the use of a weapon violates double jeopardy. Lott challenged the sentence by a petition characterized as a writ of habeas corpus. The state argued that Lott could have raised the constitutional issues but did not and that Lott was statutorily barred from raising the issues in 2006. The Supreme Court found that Lott's sentence was enhanced unconstitutionally in light of Guillaume and Whitehorn, which apply retroactively. Because Art. II, sec. 19, Mont. Const., provides that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended, the procedural bar in 46-22-101(2) unconstitutionally suspends the writ, and implementing the statutory bar to allow incarceration of a person pursuant to a facially invalid sentence would be a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice. Therefore, habeas corpus relief was warranted, and Lott's petition was granted. However, Lott challenged only the sentence and not the underlying conviction, so on remand, Lott was not entitled to be released but only to be resentenced. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 240, 333 M 531 (2006).

Time for Challenge of Sentence Enhancement Expired — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: In 2003, Bingman filed a petition for postconviction relief challenging a 1986 sentence enhancement. The District Court denied the petition as untimely, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the applicable 1995 version of this section, a petition for postconviction relief needed to be filed within 5 years of the final sentence (now 1 year), and because Bingman's petition was filed long after the statutory limit, the petition was properly denied. Bingman v. St., 2005 MT 272, 329 M 151, 122 P3d 1235 (2005).

Jurisdictional and Nonjurisdictional Claims Subject to Time Limitation: In a petition for postconviction relief, Daniels contended that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to preside over his case because, as a juvenile, Daniels never expressly waived his right to a hearing on whether the case should be moved from Youth Court to District Court. The Supreme Court did not reach the merits of the issue because Daniels' claim was time-barred. Both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional claims are subject to the time limitation in this section. The time bar applies to all claims except claims alleging the existence of newly discovered evidence that would establish the petitioner's innocence. Daniels' jurisdictional claim was therefore properly dismissed as time-barred. St. v. Daniels, 2005 MT 110, 327 M 78, 111 P3d 675 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under 41-5-206. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to 46-21-105, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under this section, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

Evidence Provided at Trial Not Considered Newly Discovered Evidence — Postconviction Claim Time-Barred: Oatman failed to bring a claim for postconviction relief within the 5-year statute of limitations under the 1993 version of this section that was in effect at the time of conviction, so the claim was time-barred. Nevertheless, Oatman contended that the claim should be considered based on newly discovered evidence that a victim had contradicted the allegation of robbery. However, the jury heard the testimony at trial, so the evidence could not be considered to be newly discovered. The alleged new evidence did not extend the statute of limitations, so denial of Oatman's claim was proper. Oatman v. St., 2004 MT 360, 324 M 472, 104 P3d 1048 (2004).

No Claim of Actual Innocence — Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Precluded: Oatman asserted that his counsel was ineffective in failing to bring a claim of Oatman's actual innocence during Oatman's first appeal. However, Oatman had no claim of actual innocence, so there was no need for counsel to bring the claim on appeal. Counsel diligently represented Oatman before and throughout trial and the first appeal, and Oatman's continued employment of counsel indicated that Oatman was satisfied with his representation. Oatman's ineffective assistance claim failed. Oatman v. St., 2004 MT 360, 324 M 472, 104 P3d 1048 (2004).

Right to Appeal Error in Length of Sentence Lost by Failing to File Petition Within Statutory Time Limit: Pena, who was 17 years of age at the time, was sentenced as an adult to 45 years in prison for deliberate homicide and aggravated burglary. Pena did not challenge the legality of his sentence on direct appeal, but more than a year after entering a guilty plea and being sentenced, Pena filed a petition alleging that his sentence was illegal because the Montana Youth Court Act provided that a youth could not be sentenced to the custody of the Department of Corrections for more than 5 years and therefore the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to impose a longer sentence. Pena argued that the lack of subject matter jurisdiction was not subject to any statutory postconviction time limits for filing appeals and could be raised at any time. The Supreme Court held that an error in sentencing does not divest a court of subject matter jurisdiction over the case before it. The Supreme Court further held that all postconviction claims, both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional, must be brought within the 1-year time limit provided by statute and that the time limit was jurisdictional and was not waived by the state's failure to raise the issue in District Court. Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004). Pena was overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Pena held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Discretion of District Court to Set Time for Filing Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief: Sellner timely filed a petition for postconviction relief and subsequently filed an amended petition more than 2 years after the original petition was filed. The state contended that under Maier v. St., 2003 MT 144, 316 M 181, 69 P3d 1194 (2003), the amended petition was untimely because it was not filed within 1 year after final conviction. The Supreme Court declined to apply Maier because Maier involved the time limit applicable to the discovery of new evidence, which did not apply here. Instead, the court applied the third sentence of 46-21-105(1)(a), which allows the District Court discretion to set deadlines as it sees fit as long as that discretion is not abused or is not subject to the new evidence deadline. Thus, Sellner's amended petition was not procedurally barred. Sellner v. St., 2004 MT 205, 322 M 310, 95 P3d 708 (2004).

Untimely Petition for Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Judgment in Davis's aggravated kidnapping case was filed on January 12, 2001, and because Davis did not appeal, the judgment became final on March 13, 2001. Davis then had 1 year to file a petition for postconviction relief, but a petition was not filed until May 28, 2002. The District Court properly dismissed the petition as untimely because it was filed 76 days beyond the deadline. Davis v. St., 2004 MT 112, 321 M 118, 88 P3d 1285 (2004).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Time-Barred Absent Showing of Exceptions: Sanchez was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to life in prison. Sentence was imposed on November 14, 1997, and Sanchez had 60 days to appeal. Sanchez filed no direct appeal, and sentence was final on January 13, 1998, for purposes of postconviction proceedings. Sanchez first filed for postconviction relief on August 31, 2000, and filed an amended petition for postconviction relief on December 5, 2002. Although this section allowed 5 years for filing for postconviction relief when the crime was committed, the section was amended in 1997 and allowed only a 1-year period for filing when Sanchez's conviction became final and when the petitions were filed. Thus, Sanchez's first filing was 1 ½ years late, and the amended petition was nearly 4 years late. Absent a showing that any exceptions to the statutory time bar applied, such as newly discovered evidence or that a miscarriage of justice occurred, Sanchez's petitions for postconviction relief were properly denied as untimely. Sanchez v. St., 2004 MT 9, 319 M 226, 86 P3d 1 (2004).

Alleged New Evidence Not Extending Statutory Time Bar for Postconviction Relief:

Raugust contended that the period for filing for postconviction relief should be extended based on newly discovered evidence that the state mishandled a weapon found at the crime scene and that a key eyewitness confessed to the offense while waiting in the County Attorney's office to testify in Raugust's trial and because of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Raugust could not establish that the evidence regarding the weapon was so material that it would probably produce a different result at trial or that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. Evidence regarding the eyewitness directly conflicted with other evidence given at trial that tended to preclude the possibility that the eyewitness could have committed the crime, nor could Raugust show that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. The claims of ineffective counsel were not newly discovered evidence because Raugust was aware of the asserted deficiencies at trial. Raugust v. St., 2003 MT 367, 319 M 97, 82 P3d 890 (2003), following St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Abe was found guilty of accountability for deliberate homicide and was sentenced to 60 years in prison. One year and 14 days after the deadline, Abe filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence. Allegedly, two jurors from Abe's trial sat in on the trial of Abe's coconspirator and heard two of the state's witnesses testify differently than they did in Abe's trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors to be considered when a District Court evaluates a motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence as set out in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215 (1997) (see also St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959)), including the requirement that the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the defendant since trial and the requirement that the evidence must not be such as will tend only to impeach the character or credit of a witness. Here, Abe's counsel knew about the alleged discrepancies after Abe's trial but prior to Abe's appeal, so the discrepancies in testimony could have been raised on direct appeal. Further, the petition for postconviction relief alleged that the discrepancies undermined the credibility of the witnesses but did not establish that Abe did not engage in the criminal conduct for which he was convicted. Thus, the District Court concluded, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the alleged new evidence did not serve to extend the statutory bar for filing a petition for postconviction relief beyond the 1-year period in this section. Although Abe correctly pointed out that the state did not raise the issue of the statutory bar in District Court and that the District Court did not rule on the issue, the general rule that the Supreme Court will not address issues raised for the first time on appeal did not apply in this case because that rule does not apply when the issue is jurisdictional. The 1-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief is a jurisdictional limit, and lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be raised at any time under Rule 12(h), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20). Dismissal of Abe's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed as procedurally barred. St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001).

Period for Petitioning U.S. Supreme Court Commences Upon Date of Final Decision in Montana Supreme Court, Not From Date of Issuance of Remittitur: In calculating the timeliness of a petition for postconviction relief, the 90-day period for petitioning the U.S. Supreme Court begins on the date that a final decision is rendered by the Montana Supreme Court, not on the date of the issuance of remittitur from the Montana court. In the present case, the District Court incorrectly calculated the period as running from the date of remittitur when denying Raugust's petition for postconviction relief, but the decision was affirmed because the petition was nevertheless untimely even when the correct date of final decision was applied. Raugust v. St., 2003 MT 367, 319 M 97, 82 P3d 890 (2003).

Actual Innocence Standard Applied to Postconviction Claim Based on Incomplete DNA Results at Trial — Burden of Postconviction Statute of Limitations Met: Pope's petition for postconviction relief was denied by the District Court as barred by the 5-year statute of limitations in the 1993 version of this section (now 1 year) and because the issues were not raised on direct appeal. The court concluded that the jurisdictional bar could be overcome only by a clear miscarriage of justice and that the exception did not apply unless Pope did not commit the offense. The court relied on an inadmissible confession that Pope committed the crime, reasoning that even if the confession was not admissible at trial, it could be considered in a postconviction proceeding because it refuted Pope's claim of innocence. Pope contended that the exception applied because newly available DNA evidence tended to show that he did not commit the crime. The Supreme Court reversed. Based on Murray v. Carrier, 477 US 478 (1986), a petitioner must demonstrate that a constitutional violation at trial has probably resulted in conviction of an individual who is actually innocent and the claim must be supported by new evidence that indicates that the individual is innocent. Montana case law provides that the miscarriage of justice must be so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity and that the exception does not apply unless the defendant did not commit the crime from which relief is sought. Further, under Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), actual innocence requires that no reasonable, properly instructed juror would have found the defendant guilty. Schlup also allows review only of the record and new evidence to determine what a reasonable juror would find, so the District Court improperly relied on the failed plea confession to determine that Pope was not actually innocent. Pope correctly pointed out that the use of "and/or" language in the jury instructions made it impossible to determine whether Pope was convicted of raping one or two women. Thus, Pope satisfied the Schlup actual innocence burden in light of the complete DNA report, and when coupled with the error of using "and/or" language in the alternative charge, the jury instructions, and the verdict, waiver of the time bar in this section was required by the clear miscarriage of justice, warranting reversal. St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003).

Miscarriage of Justice Exception to Statute of Limitations for Postconviction Relief Applicable Only to Claim of Discovery of New Evidence — Recanted Victim Testimony Not Considered New Evidence: Maier cited 12 grounds for postconviction relief, including a claim alleging that newly discovered evidence in the form of the victim's recantation established that Maier did not commit attempted deliberate homicide. The District Court held that 10 of the claims were procedurally barred by 46-21-105, that 1 claim was improper under the facts of the case, and that the final claim of newly discovered evidence merited a response by the state. The state contended that the final claim was barred by this section because it was not raised within 1 year of final judgment. The District Court rejected the state's argument, but denied the claim anyway, and Maier appealed. The Supreme Court considered the nexus between 46-21-105 and this section, which address amendments to petitions for postconviction relief and require that amended claims alleging the existence of newly discovered evidence be filed within 1 year of final conviction or within 1 year of the time that the petitioner discovered or reasonably should have discovered the existence of the evidence, whichever is later. In this case, Maier discovered the evidence when the victim of the attempted deliberate homicide recanted testimony given at trial, but Maier's amended petition was not filed until more than 2 years after the recantation. Under St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001), the 1-year statute of limitation may be waived only if justified by a clear miscarriage of justice that renders the judgment a complete nullity, and under St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313 (2000), the newly discovered evidence must establish that the defendant did not commit the offense for the miscarriage of justice exception to apply. Here, the victim never actually stated that Maier was not the person who shot him, but only mentioned that he could not see the shooter because he was hiding. However, two other persons testified that Maier was the shooter, so the recanted testimony did not in itself establish that Maier did not commit attempted deliberate homicide. Thus, the miscarriage of justice exception did not apply, Maier's petition was not timely, and the District Court erred by not denying the claim on procedural grounds. Nevertheless, the proper result was reached, if for the wrong reason, so the District Court was sustained. Maier v. St., 2003 MT 144, 316 M 181, 69 P3d 1194 (2003).

One-Year Limitation on All Postconviction Proceedings, Including Second or Subsequent Petitions — Exception: Defendant contended that the 1-year period of limitation in this section applies only to an initial or original petition for postconviction relief, not to a second or subsequent petition. The Supreme Court disagreed. The 1-year period of limitation applies to the initiation of all postconviction proceedings, including those initiated by a second or subsequent petition. Further, under 46-21-105, in order to avoid dismissal, a second or subsequent petition must also demonstrate good cause why its claims were not asserted in the original petition. A narrow exception to the 1-year limitation period is allowed under subsection (2) of this section, which provides that a petition that alleges newly discovered evidence may be filed 1 year after the evidence was discovered or reasonably should have been discovered. St. v. Root, 2003 MT 28, 314 M 186, 64 P3d 1035 (2003).

Postconviction Relief Based on Claims of Newly Discovered Evidence Consisting of Defendant's Own Exculpatory Statements Properly Denied: Almost 2 years after pleading guilty to drug charges, Graham sought postconviction relief, contending that at the time that he pleaded guilty, he believed that he was admitting possessing only two drugs, not four, and that he was thus innocent of possessing the four drugs mentioned in the information. Graham also asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not advise him that he was pleading guilty to possession of all four drugs, and that his plea was thus not made knowingly and voluntarily. Despite the untimely filing of the petition, the District Court considered the petition because the issues were significant and should be disposed of on the merits. Nevertheless, the petition was dismissed and Graham appealed. The Supreme Court noted that in order to waive the 1-year statute of limitations on petitions for postconviction relief, the petitioner must provide newly discovered evidence that demonstrates actual innocence, which must be a showing that no reasonable juror would have found the defendant guilty rather than a mere showing that reasonable doubt exists. Graham did not show a clear miscarriage of justice because his own exculpatory statements did not qualify as newly discovered evidence and were insufficient to establish Graham's actual innocence. Additionally, Graham's allegations that he received ineffective assistance of counsel were record-based and did not qualify as new evidence of actual innocence. Last, Graham's request to withdraw the guilty plea because it was not made knowingly or voluntarily was considered. The Supreme Court applied the factors in 46-16-105 and found that the trial court's interrogation was adequate, the motion to withdraw was not timely, and the plea bargain provided Graham a considerable benefit in exchange for dismissal of other charges. Therefore, the plea was knowing and voluntary and did not provide grounds for postconviction relief. The denial of Graham's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. St. v. Graham, 2002 MT 237, 311 M 500, 57 P3d 54 (2002).

No Jurisdiction of District Court to Consider Postconviction Relief Upon Failure to File Petition Within Statutory Period: Carson sought relief from an amended sentencing order entered August 3, 1998. The amended sentencing order became final in October 1998, once the 60-day period for appeal expired. Carson filed the petition for postconviction relief on July 5, 2000, which was clearly beyond the 1-year period prescribed in this section for filing for postconviction relief. Thus, the District Court did not err in concluding that it did not have jurisdiction to entertain Carson's petition. St. v. Carson, 2002 MT 234, 311 M 485, 56 P3d 844 (2002).

Retroactivity of Substantive and Procedural Rules Distinguished — Nichols Rule Prohibiting Retroactive Applicability of Guillaume Sentencing Enhancement Restriction Overruled: Whitehorn was convicted in 1995 of felony assault, criminal endangerment, and possession of dangerous drugs, and the sentencing court added an additional 10-year sentence for use of a weapon. In 1999, the Supreme Court decided St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), which held that enhancing a defendant's sentence for use of a weapon when the underlying offense (felony assault in Guillaume's case) required proof of the use of a weapon violated the constitutional double jeopardy provision. Whitehorn moved for resentencing in light of Guillaume, arguing that the enhanced sentence should be stricken because his underlying offense of felony assault also required proof that he used a weapon. The state initially agreed that Guillaume applied and that resentencing was appropriate, but prior to resentencing, the state changed its position in light of St. v. Aguilar, 1999 MT 159, 295 M 133, 983 P2d 345 (1999), and St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which provided that Guillaume would not be retroactively applied to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when that opinion was issued. Whitehorn then filed a petition for postconviction relief under this section, arguing that his case was not final because he had not exhausted the 5-year time period for filing for postconviction relief (revised to 1 year in 1997). The District Court agreed that the petition was timely filed under this section, but, relying on Nichols, denied the petition and held that Whitehorn's case was final and not pending on direct review, and thus concluded that Guillaume could not be retroactively applied. Whitehorn appealed the denial of his petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court found that the District Court erred in not retroactively applying Guillaume and reversed, holding that under the common-law doctrine of plain error, Whitehorn was not procedurally barred from raising the retroactivity argument on appeal. The court distinguished between substantive and procedural rules when considering whether to apply a rule change retroactively. In Nichols, the court adopted the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989), which stands for the proposition that on collateral review, a new procedural rule of constitutional law will not be applied retroactively if it puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe or if the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute a watershed rule of criminal procedure. In Nichols, the court concluded that Guillaume announced a new rule, but that neither Teague exception applied. However, here the court decided that Guillaume was by its own terms a substantive rule to which the Teague exceptions should not even have been applied (accord, Chambers v. U.S., 22 F3d 939 (9th Cir. 1994)). Partially overruling Nichols and a similar holding in St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), the court concluded that it was illogical to refuse to extend constitutional protections to citizens simply because their claims are raised by collateral review rather than direct appeal. However, the court retained the Guillaume analysis, clarifying that sentences on convictions for felony assault with a weapon and aggravated burglary are the only offenses that may not be enhanced under 46-18-221. St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also Desist v. U.S., 394 US 244 (1969), and Mackey v. U.S., 401 US 667 (1971).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred by Seven-Year Lapse: Following remand of St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514 (1993), in 1993, the District Court set forth findings of fact supporting Morrison's 3-year dangerous offender sentence that had been added to Morrison's 20-year prison sentence for sexual intercourse without consent, and Morrison's sentence became final. In 2000, Morrison petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that the 3-year sentence enhancement should be vacated because the use of a weapon had not been charged as a separate offense in the information and that the court relied on false or misleading evidence to support the enhancement. The court treated the petition as one for postconviction relief and denied it as untimely. Morrison appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the version of this section in effect at the time of Morrison's final conviction in 1993, the statute of limitations required that petitions for postconviction relief be filed within 5 years after conviction became final. Morrison's petition was not filed until 7 years after conviction. Notwithstanding Morrison's argument that the statute of limitations should be equitably tolled, the petition was not timely and the District Court properly dismissed it. Morrison v. Mahoney, 2002 MT 21, 308 M 196, 41 P3d 320 (2002).

Postconviction Relief Barred by Statute of Limitations — Inapplicability of Civil Tolling Provisions in Postconviction Proceeding: Placzkiewicz pleaded guilty in 1992 to felony arson and was sentenced to 20 years in prison with 15 suspended. Following release to begin serving the suspended sentence, Placzkiewicz had four revocation hearings for various probation violations, until the remaining term was 10 years with no time suspended. Placzkiewicz later requested to file a petition for postconviction relief to challenge the original sentence, but the request was denied as time-barred. Placzkiewicz appealed, contending that the statute of limitations should be tolled pursuant to 27-2-401 to include months of incarceration, plus the 5-year limitations period in this section (reduced to 1 year in 1997). The Supreme Court noted that the statutory time bar may be waived when there is a clear miscarriage of justice and the petitioner provides newly discovered evidence that demonstrates actual innocence, but Placzkiewicz failed to satisfy the exception. Placzkiewicz's argument that the civil tolling provisions in 27-2-401 should apply also failed because that section does not apply to postconviction proceedings, despite the fact that such proceedings are civil in nature. Rather, the Legislature has provided a specific statute of limitations in this section for postconviction proceedings, and that specific provision controls over other statutes of limitations. The District Court's ruling that the petition was time-barred was affirmed. St. v. Placzkiewicz, 2001 MT 254, 307 M 189, 36 P3d 934 (2001).

Retroactive Effect of Statute of Limitations on Petitions for Postconviction Relief: In 1997, the Legislature revised procedures for seeking postconviction relief, including a reduction in the statute of limitations for filing a petition from 5 years to 1 year after the date of final conviction. The revised statute of limitations was made to apply retroactively to all convictions occurring during the 12 months prior to the April 24, 1997, effective date of the amendments. Because this procedural change neither altered the definition of a crime nor increased a petitioner's punishment, the amended statute of limitations was not subject to the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto legislation. Wright's conviction fell within the period of retroactive applicability, so Wright had until April 24, 1998, to file a petition for postconviction relief, but did not file until November 16, 2000, in violation of the statute of limitations. The postconviction statute of limitations is a jurisdictional limit on litigation that will be waived by the Supreme Court only when there is a clear miscarriage of justice so obvious as to render the judgment void, and the miscarriage of justice exception does not apply to postconviction claims unless a constitutional violation has resulted in the conviction of an innocent person or unless newly discovered evidence establishes innocence. Wright raised neither of those issues, so the Supreme Court declined to waive the statute of limitations. The District Court's denial of Wright's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 247, 307 M 100, 38 P3d 772 (2001).

Appeal to Montana Supreme Court Not Final Until Time for Petitioning U.S. Supreme Court Expires — Improper Dismissal of Petition for Postconviction Relief as Time-Barred: Following conviction on numerous felony charges, Whitlow appealed his conviction and sentence, but did not raise concerns about ineffective assistance of counsel in the appeal. The conviction and sentence were upheld by the Montana Supreme Court, and Whitlow subsequently petitioned for postconviction relief, claiming that he was denied the right to effective assistance of counsel when his trial counsel failed to ask followup questions during voir dire. The District Court held that the petition was time-barred by the 1-year statute of limitations in this section, because it was filed over 1 year after the conviction was affirmed and a request for rehearing was denied by the Montana Supreme Court. Whitlow appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Under subsection (1)(b) of this section, if an appeal of a conviction is taken to the Montana Supreme Court, the conviction does not become final for purposes of the statute of limitations on postconviction relief petitions until the time for petitioning for review by the U.S. Supreme Court has expired. In this case, that time limit for petitioning the federal court occurred less than 1 year before Whitlow filed his petition for postconviction relief, so dismissal of the petition on grounds that it was time-barred was erroneous. St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Both Procedurally and Time Barred: Wells pleaded guilty to felony assault, and the District Court entered its written judgment and sentence on January 2, 1998. Wells did not appeal, and the time for filing an appeal expired 60 days later, on March 3, 1998, which became the date of final conviction. In order to come within the 1-year period for a petition for postconviction relief, Wells needed to file by March 3, 1999, but the petition was not filed until December 22, 1999, when Wells asserted a double jeopardy claim for weapons enhancement based on St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999). The District Court dismissed the petition as untimely. Wells argued on appeal that the 1-year limitation is not a jurisdictional limitation, but rather a statute of limitations subject to equitable tolling, and contended that a tolling should be applied to the time period that Wells was incarcerated in New Mexico without adequate legal assistance. The Supreme Court recalled the holding in St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313 (2000), when it was held that the postconviction statute of limitations is indeed a jurisdictional limit on litigation to be waived only if there is a clear miscarriage of justice and defendant alleges newly discovered evidence that defendant did not commit the offense. Wells presented no new evidence of innocence. Further, Wells could have raised the Guillaume claim on direct appeal, but did not. Wells' petition was thus both procedurally and time-barred. St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that Wells was barred from raising a double jeopardy claim in a petition for postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-105 for failing to raise the issue on direct appeal, and overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Wells held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed Twelve Years After Conviction Time Barred — Guillaume Inapplicable: Charlo was convicted of aggravated assault in 1986 and sentenced to 20 years plus 10 years for use of a weapon, and the sentence was affirmed in 1987 (see St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278 (1987)). Following the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Charlo petitioned for postconviction relief in 1999 on grounds that the imposition of the additional 10-year weapon enhancement sentence violated his double jeopardy rights. The District Court concluded that Guillaume did not apply and that no miscarriage of justice would occur if the court applied the 5-year statute of limitations on postconviction relief provided in this section (now 1 year). The Supreme Court concurred. A petition filed 12 years after final conviction clearly violated the statute of limitations in this section. The court relied on St. v. Keith, 2000 MT 23, 298 M 165, 995 P2d 966, 57 St. Rep. 120 (2000), for the holding that application of the weapon enhancement provision in 46-18-221 to a conviction in which the underlying offense does not require use of a weapon as an element of the crime does not constitute a double jeopardy violation. The offense of aggravated assault does not require use of a weapon, so Guillaume did not apply. The court also declined to apply the fundamental miscarriage of justice exception in St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999). Guillaume was the sole basis of Charlo's petition, so Charlo could not show that the Redcrow exception would apply. St. v. Charlo, 2000 MT 192, 300 M 435, 4 P3d 1201, 57 St. Rep. 761 (2000).

Miscarriage of Justice Exception — Newly Discovered Evidence Necessary to Trigger Waiver of Postconviction Statute of Limitations: Rosales's deferred sentence for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and use of a weapon was revoked in 1994 because Rosales violated the deferral conditions. He was sentenced to 10 years for assault and an additional 2 years for use of a weapon in violation of 46-18-221. About 5 years and 3 months later and about 2 ½ months after the decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), Rosales moved to amend the sentence, contending that the additional 2-year sentence for use of a weapon put him in double jeopardy, based on Guillaume. The District Court dismissed the motion because of the running of the 5-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief in this section (changed to a 1-year statute of limitations in 1997). On appeal, Rosales asked the Supreme Court to reverse its application of the statute of limitations and the bar against retroactive application of the law as established in a similar case, St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093 (1999), which procedurally barred a defendant from moving the court to amend the sentence based on Guillaume. The Supreme Court declined, holding that the postconviction statute of limitations is a jurisdictional limit on litigation and is waived only when there is a clear miscarriage of justice—one so obvious that the judgment is rendered a complete nullity. The miscarriage of justice exception refers to actual, not legal, innocence and does not apply to postconviction claims unless the defendant alleges newly discovered evidence establishing that the defendant did not commit the offense. The Supreme Court refused to alter the conditions upon which the statute of limitations will be waived, and because the District Court was affirmed on grounds that the statute of limitations had run, Rosales's argument regarding retroactive application of the law was not considered. St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313, 57 St. Rep. 385 (2000).

Exceptions to General Rule of Retroactivity — Guillaume Inapplicable to Case Finalized Before Adoption of New Constitutional Rule: Although Nichols' conviction, resulting in an enhanced penalty for use of a weapon, was finalized more than 5 years prior to the Supreme Court's decision in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312, 56 St. Rep. 117 (1999), which created a new constitutional rule barring enhanced weapon sentences when the underlying offense requires proof of use of a weapon, Nichols nevertheless argued that the portion of his sentence precluded by Guillaume should be stricken from his sentence. The Supreme Court applied the retroactivity criteria in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288, 103 L Ed 2d 334, 109 S Ct 1060 (1989), noting that two exceptions apply to the general rule of retroactivity. The first exception applies when the constitutional rule puts primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law to proscribe; the second exception applies when the procedures used to convict the defendant are so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty as to constitute watershed rules of criminal procedure. Finding that Guillaume was not dictated by prior precedent and did not set out a watershed rule, the court held that the new rule did not require retroactive application to cases not pending on direct appeal or to cases that were final when the Guillaume opinion was issued. Not only was Nichols' claim time-barred under the pre-1997 version of this section, his argument that the sentence should be reduced to prevent a miscarriage of justice also failed because miscarriage of justice refers to actual, not legal, innocence. St. v. Nichols, 1999 MT 212, 295 M 489, 986 P2d 1093, 56 St. Rep. 827 (1999), followed in St. v. Baker, 1999 MT 251, 296 M 253, 989 P2d 335, 56 St. Rep. 987 (1999), and overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002). See also St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Death Row Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Delay Attributed to Defendant's Appeals: Citing Lackey v. Tex., 514 US 1045, 131 L Ed 2d 304, 115 S Ct 1421 (1995), Gollehon claimed that his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated by the amount of time that he spent on death row and by the number of sentencing hearings in his capital murder case. The Supreme Court declined to apply Lackey because the majority of the delay in Gollehon's case was caused by his own pursuit of constitutional and statutory rights in state and federal courts and was not caused by the state. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999). See also St. v. Smith, 280 M 158, 931 P2d 1272, 53 St. Rep. 1345 (1996).

"Conviction" Based on Verdict and Sentence in District Court — Petition for Postconviction Relief Time-Barred: Redcrow was convicted in February 1988, and sentence was imposed in October 1988. Following affirmation of the conviction by the Supreme Court in 1990, Redcrow filed a petition for postconviction relief in District Court in March 1995. The petition was denied as untimely. Redcrow appealed, asserting that the date of conviction was in 1990 on the date on which the Supreme Court affirmed the original murder conviction in St. v. Redcrow, 242 M 254, 790 P2d 449, 47 St. Rep. 672 (1990), rather than the date of the District Court conviction in 1988, which would render the statutory filing bar inapplicable. Applying the definition of "conviction" in 45-2-101 and Beach v. Day, 275 M 370, 913 P2d 622, 53 St. Rep. 184 (1996), the Supreme Court held that Redcrow was considered convicted when the jury rendered the guilty verdict and sentence was imposed in District Court in 1988; thus, the petition for postconviction relief, filed 6 1/2 years later, was time-barred under the 1988 version of this section. St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622, 56 St. Rep. 409 (1999).

Waiver of Statute of Limitations Not Justified — No Clear Miscarriage of Justice: Redcrow was convicted in February 1988, and sentence was imposed in October 1988. Following affirmation of the conviction by the Supreme Court in 1990, Redcrow filed a petition for postconviction relief in District Court in March 1995. The petition was denied as untimely. The District Court held that although the petition was not filed within the 5-year statute of limitations in this section, as it read in 1988, the exception to the procedural bar allowed the state to examine the record to ascertain whether a constitutional violation resulted in a fundamental miscarriage of justice that would render the judgment a nullity. The court then examined the record, concluded that no constitutional violation occurred, and denied the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that a fundamental miscarriage of justice arises only when a jury could find, in light of new evidence, that the defendant is actually innocent of the crime. In Redcrow's case, defendant confessed and admitted to the crime of murder, which eliminated the possibility of innocence. Further, all of Redcrow's claims regarding ineffective assistance of counsel were record-based and not properly described as new evidence. Because the claims could have been presented prior to expiration of the 5-year statute of limitations, relief was barred. St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622, 56 St. Rep. 409 (1999).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims Barred as Untimely:

Hawkins contended that his petition for postconviction relief was not time-barred because of ineffective counsel at his trial more than 20 years prior, asserting that witnesses whom his attorney failed to discover would have offered mitigating testimony that Hawkins had been under extreme mental and emotional stress and was provoked into murdering his wife. However, because Hawkins' original trial counsel was since deceased, a miscarriage of justice would have resulted if Hawkins were allowed to make a claim on the merits when the state's primary witness was no longer available. Thus, the claim was time-barred. Hawkins v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 82, 294 M 124, 979 P2d 697, 56 St. Rep. 345 (1999).

Claims of ineffective assistance of counsel and confession-related claims raised in a petition for postconviction relief filed 11 years after conviction were barred as untimely. Beach v. Day, 275 M 370, 913 P2d 622, 53 St. Rep. 184 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988).

"Newly Discovered" Evidence, Discoverable at Trial, Not New — Claim Time-Barred: Hawkins contended that his petition for postconviction relief was not time-barred because of newly discovered evidence of ineffective counsel at his trial more than 20 years prior, asserting that witnesses whom his attorney failed to discover would have offered mitigating testimony that Hawkins had been under extreme mental and emotional stress and was provoked into murdering his wife. However, rather than being newly discovered, the evidence of Hawkins' mental state was available at the time of trial through Hawkins himself, despite the fact that he did not testify at trial. Thus, the claim was time-barred. Hawkins v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 82, 294 M 124, 979 P2d 697, 56 St. Rep. 345 (1999).

Statute of Limitations on Petition for Postconviction Relief to Run From Time of Filing, Not Conviction: The statute of limitations applicable to Hawkins when he was convicted in 1973 provided that a petition for postconviction relief could be filed any time after conviction. In 1981, the time period was changed to require filing within 5 years of conviction. Hawkins' petition for postconviction relief, filed in 1997, was subject to the 5-year statute of limitations in effect at the time of filing, not the one in effect at the time of conviction. Hawkins v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 82, 294 M 124, 979 P2d 697, 56 St. Rep. 345 (1999).

"Motion to Vacate Conviction" Construed as Motion for Postconviction Relief and Not Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Attorney Conflict of Interests — Petition Previously Denied: Howard filed a motion for postconviction relief in 1993, asserting that his attorney in his 1981 trial for felony theft had a conflict of interests because the attorney also represented a codefendant. The Supreme Court denied his petition as time-barred under this section. Howard then filed with the District Court a "Motion to Vacate Conviction", which the District Court construed as another petition for postconviction relief and also denied as time-barred. The Supreme Court held that it was proper for the District Court to construe the "Motion to Vacate Conviction" as another motion for postconviction relief. Despite Howard's argument that his motion did not meet the formal prerequisites for a motion for postconviction relief and that motions to withdraw a guilty plea are allowed after judgment by virtue of 46-16-105, the Supreme Court held: (1) that it had not always strictly enforced the requirements for a motion for postconviction relief, especially for persons appearing pro se; (2) that the content of Howard's motion was of the type usually made in motions for postconviction relief; and (3) that although other means of review of a sentence other than postconviction relief may sometimes be necessary because of exigent circumstances, the circumstances of Howard's situation, in which he waited over 10 years to challenge his conviction the first time, did not demonstrate those exigent circumstances. The Supreme Court held that this petition, like Howard's first petition for postconviction relief, was time-barred by 46-21-101. St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

State Not Required to Wait Five Years to Execute Convict: Upon the dissolution of Gollehon's stay of execution, the District Court set a new execution date within 90 days of the hearing dissolving the stay, as required by 46-19-103. Gollehon argued that the state could not execute him prior to the expiration of the 5-year period provided in this section (see 1997 amendment) for petitioning for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court held that the provisions concerning postconviction relief do not override the statutory language requiring the setting of a new execution date upon the dissolution of a stay of execution. Gollehon v. District Court, 271 M 363, 897 P2d 1058, 52 St. Rep. 447 (1995), followed in State ex rel. Turner v. District Court, 271 M 392, 897 P2d 1060, 52 St. Rep. 498 (1995).

Motion for New Trial Based on Recantation by Accomplice Fifteen Years After Conviction: Some 15 years after defendant was convicted of second degree murder, an accomplice recanted his testimony, claiming that he, not defendant, committed the crime. Defendant then filed a motion for a new trial or other appropriate relief. The state argued the motion was essentially a petition for postconviction relief barred by the 5-year statute of limitations in this section. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that under such an interpretation a defendant held in violation of his constitutional rights would be deprived of a method of redress regardless of his diligence or the justness of his claim. Rather, the claim sounded in the nature of a petition for habeas corpus, and the court determined the single issue to be whether defendant was entitled to a new trial based on the proffered evidence of another person doing the crime for which defendant was convicted. St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268, 45 St. Rep. 1192 (1988), overruled, to the extent that Perry stands for the proposition that a trial judge is required to grant a new trial only when satisfied that the recantation of the witness is true, in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005). However, see In re Petition of Gray, 274 M 1, 908 P2d 1352, 52 St. Rep. 1041 (1995). Gray was overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Gray held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Postconviction Relief Petition Barred by Twenty-Five Year Lapse: A defendant, despite this section and notwithstanding the rule in In re McNair, 189 M 321, 615 P2d 916 (1980), that a petition for postconviction relief cannot be defeated by a claim of Statute of Limitations, res judicata, or laches, is barred from petitioning for postconviction relief if 25 years have elapsed between the conviction and the petition for postconviction relief. The passage of time may make it impracticable to retry a case if the motion is granted and a new trial is ordered. Long delay may raise a question of good faith. St. v. Standley, 192 M 54, 626 P2d 248, 38 St. Rep. 522 (1981).

Petition for Postconviction Relief — No Time Limitation: Petitioner applied for postconviction relief 8 ½ years after he was sentenced. The County Attorney contended that he was barred by laches from attempting to withdraw his guilty plea. The postconviction hearing statutes are an attempt by the Legislature to consolidate all of the common-law statutory remedies normally available to challenge a sentence. The Legislature did not intend to impose an absolute time constraint on the filing of an application for postconviction relief [until 1981, when a limit of 5 years from the date of conviction was set], and therefore laches does not apply. The length of delay may be considered, however, in viewing the good faith and credibility of the moving party. Petitioner claimed ineffective assistance of counsel and wished to withdraw his guilty plea. Nothing in the record indicated ineffective counsel, and the long delay makes the situation even less favorable to the petitioner. The application for postconviction relief was denied. In re McNair, 189 M 321, 615 P2d 916 (1980).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is identical to 1987 MCA 46-21-103, except that the opportunity for filing with the Clerk of the Supreme Court is eliminated. See 46-21-101(3), which authorizes the filing of a postconviction petition in the Supreme Court in situations in which the petitioner is in custody.

This section sets forth the process by which proceedings are commenced. It further provides that the venue is at the place of conviction and not the place of confinement. The advantages of having the venue at the place of conviction are: 1. It will reduce the burden of the courts at the place of confinement; 2. Since most of the witnesses who are called are likely to be found in the area of conviction, the cost of the proceedings will be reduced; 3. The convicting court is more familiar with the background and facts of the case. (See U.S. v. Hayman, 342 U.S. 205.) This section will be supplemented by rules of the Supreme Court.

1991 Amendment: In first sentence after "proceeding", inserted "for relief under 46-21-101" and at end substituted "appropriate court" for "court in which the conviction took place or the clerk of the supreme court"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Denial of Unsupported Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Abuse of Discretion: Although Hanson's verified petition satisfied the requirements of this section for commencing a proceeding for postconviction relief, it did not satisfy the separate requirement in 46-21-104 that evidence establishing the facts alleged to provide a basis for relief be attached to the petition. The unsupported petition was insufficient to entitle Hanson to an evidentiary hearing, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the petition. St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999).

This section describes what the petition should contain. The requirements that the petition shall also identify any previous proceedings the petitioner may have taken to secure relief from his conviction deserves special emphasis. This is intended to guide the district judge in exercising his discretion as to whether the relief available to the petitioner in this chapter shall be deemed waived. (See Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391)

1997 Amendment: Chapter 302 in (1)(c), at beginning, inserted "identify all facts supporting the grounds for relief set forth in the petition" and at end substituted "establishing the existence of those facts" for "supporting its allegations or state why the evidence is not attached"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 17, 1997.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 302, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, it is the public policy of the State of Montana to provide persons accused of crimes with a fair and speedy trial and direct appellate review of legal issues fairly presented to the trial court; and

WHEREAS, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is preserved by Article II, section 19, of the Montana Constitution; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has set forth in Title 46, chapter 21, MCA, procedures for protecting an offender's right to postconviction review of the judgment; and

WHEREAS, there is no federal constitutional right to a specific statutorily prescribed postconviction procedure; and

WHEREAS, it is the Legislature's intent that decisions of Montana juries and judgments of Montana trial courts in criminal cases, including death penalty cases, be respected and given finality by other reviewing courts unless errors affecting an offender's substantial rights have occurred; and

WHEREAS, amendments to Montana's postconviction relief and death penalty statutes will further the goal of finality by codifying certain interpretations of those statutes by the Montana Supreme Court and clarifying legislative intent with respect to other provisions.

THEREFORE, it is the policy of the State of Montana to prescribe and limit, consistent with constitutional safeguards of the criminal justice process, the authority of an appellate or other reviewing court to consider legal and factual issues determined by the trial or sentencing court."

Severability: Section 5, Ch. 302, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "petition", inserted "for postconviction relief"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Deleted "Arguments" and inserted "The petition must be accompanied by a supporting memorandum including appropriate arguments" at the beginning of the last sentence; deleted "shall be omitted from this petition" following "discussion of authorities" at the end of the last sentence.

Case Notes

Second Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Procedurally or Time Barred: After a 1995 petition for postconviction relief was denied, Beach filed in 2008 for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence, but the District Court, without a hearing, denied the petition on grounds that it was procedurally and time barred. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The 2008 petition claimed that the newly discovered evidence was only recently available and thus could not have been raised in the 1995 petition. Since nothing indicated a lack of diligence on Beach's part in locating the new evidence, the Supreme Court granted Beach the benefit of the doubt as to whether he acted with sufficient alacrity in locating the new evidence, so the 2008 petition was not procedurally barred. To determine whether Beach would be entitled to a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, the court applied the criteria in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), regarding a trial court's consideration of what impact new evidence might have when looking prospectively at a new trial with a new jury. The court concluded that the District Court abused its discretion by denying the petition without holding an evidentiary hearing on the new evidence. The case was remanded to allow a hearing to evaluate whether the evidence was actually newly discovered and whether a reasonable jury would have found Beach guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The newly discovered evidence must be material to the issues at trial and neither cumulative nor merely impeaching, and in order to prevail on a substantive innocence claim, Beach was required to show by clear and convincing evidence that but for a procedural error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty. Beach v. St., 2009 MT 398, 353 M 411, 220 P3d 667 (2009). See also Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999), and St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003).

Death of Attorney Prior to Filing Response to Petition for Postconviction Relief — Unique Circumstance Warranting Evidentiary Hearing: Heath filed a timely petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court ordered the attorney to respond to the charges, but before a response was filed, the attorney died. Heath then requested an evidentiary hearing, but the request for a hearing was denied on grounds that the court failed to see the benefit of a hearing without the attorney in attendance, and the petition was denied without holding a hearing. Heath appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Although not all circumstances require the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing on a petition for postconviction relief, a hearing may be appropriate in certain settings with unique circumstances. The attorney's death prior to filing a court-ordered response constituted one of those unique circumstances. The record failed to set forth the attorney's reasons for pretrial and trial actions, and denial of a hearing left Heath without any alternative means of inquiry into the attorney's actions and whether those decisions supported Heath's ineffective assistance claims. Therefore, under these unique circumstances the Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing to provide Heath a reasonable alternative means to inquire into the attorney's reasons for the pretrial and trial actions and to allow the District Court to evaluate Heath's claims. Heath v. St., 2009 MT 7, 348 M 361, 202 P3d 118 (2009). See also Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002), and Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Required Before Request for Counsel Considered: Davis filed a motion requesting counsel to prepare postconviction proceedings. While the motion was pending, the time for filing a postconviction petition expired. The District Court denied the motion for counsel on grounds that the time for a postconviction petition had run. Although the court erred in its conclusion because 42 days remained for filing a petition when the motion for counsel was filed, the Supreme Court nevertheless affirmed because Davis was required to file a petition for postconviction relief before the motion for appointment of counsel could be considered. Absent a valid petition, the motion for counsel was properly denied. Davis v. St., 2007 MT 207, 339 M 1, 167 P3d 892 (2007).

Dismissal of Postconviction Petition for Failure to State Claim — Differentiation of Standards Applicable to Civil Cases — No Error in Failure to Hold Evidentiary Hearing on Postconviction Petition: Herman asserted that an evidentiary hearing should have been held regarding his petition for postconviction relief because the standard in 46-21-201 is nearly identical to the provision in Rule 12(b)(6), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20), so allegations in a petition for postconviction relief must be taken as true and construed in a light most favorable to the petitioner, requiring a hearing on the allegations. The Supreme Court disagreed. The express statutory requirements in this section significantly exceed and are inconsistent with the mere notice pleading requirements for an ordinary complaint in a civil action. Thus, the civil standards do not apply to dismissals of petitions for postconviction relief for failure to state a claim because the civil standards are inconsistent with the more specific requirements of 46-21-201 and this section, and the District Court did not err in failing to hold an evidentiary hearing on Herman's petition and in dismissing Herman's claim for failure to meet the procedural threshold in this section. Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006), following Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), and distinguishing St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), and St. v. Lawrence, 2001 MT 299, 307 M 487, 38 P3d 809 (2001).

Waiver of Right to Postconviction Challenge of Matters Occurring Prior to Guilty Plea and Unrelated to Nature of Plea: In a petition for postconviction relief, Herman raised numerous issues related to ineffective assistance of counsel that allegedly led to a guilty plea. However, by pleading guilty, Herman waived the right to challenge matters that occurred prior to the plea and that were unrelated to the voluntary or knowing nature of the plea or to the ineffective assistance claim, including: (1) a claim that Herman conducted, sought, or obtained independent legal research; (2) an assertion that Herman met the attachments requirement of subsection (1)(c) of this section; (3) Herman's claim that he pleaded guilty because of the duress of incarceration; (4) counsel's failure to move for a bond reduction or pretrial release; and (5) a claim that counsel was ineffective by asserting a speedy trial violation. Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006), following Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004).

Defense Counsel's Complaint to Media Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: While Ford was incarcerated awaiting trial, a family member of Ford's homicide victim visited Ford and caused a disruption. Ford's counsel issued a news release to local media contending that jail officials violated Ford's constitutional rights by allowing the incident to occur, and the local newspaper ran a story that contained counsel's accusation. Ford contended that counsel's conduct prejudiced the case by instigating negative media coverage that reduced Ford's chance of obtaining an impartial jury. However, Ford cited no authority in support of the claim that counsel's complaint to the media amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. Absent support by legal authority and evidence of prejudice, Ford's postconviction claim for relief was properly denied. Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Failure of Counsel to Present Evidence of Purported Negligent Rescue Efforts Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In a petition for postconviction relief, Ford contended that his counsel was ineffective in failing to present evidence that Ford's beating victim may have been injured through the negligent rescue efforts of emergency personnel who responded at the scene. However, the trial record contained no evidence to support the claim, and Ford's arguments were based on mere allegations. Counsel could not be found to be ineffective for failing to raise a defense that was unsupported in the record, and Ford's claim for postconviction relief was properly denied. Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Failure of Counsel to Suppress Unintroduced Evidence Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In a petition for postconviction relief, Ford contended that his counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress evidence of a blood sample taken from Ford's hands before a search warrant was obtained. However, the state introduced no blood evidence at trial, so there was no evidence for Ford's counsel to move to suppress. Ford's ineffective assistance of counsel claim failed. Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Speculative Postconviction Claim Properly Denied: In a petition for postconviction relief, Ford contended that his counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress testimony from Ford's neighbors regarding statements by the neighbors that were allegedly coerced by police. However, the claim was based on nothing more than Ford's allegation that officers coerced statements from the neighbors. Because Ford produced no evidence to support the allegation and the claim was not grounded on facts in the record, the claim for relief was properly denied. Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Unfounded and Unpleaded Speculative Argument Not Considered for First Time on Appeal: Kallowat contended for the first time on appeal that if the jury in his DUI case had known that the arresting officer had been convicted of a felony and was employed under questionable status, the case would in all probability have had a different outcome. However, Kallowat failed to properly plead the issue as required in this section, nor was this speculative contention supported by the record. Therefore, the Supreme Court declined to address Kallowat's unsupported argument raised for the first time on appeal. Kallowat v. St., 2004 MT 152, 321 M 501, 92 P3d 1176 (2004).

Failure to Provide Proof of Entitlement to Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Ellenburg raised several issues on appeal, some of which were raised in District Court and some of which were not. The Supreme Court declined to address all issues that were not preserved for appeal. Several other issues were procedurally barred because Ellenburg either raised them on direct appeal or reasonably could have raised them on direct appeal. Postconviction relief was denied on the remaining issues because Ellenburg waived the right to appeal those issues by failing to provide any evidentiary support for the allegations. The petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), following St. v. Schmalz, 1998 MT 210, 290 M 420, 964 P2d 763 (1998), St. v. Niederklopfer, 2000 MT 187, 300 M 397, 6 P3d 448 (2000), and St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and followed in Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Failure to State Claim or Present Facts Justifying Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Griffin petitioned for postconviction relief, asserting claims of prosecutorial misconduct, double jeopardy, judicial bias, and ineffective assistance of counsel. However, a petitioner has the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that facts justify the relief. Here, Griffin failed to bolster the claims with supporting evidence, such as affidavits, records, or other evidence. Thus, the petition failed to meet the statutory requirements or state a claim for relief and was properly dismissed as a matter of law. Griffin v. St., 2003 MT 267, 317 M 457, 77 P3d 545 (2003).

Dismissal of Procedurally Deficient Petition Proper: Finley filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel because the attorney failed to mention that Finley could challenge the validity of three prior unspecified DUI convictions during a trial for felony DUI. The petition was dismissed for failure to state a claim for relief. Finley appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Mere allegations do not constitute the evidence contemplated by this section, nor are unsupported allegations sufficient to entitle a petitioner to an evidentiary hearing. Claims of ineffective assistance of counsel must be grounded on facts in the record and not merely on conclusory allegations. Finley did not provide evidence in any form that would establish the facts underlying the assertions in the petition or provide an explanation for why the supporting evidence was not provided, which in this case would have included identification of the prior DUI convictions by court or cause number and other particulars. The petition was therefore procedurally deficient and was properly dismissed. St. v. Finley, 2002 MT 288, 312 M 493, 59 P3d 1132 (2002), following St. v. Kills On Top, 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182 (1996), and St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299 (1999), and distinguishing Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002 (1981), St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), St. v. Lawrence, 2001 MT 299, 307 M 487, 38 P3d 809 (2001), and Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002).

Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Appeal Sentence and Withholding Exculpatory Evidence — No Showing of Deficient Performance of Counsel: Wright contended in a petition for postconviction relief that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to appeal the sentence after indicating to Wright that the sentence would be appealed and when counsel withheld exculpatory evidence from Wright prior to a change of plea hearing. Wright contended that counsel failed to mention that two of Wright's sexual assault victims made second statements that contradicted their original statements, which would have cleared Wright of 2 of the 11 charges against him. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test for ineffective assistance, which required Wright to first show that counsel's performance was deficient. By deposition, counsel in this case swore that he was never asked to appeal, and never indicated to Wright that the sentence would be appealed. The only evidence suggesting counsel's refusal to appeal was Wright's own affidavit. The District Court accepted counsel's statements, and that decision was not disturbed by the Supreme Court absent a showing of clear error. Further, the only support for Wright's contention that counsel withheld exculpatory evidence was Wright's own affidavit. Wright failed to produce the alleged revised statements or any records indicating that the victims even gave second statements; thus, Wright's affidavit was no more than a mere conclusory allegation unsupported by any evidence. The Supreme Court held that Wright failed to show that counsel's performance was deficient and declined to grant postconviction relief on the issue. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), followed in Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), and St. v. Godfrey, 2009 MT 60, 349 M 335, 203 P3d 834 (2009).

Postconviction Relief Barred Upon Failure to Raise Issue of Alleged Unlawful Sentences on Direct Appeal: In a petition for postconviction relief, Wright alleged three erroneous sentencing issues: (1) oral pronouncement of the sentence varied from the written sentence; (2) the District Court's nunc pro tunc order was improper; and (3) a sentencing condition ordering Wright to stay out of Custer County was illegal. However, Wright could have reasonably raised the sentencing issues before the District Court and on direct appeal, but chose not to do so. Thus, Wright was procedurally barred under 46-21-105(2) from raising the issues in postconviction relief. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Record Indicating Voluntary Nature of Guilty Plea — Postconviction Relief Barred When Ineffective Counsel Claim Could Have Been Raised on Direct Appeal: At a change of plea hearing, Wright pleaded guilty to 11 counts of sexual assault and was sentenced to 55 years in prison. The District Court suspended sentence on six counts. Wright did not file a direct appeal on any issue, but more than 1 year after sentencing, he filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, asserting that he was coerced into pleading guilty by his attorney. On the issue of the voluntariness of the guilty pleas, the Supreme Court looked to the record to determine whether this question of fact was documented in the District Court. In this case, there was ample indication in the record to determine that the issue of the voluntary nature of Wright's pleas and the propriety of counsel's representation were raised in District Court and documented. Wright could thus have raised the issue on direct appeal, but failing to do so, he was barred from raising the issue in a petition for postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-105. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Denial of Unsupported Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Abuse of Discretion: Although Hanson's verified petition satisfied the requirements of 46-21-103 for commencing a proceeding for postconviction relief, it did not satisfy the separate requirement in this section that evidence establishing the facts alleged to provide a basis for relief be attached to the petition. The unsupported petition was insufficient to entitle Hanson to an evidentiary hearing, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the petition. St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Denied — No Due Process Violation — No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing New Trial Because All Factors Not Fulfilled — No New Trial: Sullivan, the director of the Parks and Recreation Department for the city of Great Falls, was convicted of three counts of felony theft of various city recreational fees and one count of tampering with public records. Later, the employee who replaced him found in a budget file an envelope containing $1,300 of city recreation funds. Sullivan brought a petition for postconviction relief, arguing that his constitutional rights under Brady v. Md., 373 US 83 (1963) (granting postconviction relief on the basis of evidence suppressed by the prosecution), had been violated and that the newly discovered evidence entitled him to a new trial. The Supreme Court held Brady inapplicable because the new evidence was not known to the prosecution at the time of the trial and therefore could not have been wrongfully withheld. In connection with the Brady claim, the Supreme Court also noted that Sullivan had not attached an affidavit or other evidence in support of his allegations, as required by this section, and concluded that Sullivan's assertions were not sufficient under 46-21-201 to allow him to conduct discovery or to entitle him to an evidentiary hearing. Because theft is not an element of tampering under 45-7-208 and 45-2-302, the Supreme Court concluded that Sullivan's conviction for tampering by making another employee alter official city records would not have been changed had the newly discovered evidence been available at trial. The Supreme Court also concluded that Sullivan had not fulfilled all of the six factors discussed in St. v. Cline, 275 M 46, 909 P2d 1171 (1996), required for grant of a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence because he had not shown that the new evidence would probably produce a different result at trial and that the new evidence was not merely cumulative evidence. Concerning Sullivan's final claim, the Supreme Court noted that in St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988), the defendant obtained newly discovered evidence but that neither a motion for a new trial nor postconviction relief was available to the defendant, so the Supreme Court created a "window" for review of the claim that otherwise would have been procedurally barred. The Supreme Court contrasted Perry and pointed out that in Sullivan's case, he was not barred from bringing a petition for postconviction relief. For all of these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's denial for postconviction relief and denial of Sullivan's motion for a new trial. St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Failure to Supply Supporting Materials: Petitioner failed to present any affidavits, records, or other evidence to establish the testimony of a proposed witness, to establish the availability of the witness, and to present any statement as to why affidavits, records, or other evidence was not attached. Lack of the presentation of supporting evidence was a factor in the denial of a petition for postconviction relief. Eiler v. St., 254 M 39, 833 P2d 1124, 49 St. Rep. 611 (1992).

46-21-105. Amendment of petition — waiver of grounds for relief.

Commission Comments

Uniform State Law — Note on Commission Comments: The following states have enacted the Uniform Post-Conviction Procedure Act: Arkansas, Idaho, Iowa, Maryland, Minnesota, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, and South Dakota.

The commission comments summarize the Uniform Commission Comments and distinguish Montana changes to the U.P.C.A., thus the Uniform Commission Comments are not set forth.

Source: Uniform Post-Conviction Procedure Act, section 8.

The object of this section is to eliminate the unnecessary burden placed upon the courts by repetitious or specious petitions. It is highly desirable that a petitioner be required to assert all his claims in one petition. Unless good cause is shown why he did not assert all his claims in the original petition, his failure to so assert them constitutes a waiver. The way is left open, however, for a subsequent petition if the court finds grounds for relief that could not reasonably have been raised in the original petition.

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendments — Coordination: Chapter 302 in (2), near beginning of first sentence, inserted "the opportunity for", near middle inserted "were or", and at end substituted "considered, or decided in a proceeding brought under this chapter" for "in the original or amended petition"; and inserted (3) stating what grounds for relief include for purposes of this section. Amendment effective April 17, 1997.

Chapter 378 in (1)(a), in first and third sentences after "amended", inserted "original"; in (1)(b), at beginning, substituted "The court shall dismiss a second or subsequent petition by a person who has filed an original petition unless the second or subsequent petition raises" for "Those grounds for relief not raised in the original or amended petition are waived unless the court on hearing a subsequent petition finds" and near end, after "amended", inserted "original"; in (2) inserted second sentence disallowing ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel as an issue that can be raised in a second or subsequent petition; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Pursuant to sec. 4, Ch. 302, L. 1997, a coordination section, the amendments to the first sentence of (2) made by sec. 5, Ch. 378, L. 1997, were rendered void.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 302, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, it is the public policy of the State of Montana to provide persons accused of crimes with a fair and speedy trial and direct appellate review of legal issues fairly presented to the trial court; and

WHEREAS, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is preserved by Article II, section 19, of the Montana Constitution; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has set forth in Title 46, chapter 21, MCA, procedures for protecting an offender's right to postconviction review of the judgment; and

WHEREAS, there is no federal constitutional right to a specific statutorily prescribed postconviction procedure; and

WHEREAS, it is the Legislature's intent that decisions of Montana juries and judgments of Montana trial courts in criminal cases, including death penalty cases, be respected and given finality by other reviewing courts unless errors affecting an offender's substantial rights have occurred; and

WHEREAS, amendments to Montana's postconviction relief and death penalty statutes will further the goal of finality by codifying certain interpretations of those statutes by the Montana Supreme Court and clarifying legislative intent with respect to other provisions.

THEREFORE, it is the policy of the State of Montana to prescribe and limit, consistent with constitutional safeguards of the criminal justice process, the authority of an appellate or other reviewing court to consider legal and factual issues determined by the trial or sentencing court."

Severability: Section 5, Ch. 302, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 9(1), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Except as provided in subsection (2), [sections 3 through 6] [amending 46-21-101, 46-21-102, 46-21-105, and 46-21-201] apply to proceedings in which the conviction becomes final:

(a) after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]; or

(b) during the 12 months prior to the [effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997] if a petition under Title 46, chapter 21, is filed within the 12 months after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 96 in (1) inserted second sentence allowing original petition to be amended only once, inserted third sentence concerning the court deadline for the filing of the amended petition, inserted fourth sentence requiring deadline to be reasonably in advance of the hearing, and in last sentence, after "raised", inserted "in the original or amended petition".

1991 Amendment: In (1), in first sentence, substituted "46-21-101" for "this chapter"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Deleted "other than constitutional grounds" following "Any grounds" in the second sentence; added the last sentence referring to direct appeal grounds.

GENERALLY

Death of Attorney Prior to Filing Response to Petition for Postconviction Relief — Unique Circumstance Warranting Evidentiary Hearing: Heath filed a timely petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court ordered the attorney to respond to the charges, but before a response was filed, the attorney died. Heath then requested an evidentiary hearing, but the request for a hearing was denied on grounds that the court failed to see the benefit of a hearing without the attorney in attendance, and the petition was denied without holding a hearing. Heath appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Although not all circumstances require the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing on a petition for postconviction relief, a hearing may be appropriate in certain settings with unique circumstances. The attorney's death prior to filing a court-ordered response constituted one of those unique circumstances. The record failed to set forth the attorney's reasons for pretrial and trial actions, and denial of a hearing left Heath without any alternative means of inquiry into the attorney's actions and whether those decisions supported Heath's ineffective assistance claims. Therefore, under these unique circumstances the Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing to provide Heath a reasonable alternative means to inquire into the attorney's reasons for the pretrial and trial actions and to allow the District Court to evaluate Heath's claims. Heath v. St., 2009 MT 7, 348 M 361, 202 P3d 118 (2009). See also Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002), and Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Failure to Show Defense Counsel's Allegedly Deficient Performance Caused Sufficient Prejudice to Undermine Confidence in Jury's Verdict: The District Court's denial of a postconviction relief petition was affirmed when neither defense counsel's failure to object to the judge's comment on a defense witness's qualifications nor defense counsel's failure to object after the witness's disqualification as an expert amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. Hammer v. St., 2008 MT 342, 346 M 279, 194 P3d 699, (2008).

No Evidence of Prejudicial State Involvement in Parole Proceedings — Postconviction Petition Properly Denied: As part of a plea agreement, the state agreed to not involve itself in Maldonado's parole proceedings. Maldonado contended that the state breached the plea agreement when the County Attorney sent a letter to the Board of Pardons and Parole recommending against Maldonado's parole. The District Court concluded that the state's action was harmless, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed. Although the Board did receive the County Attorney's letter and one Board member met with a Deputy County Attorney, the state withdrew the letter of opposition, and the Board member who met with the Deputy County Attorney recused herself. Maldonado failed to present any evidence that the state's actions figured into the decision of the Board of Pardons and Parole or that Maldonado was prejudiced in any way, and the District Court did not err in denying Maldonado's request for postconviction relief on this issue. Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008).

Issue With Trial Court Evidentiary Ruling to Be Raised on Direct Appeal: Alleged errors committed by a District Court during trial that ostensibly affect the outcome of a case, including a trial court's allegedly erroneous evidentiary ruling regarding the admission of evidence of other crimes or acts, must be raised on direct appeal rather than through a postconviction relief proceeding. Adgerson v. St., 2007 MT 336, 340 M 242, 174 P3d 475 (2007).

No Record as to Why Counsel Took Particular Actions in Providing Defense — Effective Assistance Claim Not Appropriate for Direct Appeal: Hamilton claimed that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at a trial on incest charges, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to deliver on the promise that Hamilton would testify; (2) allowed a detective to testify regarding the veracity of Hamilton and the alleged victim; and (3) demeaned Hamilton and defense counsel in closing statements. The Supreme Court examined each claim but was unable to determine from the record why counsel took that particular strategy. Because the claims were not record-based, the effective assistance issue was not appropriate for direct appeal, and Hamilton's claim was dismissed without prejudice to raising the claim in postconviction relief proceedings. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 223, 339 M 92, 167 P3d 906 (2007), following St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Alleging Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Filed in District Court — Immunity of Attorney Assisting in Proceedings — Gillham Clarified: At the time of the decision in In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100 (1985), petitions for postconviction relief were addressed to the Supreme Court. Because the postconviction procedure has changed, pursuant to this section, petitions for postconviction relief are now initially filed in District Court. Thus, the Supreme Court clarified that petitions for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel may now be filed in the District Court where the postconviction proceeding is pending. The court affirmed that an attorney ordered to respond to a Gillham order issued by a District Court is not subject to a disciplinary proceeding before the Commission on Practice or subject to charges of malpractice. The immunity extends to all information, testimony, or documents necessarily provided in response to the allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007).

Section Procedural Bar — Foreclosure of Federal Habeas: This section is a state procedural bar that, under the federal procedural default doctrine, bars a federal habeas action. The section was clear, consistently applied, and well established at the time of the petitioner's purported default in raising grounds for relief on direct appeal that could have raised at that time. Hanson v. Mahoney, 433 F3d 1107 (9th Cir. 2006).

Failure to Raise Ineffective Assistance of Appellate Counsel in Petition for Postconviction Relief — Petition Barred: In a petition for postconviction relief, Swan claimed ineffective assistance of trial counsel. The District Court determined that the petition was barred under this section. On appeal, Swan claimed that under Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), unpreserved appellate issues could be raised in the context of a postconviction relief petition that alleges ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Hagen, the petitioner set forth an ineffective assistance claim related to appellate counsel, not trial counsel. Swan's argument was without merit, and the petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006).

Right to Substitute Judge Not Considered Structural Issue of Constitutional Dimension — No Ineffective Assistance of Trial Counsel for Failure to Move for Automatic Substitution of Trial Judge: In a petition for postconviction relief, Swan contended that trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to move for an automatic substitution of the trial judge and that this structural error entitled Swan to a new trial. However, structural error is typically of constitutional dimensions, precedes the trial, and undermines the fairness of the entire trial proceeding. Although lack of an impartial judge would be considered a structural error, failure to exercise the statutory right to substitute a trial judge is not of constitutional dimension and is not presumed prejudicial. Having failed to establish that counsel's failure to timely move for an automatic substitution of the trial judge was an error of constitutional dimension, Swan's postconviction argument failed. Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006), following St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

Claim That Prior Convictions Could Not Serve as Basis for Charging Current Crime as Felony Considered Nonjurisdictional — Guilty Plea as Waiver of Nonjurisdictional Claims — Postconviction Relief Denied for Failure to Raise Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal: Slavin was convicted of partner or family member assault in 1992 and 1993. In 2001, Slavin pleaded guilty to a third charge of the same crime, which was considered a felony because of the two prior convictions, and was sentenced. Slavin did not appeal, but later filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief on grounds that the two prior convictions were constitutionally infirm. The District Court denied the petition because Slavin failed to provide direct evidence overcoming the presumption of regularity attached to the prior convictions. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that Slavin's claim was a nonjurisdictional claim involving whether the District Court had statutory authority to impose the sentence, not whether the court had the power or capacity to impose the sentence. Slavin's knowing and voluntary guilty plea constituted a waiver of all nonjurisdictional defects and defenses that arose prior to the plea. Additionally, because Slavin failed to appeal the legality of the sentence, postconviction consideration of the sentence-related claim was precluded. The District Court was affirmed. Slavin v. St., 2005 MT 306, 329 M 424, 127 P3d 350 (2005), following Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2005), and overruling St. v. LaPier, 1998 MT 174, 289 M 392, 961 P2d 1274 (1998).

Record Devoid of Reasons for Counsel's Conduct During Voir Dire — Ineffective Assistance Claim Improperly Raised on Direct Appeal: Defendant's claims of ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire could not be addressed without considering matters outside the record and were therefore inappropriate for direct appeal. The claims were thus dismissed without prejudice to defendant's pursuit of the claims in postconviction proceedings. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), following St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003).

Counsel Decision to Forego Certain Defense Considered Trial Strategy — Insufficient Record to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Hendricks contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel in his assault trial because his attorney failed to raise the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force. However, in a disclosure statement filed prior to the omnibus hearing, Hendricks's counsel specifically noted that the defense of justifiable use of force would not be asserted. On the morning of trial, counsel stated that no jury instructions on the defense of justifiable use of force would be offered. Thus, the decision not to raise the defense was made consciously and was not the result of ignorance or neglect and was presumed to be sound trial strategy falling within the realm of reasonable professional conduct absent evidence to the contrary. Absent a sufficient record to address the issue of ineffective assistance, the direct appeal was dismissed, requiring Hendricks to raise the issue by a postconviction relief proceeding, if at all. The Supreme Court clarified that it will no longer use the approach in St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), to determine effective assistance of counsel, but rather the procedure set out in St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003). St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003), followed in St. v. Webster, 2005 MT 38, 326 M 112, 107 P3d 500 (2005).

One-Year Limitation on All Postconviction Proceedings, Including Second or Subsequent Petitions — Exception: Defendant contended that the 1-year period of limitation in 46-21-102 applies only to an initial or original petition for postconviction relief, not to a second or subsequent petition. The Supreme Court disagreed. The 1-year period of limitation applies to the initiation of all postconviction proceedings, including those initiated by a second or subsequent petition. Further, under this section, in order to avoid dismissal, a second or subsequent petition must also demonstrate good cause why its claims were not asserted in the original petition. A narrow exception to the 1-year limitation period is allowed under 46-21-102(2), which provides that a petition that alleges newly discovered evidence may be filed 1 year after the evidence was discovered or reasonably should have been discovered. St. v. Root, 2003 MT 28, 314 M 186, 64 P3d 1035 (2003).

Failure of District Court to Review Entire Record on Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Violative of Due Process When Same Judge Presided at Trial: When considering Hagen's petition for postconviction relief, the District Court did not review the entire trial proceedings before making its conclusions of law. Hagen contended that failure to review the entire record deprived him of due process and resulted in erroneous findings and conclusions. A fundamental requirement of due process is the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner; however, due process is a flexible concept that calls for such procedural protections as a particular situation demands. There is nothing in the postconviction relief statutes that explicitly requires that a District Court review the entire record, and the Supreme Court declined to impose a duty on District Courts to review the entire record in every situation. Rather, the scope of the duty is determined on a case-by-case basis. In this case, the District Court Judge who presided over the postconviction hearing was the same judge who presided at trial, so the duty to review relevant portions of the record at issue in the postconviction proceedings did not extend to the entire record because the same judge heard the trial testimony when it was presented. St. v. Hagen, 2002 MT 190, 311 M 117, 53 P3d 885 (2002).

Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Appeal Sentence and Withholding Exculpatory Evidence — No Showing of Deficient Performance of Counsel: Wright contended in a petition for postconviction relief that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to appeal the sentence after indicating to Wright that the sentence would be appealed and when counsel withheld exculpatory evidence from Wright prior to a change of plea hearing. Wright contended that counsel failed to mention that two of Wright's sexual assault victims made second statements that contradicted their original statements, which would have cleared Wright of 2 of the 11 charges against him. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test for ineffective assistance, which required Wright to first show that counsel's performance was deficient. By deposition, counsel in this case swore that he was never asked to appeal, and never indicated to Wright that the sentence would be appealed. The only evidence suggesting counsel's refusal to appeal was Wright's own affidavit. The District Court accepted counsel's statements, and that decision was not disturbed by the Supreme Court absent a showing of clear error. Further, the only support for Wright's contention that counsel withheld exculpatory evidence was Wright's own affidavit. Wright failed to produce the alleged revised statements or any records indicating that the victims even gave second statements; thus, Wright's affidavit was no more than a mere conclusory allegation unsupported by any evidence. The Supreme Court held that Wright failed to show that counsel's performance was deficient and declined to grant postconviction relief on the issue. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), followed in Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004).

Record Indicating Voluntary Nature of Guilty Plea — Postconviction Relief Barred When Ineffective Counsel Claim Could Have Been Raised on Direct Appeal: At a change of plea hearing, Wright pleaded guilty to 11 counts of sexual assault and was sentenced to 55 years in prison. The District Court suspended sentence on six counts. Wright did not file a direct appeal on any issue, but more than 1 year after sentencing, he filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, asserting that he was coerced into pleading guilty by his attorney. On the issue of the voluntariness of the guilty pleas, the Supreme Court looked to the record to determine whether this question of fact was documented in the District Court. In this case, there was ample indication in the record to determine that the issue of the voluntary nature of Wright's pleas and the propriety of counsel's representation were raised in District Court and documented. Wright could thus have raised the issue on direct appeal, but failing to do so, he was barred from raising the issue in a petition for postconviction relief pursuant to this section. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Failure of Trial Counsel to Request Ruling on Use of Suppressed Confession for Impeachment Purposes — Absence in Record of Understanding of Counsel's Course of Action — Remand for Determination of Reasonableness of Counsel's Actions: Harris claimed ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney at trial never requested a ruling from the trial court on the prosecution's use of Harris's suppressed confession for impeachment purposes. The trial court's deferral of the ruling initially preserved the issue for appeal should the prosecution have referred to the confession at trial, but Harris's counsel decided to raise the issue of the suppressed confession on direct examination, which created an opening for the prosecution to further question Harris on cross-examination and made the appealable issue moot. The record did not reveal whether counsel's acts and omissions sprang from tactical decisions based on articulable trial strategies or reflected misunderstandings of the law and trial procedures. Because information outside the record was necessary to determine the merits of Harris's assistance of counsel claim, this section did not bar a postconviction assertion of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial (see St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001)). The Supreme Court refused to speculate on whether the alleged errors reflected a coherent trial strategy or whether they were reasonable and deserved deference, so the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing to determine whether counsel's actions fell below an objective standard of reasonableness pursuant to the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), followed in St. v. Worthan, 2006 MT 147, 332 M 401, 138 P3d 805 (2006).

Inability to Document Claim of Ineffective Counsel From Record — Dismissal of Petition for Postconviction Relief Improper: Following conviction on numerous felony charges, Whitlow appealed his conviction and sentence, but did not raise concerns about ineffective assistance of counsel in the appeal. The conviction and sentence were upheld by the Montana Supreme Court, and Whitlow subsequently petitioned for postconviction relief, claiming that he was denied the right to effective assistance of counsel when his trial counsel failed to ask followup questions during voir dire. The District Court held that Whitlow's petition was barred under subsection (2) of this section because the claim of ineffective assistance should have been raised on direct appeal and that Whitlow's sole claim of ineffective assistance was to be found within the trial record. As set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), when ineffective assistance of counsel claims are based on facts of record in the underlying case, they must be raised on direct appeal, but when those claims cannot be documented from the record, they must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The state insisted that St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57 (1997), established that ineffective assistance claims, such as Whitlow's, can reasonably be raised on direct appeal and that in order to conclude that Whitlow's ineffective assistance claim was not record-based, Chastain must be overruled. The Supreme Court disagreed, distinguishing Chastain instead. In contrast to the jurors' clear expressions for potential bias in Chastain, in Whitlow's case, the jurors all indicated that they could reserve judgment until the facts had been presented. It was possible that Whitlow's counsel could have known other facts that would lead to the reasonable belief that, despite their possible prejudices, placing those jurors on the panel would be favorable to Whitlow. As stated in U.S. v. Taglia, 922 F2d 413 (7th Cir. 1991), when the only record on which a claim of ineffective assistance is based is the trial record, every indulgence will be given to the possibility that a seeming lapse or error by defense counsel was in fact a tactical move, flawed only in hindsight. Thus, in order to establish that his counsel's decision not to question or challenge the prospective jurors was not the product of sound trial strategy, Whitlow would have to go beyond the trial record. Because the ineffective assistance claims could not be documented from the record, they could not have been raised on direct appeal. The District Court erred in dismissing the petition for postconviction relief based on the bar in subsection (2) of this section. Without commenting on the merits of Whitlow's claim, the Supreme Court reversed. St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Both Procedurally and Time Barred: Wells pleaded guilty to felony assault, and the District Court entered its written judgment and sentence on January 2, 1998. Wells did not appeal, and the time for filing an appeal expired 60 days later, on March 3, 1998, which became the date of final conviction. In order to come within the 1-year period for a petition for postconviction relief, Wells needed to file by March 3, 1999, but the petition was not filed until December 22, 1999, when Wells asserted a double jeopardy claim for weapons enhancement based on St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999). The District Court dismissed the petition as untimely. Wells argued on appeal that the 1-year limitation is not a jurisdictional limitation, but rather a statute of limitations subject to equitable tolling, and contended that a tolling should be applied to the time period that Wells was incarcerated in New Mexico without adequate legal assistance. The Supreme Court recalled the holding in St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313 (2000), when it was held that the postconviction statute of limitations is indeed a jurisdictional limit on litigation to be waived only if there is a clear miscarriage of justice and defendant alleges newly discovered evidence that defendant did not commit the offense. Wells presented no new evidence of innocence. Further, Wells could have raised the Guillaume claim on direct appeal, but did not. Wells' petition was thus both procedurally and time-barred. St. v. Wells, 2001 MT 55, 304 M 329, 21 P3d 610 (2001), overruled in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), to the extent that Wells was barred from raising a double jeopardy claim in a petition for postconviction relief pursuant to this section for failing to raise the issue on direct appeal, and overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Wells held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Application for Sentence Review Not Considered Direct Appeal — Plain Error Doctrine Inapplicable: Postconviction relief provides a defendant with a procedure to address claims that would have been raised by means of a petition for writ of habeas corpus or a writ of error coram nobis, while the Sentence Review Division reviews the equity of a sentence. The plain language of this section makes it clear that an application for review of a sentence, as contained in 46-18-903, is not a direct appeal within the context of this section. Further, the common-law rule of plain error does not extend to cases in which a defendant had the opportunity to challenge a dangerous offender designation on direct appeal but chose not to. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996).

CLAIMS RAISED OR THAT COULD HAVE BEEN RAISED ON DIRECT APPEAL

Record-Based Claims of Involuntary Plea, Breach of Plea Agreement, and Impermissibility of Polygraph Results Barred From Postconviction Consideration: In a petition for postconviction relief, Evert raised issues regarding the voluntariness of his guilty plea, an alleged breach of the plea agreement by the County Attorney, and the potential of flawed sentencing because evidence of a polygraph test was admitted and considered by the sentencing court. The Supreme Court analyzed each claim and determined that each was record-based and could have been raised on direct appeal and was therefore procedurally barred from postconviction consideration. St. v. Evert, 2007 MT 30, 336 M 36, 152 P3d 713 (2007).

No Challenge to Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Relief Barred: Hardin claimed in a petition for postconviction relief that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to accept a nolo contendere plea to a sexual offense because such a plea is prohibited under 46-12-204. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Hardin failed to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal, so the claim was procedurally barred by this section from postconviction relief. Hardin v. St., 2006 MT 272, 334 M 204, 146 P3d 746 (2006).

Failure to Raise Legality of Sentence on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Consideration Barred: Osborne was convicted of a fourth DUI in 1999, and when charged with felony DUI in 2003, the state sought to have Osborne declared a persistent felony offender. The District Court obliged, and Osborne was declared a persistent felony offender and sentenced to 10 years in prison with 5 years suspended. Osborne did not appeal the sentence directly, but filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that the sentence was not legal. The petition was denied, and Osborne appealed. The state argued that the Supreme Court was procedurally barred under this section from considering the petition because the legal challenge to the sentence could have been raised on direct appeal. Osborne asserted that because the state did not raise the procedural bar issue in District Court, that argument was waived. Although the Supreme Court as a rule does not consider issues raised for the first time on appeal, this general rule does not preclude consideration of jurisdictional questions raised for the first time on appeal. The procedural bar is jurisdictional, so the court considered the state's argument, concluding that lack of subject matter jurisdiction may not be waived and that this section represents a jurisdictional limit on courts' ability to entertain and decide petitions for postconviction relief and effectively prohibits courts from exercising jurisdiction over grounds for relief that could have been raised on direct appeal. Thus, Osborne's failure to challenge the legality of the sentence on direct appeal precluded consideration in a postconviction petition. St. v. Osborne, 2005 MT 264, 329 M 95, 124 P3d 1085 (2005).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under 41-5-206. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to this section, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under 46-21-102, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

Untimely Hearing on Alleged Probation Violation — Not Considered in Postconviction Relief Proceeding When It Could Have Been Raised on Direct Appeal: Appellant's claim that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to revoke a suspended sentence following his arrest for another offense because he was not given a probation revocation hearing within 72 hours of his detention, as required by 46-23-1012, did not raise a true jurisdictional question. The claim was more properly characterized as a claim that his sentence was illegal, which was a nonjurisdictional claim for purposes of postconviction relief statutes. This section precludes postconviction relief on such a claim because appellant could have raised the claim on direct appeal. Sanders v. St., 2004 MT 374, 325 M 59, 103 P3d 1053 (2004).

Sentence Under Plea Bargain Within Statutory Maximum Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment — Cruel and Unusual Punishment Claim Not Raised on Direct Appeal Barred in Postconviction Proceedings: In exchange for dismissal of a charge of assault with a bodily fluid, Basto entered a plea agreement to plead guilty of possession of a deadly weapon by a prisoner. Basto was sentenced to 5 years in prison and subsequently filed a timely petition for postconviction relief on grounds that the sentence was disproportionately severe when compared to the sentences of other defendants in the case, constituting cruel and unusual punishment. The state responded that there is no guarantee of proportionality under the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment and that even if there were, Basto's sentence was still within statutory parameters. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. A sentence that is within maximum statutory guidelines does not violate the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Basto received the sentence that he bargained for, and there was nothing in the plea agreement that indicated that Basto would receive the same sentence as the other defendants. Further, Basto failed to raise any cruel and unusual punishment argument on direct appeal, so the argument was barred in postconviction proceedings under this section. Basto v. St., 2004 MT 257, 323 M 80, 97 P3d 1113 (2004). See also St. v. DeSalvo, 273 M 343, 903 P2d 202 (1995), and St. v. Mingus, 2004 MT 24, 319 M 349, 84 P3d 658 (2004).

Issues Subsumed in First Appeal Res Judicata on Second Appeal: In a noncite opinion (St. v. Kallowat, 2000 MT 354N), the Supreme Court affirmed defendant's Sanders County convictions for felony DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, and felony bail-jumping. Kallowat's petition for postconviction relief was denied, and Kallowat appealed. The issue decided in the first appeal was whether the arresting officer had probable cause, given that the officer was a prior felon. The Supreme Court held that even if the officer's employment status was questionable, he still had probable cause to make the arrest as a private citizen. Kallowat devoted most of the motion for postconviction relief reiterating the same arguments, and because the postconviction arguments were subsumed in the issues considered in the first appeal, the issue was res judicata and the Supreme Court declined further consideration. Kallowat v. St., 2004 MT 152, 321 M 501, 92 P3d 1176 (2004).

Failure to Raise Question of District Court's Sentencing Authority on Direct Appeal — Issue Precluded in Postconviction Hearing: In a petition for postconviction relief, Thurston alleged that the District Court erred by imposing a prison sentence without considering the statutory nonviolent offender criteria. The claim was denied by the District Court on grounds that the issue should have been raised on direct appeal. The Supreme Court affirmed. Contrary to Thurston's contention, the issue was not a subject matter jurisdiction issue that could be raised at any time. The failure to consider nonviolent offender sentencing alternatives should have been raised on direct appeal, and failure to do so precluded consideration of the issue in postconviction proceedings. Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145 (1996).

Failure to Provide Proof of Entitlement to Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Ellenburg raised several issues on appeal, some of which were raised in District Court and some of which were not. The Supreme Court declined to address all issues that were not preserved for appeal. Several other issues were procedurally barred because Ellenburg either raised them on direct appeal or reasonably could have raised them on direct appeal. Postconviction relief was denied on the remaining issues because Ellenburg waived the right to appeal those issues by failing to provide any evidentiary support for the allegations. The petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), following St. v. Schmalz, 1998 MT 210, 290 M 420, 964 P2d 763 (1998), St. v. Niederklopfer, 2000 MT 187, 300 M 397, 6 P3d 448 (2000), and St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and followed in Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Failure of Counsel to Properly Withdraw or Preserve Direct Appeal — Denial of Postconviction Petition Erroneous: Adams filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because his original court-appointed attorney failed to move to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial and because his subsequently appointed trial counsel offered a lesser included instruction on aggravated assault to the jury and failed to appeal to the Supreme Court following Adams' conviction, despite Adams' request to do so. The petition was denied on grounds that Adams failed to file an appeal within 60 days of judgment as required by former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and Adams appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under 46-8-103, appointed counsel is required to continue representation until final judgment, including appellate review, unless counsel is relieved by court order. Adams' counsel failed to comply with the requirements of 46-8-103 and effect a valid withdrawal, so the right to appeal was not preserved. When a defendant would have appealed but for counsel's deficient performance, the error is prejudicial. Thus, denial of Adams' petition for postconviction relief on procedural grounds was reversible error, and on remand, Adams was allowed to raise the issues that would have been raised on direct appeal but for counsel's abandonment of the appeal, as well as the issues raised in the petition for postconviction relief that were not previously raised. St. v. Adams, 2002 MT 202, 311 M 202, 54 P3d 50 (2002), following In re Petition of Hans, 1998

MT 7, 288 M 168, 958 P2d 1175 (1998), and St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Postconviction Relief Barred Upon Failure to Raise Issue of Alleged Unlawful Sentences on Direct Appeal: In a petition for postconviction relief, Wright alleged three erroneous sentencing issues: (1) oral pronouncement of the sentence varied from the written sentence; (2) the District Court's nunc pro tunc order was improper; and (3) a sentencing condition ordering Wright to stay out of Custer County was illegal. However, Wright could have reasonably raised the sentencing issues before the District Court and on direct appeal, but chose not to do so. Thus, Wright was procedurally barred under subsection (2) of this section from raising the issues in postconviction relief. St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Claims Raised on Direct Appeal Barred by Statute or Res Judicata on Petition for Postconviction Relief: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were summarily dismissed. Although res judicata prevents claims raised on appeal from being raised again in a petition for postconviction relief, Dawson argued that three of his claims for postconviction relief could not have been raised on direct appeal because they required evidence not found in the record and thus should not have been subject to summary judgment. The District Court concluded that the issues could have been raised on direct appeal and were not preserved through objection at trial and so were barred by res judicata and this section. The Supreme Court examined all three of Dawson's claims before affirming that this section was properly applied to two of the claims and that no prejudice resulted from the application of res judicata to the third. Lastly, Dawson raised Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182 (1996), as grounds for reconsideration of several other claims based on serving the "ends of justice". The Supreme Court felt no compulsion to reconsider any of Dawson's claims to serve those ends because the claims were barred by res judicata. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Authority to Defer Imposition of Sentence When Financial Condition Imposed — Failure to File Timely Appeal: Ingersoll filed for postconviction relief, arguing that the District Court lacked statutory authority to either impose consecutive deferred sentences or to defer imposition of his sentence in excess of 3 years. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had statutory authority at the time of sentencing under 46-18-201 to impose a deferred sentence for up to 6 years for Ingersoll's felony conviction for criminal mischief. Therefore, pursuant to former Rule 5(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), Ingersoll had 60 days after sentencing to appeal the court's authority to impose the sentence. Failure to file a timely appeal rendered Ingersoll's claim procedurally barred in a postconviction hearing. Ingersoll v. St., 1999 MT 215, 295 M 520, 986 P2d 403, 56 St. Rep. 843 (1999).

Failure to Raise Claims on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Relief Unavailable: In his petition for postconviction relief, Gollehon requested that the Supreme Court reconsider its rulings on certain issues that were decided on direct appeal. The court declined to address the issues again. Postconviction relief is not available on claims that a petitioner could have raised on direct appeal. Here, if Gollehon failed to adequately raise issues in his direct appeal, he was procedurally barred from doing so under a petition for postconviction relief. If the issues were adequately raised, relitigation of the issues was barred by res judicata. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999).

Issue of Whether Postconviction Claims Barred Raised Sua Sponte — Statutory Bar Not Primary Basis for Denial of Postconviction Relief: Wilson asserted that the District Court should not have raised sua sponte the issue of whether Wilson's postconviction claims were barred because of his failure to directly appeal a sentencing order to the Supreme Court. Although the District Court did suggest that the procedural bar in this section could be applied to Wilson's claims, the court fully discussed those claims on their merits. Therefore, the procedural bar was not the primary or alternative basis for denial of Wilson's postconviction relief and the court did not err. St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Petition for Postconviction Relief — Only Record-Based Claims Barred by Statute or Res Judicata: In 1993, Hagen was convicted of deliberate homicide and aggravated assault and appealed to the Montana Supreme Court, raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. Hagen then filed a petition for postconviction relief, raising nine claims of ineffective assistance of counsel and argued that: (1) none of the claims could have been raised in his earlier direct appeal; (2) all claims were appropriate for his petition because an evidentiary hearing was required for all nine issues; (3) appellate counsel was ineffective in raising a particular issue in his previous direct appeal; and (4) if some or all of the claims relating to ineffective assistance of trial counsel should have been raised in his direct appeal but were not and were therefore barred, his appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance in failing to present those issues in his direct appeal. The state responded that six of Hagen's claims were procedurally barred by this section because they could have been raised in his previous appeal, that one claim was barred by res judicata because it had been raised and decided in his previous appeal, and that three of Hagen's claims were not supported by the record or by the law and could therefore be decided on their merits without an evidentiary hearing. The District Court refused Hagen's request for an evidentiary hearing on his petition for postconviction relief and dismissed the petition, holding that the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel was raised in Hagen's direct appeal and had been decided by the Supreme Court, that Hagen's adequate remedy of appeal had been pursued, and that the petition for postconviction relief failed to state a claim for relief. Hagen appealed the dismissal of the petition to the Supreme Court. As an initial observation, the Supreme Court pointed out that although all of the issues raised by Hagen in his appeal of the District Court's denial of his petition for postconviction relief concerned ineffective assistance of counsel, not all of those claims were raised in the previous direct appeal and only those claims that were raised or that could have been raised in that previous direct appeal based upon the trial record were barred by the doctrine of res judicata or subsection (2) of this section. Citing In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156 (1991), and St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611 (1995), the Supreme Court further pointed out that those issues that are not record-based are properly brought to the Supreme Court by a petition for postconviction relief and that the District Court erred in failing to make that distinction and dismissing all of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims just because some of those claims may have been legitimately barred. The Supreme Court then individually reviewed each of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims and held that: (1) the manner in which mental evaluations of Hagen were disseminated during the trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (2) failure of Hagen's trial counsel to object to evidence introduced at trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (3) eliciting certain cross-examination testimony was based upon record evidence and was barred; (4) shifting the burden of proof during counsel's closing argument was a matter of record and barred by res judicata and this section; (5) failure to investigate facts that could have provided a defense was properly raised in the postconviction relief petition because there could be no record evidence on this issue; (6) failure of trial counsel to present impeachment testimony was in part resolved during the appeal and was therefore res judicata and, with regard to one potential witness, was a matter of failure of trial counsel to investigate, could not be a matter of record, and therefore was not barred; (7) failure of trial counsel to properly prepare witnesses for trial was not and could not be reflected in the trial record and therefore was not barred; and (8) failure of appellate counsel to raise the ineffective assistance of trial counsel could not have been a matter of record evidence by its very nature and was therefore not barred from consideration in the postconviction relief petition. Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999), distinguished in Smith v. St., 2000 MT 327, 303 M 47, 15 P3d 395, 57 St. Rep. 1387 (2000), and followed in St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001), and St. v. Upshaw, 2006 MT 341, 335 M 162, 153 P3d 579 (2006). See also St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), in which the question of voluntariness of a plea because of ineffective assistance of counsel was remanded for a hearing, despite the previous disposition of other voluntariness claims on direct appeal, because discussions between defendant and counsel were not record-based and thus could be presented only through postconviction proceedings.

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Issue at Trial or on Direct Appeal — Petition for Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Mothka was charged with conspiracy to sell dangerous drugs and entered a plea agreement under which he pleaded guilty, agreed to forfeiture of a majority of his business assets, and agreed not to contest any alleged violation of his constitutional rights. Following conviction and sentencing, Mothka claimed a double jeopardy violation in that he had already been punished by the civil forfeiture of his property. However, the claim could have been raised in District Court and on direct appeal but was not. Therefore, the District Court properly denied the petition as procedurally barred pursuant to this section. Mothka v. St., 281 M 175, 931 P2d 1331, 54 St. Rep. 122 (1997).

Procedural Bar Applicable to Jurisdictional Issues: The purpose of the waiver provision in subsection (2) of this section is to preserve the integrity of the trial and direct appeal and to prevent abuse of the postconviction relief process. The procedural bar rule in subsection (2) of this section does not apply in a petition for postconviction relief when the sentencing court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to impose the particular sentence. Because Moorman's claims contained in his petition for postconviction relief could have been raised on direct appeal, those claims were procedurally barred from consideration in a postconviction proceeding. St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145, 53 St. Rep. 1173 (1996), following St. v. Ohnmacht, 342 NW 2d 838 (Iowa 1983), and Maxfield v. St., 700 P2d 115 (Idaho App. 1985), distinguishing St. v. Akers, 106 M 43, 74 P2d 1138 (1938), and Smith v. St., 186 M 52, 606 P2d 153 (1980), and overruled, to the extent that a sentencing issue was treated as jurisdictional, in Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004).

Issues Not Raised on Appeal Barred by Statute — Scope of Bar: Brown was convicted of felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and the conviction was affirmed on appeal. Brown then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming ineffective assistance of his appellate counsel and that the introduction of certain evidence at trial violated his fourth and fifth amendment rights. In his petition for postconviction relief, Brown acknowledged that the constitutional issues were not raised on appeal but argued that the statutory bar should not apply because he tried to raise the issues, but neither his trial nor appellate counsels did so. Citing St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54 (1995), the Supreme Court held that because Brown's appellate counsel properly applied that law (concluding that issues not raised at trial could not be raised on appeal) and because the statutory language barring issues that "could reasonably have been raised on direct appeal" included issues not properly preserved at trial, Brown was precluded from raising those issues in a petition for postconviction relief. Brown v. St., 277 M 430, 922 P2d 1146, 53 St. Rep. 692 (1996).

Confession-Related Claims Barred on Appeal — Res Judicata: Beach raised claims regarding the voluntariness and legality of his confession. The Supreme Court compared the confession-related claims quoted in the petition for postconviction relief and found that either they were identical in substance to those raised on direct appeal or that they could have been raised on direct appeal but were not. The claims are barred by res judicata and this section because a procedural bar exists to postconviction claims that could have been raised on direct appeal. Beach v. Day, 275 M 370, 913 P2d 622, 53 St. Rep. 184 (1996).

Failure to Raise Issue of Waiver of Jury Trial on Direct Appeal — Postconviction Relief Procedurally Barred: Despite Christensen's allegation that he did not timely appeal the issue of whether he waived a jury trial because he was informed by both his attorney and the City Court Judge that an appeal could not be taken from a City Court bench trial, the District Court properly found that Christensen knew of the right to appeal but declined to do so. The procedural bar in this section serves to prevent abuses of the postconviction process and to preserve the integrity of the trial and the direct appeal process. Because Christensen could have raised the issue on direct appeal, he was statutorily barred from raising the issue in a postconviction petition. St. v. Christensen, 274 M 326, 907 P2d 970, 52 St. Rep. 1254 (1995).

Procedural Bar on Postconviction Claims That Could Have Been Raised on Appeal: As set out in Harris v. Reed, 489 US 255, 103 L Ed 2d 308, 109 S Ct 1038 (1989), the application of a state procedural bar is generally considered an independent and adequate state ground precluding federal habeas review. Further, a lack of absolute consistency in the application of a state's procedural bar is not necessarily fatal. Therefore, claims that could reasonably have been raised on appeal are procedurally barred from consideration in postconviction proceedings regardless of whether or not the failure to raise the claim was an intentional strategic decision of counsel to cause delay. In this case, those claims included denial of the right to a fair trial and to a fair and impartial jury, assertion of prosecutor misconduct, failure by the state to corroborate testimony of an accomplice witness, prejudice caused by the presence of armed officers in the courtroom during trial, failure to convict by a unanimous jury, jury instructions regarding voluntary intoxication and the inference of a criminal mental state, constitutionality of Montana's death penalty, double jeopardy, and failure by the trial court to disclose a psychological report to the prosecution. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995), overruling St. v. Henricks, 206 M 469, 672 P2d 20 (1983), and followed in Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred by Waiver of Right to Appeal: Manula was arrested for rape and kidnapping and released on bond. While awaiting trial, he was arrested for rape, incest, and kidnapping. He stood trial and was convicted for the second series of crimes. As part of a plea agreement, Manula voluntarily signed a waiver of rights to not appeal his conviction in the trial for the second set of crimes and to enter an "Alford" guilty plea to the first set of crimes in return for the prosecution recommending specific sentences in both causes of action. Manula subsequently petitioned for postconviction relief on the basis of denial of his right to appeal, ineffective assistance of counsel, lack of evidence, and other claims. The Supreme Court held that a voluntary waiver of the right to appeal barred the defendant from raising other claims for postconviction relief. In re Petition of Manula, 263 M 166, 866 P2d 1127, 50 St. Rep. 1758 (1993), followed in St. v. Hanson, 1999 MT 226, 296 M 82, 988 P2d 299, 56 St. Rep. 891 (1999).

Reserving for Postconviction Relief — Ineffective Assistance Claim That May Be Made on Appeal: On appeal, a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel with respect to any matters in the record may not be reserved and later made in a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Postconviction Relief Barred When Allegations Appealable on Direct Appeal: The District Court properly denied defendant's petition for postconviction relief when it was determined that defendant's allegations could have been, should have been, or were raised on direct appeal and that petitioner's allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel were merely conclusory rather than based on facts in the record. Eiler v. St., 254 M 39, 833 P2d 1124, 49 St. Rep. 611 (1992), followed in St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995). St. v. Baker was followed in Brown v. St., 277 M 430, 922 P2d 1146, 53 St. Rep. 692 (1996), Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), and Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Ineffective Counsel Claims Not Raised on Direct Appeal: After his convictions for aggravated burglary, felony assault (now assault with a weapon), and felony theft, petitioner obtained new counsel and appealed his convictions to the Supreme Court. When the convictions were affirmed on appeal, petitioner filed for postconviction relief, alleging that he was denied effective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court denied the petition, ruling that because petitioner failed to raise claims concerning ineffective assistance of counsel on direct appeal, his assertions were procedurally barred. In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156, 48 St. Rep. 702 (1991), followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Allegation of Newly Discovered Evidence — Failure to Timely Appeal — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: The Supreme Court denied a petition for writ of habeas corpus based on allegations of newly discovered medical evidence, noting that there was no showing as to what constituted the new evidence and that petitioner was afforded the right of appeal but did not take it. Tecca v. McCormick, 246 M 317, 806 P2d 11, 47 St. Rep. 2068 (1990), followed in Blaney v. Gamble, 266 M 51, 879 P2d 51, 51 St. Rep. 466 (1994). Tecca was distinguished in Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Raising Issue in Postconviction Relief That Could Have Been Preserved for Appeal — Abuse of Process: Defendant sought to challenge jury instructions in a petition for postconviction relief after failing to object to the disputed instructions at trial. He offered no excuse for failing to object and did not argue that he could not have reasonably complied with the procedural requirements of 46-16-401 and 46-20-104. Because objections to the instructions could have been raised at trial, those grounds for relief could have reasonably been available for direct appeal. To allow defendant to raise an issue in postconviction relief that he could reasonably have preserved for direct appeal would constitute an abuse of process. St. v. Gorder, 243 M 333, 792 P2d 370, 47 St. Rep. 958 (1990), followed in St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995). Baker was followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Evidentiary Issues Not Raised on Direct Appeal: The defendant refused to cooperate with his appointed appellate attorney. The attorney was relieved, and the defendant was ordered to proceed pro se and was given an extension of time to file his appellate brief. Two weeks after the time period expired, the Supreme Court dismissed his appeal. The defendant then filed a petition for postconviction relief that included claims of failure to suppress evidence and the presentation of false testimony by the state. The Supreme Court ruled that the defendant was procedurally barred from raising issues in a petition for postconviction relief that could have been raised on direct appeal. Duncan v. St., 243 M 232, 794 P2d 331, 47 St. Rep. 738 (1990), followed in St. v. McColley, 247 M 524, 807 P2d 1358, 48 St. Rep. 290 (1991), and St. v. Baker, 272 M 273, 901 P2d 54, 52 St. Rep. 735 (1995). Baker was followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Judicial and Prosecutorial Misconduct Not Raised on Direct Appeal: The defendant argued that several comments made at trial by the judge and prosecuting attorney amounted to misconduct. The Supreme Court referred to the direct language of the statute and held that the argument of prosecutorial and judicial misconduct was not raised on direct appeal and therefore was procedurally barred on petition. In re Petition of Martin, 240 M 419, 787 P2d 746, 46 St. Rep. 2213 (1989).

CLAIMS ALLOWED IN POSTCONVICTION RELIEF PROCEEDING

Defendant's Failure to Discover Alleged Error in Sentencing Process Until Time for Appeal Expired — Postconviction Proceeding Not Barred: Phillips sought postconviction relief on grounds that his tribal court juvenile record had been illegally requested by the state and incorporated into the presentence investigation report and sentencing proceedings in violation of due process. The state asserted that the matter could have been raised on direct appeal and was thus inappropriate for postconviction relief. However, by the time that Phillips discovered the alleged error, the time for appeal of his conviction had passed, so the Supreme Court held that the claim was not procedurally barred from postconviction consideration. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Only Record-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim on Appeal: Frasure claimed on appeal that her attorney provided ineffective assistance at trial by failing to object to the introduction of certain evidence. However, the Supreme Court will determine that there was ineffective assistance of counsel only if that conclusion can be based on the record on appeal or if there is no plausible justification for counsel's actions or inactions. Frasure failed to establish that her ineffective assistance claim was record-based, so the claim was dismissed without prejudice to the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 305, 323 M 479, 100 P3d 1013 (2004). See also St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003).

Proper Consideration in Postconviction Relief Proceedings of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims Based on Conversations off Record: In postconviction relief proceedings, Thurston contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel because: (1) he had given counsel information needed to support at least seven criteria for designating Thurston as a nondangerous offender, but counsel failed to raise the mitigating information at the sentencing hearing; (2) counsel did not discuss with Thurston how to refute testimony by the state's witnesses until they were walking to the sentencing hearing and it was too late; and (3) counsel failed to provide Thurston with an accurate portrayal of the sentence contained in a plea agreement. The District Court dismissed the claims on grounds that they would have been reflected in the record and should have been raised on direct appeal. The Supreme Court disagreed. The basis for the claims rested on conversations that Thurston had with counsel outside the courtroom and thus by their very nature could not have been reflected in transcripts or the record. The Supreme Court therefore reversed and ordered the District Court to consider the issues on their merits in accordance with the ineffective assistance test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Thurston v. St., 2004 MT 142, 321 M 411, 91 P3d 1259 (2004).

Failure of Defense Counsel to Question Defendant's Mental Condition During Sentencing — Alleged Errors in Attorney Performance Properly Resolved in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: Watson petitioned for postconviction relief and claimed that defense counsel provided inadequate assistance at sentencing by not questioning whether Watson suffered from a mental disease or defect. The District Court denied the petition, determining that the ineffective assistance claim was record-based and should have been raised on direct appeal. In St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001), the Supreme Court outlined a two-step process for determining whether ineffective assistance claims should have been raised on appeal or in a postconviction hearing. First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for a defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reasons for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expressed a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. Here, the record was devoid of any evidence as to why counsel did not question Watson's mental condition, so Watson could not have properly raised an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Therefore, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for an evidentiary postconviction hearing to determine whether counsel's act or omission was a trial strategy or tactical decision. Watson v. St., 2002 MT 329, 313 M 209, 61 P3d 759 (2002), following Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). See also Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002).

Summary Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief — Defendant Entitled to Hearing to Present Nonrecord-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims: Schaff was convicted of deliberate homicide and filed a petition for postconviction relief, contending that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when forced to decide whether to accept a plea agreement after considering the matter for less than 2 hours. He claimed that with the assistance of different counsel at the hearing to withdraw the guilty plea, he could have established that the plea was not voluntary. Schaff further argued that he could not have raised the precise issue of ineffective assistance because discussions between his attorney and him were not record-based and thus could be presented only through a petition for postconviction relief. The state argued that the petition was defective because Schaff did not sufficiently specify the claim of ineffective assistance, offered no supporting information, and did not identify precisely why counsel was ineffective. The state also pointed out that Schaff had previously raised the issue of voluntariness in St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682 (1998), and that the issue had been decided and was barred from being raised again by the doctrine of res judicata. The Supreme Court disagreed that the voluntariness of Schaff's plea was not a proper subject for a postconviction proceeding. Although the issue of voluntariness was previously raised, Schaff did not raise the precise question of whether he had received competent advice prior to entering a plea or the question of whether he was misled to believe that he was required to proceed with the change of plea hearing with trial counsel when he was legally entitled to be represented by other counsel. The question of whether Schaff was properly advised necessarily touched on the voluntariness of the plea but was separate from it and was not part of the record in the direct appeal, nor was it the type of evidence that Schaff would be likely to present at a change of plea hearing. Rather than summarily dismiss Schaff's petition, the better course would have been for the District Court to appoint Schaff counsel and provide an opportunity for a hearing to present the ineffective assistance claims. Thus, the Supreme Court affirmed the part of the District Court's order with regard to any record-based voluntariness claims that had already been addressed by direct appeal, but reversed that part of the order that held that Schaff was procedurally barred from raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel in the nonrecord-based postconviction proceeding. St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001). Following hearing on remand, the District Court again denied Schaff's petition for postconviction relief, and Schaff appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying the Strickland test, the Supreme Court found that Schaff proved neither that counsel's assistance was deficient nor that counsel's performance was prejudicial to Schaff's case. An ineffective assistance claim must be grounded on facts in the record rather than on mere conclusory allegations. Schaff's claim was not supported by the record, so the petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Schaff v. St., 2003 MT 187, 316 M 453, 73 P3d 806 (2003). See also Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999).

Allegation of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel That Is Not Record-Based Must Be Submitted as Petition for Postconviction Relief: Dyfort appealed his burglary conviction, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney stipulated to the admission as evidence of an accomplice's Alford plea of guilty. The Supreme Court stated that before it could reach the merits of Dyfort's claim, it had to determine if the claim was properly before it. The Supreme Court pointed out that when ineffective assistance of counsel claims are based on facts of record in the underlying case, they must be raised in the direct appeal and when the claims cannot be documented from the record, they must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. Dyfort had argued that his attorney had originally planned to not object to admission of the accomplice's plea because the attorney intended to introduce evidence to show that, as a condition of the accomplice's plea bargain, the accomplice could avoid deportation. The trial court ruled, prior to the admission of the Alford plea, that the defense counsel could not mention that the plea bargain negated the possibility of deportation. However, subsequent to the plea's admission, Dyfort's attorney failed to request a cautionary instruction to the jury concerning the limitations on the permissible use of the evidence. The Supreme Court held that the trial record did not contain facts indicating what specific tactical intentions Dyfort's attorney may have had relating to the admission of the accomplice's plea bargain, and therefore Dyfort's allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel were not record-based and had to be submitted in a petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court dismissed Dyfort's appeal without prejudice. St. v. Dyfort, 2000 MT 338, 303 M 153, 15 P3d 464, 57 St. Rep. 1438 (2000).

Petition for Postconviction Relief — Only Record-Based Claims Barred by Statute or Res Judicata: In 1993, Hagen was convicted of deliberate homicide and aggravated assault and appealed to the Montana Supreme Court, raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. Hagen then filed a petition for postconviction relief, raising nine claims of ineffective assistance of counsel and argued that: (1) none of the claims could have been raised in his earlier direct appeal; (2) all claims were appropriate for his petition because an evidentiary hearing was required for all nine issues; (3) appellate counsel was ineffective in raising a particular issue in his previous direct appeal; and (4) if some or all of the claims relating to ineffective assistance of trial counsel should have been raised in his direct appeal but were not and were therefore barred, his appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance in failing to present those issues in his direct appeal. The state responded that six of Hagen's claims were procedurally barred by this section because they could have been raised in his previous appeal, that one claim was barred by res judicata because it had been raised and decided in his previous appeal, and that three of Hagen's claims were not supported by the record or by the law and could therefore be decided on their merits without an evidentiary hearing. The District Court refused Hagen's request for an evidentiary hearing on his petition for postconviction relief and dismissed the petition, holding that the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel was raised in Hagen's direct appeal and had been decided by the Supreme Court, that Hagen's adequate remedy of appeal had been pursued, and that the petition for postconviction relief failed to state a claim for relief. Hagen appealed the dismissal of the petition to the Supreme Court. As an initial observation, the Supreme Court pointed out that although all of the issues raised by Hagen in his appeal of the District Court's denial of his petition for postconviction relief concerned ineffective assistance of counsel, not all of those claims were raised in the previous direct appeal and only those claims that were raised or that could have been raised in that previous direct appeal based upon the trial record were barred by the doctrine of res judicata or subsection (2) of this section. Citing In re Petition of Evans, 250 M 172, 819 P2d 156 (1991), and St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611 (1995), the Supreme Court further pointed out that those issues that are not record-based are properly brought to the Supreme Court by a petition for postconviction relief and that the District Court erred in failing to make that distinction and dismissing all of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims just because some of those claims may have been legitimately barred. The Supreme Court then individually reviewed each of Hagen's ineffective assistance claims and held that: (1) the manner in which mental evaluations of Hagen were disseminated during the trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (2) failure of Hagen's trial counsel to object to evidence introduced at trial was a matter of record and was therefore barred; (3) eliciting certain cross-examination testimony was based upon record evidence and was barred; (4) shifting the burden of proof during counsel's closing argument was a matter of record and barred by res judicata and this section; (5) failure to investigate facts that could have provided a defense was properly raised in the postconviction relief petition because there could be no record evidence on this issue; (6) failure of trial counsel to present impeachment testimony was in part resolved during the appeal and was therefore res judicata and, with regard to one potential witness, was a matter of failure of trial counsel to investigate, could not be a matter of record, and therefore was not barred; (7) failure of trial counsel to properly prepare witnesses for trial was not and could not be reflected in the trial record and therefore was not barred; and (8) failure of appellate counsel to raise the ineffective assistance of trial counsel could not have been a matter of record evidence by its very nature and was therefore not barred from consideration in the postconviction relief petition. Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999), distinguished in Smith v. St., 2000 MT 327, 303 M 47, 15 P3d 395, 57 St. Rep. 1387 (2000). See also St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), in which the question of voluntariness of a plea because of ineffective assistance of counsel was remanded for a hearing, despite the previous disposition of other voluntariness claims on direct appeal, because discussions between defendant and counsel were not record-based and thus could be presented only through postconviction proceedings.

AMENDED PETITION

Discretion of District Court to Set Time for Filing Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief: Sellner timely filed a petition for postconviction relief and subsequently filed an amended petition more than 2 years after the original petition was filed. The state contended that under Maier v. St., 2003 MT 144, 316 M 181, 69 P3d 1194 (2003), the amended petition was untimely because it was not filed within 1 year after final conviction. The Supreme Court declined to apply Maier because Maier involved the time limit applicable to the discovery of new evidence, which did not apply here. Instead, the court applied the third sentence of subsection (1)(a) of this section, which allows the District Court discretion to set deadlines as it sees fit as long as that discretion is not abused or is not subject to the new evidence deadline. Thus, Sellner's amended petition was not procedurally barred. Sellner v. St., 2004 MT 205, 322 M 310, 95 P3d 708 (2004).

No Ineffective Assistance Based on Defense Counsel's Personal Problems — Remand for Consideration of Issues in Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief: In an original petition for postconviction relief, Williams raised five issues of ineffective assistance of counsel, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to conduct proper discovery; (2) failed to obtain and call necessary witnesses at trial; (3) failed to properly question witnesses; (4) conducted inadequate trial preparation; and (5) allowed his personal problems to detract from his representation. The District Court allowed Williams to amend the petition to add two additional claims, contending that counsel failed to substitute the trial judge when requested to do so and failed to call necessary and beneficial witnesses at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court's review of the record revealed that the District Court did not erroneously address any of the original five claims, including the assertion that defense counsel's overall emotional state adversely affected Williams's representation. However, the record showed that the two issues added by Williams in the amended petition were never addressed, so the District Court's findings regarding those two material issues were insufficient. The case was remanded to allow further consideration of the additional claims. Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002).

Dismissal of Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief — Failure to Address New Claims in Order Harmless Error — Postconviction Relief Claims Civil in Nature: On remand, petitioner amended the petition for postconviction relief, adding claims 16-18. By remanding to the District Court to allow petitioner to add proposed claims 16-18, the Supreme Court necessarily required the District Court to address the merits of those claims. However, the District Court's failure to address the new claims in its Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Order was harmless error. Petitioner's newly discovered evidence claims, Brady claim, and cumulative error claims were without merit. Postconviction relief proceedings are collateral attacks that are civil in nature and independent of the underlying criminal cause. If there is no showing of substantial injustice the error is harmless. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Filed With Supreme Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Amend Pleadings on Remand: Boucher filed with the Supreme Court for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court remanded to District Court for an evidentiary hearing on whether Boucher was denied effective assistance of counsel because of counsel's failure to investigate and formulate a defense based on the victim's history of making false accusations of sexual assault. On remand, Boucher sought to offer additional evidence of ineffective counsel unrelated to the issue remanded. Although a District Court has the discretion to grant or deny a motion to amend a postconviction petition when the petition is filed with that court, in cases like this when the petition is originally filed with the Supreme Court and remanded, the District Court does not have authority to grant leave to amend the pleadings to include allegations not included in the original petition. St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), distinguishing Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997), and Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

SECOND OR SUBSEQUENT PETITION

Second Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Procedurally or Time Barred: After a 1995 petition for postconviction relief was denied, Beach filed in 2008 for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence, but the District Court, without a hearing, denied the petition on grounds that it was procedurally and time barred. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The 2008 petition claimed that the newly discovered evidence was only recently available and thus could not have been raised in the 1995 petition. Since nothing indicated a lack of diligence on Beach's part in locating the new evidence, the Supreme Court granted Beach the benefit of the doubt as to whether he acted with sufficient alacrity in locating the new evidence, so the 2008 petition was not procedurally barred. To determine whether Beach would be entitled to a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, the court applied the criteria in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), regarding a trial court's consideration of what impact new evidence might have when looking prospectively at a new trial with a new jury. The court concluded that the District Court abused its discretion by denying the petition without holding an evidentiary hearing on the new evidence. The case was remanded to allow a hearing to evaluate whether the evidence was actually newly discovered and whether a reasonable jury would have found Beach guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The newly discovered evidence must be material to the issues at trial and neither cumulative nor merely impeaching, and in order to prevail on a substantive innocence claim, Beach was required to show by clear and convincing evidence that but for a procedural error, no reasonable juror would have found him guilty. Beach v. St., 2009 MT 398, 353 M 411, 220 P3d 667 (2009). See also Schlup v. Delo, 513 US 298 (1995), St. v. Redcrow, 1999 MT 95, 294 M 252, 980 P2d 622 (1999), and St. v. Pope, 2003 MT 330, 318 M 383, 80 P3d 1232 (2003).

Only One Amendment Allowed to Petition for Postconviction Relief: A petitioner may amend a petition for postconviction relief only once. A second or subsequent petition must be dismissed unless the second or subsequent petition raises grounds for relief that could not reasonably have been raised in the original or amended petition. St. v. Evert, 2007 MT 30, 336 M 36, 152 P3d 713 (2007).

Third Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred as Successive Petition: Hawkins filed a petition for postconviction relief in District Court in 1983, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. Hawkins filed a similar petition in 1997. In 1998, Hawkins petitioned the Supreme Court for postconviction relief in an original proceeding, which the court allowed, ordering the state to file a supplemental response addressing the merits of Hawkins' petition. The state responded that the petition should be barred as a successive petition. The Supreme Court noted that the 1998 petition was, in effect, Hawkins' third petition alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. Nothing in Montana statutory law allows a petitioner three chances to present a claim for collateral relief. Hawkins' claims could reasonably have been raised in the original petition, so pursuant to this section, the 1998 claim was barred as a successive petition. Hawkins v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 82, 294 M 124, 979 P2d 697, 56 St. Rep. 345 (1999).

Issue Known but Not Appreciated and Thus Not Raised in First Petition — Pro Se Petitioner Held to Same Standard as Attorney: Bromgard knew of the jury experiment when, acting pro se, he filed his first petition for postconviction relief but failed to include the experiment as a ground for relief. He claimed that the issue of jury misconduct could not reasonably have been raised in the first petition because at the time of the first petition, he was unaware of the legal significance of the experiment. He also claimed that his failure to include the experiment in the first petition should be excused because he was not represented by counsel in filing the first petition. The lower court did not err in barring the experiment claim from a second petition on the grounds that it could reasonably have been raised in the first petition. In addition, Bromgard knew when he filed his first petition that his trial lawyer did not challenge the experiment in any posttrial motion. Therefore, Bromgard could not, in his second petition, raise the failure to challenge as ineffective assistance of counsel because he could reasonably have raised the issue in the first petition. A person appearing pro se in appealing the denial of a petition for postconviction relief is held to the same standards as an attorney. St. v. Bromgard, 285 M 170, 948 P2d 182, 54 St. Rep. 1096 (1997).

Error to Fail to Hold Hearing on Good Cause for Not Raising Grounds in First Petition: Whether grounds for relief raised in a second petition of postconviction relief could reasonably have been raised in the first petition and whether good cause could be shown why those grounds were not raised in the first petition were questions of fact best left to the District Court. (See 1995 amendment.) The District Court, without a hearing on the matter, erroneously denied the second petition on the grounds that the issue sought to be raised could have been raised on direct appeal. A further error, requiring a vacation of the denial and a remand, occurred because lack of a hearing prevented a determination of whether the grounds raised in the second petition could have been raised in the first petition. If the grounds could have been raised initially, the second petition should be denied, and if they could not have been raised, the merits of the second petition should be decided. St. v. Bromgard, 273 M 20, 901 P2d 611, 52 St. Rep. 947 (1995), followed in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

DECISION ON PARTICULAR CLAIMS

No Showing of Ineffective Counsel — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: In a petition for postconviction relief, DuBray asserted ineffective assistance of trial and appellate counsel based on: (1) trial counsel's introduction of prejudicial issues during trial; (2) trial counsel's conflict of interest; (3) failure of trial counsel to ensure DuBray's presence at all critical stages of the trial; and (4) appellate counsel's failure to raise issues 2 and 3 on appeal. The District Court found no ineffective assistance and denied DuBray's petition, and on appeal, the Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Counsel's actions regarding the introduction of allegedly prejudicial issues were made for tactical reasons and stemmed from informed professional deliberation, and DuBray could not demonstrate that counsel's actions were deficient. Defense counsel clearly revealed the potential conflict of interest within the trial record, so that claim was procedurally barred by this section. The claim that counsel erred by not ensuring DuBray's presence at all critical trial stages could have been raised on direct appeal and thus was procedurally barred from consideration in postconviction proceedings. DuBray's contention of error by appellate counsel for failure to raise the conflict of interest claim failed because DuBray did not establish that trial counsel actively represented conflicting interests and because DuBray himself stated that he did not wish to discharge trial counsel merely because counsel had a previous attorney-client relationship with a potentially adverse party. Last, Dubray's assertion that he might have demanded that trial counsel act differently had DuBray been present during interactions between the trial court and the jury foreman was pure speculation, particularly given that DuBray deferred to counsel on such matters. DuBray's postconviction petition was properly denied. DuBray v. St., 2008 MT 121, 342 M 520, 182 P3d 753 (2008).

Claims of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Properly Denied Absent Showing of Prejudice: Hartinger filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds that he received ineffective assistance because his counsel: (1) failed to file a notice of appeal; (2) failed to move to suppress Hartinger's incriminating statements; (3) failed to move to suppress newly discovered evidence; and (4) incorrectly conducted voir dire. The petition was denied, and Hartinger appealed. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed, noting that ineffective assistance claims must stem from counsel's neglect or ignorance rather than from informed, professional deliberation. First, Hartinger understood the right to file an out-of-time appeal but knowingly and intentionally waived that right, instead choosing to file for postconviction relief, so Hartinger could claim no prejudice from counsel's failure to file an appeal. Second, even if Hartinger's incriminating statements should have been suppressed, there was more than enough evidence to support the conviction, so no prejudice accrued. Third, counsel's decision to not suppress newly discovered evidence was an informed, tactical decision that did not constitute deficient performance. Fourth, counsel's tactic of using a peremptory challenge to remove a prospective juror who voiced pro-police views during voir dire was a reasonable trial tactic, reaffirmed the essence of voir dire, and could not be viewed as deficient performance. Hartinger v. St., 2007 MT 141, 337 M 432, 162 P3d 95 (2007).

No Prejudice Shown in Incorporation of Tribal Court Juvenile Record Into Sentencing Procedure — Due Process Not Violated: Phillips sought postconviction relief on grounds that his tribal court juvenile record had been illegally requested by the state and incorporated into the presentence investigation report and sentencing proceedings in violation of due process. The petition was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed without addressing the issue of release of the record under tribal law. Phillips did not present any evidence that the juvenile record or any information in the presentence investigation report was materially inaccurate, that the tribal court record influenced placement with the Department of Corrections, or that he was prejudiced by the tribal court record in violation of due process, so dismissal of the petition for postconviction relief was not erroneous. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

Defense Counsel's Trial Tactics Not Basis for Ineffective Assistance Claim — Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Garrett filed a petition for postconviction relief, asserting that trial counsel rendered ineffective assistance by lack of preparation and deficient presentation, failure to make timely hearsay objections, failure to obtain a defense expert and call witnesses, and failure to offer adequate jury instructions and to assert affirmative defenses. The District Court denied the petition, and on appeal, the Supreme Court considered each assertion and affirmed. The decision whether and when to make an opening statement is a matter of trial tactics that do not form the basis for an ineffective assistance claim, and decisions regarding the timing and number of objections also lie within trial counsel's tactical discretion. The decision not to call a handwriting expert for the defense was not ineffective assistance because Garrett admitted altering the documents on which the expert would have testified. The 10 jury instructions offered by defense counsel were consciously and tactically chosen to further the chosen defense theory. Counsel's decisions regarding the calling of potential witnesses and other tactical decisions at trial, did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness required to find ineffective assistance of counsel, and the petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Garrett v. St., 2005 MT 197, 328 M 165, 119 P3d 55 (2005).

Failure to Meet Strickland Burden Demonstrating Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Petition for Postconviction Relief Properly Denied: Following conviction for deliberate homicide and a failed direct appeal, Elliott filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief alleging 12 separate instances of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial and on direct appeal. The District Court held a hearing at which counsel testified and then denied the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, examined the alleged instances of counsel ineffectiveness, and concluded that Elliott failed to overcome the strong presumption that counsels' defense strategies and trial tactics fell within the wide range of sound professional decisions. Elliott also failed to demonstrate prejudice or a reasonable probability that the result of the proceedings would have been different had counsel not performed ineffectively. Failing the Strickland test, denial of Elliott's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. Elliott v. St., 2005 MT 10, 325 M 345, 106 P3d 517 (2005). See also St. v. Kougl, 2004 MT 243, 323 M 6, 97 P3d 2095 (2004).

Evidence Provided at Trial Not Considered Newly Discovered Evidence — Postconviction Claim Time-Barred: Oatman failed to bring a claim for postconviction relief within the 5-year statute of limitations under the 1993 version of 46-21-102 that was in effect at the time of conviction, so the claim was time-barred. Nevertheless, Oatman contended that the claim should be considered based on newly discovered evidence that a victim had contradicted the allegation of robbery. However, the jury heard the testimony at trial, so the evidence could not be considered to be newly discovered. The alleged new evidence did not extend the statute of limitations, so denial of Oatman's claim was proper. Oatman v. St., 2004 MT 360, 324 M 472, 104 P3d 1048 (2004).

Increased Sentence Imposed on Resentencing After Original Sentence Vacated Not Due Process Violation: After Redfern's petition for postconviction relief was granted, Redfern's original sentence was vacated and the District Court resentenced him to a greater period of potential imprisonment and supervision than the original sentence. Redfern appealed the new sentence, contending that the greater sentence on resentencing violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under N.C. v. Pearce 395 US 711 (1969), neither double jeopardy nor equal protection bars imposition of a more severe sentence upon resentencing after an original conviction is set aside unless a heavier sentence is imposed to punish a defendant for successfully having the original conviction set aside. However, in order to meet due process requirements and allow full appellate review of the constitutional legitimacy of the sentence, a longer sentence on resentencing after a new trial must be based on objective information concerning identifiable conduct of the defendant after the original sentencing and reasons for the longer sentence must affirmatively appear on the record. Both conditions were met here, there was no showing that the more severe sentence was imposed as retaliatory motivation by the sentencing judge, and the new sentence was within statutory sentencing parameters. St. v. Redfern, 2004 MT 277, 323 M 225, 99 P3d 223 (2004), following St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363 (1988), and St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), and distinguishing St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Miscarriage of Justice Exception to Statute of Limitations for Postconviction Relief Applicable Only to Claim of Discovery of New Evidence — Recanted Victim Testimony Not Considered New Evidence: Maier cited 12 grounds for postconviction relief, including a claim alleging that newly discovered evidence in the form of the victim's recantation established that Maier did not commit attempted deliberate homicide. The District Court held that 10 of the claims were procedurally barred by this section, that 1 claim was improper under the facts of the case, and that the final claim of newly discovered evidence merited a response by the state. The state contended that the final claim was barred by 46-21-102 because it was not raised within 1 year of final judgment. The District Court rejected the state's argument, but denied the claim anyway, and Maier appealed. The Supreme Court considered the nexus between 46-21-102 and this section, which address amendments to petitions for postconviction relief and require that amended claims alleging the existence of newly discovered evidence be filed within 1 year of final conviction or within 1 year of the time that the petitioner discovered or reasonably should have discovered the existence of the evidence, whichever is later. In this case, Maier discovered the evidence when the victim of the attempted deliberate homicide recanted testimony given at trial, but Maier's amended petition was not filed until more than 2 years after the recantation. Under St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001), the 1-year statute of limitation may be waived only if justified by a clear miscarriage of justice that renders the judgment a complete nullity, and under St. v. Rosales, 2000 MT 89, 299 M 226, 999 P2d 313 (2000), the newly discovered evidence must establish that the defendant did not commit the offense for the miscarriage of justice exception to apply. Here, the victim never actually stated that Maier was not the person who shot him, but only mentioned that he could not see the shooter because he was hiding. However, two other persons testified that Maier was the shooter, so the recanted testimony did not in itself establish that Maier did not commit attempted deliberate homicide. Thus, the miscarriage of justice exception did not apply, Maier's petition was not timely, and the District Court erred by not denying the claim on procedural grounds. Nevertheless, the proper result was reached, if for the wrong reason, so the District Court was sustained. Maier v. St., 2003 MT 144, 316 M 181, 69 P3d 1194 (2003).

Partially Deficient Performance of Trial Counsel — Not Sufficient Prejudice to Warrant New Trial: The District Court found that Hagen's trial counsel could have done a better job of investigating and presenting testimony regarding an alleged reputation for violence and prior criminal record on the part of the victim of Hagen's aggravated assault and that counsel could have done a more thorough job of interviewing and preparing witnesses, but held that even though Hagen may have suffered some prejudice as a result of trial counsel's deficiencies, Hagen did not show that but for the deficiencies, the results of the trial would have been different. The District Court concluded that Hagen was provided reasonably effective assistance of counsel and received a fair trial. The court also concluded that Hagen failed to meet the heavy burden of showing that appellate counsel was ineffective. Hagen appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the framework of Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984), it is entirely possible to find attorney error that possibly prejudiced defendant, yet conclude that the error did not rise to a level serious enough to result in a verdict unworthy of confidence. After examining all the alleged shortcomings of Hagen's trial and appellate counsel's representations, the Supreme Court agreed that counsel's performance was reasonably effective and that the combined effect of all the acts and omissions was not sufficient to undermine confidence in the trial outcome. St. v. Hagen, 2002 MT 190, 311 M 117, 53 P3d 885 (2002), followed in St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005). See also St. v. Daniels, 210 M 1, 682 P2d 173 (1984).

Record Devoid of Pretrial Tactical Decisions — Evidentiary Hearing Required on Ineffective Assistance Claim: In St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 175, 979 P2d 206 (1999), the Supreme Court held that the prosecutor in Soraich's murder trial was entitled to comment on a theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support and because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. Soraich then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming that defense counsel rendered ineffective assistance by stating that counsel would prove that the state's key witness gave inconsistent statements, without first determining whether an investigator's statement could be introduced as impeachment evidence. The District Court denied the petition, holding that Soraich should have raised the ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal because the claim was based on facts of record in the underlying case, so the claim was procedurally barred from postconviction review. To determine whether the ineffective assistance claim should have been raised on direct appeal or in a postconviction hearing, the Supreme Court cited the two-part process in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for the defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reason for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expresses a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by postconviction relief. The record here did not contain any information about why defense counsel promised the jury that the investigator's testimony would prove Soraich's defense, but then failed to call the investigator as a witness. Without an evidentiary hearing and direct questioning of defense counsel, any guesses on what led to the failure to call the investigator as a witness were purely speculative. Because the record was devoid of counsel's pretrial tactical decisions, Soraich could not satisfy the second prong of the Strickland test, so this section did not bar Soraich's postconviction assertion of ineffective assistance at trial. An evidentiary hearing was necessary to address the second prong of the Strickland test, and the District Court improperly dismissed Soraich's petition for postconviction relief. Therefore, the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the ineffective assistance claim. Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002). On remand, the District Court again denied relief, holding that under the second prong of the Strickland test, any allegedly deficient performance of counsel did not prejudice Soraich. Soraich appealed again, asserting that counsel's failure to call a witness to impeach a state witness resulted in prejudice. The Supreme Court disagreed. The witness had already been impeached through the testimony of another defense witness and by cross-examination concerning all of the inconsistencies in the questionable testimony. Failure to call another witness to establish the same point did not create a reasonable probability that the trial result would have been different and did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court was affirmed. Soraich v. St., 2004 MT 215, 322 M 375, 97 P3d 529 (2004). See also St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001).

Failure to Present Medical Records and Failure to Move to Withdraw Guilty Plea — No Denial of Effective Assistance of Counsel: The appellant pleaded guilty to a possession of dangerous drugs charge. Sentencing was postponed so that the appellant could undergo drug and alcohol counseling and a hernia operation. At the time of sentencing, the appellant's partial medical records from Fort Harrison dealt only with the appellant's substance abuse issues and hernia problem and did not mention any psychiatric problems. Later reports received by the counsel would have indicated a need to request a psychiatric examination. The counsel's performance in allowing the District Court to sentence the appellant without presenting his medical records from Fort Harrison was not deficient. When the counsel testified that the first time that an issue of schizophrenia or other mental illness arose was in the petition for postconviction relief and the District Court found that the trial counsel had not been informed of any psychiatric issues, it was not error for the counsel to not move to withdraw the guilty plea immediately after the plea hearing. The Supreme Court refused to disturb the District Court findings that were supported by substantial evidence and were not otherwise clearly erroneous. St. v. Cady, 2000 MT 353, 303 M 258, 15 P3d 479, 57 St. Rep. 1491 (2000).

Claims of Abuse of Process and Outrageous Governmental Conduct — No Basis for Postconviction Relief: In a petition for postconviction relief, defendant claimed abuse of process and outrageous governmental conduct that could have been addressed or remedied at the trial level, including: (1) manipulation of jurisdiction and witnesses to ensure the possible application of the death penalty; (2) use of an out-of-state crime lab; (3) mishandling of evidence; and (4) use of facially invalid witness testimony. The Supreme Court addressed each allegation as follows and found no abuse or outrageous conduct: (1) As long as the state has jurisdiction over a crime, the decision to bring charges in state court rather than federal court or in one state's court rather than another's properly rests with the discretion of the prosecutor. The prosecution of other defendants in the case in federal court and the offering of plea bargains and use of other witnesses' testimony against defendant suited the degree of culpability of the witnesses. (2) Use of the crime lab of the state in which the crime was discovered and the sharing of resources between the states were proper. (3) The prosecution properly established the chain of evidence regarding the evidence allegedly mishandled and satisfactorily explained that the change in certain evidence between the time of the crime and the time of trial was due to laboratory testing. (4) There was no indication that the prosecutor knew that one witness's testimony was false, and the use of the testimony at trial was insufficient to warrant reversal of the conviction. Four other theories of abuse of process or outrageous governmental conduct were not properly raised and thus were not addressed by the Supreme Court. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel at Trial and on Appeal — Not Established: The defendant argued that his trial and appeal attorneys did not argue his case fully. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and held that the attorneys had presented the strongest arguments in the defendant's favor and had performed in a competent manner. In re Petition of Martin, 240 M 419, 787 P2d 746, 46 St. Rep. 2213 (1989).

Part 2
Action of Court

46-21-201. Proceedings on petition.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsection (1) is similar to 1987 MCA 46-21-201(1). With regard to subsection (2), the Commission determined that if the allegations of the petition were serious enough to warrant hearing, counsel should be appointed if the petitioner is indigent. Subsection (3) provides the option of using civil discovery procedures. This will give the court and counsel the opportunity to streamline the proceedings with depositions and other civil-type discovery if necessary. Subsection (4) is similar to 1987 MCA 46-21-201(2). Subsection (5) is similar to 1987 MCA 46-21-201(3), except that the reference to writ is eliminated and the result is simply that the petition is dismissed.

Uniform State Law — Note on Commission Comments: The following states have enacted the Uniform Post-Conviction Procedure Act: Arkansas, Idaho, Iowa, Maryland, Minnesota, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, and South Dakota.

The commission comments summarize the Uniform Commission Comments and distinguish Montana changes to the U.P.C.A., thus the Uniform Commission Comments are not set forth.

Source: 22 U.S.C., 2255; U.P.C.A., Section 7.

This section merely establishes the method of procedure. It allows the court discretion as to whether the petitioner need be present. This is substantially the same as the present law in Montana on habeas corpus.

This section provides that proceedings may be heard in the court in which the conviction took place, serving to facilitate the flow of post-conviction hearings. The court is authorized to receive proof by affidavits, depositions, oral testimony or other evidence. The language is broad and general in order not to cast a heavy burden on the petitioner. The prisoner need not be brought before the court. This provision is designed to make possible the rapid disposal of petitions which have no real merit and which may be filed merely to give the petitioner a free trip and a few days outside the penitentiary. The court, if it deems it necessary, may order the petitioner to be brought before it. This section was drafted to give the court broad powers in disposal of the petition. Therefore, error in the original proceedings need not cause the release of a guilty party. The court may order the correction of judgment or sentence.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 51 in (1)(a) inserted second sentence regarding the attorney general's response to the petition; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Applicability: Section 2, Ch. 51, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies to a petition for postconviction relief filed on or after October 1, 2009."

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 in (2) after "shall" deleted "appoint" and inserted reference to ordering office of state public defender to assign counsel, after "qualifies for the" deleted "appointment" and inserted "assignment", and after "part 1" inserted reference to Montana Public Defender Act; in (3)(a) after "indigent" inserted reference to 47-1-103, after "will" deleted "appoint" and inserted reference to ordering office of state public defender to assign counsel, after "court's standards" inserted reference to office of state public defender's standards, and after "competency of" deleted "appointed" and inserted "assigned"; in (3)(b)(i) at beginning before "counsel" deleted "appoint" and inserted reference to ordering office of state public defender to assign counsel, after first "person" substituted "pending a determination by the office of state public defender" for "if the court finds", after "indigent" inserted reference to 47-1-103, after "offer of" deleted "appointment" and inserted "assigned counsel", and near end before "counsel" deleted "appointed" and inserted "assigned"; in (3)(b)(ii) after first "offer" inserted "of assigned counsel"; in (3)(b)(iii) before "petitioner" deleted "court finds that the", after "is" inserted "determined", after "not" inserted "to be", and after "deny" deleted "appointment" and inserted reference to rescinding order requiring assignment of counsel; in (3)(c) at beginning deleted "The court may not appoint counsel" and inserted reference to office of state public defender assigning counsel and at end deleted "appointment" and inserted "assignment"; in (3)(d) before "not" inserted "determined", after "not" inserted "to be", after "indigent" deleted "at the time that the court's determination is made under subsection (3)(b)", and after "shall" deleted "appoint" and inserted "order the assignment of"; in (3)(e) after "counsel" deleted "appointed" and inserted "assigned" and after "paid" deleted "as provided in 46-8-201" and inserted reference to office of state public defender; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Contingent Effective Date — Standards Effective January 1, 2000: Section 10(2), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "The provision in [section 6] [enacting 46-21-201(3)(a)] that the notification must state that counsel to be appointed will meet supreme court standards for counsel is effective on [the effective date of standards adopted under section 7]." On June 29, 1999, the Montana supreme court issued an order adopting standards for competency of counsel in capital cases. The standards are effective January 1, 2000. The standards govern the trial, appeal, and postconviction relief phases. The standards are set forth in the Montana Supreme Court rules contained in the annotations to Art. VII, sec. 2, Mont. Const.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 378 in (1)(a), near end of second sentence after "may", substituted "proceed to" for "grant a prompt hearing on the petition" and at end, after "issue", deleted "and make findings of fact and conclusions with respect to the petition"; inserted (1)(b) regarding issuance of a decision in a death sentence case; inserted (1)(c) regarding applicability of the Rules of Civil Procedure; in (2), at beginning after "If", inserted "the death sentence has not been imposed and"; inserted (3) regarding appointment of counsel in a death sentence appeal; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1997.

Attorney General Petition to Supreme Court for Competency Standards: Section 7, Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Within 60 days after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997], the attorney general shall, in compliance with 28 U.S.C. 2261, petition the supreme court for a court order establishing standards for competency of counsel appointed to represent indigent persons in proceedings under Title 46, chapter 21, who are sentenced to death. The court may hold appropriate proceedings on the petition, appoint a commission to advise it on competency standards, and adopt standards."

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 378, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 9(1), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "Except as provided in subsection (2), [sections 3 through 6] [amending 46-21-101, 46-21-102, 46-21-105, and 46-21-201] apply to proceedings in which the conviction becomes final:

(a) after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]; or

(b) during the 12 months prior to the [effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997] if a petition under Title 46, chapter 21, is filed within the 12 months after [the effective date of this section] [effective April 24, 1997]."

Section 9(2), Ch. 378, L. 1997, provided: "The provision in [section 6] [enacting 46-21-201(3)(a)] that the notification must state that counsel to be appointed will meet supreme court standards for counsel applies to petitions for postconviction relief filed after [the effective date of standards adopted under section 7]."

1991 Amendment: Inserted (2) concerning appointed counsel for a hearing; inserted (3) concerning discovery; in (5) substituted "prosecution" for "state" and at end substituted "petition must be dismissed" for "petitioner shall be returned to the custody of the person to whom the writ was directed"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: In (1), following "conviction took place", inserted "and the attorney general and order them to file a responsive pleading to the petition. Following its review of the responsive pleading, the court may dismiss the petition as a matter of law for failure to state a claim for relief or it may".

Case Notes

Death of Attorney Prior to Filing Response to Petition for Postconviction Relief — Unique Circumstance Warranting Evidentiary Hearing: Heath filed a timely petition for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court ordered the attorney to respond to the charges, but before a response was filed, the attorney died. Heath then requested an evidentiary hearing, but the request for a hearing was denied on grounds that the court failed to see the benefit of a hearing without the attorney in attendance, and the petition was denied without holding a hearing. Heath appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Although not all circumstances require the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing on a petition for postconviction relief, a hearing may be appropriate in certain settings with unique circumstances. The attorney's death prior to filing a court-ordered response constituted one of those unique circumstances. The record failed to set forth the attorney's reasons for pretrial and trial actions, and denial of a hearing left Heath without any alternative means of inquiry into the attorney's actions and whether those decisions supported Heath's ineffective assistance claims. Therefore, under these unique circumstances the Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing to provide Heath a reasonable alternative means to inquire into the attorney's reasons for the pretrial and trial actions and to allow the District Court to evaluate Heath's claims. Heath v. St., 2009 MT 7, 348 M 361, 202 P3d 118 (2009). See also Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002), and Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006).

Charge That Defense Counsel Failed to Adequately Investigate and Rehabilitate Witness With Prior Consistent Statement — Objective Standard of Reasonableness Applied: Postconviction relief was denied after DeSchon contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at trial because his court-appointed attorneys failed to investigate the violent history of DeSchon's stabbing victim and did not attempt to rehabilitate a witness with a prior consistent statement. The Supreme Court found that investigation of the victim's history would have produced no admissible evidence because there was nothing indicating that DeSchon stabbed the victim based on alleged incidents of the victim's violent past. Further, counsel believed that the witness was credible and that calling another witness to rehabilitate the witness with a prior consistent statement was not significant because the point that the victim was drunk was otherwise established. Counsel's actions fell within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance and sound trial strategy. DeSchon failed to show that counsel's conduct was unreasonable, and having failed the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance, DeSchon's petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. DeSchon v. St., 2008 MT 380, 347 M 30, 197 P3d 476 (2008).

No Evidence of Prejudicial State Involvement in Parole Proceedings — Postconviction Petition Properly Denied: As part of a plea agreement, the state agreed to not involve itself in Maldonado's parole proceedings. Maldonado contended that the state breached the plea agreement when the County Attorney sent a letter to the Board of Pardons and Parole recommending against Maldonado's parole. The District Court concluded that the state's action was harmless, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed. Although the Board did receive the County Attorney's letter and one Board member met with a Deputy County Attorney, the state withdrew the letter of opposition, and the Board member who met with the Deputy County Attorney recused herself. Maldonado failed to present any evidence that the state's actions figured into the decision of the Board of Pardons and Parole or that Maldonado was prejudiced in any way, and the District Court did not err in denying Maldonado's request for postconviction relief on this issue. Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008).

Appointment of Public Defender Prior to Filing of Petition for Postconviction Relief Prohibited: Section 46-8-104 provides that a District Court may order that counsel from the Office of State Public Defender represent an eligible person who has filed a postconviction action or proceeding under certain circumstances, but nothing in that section allows appointment of a public defender in advance of the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. Further, 47-1-104 does not give a District Court authority to appoint counsel employed by the public defender system to represent a person who may desire to file a petition for postconviction relief but who has not done so. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. District Court, 2007 MT 333, 340 M 234, 178 P3d 693 (2007).

Sentencing Judge to Preside Over Postconviction Proceedings: A District Court judge was substituted for the original judge early in Jordan's criminal proceedings and ultimately sentenced Jordan. When Jordan petitioned for postconviction relief, the original judge handled the proceedings and dismissed Jordan's petition. The Supreme Court held that the sentencing judge should preside over postconviction proceedings. Substitution of a trial judge does not suddenly evaporate in subsequent postconviction proceedings involving the same parties, witnesses, and factual background as the underlying case from which a judge was previously removed. In this case, the original judge's substitution in Jordan's criminal action also prevented the original judge from presiding over Jordan's postconviction proceedings. The postconviction claim was remanded for consideration by the sentencing judge. Jordan v. St., 2007 MT 165, 338 M 113, 162 P3d 863 (2007), following Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624 (1981).

Dismissal of Postconviction Petition for Failure to State Claim — Differentiation of Standards Applicable to Civil Cases — No Error in Failure to Hold Evidentiary Hearing on Postconviction Petition: Herman asserted that an evidentiary hearing should have been held regarding his petition for postconviction relief because the standard in this section is nearly identical to the provision in Rule 12(b)(6), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20), so allegations in a petition for postconviction relief must be taken as true and construed in a light most favorable to the petitioner, requiring a hearing on the allegations. The Supreme Court disagreed. The express statutory requirements in 46-21-104 significantly exceed and are inconsistent with the mere notice pleading requirements for an ordinary complaint in a civil action. Thus, the civil standards do not apply to dismissals of petitions for postconviction relief for failure to state a claim because the civil standards are inconsistent with the more specific requirements of 46-21-104 and this section, and the District Court did not err in failing to hold an evidentiary hearing on Herman's petition and in dismissing Herman's claim for failure to meet the procedural threshold in 46-21-104. Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006), following Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004), and distinguishing St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001), and St. v. Lawrence, 2001 MT 299, 307 M 487, 38 P3d 809 (2001).

Waiver of Right to Postconviction Challenge of Matters Occurring Prior to Guilty Plea and Unrelated to Nature of Plea: In a petition for postconviction relief, Herman raised numerous issues related to ineffective assistance of counsel that allegedly led to a guilty plea. However, by pleading guilty, Herman waived the right to challenge matters that occurred prior to the plea and that were unrelated to the voluntary or knowing nature of the plea or to the ineffective assistance claim, including: (1) a claim that Herman conducted, sought, or obtained independent legal research; (2) an assertion that Herman met the attachments requirement of 46-21-104(1)(c); (3) Herman's claim that he pleaded guilty because of the duress of incarceration; (4) counsel's failure to move for a bond reduction or pretrial release; and (5) a claim that counsel was ineffective by asserting a speedy trial violation. Herman v. St., 2006 MT 7, 330 M 267, 127 P3d 422 (2006), following Ellenburg v. Chase, 2004 MT 66, 320 M 315, 87 P3d 473 (2004).

Counsel's Failure to Interview and Call Witnesses Within Range of Reasonable and Sound Professional Decisions — Failure to Prove Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Weaver contended that his defense counsel was ineffective in failing to interview and call certain witnesses and in not introducing an entomologist's report that might have created a reasonable doubt as to Weaver's role in a homicide. Under the first prong of the Strickland test, Weaver needed to overcome the strong presumption that counsel's defense strategies and trial tactics fell within a wide range of reasonable and sound professional decisions. The Supreme Court examined each of Weaver's contentions and determined that: (1) counsel's decision not to investigate potential witnesses did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness; (2) Weaver failed to meet the burden of showing that counsel's failure to interview potential witnesses constituted ineffective assistance to the extent that it resulted in prejudice raising a reasonable probability that the trial outcome would have been different; (3) counsel's decision not to call every witness that Weaver identified actually carried fewer risks and promoted Weaver's best interest at trial; and (4) failure to introduce the entomologist's report was tactical and the result of a conscientious, weighed decision made after consultation with Weaver and thus was not erroneous. Weaver's ineffective assistance claim failed. Weaver v. St., 2005 MT 158, 327 M 441, 114 P3d 1039 (2005), following Clausell v. St., 2005 MT 33, 326 M 63, 106 P3d 1175 (2005).

No Continuing District Court Jurisdiction to Review Original Sentence and Resentence on Original Charge: Evert was sentenced to 65 years in prison with 15 years suspended for sexual assault. About 5 years into the sentence, Evert petitioned pro se for postconviction relief, alleging numerous claims related to his guilty plea and sentencing, but no hearing was held. Following appointment of two different public defenders, the District Court was notified that the parties had reached an agreement on Evert's petition. In exchange for a new sentence, Evert agreed to withdraw the petition, waive the right to appeal the amended sentence, and waive the right to file any further postconviction petitions based on the new sentence. The District Court agreed to the stipulation, noted Evert's criminal history and progress in prison, and resentenced Evert to 60 years with 20 years suspended, with credit for time served. Evert then appealed the new sentence on grounds that the District Court mistakenly described Evert's eligibility for parole and that because the court did not correctly advise him, he did not fully understand the consequences of waiving his postconviction claims. The Supreme Court reversed because the District Court did not have continuing jurisdiction to resentence Evert after final judgment. Under 46-18-117, the District Court could modify or correct an erroneous sentence but had no authority to resentence Evert on the original charge. Therefore, Evert's original sentence was reinstated, the postconviction claims that Evert waived were also reinstated, and the case was remanded for consideration of the postconviction claims. St. v. Evert, 2004 MT 178, 322 M 105, 93 P3d 1254 (2004), following Gilbert v. St., 2002 MT 258, 312 M 189, 59 P3d 24 (2002), and Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

No Prejudice From Counsel's Failure to Notify Defendant of Minimum Sentence — Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Not Justifying Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied as Matter of Law: In a petition for postconviction relief, Cobell asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not inform him of the minimum 5-year imprisonment penalty for possession of a deadly weapon by a prisoner when Cobell entered a plea agreement wherein the state would recommend the minimum sentence in exchange for Cobell's guilty plea. The District Court summarily dismissed the petition, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The information charging Cobell informed him of the penalty, and Cobell accepted the plea agreement understanding that the sentencing court was free to reject the agreement and impose any appropriate sentence. Given the uncertainty in the agreement and the fact that Cobell received the benefit of the plea bargain, Cobell failed to show that he was prejudiced by counsel's alleged error. Absent a showing of prejudice, the District Court did not err in dismissing Cobell's petition for postconviction relief as a matter of law. St. v. Cobell, 2004 MT 46, 320 M 122, 86 P3d 20 (2004), followed in Lout v. St., 2005 MT 93, 326 M 485, 111 P3d 199 (2005).

Evidentiary Hearing on Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Required: A District Court may dismiss a petition for postconviction relief based solely on the files and records of the case. An evidentiary hearing is not required, nor are unsupported allegations sufficient to entitle a petitioner to a postconviction evidentiary hearing. Griffin v. St., 2003 MT 267, 317 M 457, 77 P3d 545 (2003). See also Notti v. St., 2008 MT 20, 341 M 183, 176 P3d 1040 (2008).

Failure to State Claim or Present Facts Justifying Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied: Griffin petitioned for postconviction relief, asserting claims of prosecutorial misconduct, double jeopardy, judicial bias, and ineffective assistance of counsel. However, a petitioner has the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that facts justify the relief. Here, Griffin failed to bolster the claims with supporting evidence, such as affidavits, records, or other evidence. Thus, the petition failed to meet the statutory requirements or state a claim for relief and was properly dismissed as a matter of law. Griffin v. St., 2003 MT 267, 317 M 457, 77 P3d 545 (2003).

Standard of Review of Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief: The correct standard of review of a District Court's denial of a petition for postconviction relief is whether the court's findings of fact are clearly erroneous and whether its conclusions of law are correct. A different standard of review, namely whether substantial evidence supports the findings and conclusions of the District Court, as set out in St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182 (1990), Walker v. St., 261 M 1, 862 P2d 1 (1993), St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145 (1996), and similar cases, is overruled. Porter v. St., 2002 MT 319, 313 M 149, 60 P3d 951 (2002), following St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Failure of District Court to Review Entire Record on Petition for Postconviction Relief Not Violative of Due Process When Same Judge Presided at Trial: When considering Hagen's petition for postconviction relief, the District Court did not review the entire trial proceedings before making its conclusions of law. Hagen contended that failure to review the entire record deprived him of due process and resulted in erroneous findings and conclusions. A fundamental requirement of due process is the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner; however, due process is a flexible concept that calls for such procedural protections as a particular situation demands. There is nothing in the postconviction relief statutes that explicitly requires that a District Court review the entire record, and the Supreme Court declined to impose a duty on District Courts to review the entire record in every situation. Rather, the scope of the duty is determined on a case-by-case basis. In this case, the District Court Judge who presided over the postconviction hearing was the same judge who presided at trial, so the duty to review relevant portions of the record at issue in the postconviction proceedings did not extend to the entire record because the same judge heard the trial testimony when it was presented. St. v. Hagen, 2002 MT 190, 311 M 117, 53 P3d 885 (2002).

Claim That Guilty Plea to Deliberate Homicide Influenced by Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Conviction Affirmed: Thee was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison. In a petition for postconviction relief, Thee contended that he was denied effective assistance of counsel prior to and during a change of plea hearing when defense counsel: (1) induced Thee to plead guilty by threatening Thee that he was going to die unless he pleaded guilty; (2) failed to address the alleged violent treatment that Thee received from inmates and guards during Thee's incarceration in the county jail; (3) failed to seek suppression of statements that Thee made during police interrogation that allegedly violated Thee's Miranda rights; (4) failed to have Thee's mental or emotional stress at the time of the homicide evaluated by a qualified mental health examiner to prove circumstances that could be used to mitigate the deliberate homicide charge; and (5) failed to inform Thee of a possibility of seeking conviction on a lesser included offense. The Supreme Court examined each claim in light of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel. First, defense counsel has a duty to inform a client of the elements of an offense, the possible punishment, and the advisability of a plea agreement. Discussion of a death penalty between an attorney and client in a capital case may well invoke extreme anxiety, but nevertheless relates directly, albeit painfully, to the genuine circumstances of the client. Counsel's reported statements to Thee regarding the possibility of a death sentence were within the wide range of reasonable and sound professional assistance of a competent attorney counseling a client facing capital punishment. Second, counsel investigated Thee's allegations of violence in the county jail, prepared a report of the findings, discussed the findings with Thee, and brought the matter to the attention of the appropriate authorities. Counsel's actions stemmed from informed professional deliberation rather than neglect or ignorance, and precluded a finding of deficient performance for failure to investigate Thee's allegations of physical assault. Third, counsel investigated all statements made by Thee to police investigators, conferred with Thee, and researched the legal bases for possible suppression of certain statements. Counsel's strategic choices made after thorough investigation of the law and facts relevant to plausible options were virtually unchallengable, and the fact that counsel reached a legal conclusion on an evidentiary challenge contrary to Thee's hopes provided no ground for finding deficient attorney performance. Fourth, despite Thee's claim to the contrary, counsel did seek and obtain a court-ordered mental health evaluation for Thee, and took the unequivocal findings from the evaluation into account when advising Thee to accept the plea agreement. Finally, counsel had no duty to inform Thee about the possibility of a lesser included offense, because neither mitigated deliberate homicide nor negligent homicide is an included offense of deliberate homicide, so the possibility of conviction on a lesser included offense did not legally exist. The trial court's denial of Thee's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. St. v. Thee, 2001 MT 294, 307 M 450, 37 P3d 741 (2001).

Issue of Counsel's Effective Use of Peremptory Juror Challenges More Appropriate When Raised as Petition for Postconviction Relief Rather Than on Direct Appeal When Record Silent: Russell was convicted of attempted deliberate homicide and appealed claiming ineffective assistance of counsel during jury selection. Russell contended that counsel failed to challenge for cause a relative of the victim and used two peremptory challenges to strike jurors who were outside the jury pool. Under the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, challenged actions of counsel are presumed to be matters of trial strategy and a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel rendered adequate assistance and made all significant decisions in the exercise of reasonable professional judgment. Pursuant to St. v. St. John, 2001 MT 1, 304 M 47, 15 P3d 970 (2001), when the record does not illuminate the basis for the challenged acts or omissions of counsel, a claim of ineffective assistance is more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief so that a supplemental record may be made. Here, the record was silent as to why Russell's counsel acted or failed to act regarding the juror challenges. Thus, the Supreme Court declined to discuss the issue on direct appeal. St. v. Russell, 2001 MT 278, 307 M 322, 37 P3d 678 (2001).

Record-Based or Nonrecord-Based Information Determinative of Appropriateness of Direct Appeal or Petition for Postconviction Relief — Direct Appeal Dismissed When Record Insufficient to Substantiate Effectiveness of Counsel: In 1999, White moved for an evidentiary hearing to allow the development of facts that were not part of the record but that were necessary to sustain a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court declared by order that a petition for postconviction relief would be the proper avenue for White's nonrecord-based ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Nevertheless, in late 2000, White appealed, contending that the claim of prejudicial error resulting from her trial counsel's various failures to provide representation, such as the failure to call witnesses, make an opening statement, or offer a theory of the case at any stage of the proceedings, was supported by the record and proper for direct appeal. The general rule set out in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999), is that when ineffective assistance claims are based on facts of record, they must be raised on direct appeal, while claims based on allegations not documented in the record must be raised by petition for postconviction relief. The underlying principle of the rule is that a silent record cannot rebut the strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance. The two distinct classifications of on-record and off-record actions tend to overlap at times, and though not easily distilled into a formula, the definitive question that decides whether actions are on-record or off-record is whether the record fully explains why counsel took the particular course of action. Generally, an alleged failure to object to the introduction of evidence, to the testimony of a witness, or to prosecutorial misconduct at trial is considered record-based and appropriate for direct appeal. Likewise, counsel's own conduct in presenting the case, such as improperly eliciting damaging testimony from a witness or rendering an improper opening statement or closing argument, may be pointed to as record-based. Decisions regarding the timing and number of objections and whether to offer no opening statement at all lie within counsel's tactical discretion, indicating that nonrecord-based information explaining the tactic may be involved. Similarly, counsel's failure to adequately investigate, to prepare a defense, to become familiar with critical areas of the applicable law, to offer a particular jury instruction, to object to the trial court's failure to consider sentencing alternatives, to object to the admission of evidence that is evidenced by the record, or to fully inform defendant of the consequences of various options and rights, even though the prejudicial results of the ineffectiveness appear on the record, may constitute a nonrecord-based claim. In White's case, the record supplied some indicia of why a certain objection was raised at a particular time, but was still insufficient to determine to what extent counsel's actions were purely tactical or resulted from deficient representation. Thus, the information was considered nonrecord-based and should have been raised by petition for postconviction relief, so White's direct appeal was dismissed without prejudice. St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Earl, 2003 MT 158, 316 M 263, 71 P3d 1201 (2003), St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), St. v. St. Germain, 2007 MT 28, 336 M 17, 153 P3d 591 (2007), in which the Supreme Court declined to address a direct appeal of defense counsel's nonrecord-based reasons for making a double jeopardy argument and for failing to call a witness to testify in an incest case because the issues were appropriate for postconviction proceedings. See also St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009), in which an ineffective counsel appeal based on counsel's failure to request an accomplice instruction in a homicide trial was dismissed in favor of postconviction relief proceedings because plausible justifications existed for counsel's conduct that could not be addressed on appeal since the record did not resolve the factual questions surrounding counsel's actions.

Summary Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief — Defendant Entitled to Hearing to Present Nonrecord-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims: Schaff was convicted of deliberate homicide and filed a petition for postconviction relief, contending that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when forced to decide whether to accept a plea agreement after considering the matter for less than 2 hours. He claimed that with the assistance of different counsel at the hearing to withdraw the guilty plea, he could have established that the plea was not voluntary. Schaff further argued that he could not have raised the precise issue of ineffective assistance because discussions between his attorney and him were not record-based and thus could be presented only through a petition for postconviction relief. The state argued that the petition was defective because Schaff did not sufficiently specify the claim of ineffective assistance, offered no supporting information, and did not identify precisely why counsel was ineffective. The state also pointed out that Schaff had previously raised the issue of voluntariness in St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682 (1998), and that the issue had been decided and was barred from being raised again by the doctrine of res judicata. The Supreme Court disagreed that the voluntariness of Schaff's plea was not a proper subject for a postconviction proceeding. Although the issue of voluntariness was previously raised, Schaff did not raise the precise question of whether he had received competent advice prior to entering a plea or the question of whether he was misled to believe that he was required to proceed with the change of plea hearing with trial counsel when he was legally entitled to be represented by other counsel. The question of whether Schaff was properly advised necessarily touched on the voluntariness of the plea but was separate from it and was not part of the record in the direct appeal, nor was it the type of evidence that Schaff would be likely to present at a change of plea hearing. Rather than summarily dismiss Schaff's petition, the better course would have been for the District Court to appoint Schaff counsel and provide an opportunity for a hearing to present the ineffective assistance claims. Thus, the Supreme Court affirmed the part of the District Court's order with regard to any record-based voluntariness claims that had already been addressed by direct appeal, but reversed that part of the order that held that Schaff was procedurally barred from raising the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel in the nonrecord-based postconviction proceeding. St. v. Schaff, 2001 MT 130, 305 M 427, 28 P3d 1073 (2001). Following hearing on remand, the District Court again denied Schaff's petition for postconviction relief, and Schaff appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying the Strickland test, the Supreme Court found that Schaff proved neither that counsel's assistance was deficient nor that counsel's performance was prejudicial to Schaff's case. An ineffective assistance claim must be grounded on facts in the record rather than on mere conclusory allegations. Schaff's claim was not supported by the record, so the petition for postconviction relief was properly denied. Schaff v. St., 2003 MT 187, 316 M 453, 73 P3d 806 (2003). See also Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233 (1999).

Appointment of Counsel for Indigent Defendant in Postconviction Proceeding Required — No Duty on Defendant to Notify Court of "Desire" for Counsel: Notwithstanding the apparent conflict between 46-8-104, which grants the court discretion to assign counsel if an indigent defendant "desires" counsel, and this section, which makes assignment of counsel mandatory if a postconviction hearing is required and the defendant is indigent, neither statute requires that a defendant give the court notice of the defendant's desire for counsel. Under this section, the court must inquire into the indigence status of the defendant and determine if the defendant is indigent and qualifies for appointed counsel under Title 46, ch. 8, part 1. If the defendant qualifies, the court must appoint counsel to represent the defendant on the postconviction petition. Swearingen v. St., 2001 MT 10, 304 M 97, 18 P3d 998 (2001).

Admission of Victim Impact Evidence at Resentencing Hearing — No Error: The District Court did not err in admitting victim impact evidence during the resentencing hearing when petitioner was informed of the information that the state planned to present and was provided with ample opportunity to respond to that information. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Presence of Victim's Family and Media at Resentencing Hearing Not Grounds for Change of Venue: The presence of the victim's family and supporters and local media is not reasonable grounds for believing that prejudice in the form of an air of hostility actually existed at the resentencing hearing. The District Court did not err in denying a motion for a change of venue. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Civil Procedure Rule That Notice of Entry of Order Be Served by Prevailing Party Inapplicable in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court addressed whether the notice of entry of judgment requirement under Rule 77(d), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20), applied to postconviction relief proceedings governed by Title 46, ch. 21. The court previously held in cases unrelated to postconviction proceedings that only when the notice is served does a prospective appellant's time for filing a notice of appeal begin to run. (See In re Marriage of Robertson, 237 M 406, 773 P2d 1213 (1989), Buckley v. Wordal, 262 M 306, 865 P2d 240, 50 St. Rep. 1570 (1993), and Troglia v. Bartoletti, 266 M 240, 879 P2d 1169, 51 St. Rep. 783 (1994).) Here, Garner was convicted of forgery and felony theft and contended that because the state was the "prevailing party", notice should have been provided to him of the entry of the District Court's order and that because notice was not provided, the 60 days within which to appeal could not have expired because it never commenced to run. However, the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure apply in a postconviction relief proceeding only when they are applicable and not inconsistent with postconviction statutes. Section 46-21-203 specifically requires that an appeal in postconviction proceedings be taken within 60 days of the entry of the order, which is inconsistent with the general notice rule in Rule 77(d). The Supreme Court applied the particular provision over the general provision and concluded that Rule 77(d) has no application in postconviction relief proceedings, so the 60-day filing deadline in 46-21-203 commences in all instances and without more upon entry of the court's order granting or denying postconviction relief. St. v. Garner, 1999 MT 295, 297 M 89, 990 P2d 175, 56 St. Rep. 1180 (1999).

Standard of Review of Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief: The Supreme Court reviews the denial of a petition for postconviction relief to determine whether the District Court's findings are clearly erroneous and whether its conclusions of law are correct. Bauer v. St., 1999 MT 185, 295 M 306, 983 P2d 955, 56 St. Rep. 715 (1999), citing Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734 (1997).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Denied — No Due Process Violation — No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing New Trial Because All Factors Not Fulfilled — No New Trial: Sullivan, the director of the Parks and Recreation Department for the city of Great Falls, was convicted of three counts of felony theft of various city recreational fees and one count of tampering with public records. Later, the employee who replaced him found in a budget file an envelope containing $1,300 of city recreation funds. Sullivan brought a petition for postconviction relief, arguing that his constitutional rights under Brady v. Md., 373 US 83 (1963) (granting postconviction relief on the basis of evidence suppressed by the prosecution), had been violated and that the newly discovered evidence entitled him to a new trial. The Supreme Court held Brady inapplicable because the new evidence was not known to the prosecution at the time of the trial and therefore could not have been wrongfully withheld. In connection with the Brady claim, the Supreme Court also noted that Sullivan had not attached an affidavit or other evidence in support of his allegations, as required by 46-21-104, and concluded that Sullivan's assertions were not sufficient under this section to allow him to conduct discovery or to entitle him to an evidentiary hearing. Because theft is not an element of tampering under 45-7-208 and 45-2-302, the Supreme Court concluded that Sullivan's conviction for tampering by making another employee alter official city records would not have been changed had the newly discovered evidence been available at trial. The Supreme Court also concluded that Sullivan had not fulfilled all of the six factors discussed in St. v. Cline, 275 M 46, 909 P2d 1171 (1996), required for grant of a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence because he had not shown that the new evidence would probably produce a different result at trial and that the new evidence was not merely cumulative evidence. Concerning Sullivan's final claim, the Supreme Court noted that in St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988), the defendant obtained newly discovered evidence but that neither a motion for a new trial nor postconviction relief was available to the defendant, so the Supreme Court created a "window" for review of the claim that otherwise would have been procedurally barred. The Supreme Court contrasted Perry and pointed out that in Sullivan's case, he was not barred from bringing a petition for postconviction relief. For all of these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's denial for postconviction relief and denial of Sullivan's motion for a new trial. St. v. Sullivan, 280 M 25, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Stiffening of Sentence by Sentence Review Division That Found Original Sentence Not Inadequate: Offender pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and was sentenced to 20 years in the state prison. The Sentence Review Division found that the sentence was not inadequate or excessive, but modified the sentence to provide for no parole until 7 years had been served and to require completion of the prison's anger management program and other counseling considered appropriate by the staff. The Division stated that the modification was made because during the sentence review hearing, offender showed no remorse or concern for the victim, showed disdain for the victim, and accepted no responsibility for his actions. On petition for postconviction relief, the court held that having found that the original sentence was not inadequate, the Sentence Review Division lacked jurisdiction to alter the sentence. The court struck the modification from the sentence. St. v. Torres, 277 M 514, 922 P2d 1180, 53 St. Rep. 826 (1996).

Failure to Appoint New Counsel During Posttrial Hearing on Counsel's Effectiveness: Finley contended that the District Court denied him his right to counsel's undivided loyalty under this section by failing to appoint new counsel to represent him at a posttrial hearing regarding his counsel's effectiveness, at which his counsel confronted him concerning the sufficiency of his allegations of ineffectiveness and then took the stand to rebut those allegations. This section was not in effect at the time of the hearing and thus did not apply; however, under 46-21-101, a postconviction hearing is a separate proceeding that is available after sentencing and applies when there is no adequate remedy of appeal. Further, under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., the right to counsel is composed of two correlative rights—the right to counsel of reasonable competence and the right to counsel's undivided loyalty. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Zackuse, 250 M 385, 833 P2d 142 (1991), in holding that when a defendant and counsel have a conflict so great that it results in a total lack of communication or that if counsel fails to render effective assistance, new counsel should be appointed. The potential for substantial prejudice to Finley existed at the posttrial hearing, qualifying the hearing as a critical stage in the proceedings. It was error for the trial court to fail to appoint new counsel, at least for purposes of the competency hearing. St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208, 53 St. Rep. 310 (1996).

Petitioner Not Entitled to Relief — Responsive Pleading and Evidentiary Hearing Not Required: Unless a petitioner is entitled to relief, a responsive pleading and evidentiary hearing are not required under this section. Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992), following Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624 (1981), and followed in St. v. Cobell, 2004 MT 46, 320 M 122, 86 P3d 20 (2004).

Defendant Granted Evidentiary Hearing — Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The District Court granted defendant a hearing as outlined in this section and received evidence in the form of oral testimony and exhibits in which defendant presented proof regarding his allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Nothing in the record supports defendant's contention that such an evidentiary hearing was not held. St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182, 47 St. Rep. 328 (1990).

Affidavit Procedure Not Violative of Fair Hearing: Defendant contended the District Court procedure for accepting or not accepting affidavits and sworn statements constituted reversible error. The Supreme Court decided defendant had a full and fair hearing in light of the fact that he: (1) was adequately represented; (2) was provided a court reporter at no expense; (3) was given proper notice; (4) was allowed to present and confront witnesses; (5) personally appeared, testified, and had his exhibits admitted into evidence; (6) sought no continuance and presented no evidence following notice of affidavit; and (7) had prior statements properly considered. St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268, 45 St. Rep. 1192 (1988).

Impartial Jury — Prejudice Not Presumed: Petitioner alleged that he was denied his right to a trial by a fair and impartial jury in that much publicity surrounded his case, and his first conviction was overturned. The District Judge reviewed the transcript of voir dire and determined that the publicity had no prejudicial effect. The jurors were questioned as a whole, and many individually, as to their attitudes resulting from the trial's publicity. The apparent result of the questioning was that nearly all jurors had heard of the case, but all agreed that they could decide the case on the evidence presented. No specific instance of a prejudiced juror was shown. The court will not presume prejudice. It is incumbent on the petitioner to present specific evidence of prejudice to the court. Judges will not "pierce the veil of jury deliberations" to try to find whether the decision was based on bias and prejudice. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981).

Omissions of Counsel — Evidentiary Hearing Required: In his petition for postconviction relief, petitioner asserted that he was denied effective assistance of counsel. Many of the errors complained of involved failure to act and omissions rather than commissions. A mere review of the record cannot show that petitioner was entitled to no relief. He is entitled to an evidentiary hearing on this issue. Fitzpatrick v. St., 194 M 310, 638 P2d 1002, 38 St. Rep. 1448 (1981), followed in Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), and distinguished in Hagen v. St., 1999 MT 8, 293 M 60, 973 P2d 233, 56 St. Rep. 33 (1999).

Two-Judge Disqualification Unavailable to Postconviction Petitioner: Although a postconviction petition filed under the provisions of Title 46, ch. 21, is civil in nature, the petitioner is not entitled to two substitutions of presiding judges as allowed in 3-1-801 (now replaced by 3-1-802). An applicant for postconviction relief is directed by the more specific provisions of the postconviction statute to bring the petition in the Supreme Court or in the court that sentenced him. A specific statute controls over a general statute. Coleman v. St., 194 M 428, 633 P2d 624, 38 St. Rep. 1352 (1981).

Burden of Petitioner: The burden of the petitioner when requesting postconviction relief is to show by a preponderance of evidence that the facts justify the relief. Yother v. St., 182 M 351, 597 P2d 79 (1979), following In re Jones, 176 M 412, 578 P2d 1150 (1978). See also St. v. Peck, 263 M 1, 865 P2d 304, 50 St. Rep. 1692 (1993).

Sufficiency of Factual Evidence to Justify Sentence: It was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to sentence the defendant within the statutory limits when the court relied on an accumulation of different reports as to the condition of the assault victim. St. v. Mann, 169 M 306, 546 P2d 515 (1976).

Mistrial — Claim of Double Jeopardy: After a motion for a mistrial was granted, the defendant's petition to the Supreme Court for dismissal of the subsequent trial on the ground of double jeopardy was dismissed, since the defendant had not yet been adjudged guilty of any offense. State ex rel. LaFlesch v. District Court, 165 M 302, 529 P2d 1403 (1974).

Source: Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293.

This section is essential so that a federal court is able to readily determine if it should accept and make an independent determination in case a petitioner files a claim for relief in that court. A sufficient state court record is referred to by the U.S. Supreme Court as "indispensable in determining whether the habeas applicant received a full and fair state court evidentiary hearing resulting in reliable findings." Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293.

Without adequate recordation of a state court proceeding the federal courts will assume that the applicant did not receive a fair and adequate proceeding, or that its findings were not reliable and the federal court will accept the claim for relief and make an independent determination. As a result, it is suggested that a court reporter be present, so that if a full record is needed it will be available.

The purpose of this section is threefold: first, it is desirable to provide a method of review of alleged errors in the lower court; second, a method of review appears to be necessary because of the finality of the judgment in the lower court; and third, the interests of justice require that both petitioner and the state be given the rights of review.

This section specifies the period within which, after a final order is rendered, an appeal must be brought. This section sets out a special procedure as to time of review (60 days) which is different from the normal appeal. The reason for this is that in most instances a person who may seek review under this Act will be incarcerated at the time he enters his petition. Individuals so situated often have difficulties in getting their papers in order and in inducing clerks to act promptly on their petitions. For these reasons a longer period of review is provided for under this Act. Other than the time element, an appeal taken under this chapter shall be in conformance with chapter [20] of this code.

Case Notes

Only Record-Based Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim on Appeal: Frasure claimed on appeal that her attorney provided ineffective assistance at trial by failing to object to the introduction of certain evidence. However, the Supreme Court will determine that there was ineffective assistance of counsel only if that conclusion can be based on the record on appeal or if there is no plausible justification for counsel's actions or inactions. Frasure failed to establish that her ineffective assistance claim was record-based, so the claim was dismissed without prejudice to the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 305, 323 M 479, 100 P3d 1013 (2004). See also St. v. Jefferson, 2003 MT 90, 315 M 146, 69 P3d 641 (2003).

Standard of Review of Denial of Petition for Postconviction Relief: The correct standard of review of a District Court's denial of a petition for postconviction relief is whether the court's findings of fact are clearly erroneous and whether its conclusions of law are correct. A different standard of review, namely whether substantial evidence supports the findings and conclusions of the District Court, as set out in St. v. Coates, 241 M 331, 786 P2d 1182 (1990), Walker v. St., 261 M 1, 862 P2d 1 (1993), St. v. Moorman, 279 M 330, 928 P2d 145 (1996), and similar cases, is overruled. Porter v. St., 2002 MT 319, 313 M 149, 60 P3d 951 (2002), following St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

No Ineffective Assistance Based on Defense Counsel's Personal Problems — Remand for Consideration of Issues in Amended Petition for Postconviction Relief: In an original petition for postconviction relief, Williams raised five issues of ineffective assistance of counsel, asserting that counsel: (1) failed to conduct proper discovery; (2) failed to obtain and call necessary witnesses at trial; (3) failed to properly question witnesses; (4) conducted inadequate trial preparation; and (5) allowed his personal problems to detract from his representation. The District Court allowed Williams to amend the petition to add two additional claims, contending that counsel failed to substitute the trial judge when requested to do so and failed to call necessary and beneficial witnesses at the sentencing hearing. The Supreme Court's review of the record revealed that the District Court did not erroneously address any of the original five claims, including the assertion that defense counsel's overall emotional state adversely affected Williams's representation. However, the record showed that the two issues added by Williams in the amended petition were never addressed, so the District Court's findings regarding those two material issues were insufficient. The case was remanded to allow further consideration of the additional claims. Williams v. St., 2002 MT 189, 311 M 108, 53 P3d 864 (2002).

Record Devoid of Pretrial Tactical Decisions — Evidentiary Hearing Required on Ineffective Assistance Claim: In St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 175, 979 P2d 206 (1999), the Supreme Court held that the prosecutor in Soraich's murder trial was entitled to comment on a theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support and because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. Soraich then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming that defense counsel rendered ineffective assistance by stating that counsel would prove that the state's key witness gave inconsistent statements, without first determining whether an investigator's statement could be introduced as impeachment evidence. The District Court denied the petition, holding that Soraich should have raised the ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal because the claim was based on facts of record in the underlying case, so the claim was procedurally barred from postconviction review. To determine whether the ineffective assistance claim should have been raised on direct appeal or in a postconviction hearing, the Supreme Court cited the two-part process in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for the defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reason for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expresses a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by postconviction relief. The record here did not contain any information about why defense counsel promised the jury that the investigator's testimony would prove Soraich's defense, but then failed to call the investigator as a witness. Without an evidentiary hearing and direct questioning of defense counsel, any guesses on what led to the failure to call the investigator as a witness were purely speculative. Because the record was devoid of counsel's pretrial tactical decisions, Soraich could not satisfy the second prong of the Strickland test, so 46-21-105 did not bar Soraich's postconviction assertion of ineffective assistance at trial. An evidentiary hearing was necessary to address the second prong of the Strickland test, and the District Court improperly dismissed Soraich's petition for postconviction relief. Therefore, the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the ineffective assistance claim. Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002). On remand, the District Court again denied relief, holding that under the second prong of the Strickland test, any allegedly deficient performance of counsel did not prejudice Soraich. Soraich appealed again, asserting that counsel's failure to call a witness to impeach a state witness resulted in prejudice. The Supreme Court disagreed. The witness had already been impeached through the testimony of another defense witness and by cross-examination concerning all of the inconsistencies in the questionable testimony. Failure to call another witness to establish the same point did not create a reasonable probability that the trial result would have been different and did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court was affirmed. Soraich v. St., 2004 MT 215, 322 M 375, 97 P3d 529 (2004). See also St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001).

Civil Procedure Rule That Notice of Entry of Order Be Served by Prevailing Party Inapplicable in Postconviction Relief Proceeding: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court addressed whether the notice of entry of judgment requirement under Rule 77(d), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20), applied to postconviction relief proceedings governed by Title 46, ch. 21. The court previously held in cases unrelated to postconviction proceedings that only when the notice is served does a prospective appellant's time for filing a notice of appeal begin to run. (See In re Marriage of Robertson, 237 M 406, 773 P2d 1213 (1989), Buckley v. Wordal, 262 M 306, 865 P2d 240, 50 St. Rep. 1570 (1993), and Troglia v. Bartoletti, 266 M 240, 879 P2d 1169, 51 St. Rep. 783 (1994).) Here, Garner was convicted of forgery and felony theft and contended that because the state was the "prevailing party", notice should have been provided to him of the entry of the District Court's order and that because notice was not provided, the 60 days within which to appeal could not have expired because it never commenced to run. However, the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure apply in a postconviction relief proceeding only when they are applicable and not inconsistent with postconviction statutes. This section specifically requires that an appeal in postconviction proceedings be taken within 60 days of the entry of the order, which is inconsistent with the general notice rule in Rule 77(d). The Supreme Court applied the particular provision over the general provision and concluded that Rule 77(d) has no application in postconviction relief proceedings, so the 60-day filing deadline in this section commences in all instances and without more upon entry of the court's order granting or denying postconviction relief. St. v. Garner, 1999 MT 295, 297 M 89, 990 P2d 175, 56 St. Rep. 1180 (1999).

Out-of-Time Appeal Based on Claim of Ineffective Counsel Denied: An out-of-time appeal is a remedy that may be available to a defendant involved in a criminal proceeding who, through no fault of the defendant, misses a deadline for filing an appeal. Here, Garner moved for an out-of-time appeal on grounds of ineffective counsel. The trial court denied the motion after finding substantial factual evidence that Garner was fully advised of his right to appeal the postconviction relief order, as well as of the 60-day deadline for filing notice of appeal. The ineffective assistance argument was without merit, and the trial court was affirmed. St. v. Garner, 1999 MT 295, 297 M 89, 990 P2d 175, 56 St. Rep. 1180 (1999).

No Legal Duty to Provide Party Copies of Transcripts in Pending Matter: Walker petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus ordering the District Court to provide him with copies of the transcripts, minutes, and documents in his pending criminal case. The Supreme Court refused to issue the order on the basis that there was no clear legal duty requiring the District Court to provide the requested information and that Walker could appeal any final decision by the District Court. Walker v. Colberg, 250 M 382, 822 P2d 82, 48 St. Rep. 971 (1991).

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of 46-9-107. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and 46-20-104. The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 46-22-103. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweiler pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweiler granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that 46-22-103 does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Trieweiler. Justice Trieweiler determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Trieweiler also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of 46-9-107; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of 46-20-104. For these reasons, Justice Trieweiler vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Federal Habeas Corpus — New Evidence: The mere existence of newly discovered evidence does not constitute grounds for federal habeas corpus relief unless the evidence bears upon the constitutionality of the petitioner's detention. In finding that the evidence submitted did not warrant habeas corpus relief, the District Judge properly applied a standard of whether the new evidence would probably produce an acquittal. Quigg v. Crist, 616 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1980).

Dual Nature of Habeas Corpus — Appealability: Habeas corpus is a civil proceeding when involved in child custody and related cases. Decisions made by the courts in those actions are appealable and res judicata as to certain matters heard at the District Court level. Habeas corpus is a criminal proceeding when the action in which it is originally brought is criminal in nature, such as an extradition proceeding. In criminal actions, denial of the writ is not appealable but successive applications for the writ may be brought directly to the Supreme Court until the judicial power of the state has been exhausted. In re Hart, 178 M 235, 583 P2d 411 (1978).

GENERAL

Likelihood of Success on Appeal Not Factor in Determining Release of Defendant Pending Appeal: Ingraham argued that because at least one issue in his pending appeal created a strong likelihood that the Supreme Court would reverse his conviction, equity and fairness required that he be released on bond pending appeal. The Supreme Court held that the statute governing the availability of release on bond pending appeal does not refer to the likelihood of a successful appeal, and therefore such likelihood is not grounds for release on bond. Ingraham v. St., 284 M 481, 945 P2d 19, 54 St. Rep. 782 (1997).

Weighing Evidence to Determine Continuation of Bond Pending Appeal Within Trial Court's Discretion: Ingraham argued that the trial court abused its discretion in denying his motion that he be released on bond pending appeal. The Supreme Court held that it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to give greater weight to evidence indicating that the defendant would pose a threat to the community if released pending appeal than to evidence presented by the defendant indicating that he would not pose a threat. Ingraham v. St., 284 M 481, 945 P2d 19, 54 St. Rep. 782 (1997).

Sequence of Consecutive Sentences: When the petitioner was sentenced to serve consecutive sentences for escape and using an automobile without the consent of the owner and the warden executed the sentences in a sequence reverse to that indicated by the court, there was no infringement on his rights and his petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was denied. Petition of Cheadle, 143 M 327, 389 P2d 579 (1964).

Waiver of Certain Irregularities:

The result of an appeal from a judgment of a Justice of the Peace, in a prosecution for a misdemeanor, is to abrogate that judgment and to hold the defendant under the original warrant of arrest for a trial de novo in the District Court, and the defendant cannot complain, on habeas corpus, of any irregularity committed by the Justice in rendering the judgment. Hosoda v. Neville, 45 M 310, 123 P 20 (1912).

Since the District Court does not, on appeal from a Justice's Court, sit as a court of review but tries the case de novo, any irregularities attending the rendition of the judgment in a case in which the Justice had jurisdiction of the offense charged and of the defendant are waived by taking the appeal. St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907).

FEDERAL HABEAS CORPUS STANDARDS

Cognizable Claims — Review of Factfinding Below — Required Record: Where habeas corpus petitioner raised cognizable claims, the Federal District Court was required to review state factfinding proceedings before accepting the findings against petitioner, and the material before the District Court was insufficient to permit it to determine whether petitioner was accorded a full and fair hearing on his constitutional claims where the District Court had before it only excerpts of brief portions of the various state trial proceedings. Dismissal of the petition would be vacated and the cause remanded. Little Light v. Crist, 649 F2d 682 (9th Cir. 1981).

Required Considerations — When Evidentiary Hearing Mandatory: When considering a federal habeas corpus petition a federal district court must: (1) consider whether the allegations would establish a right to be released if proved; (2) decide whether any cognizable issues raised by the petition were accorded a full and fair hearing in the state trial court (if not, the District Court must hold an evidentiary hearing on them); and (3) independently apply federal law principles to the state factual findings. An evidentiary hearing is mandatory in any of the following instances: (1) the merits of the factual dispute were not resolved at the state hearing; (2) the state factual determination was not fairly supported by the record; (3) the state factfinding procedure did not afford a full and fair hearing; (4) there were substantial allegations of newly discovered evidence; (5) material facts were not adequately developed at the state hearing; and (6) it appears for any other reason that the state trier did not afford petitioner a full and fair fact hearing. Little Light v. Crist, 649 F2d 682 (9th Cir. 1981).

Unexhausted Issues Existing — Exhausted Issues Heard When Fairness Dictates: When considerations of fairness so dictate, a federal court may, in a habeas corpus proceeding, hear issues exhausted in the state courts even though unexhausted issues exist. Little Light v. Crist, 649 F2d 682 (9th Cir. 1981).

Failure to Give Advice and Explanation Prior to Guilty Plea — Hearing Required: When a state prisoner makes specific and detailed factual assertions which are improbable but cannot be called incredible, and the record shows that no preguilty plea explanation of the elements of the charge, and of possible defenses which his attorney or the court is aware of, was made to the prisoner, a hearing must be held on the question whether the guilty plea was voluntary in the sense of being intelligently made. If the State contends but cannot prove that an explanation of the plea was made in private, and the prisoner denies it, a hearing must be held. And a hearing must be held in federal courts if the state courts do not hold a hearing. Federal habeas corpus is appropriate in such instances. Sober v. Crist, 644 F2d 807 (9th Cir. 1981).

Incompetent Attorney Claim — Hearing Required: State prisoner who had pleaded guilty and was seeking federal habeas corpus should have been given a hearing in the District Court on his claim that his attorney was incompetent. Sober v. Crist, 644 F2d 807 (9th Cir. 1981).

FEDERAL HABEAS CORPUS DENIED

State Remedies for Prosecutor's Acts Exhausted — Comity and Judicial Restraint as Grounds for Denying Relief: Comity and judicial restraint required that, absent special circumstances warranting federal court intervention, District Court grant of pretrial petition for federal habeas corpus, brought by petitioners who had exhausted their state remedies, be reversed. Delay caused by prosecution's disqualification of judge for tactical purposes did not constitute special circumstances. Nor did a 19-count charge when six counts were sufficient, where any unfairness resulting therefrom was avoided by state courts' dismissal of the unnecessary counts. Carden v. Mont., 626 F2d 82 (9th Cir. 1980), certiorari denied, 449 US 1014, 66 L Ed 2d 473, 101 S Ct 573 (1980).

Exhaustion of State Remedies: Federal habeas corpus relief was denied where petitioner claiming constitutional violations failed to exhaust state remedies in accordance with 28 U.S.C. §2254(b). Since a lack of state jurisdiction over the petitioner could also have been tested by state habeas corpus proceedings but was not, the habeas corpus complaint for lack of state jurisdiction was also denied. Campbell v. Crist, 36 St. Rep. 1690 (D.C. Mont. 1979) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement), affirmed in 647 F2d 956 (9th Cir. 1981).

Failure to Give Defendant's Offered Self-Defense Instruction: Failure of the court to give defendant's offered instruction on self-defense, when viewed with the instructions as a whole, did not render the trial so fundamentally unfair as to amount to a fundamental deprivation of due process that would support federal habeas corpus relief. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

"Plain Error" Rule Not Invoked by Invalid Instruction: The instruction by the court that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary act, which was declared improper in Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979), was not objected to by the defendant, thus invoking the plain error test. The instruction did not go to the essence of the case, and it is not highly probable that the error materially affected the verdict. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

Speedy Trial Claim: There was no fundamental deprivation of the federal constitutional right to a speedy trial that would support federal habeas corpus relief where a delay of 330 days, although substantial, was granted for the benefit of the defendant. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

This chapter has been narrowed in an attempt to limit the scope of habeas corpus to its historical position in Montana. It is intended that most post conviction remedies will be provided by the post conviction hearing section. In any event it must be noted that the scope of the writ is broader than it once was due to the federal decisions. Further habeas corpus is not controlled by statutory law, but rather by case development, thus making it necessary to have only a general outline available in the code.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning of (2) substituted "The writ of habeas corpus" for "Relief under this chapter" and deleted last sentence that read: "Relief for such purposes is limited to the provisions of Title 46, chapter 21"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: In (2) near beginning of first sentence, after "conviction", inserted "or sentence" and at end of first sentence inserted "nor is relief under this chapter available to attack the legality of an order revoking a suspended or deferred sentence".

1981 Amendment: Inserted "Except as provided in subsection (2)" in (1); and inserted (2) denying relief if appeal remedy is exhausted and denying relief as to an order revoking a suspended or deferred sentence and stating that relief for those purposes is limited to chapter 21 of this title.

GENERAL

Facially Invalid Sentence — Statutory Bar Against Appeal Unconstitutional — Habeas Corpus Relief Granted: Lott was sentenced in 1992 for aggravated kidnapping, sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated burglary, and felony assault, and each sentence was enhanced by 10 years for use of a dangerous weapon. The 5-year limit on appealing the sentences that was in effect at sentencing (now a 1-year limit) expired, so Lott was procedurally barred from challenging the sentences. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Guillaume, 1999 MT 29, 293 M 224, 975 P2d 312 (1999), that application of the weapons enhancement to a felony offense that itself required proving use of a weapon constituted a double jeopardy violation. Guillaume was held to apply retroactively in St. v. Whitehorn, 2002 MT 54, 309 M 63, 43 P3d 922 (2002), so Lott's sentence was unconstitutionally enhanced with regard to the aggravated burglary and felony assault convictions. The state asserted that Lott was procedurally barred from raising the issue in a habeas corpus petition because Lott did not raise the issue on direct appeal or in a petition for postconviction relief. After analyzing habeas corpus and postconviction relief in Montana, the Supreme Court noted the constitutional guarantee that the writ of habeas corpus may never be suspended and concluded that as applied to a facially invalid sentence, the procedural bar in this section unconstitutionally suspends the writ. Even if Lott had filed a direct appeal or petition for postconviction relief, the double jeopardy argument would have been unavailing because Guillaume and Whitehorn were not decided until well after both filing dates had expired. In order to avoid a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice, the Supreme Court granted Lott's petition for habeas corpus and remanded for resentencing pursuant to Guillaume and Whitehorn. Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006), followed in St. v. Jackson, 2007 MT 186, 338 M 344, 165 P3d 321 (2007), and St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

Petition for Postconviction Relief Barred by Seven-Year Lapse: Following remand of St. v. Morrison, 257 M 282, 848 P2d 514 (1993), in 1993, the District Court set forth findings of fact supporting Morrison's 3-year dangerous offender sentence that had been added to Morrison's 20-year prison sentence for sexual intercourse without consent, and Morrison's sentence became final. In 2000, Morrison petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that the 3-year sentence enhancement should be vacated because the use of a weapon had not been charged as a separate offense in the information and that the court relied on false or misleading evidence to support the enhancement. The court treated the petition as one for postconviction relief and denied it as untimely. Morrison appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the version of 46-21-102 in effect at the time of Morrison's final conviction in 1993, the statute of limitations required that petitions for postconviction relief be filed within 5 years after conviction became final. Morrison's petition was not filed until 7 years after conviction. Notwithstanding Morrison's argument that the statute of limitations should be equitably tolled, the petition was not timely and the District Court properly dismissed it. Morrison v. Mahoney, 2002 MT 21, 308 M 196, 41 P3d 320 (2002).

Defendant Incarcerated Prior to Sentencing Entitled to Ten Days a Month of Good Time Credit: Sebastian argued that the policy of awarding 10 days of good time allowance a month for presentence incarceration served under 53-30-105 (now repealed) constituted a wealth-based classification, in violation of MacPheat v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 62, 299 M 46, 997 P2d 753 (2000). The Supreme Court noted that it had previously addressed the good time issue in Corcoran v. Mahoney, No. 00-346 (July 2000), an unpublished opinion holding that because security levels in county jails are consistent with close custody security classifications at the state prison, defendants who are incarcerated prior to sentencing are entitled to 10 days a month of good time credit under the former good time statute. The court found the policy determination that pretrial detainees are entitled to no more than 10 days of good time credit to be reasonable and declined to apply the classification system in MacPheat to pretrial detainees. Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Minimal Liberty Interest of Prison Inmate: As an inmate at the state prison, Jellison participated in a sitdown demonstration, repeatedly disobeying direct orders from corrections officers. Jellison claimed that his subsequent detention and custody reclassification violated his due process rights and right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court disagreed and denied Jellison's petition for relief. Considering that prison disciplinary actions take place in a closed, tightly controlled environment peopled by those who have chosen to violate the criminal law and have been lawfully incarcerated for doing so, the liberty interest of an inmate is minimal and is generally limited to freedom from restraint that, although not exceeding the sentence in such an unexpected manner as to give rise to protection by the due process clause by its own force, nevertheless imposes atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. Discipline in segregated confinement does not generally rise to that level, nor does custody classification generally implicate a liberty interest sufficient to give rise to due process protection for an inmate. Further, Jellison was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because prison officials are accorded wide-ranging deference in adopting policies to preserve internal order and discipline among the inmates, including prophylactic and preventative measures intended the reduce the incidence of breaches of prison order. Jellison v. Mahoney, 1999 MT 217, 295 M 540, 986 P2d 1089, 56 St. Rep. 853 (1999).

Consideration of Moot Issue of Right to Reasonable Bail: Although a petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus was moot because petitioner was no longer in custody, the issue was the petitioner's right to reasonable bail, and the court accepted jurisdiction to address the substantive issues by writ of supervisory control in order to address a constitutional issue capable of repetition. Wier v. Lincoln County Sheriff's Dept., 278 M 473, 925 P2d 1172, 53 St. Rep. 1013 (1996).

Writ of Habeas Corpus Treated as Petition for Postconviction Relief and Time-Barred: Petitioner brought a writ of habeas corpus 8 years after having been convicted. The Supreme Court treated the writ as a petition for postconviction relief but held that relief was time-barred under this section because the writ was brought more than 5 years after conviction. Rudolph v. Day, 273 M 309, 902 P2d 1007, 52 St. Rep. 988 (1995), followed in George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001). See also St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

Substitution of Postconviction Proceedings for Habeas Corpus Proceedings When Appeals Exhausted — Not Unconstitutional Suspension of Habeas Corpus Writ: The District Court dismissed defendant's habeas corpus petition, relying on this section, which provides that habeas corpus relief is not available to attack the validity of a conviction or sentence of a person adjudged guilty in a court of record who has exhausted the remedy of appeal. Defendant argued that this section was an unconstitutional suspension of the constitutional right to a writ of habeas corpus. However, relying on Swain v. Pressley, 430 US 372, 51 L Ed 2d 411, 97 S Ct 1224 (1977), the Supreme Court held that the substitution of postconviction proceedings for habeas corpus proceedings when a petitioner has exhausted the right of appeal does not amount to a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Release From Custody: Two days after defendant filed an application for a writ of habeas corpus in the District Court, he was released from custody by a Justice's Court. The District Court did not notice the application for hearing. Because defendant was not in custody, he was not deprived of his liberty and the petition became moot. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Habeas Corpus Inappropriate Remedy: In an original proceeding before the Supreme Court, petitioners protested the physical conditions under which they were held in a county jail. They alleged a tort cause of action and violation of their constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. They sought relief under the habeas corpus and declaratory judgment statutes. Habeas corpus is not an appropriate remedy because it allows a prisoner to challenge the legal sufficiency of the cause for his incarceration, not the physical conditions under which he is held. Gates v. Missoula County Comm'rs, 235 M 261, 766 P2d 884, 45 St. Rep. 2370 (1988).

Application Granted — Incarceration and No Other Pending Action: Application for a Writ of Habeas Corpus is proper when petitioner was incarcerated at the time of petitioning and when no application for a Writ of Certiorari was pending in the District Court. Crane v. St., 200 M 280, 650 P2d 794, 39 St. Rep. 1743 (1982).

Denial of Federal Constitutional Rights: A Writ of Habeas Corpus is not available in the state courts of Montana to correct denials of federal constitutional rights. Brown v. St., 202 F. Supp. 29 (D.C. Mont. 1962).

Purpose: The purpose of a Writ of Habeas Corpus is to determine the legality or illegality of the restraint alleged to be exercised; it is available only to persons unlawfully imprisoned or restrained of their liberty, and is independent of the legal proceeding under which the detention is sought to be justified. August v. Burns, 79 M 198, 255 P 737 (1927).

PROCEDURE

Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Not Necessarily Mooted by Release of Petitioner From Physical Custody: Sebastian argued that he was entitled to a writ of habeas corpus because he was being unlawfully imprisoned under the Department of Corrections good time policy. The state contended that the legality of Sebastian's imprisonment was moot because he had been released from incarceration. Sebastian argued that even though he was released from prison, he was still suffering under an unlawful restraint on his liberty because the discharge date of the 10-year suspended sentence that he was serving depended on good time credit to which he was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that release from custody may moot some habeas corpus petitions because the relief requested, i.e., release from unlawful imprisonment, can no longer be granted. However, release from physical custody does not necessarily moot the petition when the court can still grant effective relief. In this case, the completion date of Sebastian's suspended sentence depended on the discharge date of his term of confinement and was thus based on the jail good time credit to which he was entitled. If the good time policy was in fact unlawful and its application to Sebastian's prison term led to an erroneous discharge date, the completion date of the suspended sentence would also be incorrect. Thus, despite the fact that Sebastian was no longer imprisoned, it was still within the power of the court to grant relief to prevent the possible unlawful restraint on Sebastian's liberty, so the petition was not moot, and the court went on to address the merits of the petition. Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Personal Appearance Before Parole Board — Subject Matter Jurisdiction to Determine Due Process Violation: Sage maintained that he had a right to due process, based on a liberty interest in parole pursuant to 46-23-201, that was violated by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) when it did not allow him to personally appear before the Board at a parole hearing. Further, Sage maintained that the District Court had subject matter jurisdiction to decide by writ of habeas corpus whether his due process rights had been violated. The Board asserted that Sage's alleged due process violations fell outside the parameters of habeas corpus relief and that the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to consider the issue. The Supreme Court held that the alleged deprivation of Sage's right to due process was directly related to whether the cause of his continued incarceration was legal, thus falling within the parameters of this section, and that the District Court therefore did have subject matter jurisdiction to determine whether the right to due process was violated. Pursuant to Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebr. Penal & Correctional Complex, 442 US 1 (1979), the opportunity of a parole applicant to appear before those entrusted with the subjective responsibility of passing judgment on the application is an important element of the due process to which the applicant is entitled. Based on the plain language of 46-23-202 and ARM 20.25.401, an inmate who is eligible for parole is clearly provided the right to personally appear at an interview "before the parole board" prior to the Board's decision to grant or deny the application for parole. Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822, 53 St. Rep. 1234 (1996).

Petition for Writ Procedurally Barred: The defendant refused to cooperate with his appointed appellate attorney. The attorney was relieved, and the defendant was ordered to proceed pro se and was given an extension of time to file his appellate brief. Two weeks after the time period expired, the Supreme Court dismissed his appeal. The defendant then petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, raising, among other issues, the issue of whether there was probable cause for his arrest and the search of his home. The Supreme Court ruled that the defendant is procedurally barred from attacking the validity of his conviction when he has been adjudged guilty of an offense in a court of record and has exhausted the remedy of appeal. Duncan v. St., 243 M 232, 794 P2d 331, 47 St. Rep. 738 (1990), followed in Rudolph v. Day, 273 M 309, 902 P2d 1007, 52 St. Rep. 988 (1995).

Exhaustion of State Remedies: When a federal claim was never fairly presented to the state court, the federal District Court denied a petition for want of exhaustion of state remedies. Swan v. Crist, 36 St. Rep. 746 (D.C. Mont. 1979) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Question of Speedy Trial Not Proper Issue in Asylum State: The issue of the lack of a speedy trial is not properly cognizable by a court of the asylum state in a habeas corpus proceeding in that court contesting extradition to another state. In re Hart, 178 M 235, 583 P2d 411 (1978).

Exhaustion of State Remedies: A petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was denied a prisoner convicted in Montana but imprisoned in Nevada because his state remedies had not been exhausted. Evans v. Wolff, 427 F. Supp. 400 (D.C. Mont. 1977).

Motives of Prosecution: On a hearing of a habeas corpus sued out for the liberation of one who is sought to be extradited for the violation in another state it is not admissible to hear evidence upon, or to inquire into, the motives or purposes of the prosecution. St. v. Booth, 134 M 235, 328 P2d 1104 (1958).

Trial Court Jurisdiction — Presumption: On application for Writ of Habeas Corpus, which presents the inquiry whether the trial court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the prosecution and of the defendant and to render such a judgment as the law authorizes in the particular case, the presumption of jurisdiction is conclusive unless want of it appears on the face of the record, and express recitals of jurisdictional facts cannot be rebutted by evidence beyond the record. In re Shaffer, 70 M 609, 227 P 37 (1924).

Objection That Facts Do Not Constitute an Offense — When Taken: Under former law, the objection that the facts stated in an information do not constitute a public offense could be taken by demurrer, at the trial under a plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment. St. v. Smith, 58 M 567, 194 P 131 (1920).

Not of a Criminal Nature: Habeas corpus is not a special proceeding of a criminal nature. State ex rel. Brandegee v. Clements, 52 M 57, 155 P 271 (1916). See also State ex rel. Hepner v. District Court, 40 M 17, 104 P 872 (1909); State ex rel. Jackson v. Kennie, 24 M 45, 60 P 589 (1900); State ex rel. Newell v. Newell, 13 M 302, 34 P 28 (1893).

Petitioner Not Defendant: The term "defendant" is not a proper designation for a petitioner in a habeas corpus proceeding. State ex rel. Jackson v. Kennie, 24 M 45, 60 P 589 (1900).

WRIT GRANTED

Illegal Revocation of Sentence — Habeas Corpus Relief Warranted: The state petitioned to revoke Borgen's suspended sentence, and the District Court granted the petition and resentenced Borgen to incarceration for an additional 14 years. Borgen petitioned for habeas corpus relief. The Supreme Court determined that after an illegal weapon enhancement sentence was subtracted from Borgen's original sentence, the total time remaining on Borgen's suspended sentence was about 9 years, 1 month. However, the petition to revoke the suspended sentence was not filed until 9 years, 8 months after sentencing. Because the legal portion of Borgen's sentence had expired before the petition to revoke was filed, revocation of Borgen's sentence was facially illegal, and Borgen's incarceration constituted a grievous wrong and a miscarriage of justice warranting habeas corpus relief. Therefore, the Supreme Court granted Borgen's petition, vacated the sentence revocation, and ordered that Borgen be released from custody. Borgen v. Sorrell, 2009 MT 143, 350 M 339, 217 P3d 1022 (2009). See also Lott v. St., 2006 MT 279, 334 M 270, 150 P3d 337 (2006).

Good Time Credit for Indigent Defendant Confined to County Detention Facility: The decision in Bearden v. Ga., 461 US 660, 76 L Ed 2d 221, 103 S Ct 2064 (1983), clearly and unambiguously stands for the principle that to deprive a criminal defendant of freedom simply because, through no want of bona fide effort, willful refusal, or fault of the defendant, the defendant lacks the financial resources to buy liberty is contrary to the fundamental fairness required by the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution. This is not to say that poverty insulates a defendant from having to post a reasonable bond should the facts and circumstances of the case so require. However, if a criminal defendant is unable to secure presentence freedom by posting bail for no other reason than indigency, that defendant is entitled to good time credit for the presentence time spent in a county detention facility to the same extent that the law allows good time credit to the criminal defendant who is able to post bail and thus serve the entirety of a sentence in the state correctional facility. In the present case, it was not clear from the record whether defendant was offered or denied bail and whether, if offered, the sole reason for defendant's inability to post bail was indigency; nevertheless, the Supreme Court granted defendant's petition for writ of habeas corpus and remanded to the District Court for a determination of whether defendant was entitled to good time credit for time served in the county detention facility. MacPheat v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 62, 299 M 46, 997 P2d 753, 57 St. Rep. 291 (2000), following MacFarlane v. Walter, 179 F3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1999), followed in Eisenman v. St., 2000 MT 170, 300 M 322, 5 P3d 542, 57 St. Rep. 704 (2000), in which the case of an indigent defendant was remanded for a determination of whether defendant was detained presentence in a county detention facility because he was too poor to post bail and thus entitled to credit for good time under the MacPheat test, and distinguished in Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001). Citing MacPheat, see also Reece v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 7, 304 M 80, 18 P3d 314 (2001). However, see also McGinnis v. Royster, 410 US 263, 35 L Ed 2d 282, 93 S Ct 1055 (1973).

Juvenile Transferred From Correctional Institution to Mental Health Facility: The Supreme Court upheld issuance of a Writ of Habeas Corpus when a juvenile was transferred under 53-21-130 from a juvenile correctional institution to a mental health facility and the record did not indicate that petitioner's transfer was caused by an emergency or that petitioner was afforded any due process protection upon expiration of the 10-day period specified in 53-21-130. In re the Petition of M.C., 211 M 105, 683 P2d 956, 41 St. Rep. 1242 (1984).

Jurisdiction to Revoke Deferred Sentence — Only During Period of Deferral: Petitioner was convicted of felony theft. On May 22, 1978, he was given a 3-year deferred imposition of sentence on the condition that restitution be made. On August 20, 1979, this deferred sentence was continued and petitioner was ordered to complete restitution by November 5, 1980. This was not done, and a petition to revoke the deferred sentence was filed on January 16, 1981. A hearing on the petition was held May 27, 1981, 3 years and 5 days after the initial deferral. The court revoked the deferred sentence and sentenced petitioner to 3 ½ years in prison, over petitioner's objections that the District Court was without jurisdiction to do so. The District Court contended it retained jurisdiction when the petition to revoke was filed within the deferral time. On a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Supreme Court held that 46-18-203 grants jurisdiction to revoke suspended sentences or impose sentences following deferral only during the period of the suspended or deferred sentences. This jurisdiction extends only through the running of the suspended or deferred sentence, regardless of whether a petition for revocation has been filed prior to the termination of the suspended or deferred sentence. (See 1985 amendment note.) Felix v. Mohler, 195 M 391, 636 P2d 830, 38 St. Rep. 1881 (1981).

Child Custody: While the welfare of a child in the matter of its custody is of paramount interest in a habeas corpus proceeding involving custody, neither such interest nor the child's wish will justify a court in denying its custody to the surviving parent, in the absence of a showing of unfitness or inability to support the child, and turning it over to a stranger. August v. Burns, 79 M 198, 255 P 737 (1927).

WRIT DENIED

Defendant Unable to Complete Residential Treatment Program Not Yet Established — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: In 1996, Johnson was sentenced to 10 years for felony aggravated kidnapping and 40 years for felony sexual intercourse without consent, with the terms to run concurrently. In 2007, 46-18-207 was enacted, which provided in part for the suspension of sentences for inmates who successfully completed the residential sexual offender treatment program established by the legislation. Johnson filed a writ of habeas corpus, asserting that his sentence for sexual intercourse without consent should be suspended because he had completed sex offender treatment programs in Arizona and Montana and further arguing that he was eligible for sexual offender treatment under 46-18-207. The District Court denied the writ and Johnson appealed, but the Supreme Court denied and dismissed the writ. The residential treatment program authorized in 46-18-207 was not yet established as of the date of the writ, so Johnson could not avail himself of the statutorily authorized program or of the benefits of 46-18-207. Additionally, even if Johnson was eligible for the program, placement is within the discretion of the Department of Corrections, and Johnson was ineligible in any case because of his conviction for aggravated kidnapping, which is one of the exceptions to the operation of 46-18-207. Johnson v. Mahoney, 2009 MT 275, 352 M 136, 217 P3d 1025 (2009).

Showing of Good Cause Required Prior to Appointment of State Public Defender in Habeas Corpus Proceedings: More than a simple motion is required before the Supreme Court will appoint the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) to represent a person seeking habeas corpus relief. In such case, OSPD counsel will be appointed only upon a demonstration of good cause. A showing of likelihood of the illegality of the sentence of the person seeking relief, and that the sentence will be shortened or terminated if habeas corpus relief is granted, is required before OSPD counsel will be appointed. A statement that an applicant is untrained or unskilled in the law is insufficient, without more, to establish good cause. Dyer v. Mahoney, 2008 MT 117, 342 M 495, 182 P3d 737 (2008).

No Showing That Defendant's Rights Violated by Failure to Make Bail or to Be Released on Own Recognizance — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Following Miller's arrest on charges of negligent homicide and failure to remain at the scene of an accident, the District Court set bail at $30,000. When Miller could not make bail, the amount was reduced to $10,000. Indigent, Miller could not pay the reduced bail and remained incarcerated. Miller petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that his continued incarceration was a violation of 46-9-106 and 46-9-111 and the constitutional guarantees of bail and against excessive sanctions. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant has a presumptive right to be released on a reasonable bail or on the defendant's own recognizance on conditions that will protect the community. However, the burden in a habeas corpus proceeding is on the petitioner to present a record that is sufficient to make a prima facie showing that the District Court's order constituted a violation, deprivation, infringement, or denial of the petitioner's constitutional, statutory, or legal rights. After considering the meager record and the seriousness of the allegations, the Supreme Court was not convinced that Miller had no ability to provide any bail or that the District Court could have released Miller on conditions that could be enforced and that could ensure the protection of the community. Thus, Miller failed to show that his rights were violated, and his petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. Miller v. District Court, 2007 MT 58, 336 M 207, 154 P3d 1186 (2007).

Federal Prohibition Against Penalty Beyond Statutory Maximum Not Retroactively Applicable: Following Gratzer's 1982 conviction for deliberate homicide, the District Court sentenced Gratzer to a consecutive 10-year term for using a weapon in committing the crime. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently decided Apprendi v. N.J., 530 US 466 (2000) (followed in Ring v. Ariz., 536 US 584 (2002), and Blakely v. Wash., 542 US 296 (2004)), holding that other than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases a penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Gratzer later petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus on grounds that the consecutive sentence for use of a weapon was a violation of Gratzer's constitutional rights. Gratzer's sentence enhancement was not submitted to the jury, so Apprendi was potentially applicable. Notwithstanding that Gratzer's conviction became final in 1984, long before Apprendi and its progeny were decided, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered Gratzer's claim pursuant to Teague v. Lane, 498 US 288 (1989), on grounds of whether Apprendi and its progeny applied retroactively. Under Teague, a new constitutional rule of criminal procedure does not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review unless the rule: (1) places certain kinds of primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal lawmaking authority to proscribe; or (2) qualifies as a watershed rule of criminal procedure. Noting that the U.S. Supreme Court held that Ring (and by implication Apprendi and Blakely) did not apply retroactively in Schriro v. Summerlin, 542 US 348 (2004), the court applied the Schriro rationale to Gratzer's case, holding that Apprendi failed to satisfy the first Teague exception for retroactivity because Apprendi announced a rule that did not inhibit the state's ability to substantively proscribe and punish a defendant for using a weapon in the commission of an offense, but merely established procedures that the state must follow in doing so, nor did the Apprendi rule qualify as a watershed rule of criminal procedure without which the likelihood of an accurate conviction would be seriously diminished. Federal courts of appeals nearly unanimously agree that the Apprendi line of cases do not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review, and the Supreme Court concurred. Gratzer's petition was denied. Gratzer v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Life Sentence Without Parole Not Violative of Constitutional Rights: Gratzer asserted that the sentencing court exceeded its authority and violated the constitutional right to habeas corpus when the court sentenced Gratzer to life without the possibility of parole. Gratzer's argument was that use of the word "term" implied that there was a distinction between sentences imposed for a specific time and indeterminate life sentences and that the statutory sentencing scheme does not authorize a court to remove a prisoner's eligibility for parole if the prisoner is serving a life sentence. The Supreme Court declined to recognize the distinction. "Term" is used throughout the criminal code to refer to the duration of a sentence without any indication that it is meant to refer exclusively to determinate time sentences, and the language in 46-18-202 that allows a court to impose the parole eligibility exception applies equally to time sentences and life sentences. A sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year refers to all felonies, including those punishable by a life sentence, rather than a cryptic means of limiting a sentencing court's ability to restrict the parole eligibility of prisoners serving life sentences. The District Court did not violate Gratzer's rights, and the sentence of life without parole was affirmed. Gratzer v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Attempt to Use Writ of Habeas Corpus to Demand Physical Presence of Children Removed From Parent in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Petition Properly Denied: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and had been removed from her custody unlawfully. The petition was denied. On appeal, the mother cited In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), for the proposition that a writ of habeas corpus was the appropriate procedural device to bring the custody matter before a court. The Supreme Court disagreed and distinguished Bertelson because the mother's position ignored the substantial differences between dissolution proceedings and abuse and neglect proceedings, differences that were not at issue in Bertelson. The court also cited its earlier holding in In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982 (2000), in which it was held that the children were properly removed from the mother's home. Because temporary custody of the children with the state was legal, relief pursuant to habeas corpus premised on illegal restraint was not available to the mother under these circumstances. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Denial of Writ of Habeas Corpus to Compel Attendance of Children in Abuse and Neglect Hearing Not Violative of Due Process Rights or Right to Confront Witnesses: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and claiming that the writ was necessary to ensure her due process rights by having the children available to rebut allegations against her at the hearing. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the mother was entitled to an opportunity for a meaningful hearing, that opportunity need not be provided at the expense of the children whose best interests were the paramount focus of the proceeding, and subjecting the children to direct and cross-examination could exacerbate the abuse that they had already experienced. Denial of the petition did not violate the mother's right to confront witnesses because the children were not her accusers and she had no right to confront them. Rather, the abuse and neglect case was brought by the state, and the mother had ample opportunity to confront and examine the state's witnesses and experts at the hearing, so her due process rights were met. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Allegation of Newly Discovered Evidence — Failure to Timely Appeal — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: The Supreme Court denied a petition for writ of habeas corpus based on allegations of newly discovered medical evidence, noting that there was no showing as to what constituted the new evidence and that petitioner was afforded the right of appeal but did not take it. Tecca v. McCormick, 246 M 317, 806 P2d 11, 47 St. Rep. 2068 (1990), followed in Blaney v. Gamble, 266 M 51, 879 P2d 51, 51 St. Rep. 466 (1994). Tecca was distinguished in Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Failure of Sentencing Court to Consider Time Served — Remand — Writ of Habeas Corpus Denied: Petitioner was sentenced to 5 years in the state prison for aggravated assault, with all 5 years suspended upon certain conditions. He served 4 ½ years of the suspended sentence before violating probation. After an appropriate petition, the District Court revoked the suspended sentence and sentenced petitioner to 5 years in the state prison, with 2 years suspended upon certain conditions. Petitioner sought a writ of habeas corpus seeking restoration of his good time but not appealing his sentence or conviction. After review, the Supreme Court held that the District Court had jurisdiction to revoke the suspended sentence and impose the original sentence but remanded for compliance with 46-18-201, requiring the District Court to consider elapsed time and state its reasons for either expressly allowing or rejecting elapsed time as credit against the sentence. The petition for writ of habeas corpus was denied for failure to set forth any basis for granting the writ. Speldrich v. McCormick, 243 M 238, 794 P2d 339, 47 St. Rep. 1186 (1990), followed in St. v. Docken, 274 M 296, 908 P2d 213, 52 St. Rep. 1240 (1995).

Prisoner Alleging Deprivation of Good Time: The Supreme Court denied petitioner's request, under a Writ of Habeas Corpus petition, to be credited for good time for participation in an education program although confined in maximum security. The computations of the state officials were found accurate. It was within their jurisdiction to impose rules under 53-30-105 (now repealed) which properly avoid good time awards in excess of the statutory provisions. Seadin v. Crist, 187 M 112, 608 P2d 1094, 37 St. Rep. 953 (1980).

Indigent Prisoners: Denial of trial transcript to an indigent prisoner does not violate his rights unless there has been some showing of need or a meritorious reason. Petition of Parker, 162 M 330, 511 P2d 973 (1973).

No Effect on Release: The Writ of Habeas Corpus is directed at unlawful imprisonment or restraint of liberty, and when, even if the Writ had been issued, it would not have resulted in the release of the petitioner from confinement since he was confined under a 5-year sentence imposed concurrently with his original 10-year sentence, habeas corpus was denied. In re Wagner's Petition, 145 M 101, 399 P2d 761 (1965).

Insufficient Commitment to Jail: When a Justice of the Peace, upon adjudging one guilty of contempt for disobeying a subpoena, imposed a fine of $100 and, upon refusal of payment, committed him to jail until payment was made and thereafter accepted a cash bond in lieu of fine and imprisonment pending final disposition of a certiorari proceeding and appeal to the Supreme Court, the objection that the commitment was insufficient under a former statute requiring imprisonment until payment of a fine would not lie since, if the Sheriff presumed to hold the contemner, the proper remedy would be habeas corpus. State ex rel. Mercer v. Woods, 116 M 533, 155 P2d 197 (1945).

Defective Indictment Not Ground for Relief: On an application for habeas corpus under former law, the court would not determine whether the indictment upon which the complainant was convicted was defective since the writ could not be used as a substitute for a demurrer or a motion to quash, its inquiry being confined to a determination of the validity of the process on its face and whether the court had jurisdiction of the offense charged. State ex rel. Boone v. Tullock, 72 M 482, 234 P 277 (1925).

Petit or Grand Larceny: When a person, after a preliminary examination, is committed for grand larceny and, upon his suing out a Writ of Habeas Corpus on the ground that he is guilty of petit larceny only, it appears from the evidence before the Justice that he was guilty at least of petit larceny and that there was a reasonable basis for the belief that he was guilty of grand larceny, it is the imperative duty of the court to remand him. In re Jones, 46 M 122, 126 P 929 (1912).

Trial Court Jurisdiction: When the court imposed a prison sentence for a misdemeanor, its judgment was void as being in excess of its jurisdiction, and the prisoner was entitled to habeas corpus. St. v. District Court, 35 M 321, 89 P 63 (1907).

Legality of Custody: When a petitioner for habeas corpus was convicted of murder and an oral judgment was rendered confining him to prison for 25 years without any record being made, but at a special term, after notice to the petitioner and his counsel, the minutes were corrected to show the judgment as rendered, and on the judgment thus entered a commitment was issued, the petitioner was legally in custody for the purposes of the judgment and not entitled to his discharge. In re Dye, 32 M 132, 79 P 689 (1905).

Case Notes

Misspelling of Petitioner's Name — Extradition Proceedings Not Defective: Slight misspelling of petitioner's name on a criminal complaint and arrest warrant, where "Henrichs" was spelled "Hendricks", constituted a technical defect and did not render extradition proceedings defective in light of the fact that the description accompanying the warrant correctly described the petitioner. Under the doctrine of idem sonans, two names spelled differently are regarded as the same if they sound alike in their pronunciation. In re Henrichs, 237 M 59, 771 P2d 967, 46 St. Rep. 620 (1989).

Technical Defects: When the court intended to vacate sentence to permit representation by counsel but said that it was vacating judgment, this was a mere technical defect and would not form the basis for habeas corpus. In re Petition of Eldiwitw, 153 M 468, 457 P2d 909 (1969).

Curable Defects in Process: When the committing order stated that the defendant was convicted for the crime of burglary, together with a prior conviction of a felony, but the defendant was properly convicted and sentenced for robbery and had a prior conviction of a felony, the erroneous use of the word "burglary", which had been the prior felony for which the defendant had been convicted, did not constitute such a defect as to allow for a Writ of Habeas Corpus. In re Petition of Erickson, 146 M 456, 409 P2d 447 (1965).

Defective Indictment Not Ground for Relief: On an application for habeas corpus under former law, the court would not determine whether the indictment upon which the complainant was convicted was defective since the writ could not be used as a substitute for a demurrer or a motion to quash, its inquiry being confined to a determination of the validity of the process on its face and whether the court had jurisdiction of the offense charged. Case Notes

Denial of Bond Pending Appeal — Method of Supreme Court Review — Jurisdiction: After conviction for negligent homicide and on related charges, Ingraham moved the District Court to continue bond pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion, finding that Ingraham was a danger to the community and therefore did not meet the requirements of 46-9-107. Ingraham then moved the Supreme Court, pursuant to former Rule 22, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), to continue bond pending appeal or, in the alternative, to accept appeal of the District Court's order denying bond, pursuant to former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), and 46-20-104. The Attorney General moved to dismiss, contending that there was no provision in law for appeal from a District Court order denying bond pending appeal and that Ingraham should have brought an original habeas corpus proceeding. The Supreme Court agreed with the Attorney General and dismissed Ingraham's motion or appeal, holding that Ingraham should have brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to this section. Ingraham then filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was filed with Justice Trieweiler pursuant to 3-2-212. Justice Trieweiler granted the petition to the extent necessary for the District Court to hold an evidentiary hearing as provided by statute, under the theory that the District Court was the more appropriate court for the hearing than was the Supreme Court. The Attorney General opposed the order by applying to the full Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, arguing, contrary to the state's previous position, that this section does not really apply to persons convicted in a criminal case and that the more appropriate procedure was an original proceeding "in the nature of habeas corpus" before the full Supreme Court. The application for a writ of supervisory control was denied, was treated by the Supreme Court as a late-filed response to Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was referred to Justice Trieweiler. Justice Trieweiler determined that it was inappropriate for him alone to determine the form of review of the District Court's denial of bond. Justice Trieweiler also determined that: (1) Ingraham had no constitutional right to bond pending appeal; (2) Ingraham did have a right to the proper exercise of the District Court's discretion in the application of 46-9-107; and (3) that right was a substantial right for the purposes of 46-20-104. For these reasons, Justice Trieweiler vacated his previous order granting Ingraham's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and referred the matter to the full Supreme Court for review of the District Court's order denying bond pending appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 284 M 77, 945 P2d 16, 54 St. Rep. 614 (1997).

Consideration of Moot Issue of Right to Reasonable Bail: Although a petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus was moot because petitioner was no longer in custody, the issue was the petitioner's right to reasonable bail, and the court accepted jurisdiction to address the substantive issues by writ of supervisory control in order to address a constitutional issue capable of repetition. Wier v. Lincoln County Sheriff's Dept., 278 M 473, 925 P2d 1172, 53 St. Rep. 1013 (1996).

Convicted Felon Allowed Preconviction Bail Not Automatically Entitled to Bail Pending Appeal: Prior to his conviction for deliberate homicide, Moore was allowed bail, and following conviction, he was designated a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for purposes of parole eligibility. After conviction, Moore was denied bail pending appeal. Moore petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that he is entitled to bail pending appeal as a matter of law pursuant to 46-9-107 and 46-20-204. The Supreme Court found that under 46-9-107, the District Court was required to order the detention of Moore unless it found that he was "not likely to flee". Since the District Court made the opposite finding based on evidence presented at the hearing, the Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in the District Court's order denying bail pending appeal. The Supreme Court also held that the phrase "[i]f an appeal is taken and the defendant is admitted to bail" contained in 46-20-204(2) referred to bail pending appeal and requires that the District Court stay the execution of its sentence if the defendant is admitted to bail pending appeal. Because Moore was not admitted to bail pending appeal, his sentence should not be stayed. Moore v. McCormick, 260 M 305, 858 P2d 1254, 50 St. Rep. 1054 (1993).

When Bail Allowable: It is proper to allow bail in a homicide case in the absence of a showing by the County Attorney that the proof of the defendant's guilt is evident or the presumption thereof great. State ex rel. Murray v. District Court, 35 M 504, 90 P 513 (1907).

Jurisdiction of District Court to Grant Habeas Corpus: Defendant applied to District Court for Writ of Certiorari, and court decided to treat the application as one for habeas corpus. The Supreme Court held that District Court has no jurisdiction to consider Writ of Habeas Corpus unless defendant properly petitions for habeas corpus. St. v. Crane, 196 M 305, 639 P2d 514, 39 St. Rep. 126 (1982).

Liberal Construction for Jailed Pro Se Defendant: Where defendant was jailed and appeared pro se, court held it would liberally construe defendant's petition for relief and thus directed matter be held in abeyance for 30 days to allow petitioner to prepare and submit proper petition for habeas corpus. St. v. Crane, 196 M 305, 639 P2d 514, 39 St. Rep. 126 (1982).

Denial of Speedy Trial: Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus by petitioner being held on detainer from another state, alleging that delay by other state in lodging a detainer deprived petitioner of right to a speedy trial, was denied on grounds that petitioner had deprived himself of a speedy trial by fleeing from the other state, and his petition disclosed no factual basis as required by the statute on which to base the issuance of a Writ. Case Notes

Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Not Necessarily Mooted by Release of Petitioner From Physical Custody: Sebastian argued that he was entitled to a writ of habeas corpus because he was being unlawfully imprisoned under the Department of Corrections good time policy. The state contended that the legality of Sebastian's imprisonment was moot because he had been released from incarceration. Sebastian argued that even though he was released from prison, he was still suffering under an unlawful restraint on his liberty because the discharge date of the 10-year suspended sentence that he was serving depended on good time credit to which he was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that release from custody may moot some habeas corpus petitions because the relief requested, i.e., release from unlawful imprisonment, can no longer be granted. However, release from physical custody does not necessarily moot the petition when the court can still grant effective relief. In this case, the completion date of Sebastian's suspended sentence depended on the discharge date of his term of confinement and was thus based on the jail good time credit to which he was entitled. If the good time policy was in fact unlawful and its application to Sebastian's prison term led to an erroneous discharge date, the completion date of the suspended sentence would also be incorrect. Thus, despite the fact that Sebastian was no longer imprisoned, it was still within the power of the court to grant relief to prevent the possible unlawful restraint on Sebastian's liberty, so the petition was not moot, and the court went on to address the merits of the petition. Sebastian v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 88, 305 M 158, 25 P3d 163 (2001).

Adoption Proceeding in Foreign Jurisdiction — Applicability of Habeas Corpus: A child was born to petitioner in Wyoming in 1980. She relinquished custody to a couple and moved to Montana. Petitioner executed handwritten instruments that were notarized relinquishing custody to the couple and stating she did not know the natural father. The couple began adoption proceedings in Wyoming. Petitioner then executed a written revocation of custody and petitioned for a Writ of Habeas Corpus for the child in Yellowstone County. The District Court deferred jurisdiction to the Wyoming court having jurisdiction of the adoption proceeding. The habeas corpus petition was properly filed in Yellowstone County because the child was currently located there. The District Court properly deferred jurisdiction because although petitioner contended she executed the written instruments under fraud and duress, those issues were equally triable in Wyoming. Under 40-7-108, the District Court could not determine whether Wyoming was an inconvenient forum, only whether the court itself was. The Supreme Court in upholding the District Court's action said in cases of simultaneous proceedings, the provisions of 40-7-107(3) should be followed. Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Inappropriate Remedy: The defendant pleaded guilty to a sexual offense after being told he would be eligible for parole in 1 year. The prosecutor and the judge were unaware that the prison's sexual offender program was a 2-year program. Due to the length of the program, the defendant was denied parole. The Supreme Court held that granting the writ of habeas corpus was proper because the guilty plea had been based upon a fundamental misunderstanding as to its consequences. The court also held that the lower court was correct in granting the defendant parole rather than allowing him to withdraw his plea, which would lead to further proceedings. Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7, 47 St. Rep. 887 (1990).

Return to Foreign Jurisdiction: Montana courts were not the proper forum for petitioner to obtain release where he had been concurrently sentenced in Wyoming and Montana and by reason of the judgment of the Wyoming court the warden of the Montana prison would not allow him to leave on parole unless he was taken to the Wyoming penitentiary to serve the balance of the term imposed there. Petition of Glover, 166 M 546, 539 P2d 721 (1975).

Credit for Time Served: When habeas corpus was granted to a petitioner who had served a considerable portion of his sentence and whose commitment was set aside and the petitioner was permitted to withdraw his guilty plea, the court held that 46-18-402 should be observed upon any subsequent imposition of a new sentence. Morsette v. Ellsworth, 151 M 319, 443 P2d 28 (1968).

Habeas Corpus Denial Unappealable: The Supreme Court dismissed an appeal from a denial of defendant's Writ of Habeas Corpus since under Montana law no appeal lies from such order in a proceeding criminal in nature when the issue to be determined is the freedom of the petitioner or the legality of his detention. Supervised Release Program Not Inclusive of Furloughs — Escape Not Chargeable to Furloughed Convict: Roberts was released from the state prison into the parole-related furlough program rather than the supervised release program and did not meet the requirements of the administrative rules governing the supervised release program. A part of Roberts' parole included a 10-day furlough to allow him to find housing and employment. When he failed to meet his parole officer on a specified date, he was charged with felony escape. Roberts moved to dismiss the charge. An escape charge can be maintained only against a person subject to official detention, which is defined in part as supervision under a supervised release program. The term "supervised release program" clearly and unambiguously refers to the program codified in part 4 (now repealed) and not to the furlough associated with parole proceedings under 46-23-215. Because Roberts was not being supervised under a supervised release program, the District Court erred in concluding that Roberts could be prosecuted for escape and in denying his motion to dismiss the escape charge. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded with instructions to enter an order of dismissal. St. v. Roberts, 275 M 365, 912 P2d 812, 53 St. Rep. 181 (1996).

Prisoner on Furlough — Federal Search and Seizure Law: Plaintiff was released from prison on an educational furlough to attend the University of Montana (now University of Montana-Missoula). A deputy received a tip that plaintiff had drugs in his dorm room. The deputy called plaintiff's parole officer who determined that plaintiff had not signed a consent to be searched when furloughed. No search warrant was procured, but the search was conducted and drugs were seized. The evidence was suppressed and plaintiff's furlough continued. Plaintiff then brought this action seeking damages for violation of his civil rights. The federal courts have distinguished between a private citizen and a convict who is paroled prior to the expiration of his term, stating that a parolee does not have the expectations of privacy (see Art. II, sec. 10, Mont.

Const.) enjoyed by other citizens. One of these restrictions is that the parolee and his home are subject to search by the parole officer when he reasonably believes that such search is necessary in the performance of his duties. Montana law may differ (see St. v. Fogarty, 187 M 393, 610 P2d 140 (1980)), but this case charged violations of the United States Constitution, and under it the search was not constitutionally infirm. Quigg v. France, 502 F. Supp. 516, 37 St. Rep. 2113 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Escape From Prison Furlough Program — Misdemeanor: A prisoner furlough program does not fit within the definition of "prison". Where defendants walked away from such programs, no risk of violence was involved and they could be convicted only of misdemeanor escape. St. v. Whiteshield, 185 M 208, 605 P2d 189 (1980).

Chapter Attorney General's Opinions

Application Based Solely on Medical Grounds Acceptable: An eligible inmate may present to the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) an application for a furlough program that is based solely on medical treatment grounds. Discretion to approve or deny the application is vested in the Board. 42 A.G. Op. 57 (1988).

Prisoner Furlough Program — Short-Term Furlough: A furlough may be granted for a specific limited period of time after which the prisoner may be required to return to prison unless he applies for and is granted a new furlough. 37 A.G. Op. 114 (1978). See 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Board of Pardons (Now Board of Pardons and Parole): The responsibilities and powers of the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) are distinguished from those of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) in administering the prisoner furlough program. 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Notification Required: The Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) shall solicit information about pertinent case material from officials and individuals in the sentencing community before approving or denying a furlough application. It is the responsibility of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) to notify and to obtain approval of law enforcement agencies to which the furloughee is released. 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Prisoner Furlough — Application: Unless the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) has adopted reasonable rules prohibiting application by certain prisoners until a certain state of incarceration, a prisoner may make application for furlough any time during incarceration. No rule may prevent a prisoner from applying for furlough at any time after he has served one-half the time required to be considered for parole [and, by 1981 amendment, not more than 15 months remain before he is eligible for parole]. 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Review of Furlough Plans: The Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections), not the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole), may make periodic review and revision of furlough plans a condition of individual furlough agreements. 37 A.G. Op. 82 (1977).

Applicant for Work Furlough Responsible for Locating Supervising Agency: Under former law, the applicant was responsible for locating an agency which would supervise his release on work furlough. 36 A.G. Op. 19 (1975).

Final Authority in Department: Under former law although the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) had the authority to release prisoners on furlough, the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) had final authority to approve or disapprove applications of prisoners for release on work furlough. 36 A.G. Op. 19 (1975).

When Application May Be Made for Work Furlough: A prisoner may apply for participation in the work furlough program at any time but he is not eligible for release on work furlough until he has completed half of the time required for eligibility for parole. 36 A.G. Op. 19 (1975).

Case Notes

Improper Delegation of Hearing Responsibility to Parole Board Member — Right to Hearing Denied Absent Opportunity to Appear in Person Before Board: Haney sought immediate parole and release from the state prison on grounds that he was improperly denied parole after being allowed only a brief appearance before a hearings officer rather than the full Board of Pardons and Parole. The state contended that there is no statutory requirement that Haney be allowed a personal appearance before a majority of the Board and that Haney's procedural rights were satisfied by the interview conducted by the hearings officer. The Supreme Court disagreed with the state's position. The language of 46-23-202 clearly requires that before consideration of a prisoner's application for parole, the Board must conduct a hearing at which statements from interested persons can be considered, and 46-23-202 clearly requires both a hearing and an interview of the prisoner. This section authorizes only delegation of the interview to a hearings officer, but the fact that the interviews may relate to parole eligibility does not eliminate the separate requirement in 46-23-202 for a hearing conducted by the Board. Thus, Haney was denied his statutory right to a hearing before the Board when the Board denied his parole without an opportunity to personally appear before the Board and when the hearing responsibility was delegated to the hearings officer. Although the Supreme Court declined to grant Haney his immediate freedom, the case was remanded to the Board for reconsideration of Haney's parole application after providing him with an opportunity to appear in person and present witnesses on his behalf. (See also 2001 amendments requiring an initial appearance and hearing before at least one member of the Board if the offense was committed prior to March 20, 1989, and 2003 amendment.) Haney v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 201, 306 M 288, 32 P3d 1254 (2001).

Requirement That Parole Board Member With Knowledge of Native American Affairs Participate in Proceedings Regarding Native Americans: George, a Native American, contended that he was entitled to have the member of the Board of Pardons and Parole with knowledge in Native American affairs participate in his parole review. The state contended otherwise, pursuant to a plain reading of 2-15-2302, and asserted that had the Legislature intended to require participation by the particular Board member with knowledge in Native American affairs, it could have stated so directly or at least have required that the member with that knowledge be appointed as a regular Board member. The Supreme Court agreed with George. Cognizant of the role of the judge to examine the substance of statutes without inserting what has been omitted or omitting what has been inserted, the court agreed with the state that at least at first blush, 2-15-2302 does not appear to require that the member of the Board of Pardons and Parole with knowledge in Native American affairs participate in parole applications by Native Americans. However, the court could think of no other plausible reason for requiring such a member on the Board, so the court ruled that the parole Board member with knowledge in Native American affairs is required to participate in parole applications by Native Americans and remanded George's case for de novo review with the full participation by that Board member. George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001).

Due Process Rights of Inmate Regarding Preparole Interview — Presence of Sufficient Number of Board of Pardons and Parole Members Required: Under 46-23-107 (now repealed), decisions regarding an inmate's parole are to be made by a majority vote of the members of the Board of Pardons and Parole. As stated in Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996), to deny an inmate the opportunity to appear before those who will personally decide the merits of the parole application implicates the inmate's due process rights. In this case, only one member of the Board was present at West's parole hearing. West contended that he had a right to appear before the full Board and that a hearing before only one member violated his due process rights. The state argued that pursuant to the unpublished opinion of Radford v. Mahoney, No. 98-150 (July 1998) (unpublished), not all Board members are required to be present for the personal interview and that this section allows the Board to delegate the responsibility for parole eligibility interviews to one of its members. The state contended that having only one Board member present was permissible because the full Board ultimately participated in the decision to deny West' parole. The Supreme Court was unpersuaded by the state's argument, noting that the copy of the case disposition attached to West's habeas corpus petition was signed by only one Board member. The court found its order in Radford inconsistent with the Sage decision, and therefore unpersuasive. West's due process rights were no less implicated because West had the right to appear before one Board member when a majority vote of the Board was required for a decision. The court remanded to the Board with instructions to provide West with an opportunity to appear before a sufficient number of Board members so that those who decide his case will have done so based on a personal interview. (See 2001 and 2003 amendments.) West v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 82, 305 M 117, 22 P3d 201 (2001).

Prehearing Interview Not Substitute for Constitutional Right to Personal Appearance Before Parole Board: The Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) contended that under this section, its personal interview responsibility could be delegated to an appointed hearings officer, precluding the need for a parole applicant to appear personally before the Board. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting a parole applicant's due process right to appear before those entrusted with the subjective responsibility of passing judgment on the application. Therefore, under this section, the Board may designate one of its members, one of its staff members, or any other adult correctional releasing authority to conduct a prehearing interview with an inmate relative to parole eligibility to assist the Board and expedite the hearing process. However, the prehearing interview is not a substitute for the applicant's constitutional right to personally appear before the Board. (See 2001 amendment.) Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822, 53 St. Rep. 1234 (1996).

1997 Amendment: Chapter 189 in (1), after "women's", substituted "prison" for "correctional system".

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 372 in (2), near middle after "at least", substituted "one-fourth" for "one-half" and at end deleted "less the good time allowance provided for in 53-30-105. Except as provided in subsection (3), a prisoner designated as a nondangerous offender under 46-18-404 may be paroled after the prisoner has served one-quarter of the prisoner's full term, less the good time allowance provided for in 53-30-105. Any prisoner serving a time sentence may be paroled after the prisoner has served 17 ½ years of the sentence"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) A prisoner serving a time sentence under 45-9-109 may not be paroled until the prisoner has served at least one-half of the full term, less the good time allowance provided for in 53-30-105"; in (3), at end after "30 years", deleted "less the good time allowance provided for in 53-30-105"; deleted (6) that read: "(6) Whenever the department of corrections and human services certifies to the board that the population at either the male or female correctional facility has exceeded its designed capacity for 30 consecutive days, the board shall consider the respective male or female prisoners under the jurisdiction of the department eligible for parole 120 days prior to the eligibility dates provided for in subsections (2) through (4)"; deleted (7) that read: "(7) Regardless of length of sentence, if the conditions of parole eligibility are met within the initial 12 months of incarceration, the provisions of subsection (6) do not apply"; and adjusted subsection references. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

Chapter 482 in version effective July 1, 1997, in (1), near middle after "46-18-202(2)", inserted "or 46-18-219".

Chapter 546 in (1) substituted "women's correctional system" for "women's correctional center"; and in (6) substituted "department of corrections" for "department of corrections and human services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995. The amendment in subsection (6) was rendered void by the amendment in Ch. 372.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 10 in (1) substituted reference to the Women's Correctional Center for reference to the Women's Correction Center; in (7), after "incarceration", deleted "at Montana state prison"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: Chapter 248 in (1), near beginning before "parole", inserted "nonmedical"; and in (2), (4), and (5), near beginning, inserted "under this section".

The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 315 in (6), near beginning, substituted "either the male or female correctional facility has exceeded" for "the Montana state prison exceeds", near middle, after "capacity", deleted "of 744 by 96 inmates or that the population at the women's correction center exceeds its design capacity of 35 inmates and that the prison or the center has exceeded its capacity for a period of more than", after "30" inserted "consecutive", and near end, after "consider", substituted "the respective male or female inmates under the jurisdiction of the department" for "convicts in the institution in which the design capacity has been exceeded"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 519 in (2), after "except", substituted "as provided in subsection (3)" for "that"; inserted (3) requiring a person convicted of criminal sale of dangerous drugs on or near school property to serve at least one-half of full sentence less good time allowance prior to parole; in (6) and (7) changed internal reference; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendment: In (1), near beginning, substituted "Subject to the restrictions contained in subsections (2) through (4), the board may" for "Subject to the following restrictions, the board shall"; in (4), in two places, substituted "may" for "shall"; changed internal references; and made minor changes in outline form, style, and grammar. Amendment effective March 20, 1989.

1985 Amendment — Effective Date: In (3) increased design capacity of prison from 545 to 744 and reduced inmates in excess of capacity from 215 to 96.

Section 3(2), Ch. 451, L. 1985, provided that sec. 1 (1985 amendment to this section) is effective 30 days after the Governor declares by executive order that the prison housing units funded in HB 833 of the 48th Legislature are occupied.

1983 Amendment: In first paragraph of (1), inserted "or the women's correction center" and substituted "the prisoner" for "himself" near the end; and inserted (3), making convicts eligible for parole 120 days prior to the date in subsection (1) if the institution's inmate numbers exceed design capacity, and (4), providing that subsection (3) does not apply if an inmate is eligible for parole during the first 12 months at the prison, which were scheduled to terminate July 1, 1985, under sec. 2, Ch. 235, L. 1983. Section 2, Ch. 451, L. 1985, effective on passage and approval [approved April 12, 1985], repealed sec. 2, Ch. 235, L. 1983, which would have terminated (3) and (4).

Case Notes

Dangerous Offender Designation as Part of Life Sentence Without Parole — No Error: Gratzer was sentenced to life without parole and contended that the sentencing court erred by also designating him a dangerous offender for all purposes. Gratzer argued that the designation cannot be applied to a life sentence because the only purpose for a dangerous offender designation is to affect a prisoner's parole eligibility. The Supreme Court held that the designation in this case had no effect on the time that Gratzer had to serve before becoming parole eligible because Gratzer's life sentence and ineligibility for parole precluded Gratzer from ever becoming eligible for parole, so no rights were violated by designating Gratzer as a dangerous offender for all purposes. Gratzer v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Life Sentence Without Parole Not Violative of Constitutional Rights: Gratzer asserted that the sentencing court exceeded its authority and violated the constitutional right to habeas corpus when the court sentenced Gratzer to life without the possibility of parole. Gratzer's argument was that use of the word "term" implied that there was a distinction between sentences imposed for a specific time and indeterminate life sentences and that the statutory sentencing scheme does not authorize a court to remove a prisoner's eligibility for parole if the prisoner is serving a life sentence. The Supreme Court declined to recognize the distinction. "Term" is used throughout the criminal code to refer to the duration of a sentence without any indication that it is meant to refer exclusively to determinate time sentences, and the language in 46-18-202 that allows a court to impose the parole eligibility exception applies equally to time sentences and life sentences. A sentence of imprisonment in the state prison for a term exceeding 1 year refers to all felonies, including those punishable by a life sentence, rather than a cryptic means of limiting a sentencing court's ability to restrict the parole eligibility of prisoners serving life sentences. The District Court did not violate Gratzer's rights, and the sentence of life without parole was affirmed. Gratzer v. Mahoney, 2006 MT 282, 334 M 297, 150 P3d 343 (2006).

Repeal of Dangerous Offender Statute Retroactively Applied: In 1995, the Legislature repealed 46-18-404, which required sentencing judges to determine whether an offender was dangerous or nondangerous for parole eligibility purposes. Parker was designated a dangerous offender for parole eligibility when initially sentenced in 1986, and when the District Court resentenced Parker in 1999 after his suspended sentence was revoked, he was again designated a dangerous offender, even though 46-18-404 had been repealed. The state conceded that the District Court had no authority to impose a dangerous offender designation in 1999 when the designation was repealed in 1995, but contended that the error was harmless because the District Court had the authority to provide the same result by restricting parole eligibility pursuant to 46-18-202. The Supreme Court disagreed. The proper remedy was to strike the portion of the sentence that was illegal and amend the judgment to that limited extent. Thus, the portion of the sentence designating Parker as a dangerous offender was vacated. St. v. Parker, 2002 MT 162, 310 M 418, 51 P3d 484 (2002).

Requirement That Parole Board Member With Knowledge of Native American Affairs Participate in Proceedings Regarding Native Americans: George, a Native American, contended that he was entitled to have the member of the Board of Pardons and Parole with knowledge in Native American affairs participate in his parole review. The state contended otherwise, pursuant to a plain reading of 2-15-2302, and asserted that had the Legislature intended to require participation by the particular Board member with knowledge in Native American affairs, it could have stated so directly or at least have required that the member with that knowledge be appointed as a regular Board member. The Supreme Court agreed with George. Cognizant of the role of the judge to examine the substance of statutes without inserting what has been omitted or omitting what has been inserted, the court agreed with the state that at least at first blush, 2-15-2302 does not appear to require that the member of the Board of Pardons and Parole with knowledge in Native American affairs participate in parole applications by Native Americans. However, the court could think of no other plausible reason for requiring such a member on the Board, so the court ruled that the parole Board member with knowledge in Native American affairs is required to participate in parole applications by Native Americans and remanded George's case for de novo review with the full participation by that Board member. George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001).

No Liberty Interest in Good Time Credits for Probationers — Credit for Time Served on Probation Properly Denied: McDermott pleaded guilty in early 1995 to issuing a bad check, felony common scheme, and received a 6-year deferred sentence and was placed on probation. After nearly 4 years on probation, McDermott had failed to comply with the conditions of probation, so the District Court revoked the deferred sentence and sentenced McDermott to 5 years at the state prison, specifying that no credit was allowed for time served while on probation or for good time. McDermott contended that he was improperly denied good time credit while on probation and that 53-30-105 (repealed 1995) violated equal protection guarantees because it granted good time credit for parolees but not probationers. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although it was held in Orozco v. Day, 281 M 341, 934 P2d 1009 (1997), that 53-30-105 created a liberty interest in good time credit for inmates, the court concluded that a similar liberty interest is not created for probationers. Because probationers are not statutorily entitled to good time credits and because the terms of probation are part of the sentence, the state's decision not to award good time credits during probation did not create an atypical and significant hardship or inevitably affect the duration of McDermott's sentence. McDermott had no protected liberty interest and was denied no process to which he was constitutionally entitled. Further, McDermott's argument that 53-30-105 violated equal protection by treating probationers differently than parolees also failed. Applying the rational basis test, the court concluded that the state has a legitimate interest in the disparate treatment of parolees and probationers regarding eligibility for sentence-reducing credits, including jurisdictional differences as well as penological interests. McDermott was properly credited with good time for the time that he was incarcerated and was properly denied credit for time spent on probation against his subsequent sentence. Thus, McDermott showed no constitutional basis for the claim that he was being illegally restrained, so his petitions for writs of habeas corpus and mandate were denied. McDermott v. Dept. of Corrections, 2001 MT 134, 305 M 462, 29 P3d 992 (2001), followed in George v. Bd. of Pardons, 2001 MT 163, 306 M 115, 30 P3d 1065 (2001). See also St. v. Bruns, 213 M 372, 691 P2d 817 (1984), and St. v. Nelson, 275 M 86, 910 P2d 247 (1996).

Authority to Condition Parole on Participation in Sexual Offender Program — Parole Considered Privilege, Not Right: McDermott pleaded guilty to four counts of assault and one count of bail-jumping in exchange for dismissal of four counts of incest and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. Because of the violent nature of the assaults and the fact that they were committed against young victims, the sentencing court found that McDermott was a substantial danger to society and designated him a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. When he began serving his sentence, an initial needs assessment concluded that he suffered from severe sexual problems and recommended participation in the prison sexual offender program (SOP). McDermott chose not to participate in the SOP, and the Board of Pardons and Parole later considered that fact during evaluations for placement in a prerelease center and for purposes of parole and inmate classification. The Board recommended that McDermott participate in the SOP to enhance success on parole. McDermott again declined to participate and, as a result, four points were added to his classification status for noncompliance with the Board's recommendation. McDermott then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus ordering his immediate release and rescinding the four points. McDermott argued that the Board did not have the authority to consider his lack of participation in the SOP as a basis for denying his early release on parole, citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished both Ommundson and Field, noting that under Montana and federal precedents, parole is a privilege, not a right. Because parole is granted as a matter of grace rather than right, the state may offer that grace under and subject to conditions that are considered most conducive to accomplish the desired purpose. Rather than restricting the Board's authority to set conditions precedent to parole, this section obligates the Board to ensure that no prisoner is released on parole who cannot meet the statutory criteria, and the Board may also consider factors that may not be considered by the District Court at trial and sentencing and evidence of offenses that were charged in dismissed counts. Even though McDermott was not a convicted sex offender, he did have four counts of incest dismissed and was identified as having severe sexual problems. Thus, his completion or lack of completion of the SOP was pertinent to his ability to be released without detriment to the community and to fulfill the obligations of a law-abiding citizen. The Board was well within its authority to consider McDermott's failure to enroll in the SOP when his petition for early release was denied. McDermott's petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001). See also Christopher v. U.S. Bd. of Pardons, 589 F2d 924 (7th Cir. 1978), and Robinson v. Hadden, 723 F2d 59 (10th Cir. 1983).

Due Process Standard Applicable to Parole Release Determination: Having determined that McDermott had a protected liberty interest in parole, the Supreme Court set out to determine whether McDermott's due process rights were protected when his application for parole was denied. There is no absolute standard for what constitutes due process. The requirements are flexible so that they may be adapted to meet the procedural protections demanded by a particular situation. The process due in any given case varies according to the factual circumstances, the nature of the interests at stake, and the risk of making an erroneous decision. A parole release determination is not subject to all the due process protections required to convict or confine, nor must a parole release determination provide the same protections that are required in a parole revocation hearing, which presents a much greater risk of error than a parole release determination because incarceration, whether as a result of conviction or parole revocation, involves a loss of liberty. On the other hand, denial of parole involves the loss of the mere anticipation of freedom to which a lawfully convicted inmate is not otherwise entitled. Thus, in the case of a prisoner seeking parole, due process is satisfied when the prisoner is, at a minimum, provided with an opportunity to be heard and a written statement explaining why parole was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001), following Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebr. Penal & Correction Complex, 442 US 1 (1979), and Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996).

Liberty Interest in Parole by Inmates Who Committed Offenses Prior to 1989 — Due Process Consideration: As a general rule, inmates have no liberty interest in parole. However, prior to amendment in 1989, this section required the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) to release on parole any prison inmate when the Board determined that there was a reasonable probability that the prisoner could be released without detriment to the prisoner or the community. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently held in Bd. of Pardons v. Allen, 482 US 369 (1987), that this mandatory statutory language created a liberty interest in parole that was protected by the federal constitutional due process clause. Although the mandatory language was removed in 1989, the Montana Supreme Court later held in Worden v. Bd. of Pardons & Parole, 1998 MT 168, 289 M 459, 962 P2d 1157 (1998), that inmates who committed offenses prior to 1989 continue to enjoy a federally protected liberty interest in parole. In the present case, McDermott committed his offenses in 1985 and 1986, so pursuant to Allen and Worden, his liberty interest in parole could not be denied without due process. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001).

Due Process Rights of Inmate Regarding Preparole Interview — Presence of Sufficient Number of Board of Pardons and Parole Members Required: Under 46-23-107 (now repealed), decisions regarding an inmate's parole are to be made by a majority vote of the members of the Board of Pardons and Parole. As stated in Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996), to deny an inmate the opportunity to appear before those who will personally decide the merits of the parole application implicates the inmate's due process rights. In this case, only one member of the Board was present at West's parole hearing. West contended that he had a right to appear before the full Board and that a hearing before only one member violated his due process rights. The state argued that pursuant to the unpublished opinion of Radford v. Mahoney, No. 98-150 (July 1998) (unpublished), not all Board members are required to be present for the personal interview and that 46-23-104 allows the Board to delegate the responsibility for parole eligibility interviews to one of its members. The state contended that having only one Board member present was permissible because the full Board ultimately participated in the decision to deny West' parole. The Supreme Court was unpersuaded by the state's argument, noting that the copy of the case disposition attached to West's habeas corpus petition was signed by only one Board member. The court found its order in Radford inconsistent with the Sage decision, and therefore unpersuasive. West's due process rights were no less implicated because West had the right to appear before one Board member when a majority vote of the Board was required for a decision. The court remanded to the Board with instructions to provide West with an opportunity to appear before a sufficient number of Board members so that those who decide his case will have done so based on a personal interview. West v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 82, 305 M 117, 22 P3d 201 (2001).

One-Quarter Time Provision Subject to Seventeen and One-Half-Year Provision: Under the 1978 version of this section, which provided that a nondangerous offender was eligible for parole after serving either one-quarter of the full term less good time or after serving 17 ½ years of the offender's full term, the Supreme Court held that the two conflicting conditions in the section must be read as establishing a general one-quarter less good time rule that is subject to the 17 ½-year outer limit on parole eligibility. Under that interpretation, an offender, who had already served over 20 years, became eligible for parole after serving 17 ½ years of his sentence. Case v. Mahoney, 2000 MT 324, 303 M 8, 15 P3d 884, 57 St. Rep. 1367 (2000).

Personal Appearance Before Parole Board — Subject Matter Jurisdiction to Determine Due Process Violation: Sage maintained that he had a right to due process, based on a liberty interest in parole pursuant to this section, that was violated by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) when it did not allow him to personally appear before the Board at a parole hearing. Further, Sage maintained that the District Court had subject matter jurisdiction to decide by writ of habeas corpus whether his due process rights had been violated. The Board asserted that Sage's alleged due process violations fell outside the parameters of habeas corpus relief and that the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to consider the issue. The Supreme Court held that the alleged deprivation of Sage's right to due process was directly related to whether the cause of his continued incarceration was legal, thus falling within the parameters of 46-22-101, and that the District Court therefore did have subject matter jurisdiction to determine whether the right to due process was violated. Pursuant to Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebr. Penal & Correctional Complex, 442 US 1 (1979), the opportunity of a parole applicant to appear before those entrusted with the subjective responsibility of passing judgment on the application is an important element of the due process to which the applicant is entitled. Based on the plain language of 46-23-202 and ARM 20.25.401, an inmate who is eligible for parole is clearly provided the right to personally appear at an interview "before the parole board" prior to the Board's decision to grant or deny the application for parole. Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822, 53 St. Rep. 1234 (1996).

Serving of One-Half Sentence Required Under 1978 Conviction: Burglary defendant argued that the District Court erred in 1978 when it failed to designate him as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) for parole purposes, requiring him to serve one-half of his sentence, because he was never charged or sentenced as a dangerous offender. However, section 95-2206.16, R.C.M. 1947, the statute in effect at the time of sentencing, when read together with 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979), an Attorney General opinion interpreting that section, clearly requires defendant to serve one-half of his sentence before he is eligible for parole because he was not expressly designated a nondangerous offender, subsequent recodification and amendment of the section notwithstanding. Rose v. McCormick, 253 M 347, 834 P2d 1377, 49 St. Rep. 427 (1992).

Standing to Challenge Constitutionality of Weapon Enhancement and Dangerous Offender Statutes: To challenge the constitutionality of a criminal statute or procedure, the defendant must show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the law in question. The Supreme Court held that a defendant had standing to challenge both Montana's weapon enhancement statute and dangerous offender statute (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) because he faced direct injury to his liberty interests through application of those laws. St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990), followed, with regard to standing to challenge criminal restitution statutes, in St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004).

Right of One Serving Consecutive Sentences to Annual Parole Review: This section clearly indicates that a person serving consecutive or concurrent multiple sentences is still eligible for parole and that if a second offense is committed while he is incarcerated, he is, under administrative rule, still entitled to annual review of eligibility for parole. Kelly v. Risley, 865 F2d 201 (9th Cir. 1989).

Liberty Interest in Parole: This section creates a protected liberty interest in parole because it uses the mandatory language that the Board "shall" parole a person under certain circumstances. Kelly v. Risley, 865 F2d 201 (9th Cir. 1989); Bd. of Pardons v. Allen, 107 S Ct 2415 (1987), affirming Allen v. Bd. of Pardons, 792 F2d 1404 (9th Cir. 1986).

Discretion to Grant Parole — Due Process: In Greenholtz v. Inmates of the Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex, 47 U.S.L.W. 4581 (U.S. May 29, 1979) (No. 78-201), the U.S. Supreme Court held that unless a parole statute creates a legitimate entitlement to parole there is no requirement of due process protection. A mere hope is insufficient. In Montana, under 46-23-201, whether or not parole is granted is dependent entirely on the discretion of the parole board (now Board of Pardons and Parole). Campbell v. Bd. of Pardons, 470 F. Supp. 1301 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

Erroneous Parole Revocation: Given the issue of whether a parolee who, after a full revocation hearing, had been found by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) not to have violated his parole could nevertheless be confined pending submission of an acceptable new parole plan, the Supreme Court held that the parolee must be released within 30 days from the decision and that the board was under a duty to develop and approve a parole plan within that period. Lopez v. Crist, 176 M 352, 578 P2d 312 (1978).

Credit for Time Served: Section 46-18-402 allows the sentencing authority to deny credit for good time earned while serving a prior modified or invalid sentence but does not authorize the sentencing authority to provide that credit for time previously served should not be considered in determining eligibility for parole. St. v. Zachmeier, 153 M 64, 453 P2d 783 (1969).

Attorney General's Opinions

Eligibility for Accelerated Parole-Release — Institutional Residence During Certification Required: A convict is entitled to accelerated parole-release eligibility under subsection (3) of this section only if he or she is actually residing within the Montana State Prison or the Women's Correction Center (now women's prison) during the effective period of certification. 42 A.G. Op. 72 (1988).

Prisoner Receives New Sentence: If a prisoner who has received a new consecutive sentence under 46-18-401(5) is paroled, the remaining time of his new and original sentences thereafter run concurrently. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Section 46-23-217 Impliedly Repealed: Section 46-23-217 was impliedly repealed by the enactment of 46-18-401(5). A sentence imposed regarding a crime committed after July 1, 1977, by a prisoner at the state prison or on parole or furlough runs consecutively with the remainder of the prisoner's original sentence. Any crime committed on or before July 1, 1977, by a prisoner while on parole or conditional release runs concurrently with the prisoner's original sentence unless otherwise specified by the sentencing court. 38 A.G. Op. 13 (1979).

Persistent Felony Offenders: Designation of a prisoner as a "persistent felony offender" has no significance for parole eligibility with respect to sentences imposed for crimes occurring on or after July 1, 1977. However, for crimes committed between July 1, 1975, and June 30, 1977, inclusive, designated persistent felony offenders must serve one-third of their sentences before they are eligible for parole. 38 A.G. Op. 10 (1979).

Parole Eligibility: Subject to the exceptions set forth in 46-23-201, a prisoner who is sentenced to a time sentence for a crime committed on or after July 1, 1977, is ineligible for parole until he has served one-half of his full sentence, less good time, unless he has been expressly designated as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) by the sentencing court. 38 A.G. Op. 10 (1979).

Nondangerous Offender: A prisoner who has been expressly designated as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) is ineligible for parole until he has served one-quarter of his full sentence, less good time. 38 A.G. Op. 10 (1979).

Elimination or Delay of Parole Eligibility: A law that eliminates or delays a defendant's parole eligibility after the criminal offense has been committed is ex post facto as applied to that defendant. 38 A.G. Op. 10 (1979).

46-23-202. Initial parole hearing — conduct of hearing.

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 559 in first sentence after "possible" substituted "the department shall make the prisoner available for a hearing before a hearing panel" for "the prisoner shall make an initial appearance before the board or the board's designee as provided for in 46-23-104(4), except that if the offense was committed prior to March 20, 1989, the initial appearance must be before at least one member of the board"; in second sentence at beginning substituted "The hearing panel" for "The board" and after "all" inserted "available and"; inserted

(5) requiring hearing panel to consider written and oral statements from interested person or interested person's legal representative, allowing statement to include circumstances surrounding crime, manner of crime, and victim's opinion on parole, and allowing victim's statement to be confidential; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) Before a prisoner may be paroled, the board or its designee shall:

(a) conduct a hearing and interview the prisoner, except that if the offense was committed prior to March 20, 1989, the hearing must be before at least one member of the board. At the time of the hearing, the board or its designee must receive relevant statements from interested persons and any person may be represented by counsel. The board has the power to regulate procedures at all hearings.

(b) permit a victim to present a statement concerning the effects of the crime on the victim, the circumstances surrounding the crime, the manner in which the crime was perpetrated, and the victim's opinion regarding whether the prisoner should be paroled. In the board's discretion, the victim's statement may be kept confidential. The board shall consider the victim's statement, along with the information provided under subsection (1), in determining whether to grant parole"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 13, Ch. 559, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 14, Ch. 559, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 425 in (1) at end of first sentence inserted reference to board's designee and exception clause; in (2) inserted reference to board's designee; in (2)(a) at end of first sentence inserted exception clause and near middle of second sentence inserted reference to board's designee; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 30, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 450 in (1) at end of first sentence inserted "or as soon thereafter as possible, the prisoner shall make an initial appearance before the board"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 22, 1999.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 125 in (2) substituted current (2)(a) requiring Board to conduct hearing and receive relevant statements from interested persons for "interview the prisoner"; inserted (2)(b) requiring Board to receive and consider victim's statement; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 372 in (1), near beginning after "date", deleted "or within 2 months following the date a prisoner becomes eligible pursuant to 53-30-105(5)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 125, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 579 in (1), new beginning, inserted "or within the 2 months following the date a prisoner becomes eligible pursuant to 53-30-105(5)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1993.

1983 Amendment: In (1), changed Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) consideration from 2 months after admission and at such intervals thereafter as the board determined to 2 months prior to official parole eligibility date.

Case Notes

Right to Counsel at Parole Hearing — Writ of Habeas Corpus Proper Vehicle for Review of Parole Board's Denial of Legal Representation: By writ of habeas corpus, Carson contended that the Department of Corrections unconstitutionally denied him the right to legal representation at a hearing before the Board of Pardons and Parole. The state maintained that Carson was required to exhaust administrative appeals before the District Court could review the Board's denial of Carson's request for representation. The District Court concurred and denied the petition, but on appeal the Supreme Court disagreed. To require exhaustion of administrative appeals with regard to the right of representation at parole hearings would defeat the purpose for which habeas corpus exists by requiring an unlawfully held inmate to first seek relief from the very institution by which he alleges that he is being unlawfully held—a course of action not contemplated by constitutional or statutory law. Therefore, a writ of habeas corpus was the appropriate vehicle for Carson to seek review. Under this section, a person appearing before the Board has a right to counsel, and the state was unable to cite any qualifying regulation to the contrary. Thus, the Supreme Court granted Carson's petition for a writ of habeas corpus and remanded to the Department of Corrections for a new parole hearing, expeditiously scheduled, with Carson's attorney in attendance. St. v. Carson, 2002 MT 234, 311 M 485, 56 P3d 844 (2002).

Improper Delegation of Hearing Responsibility to Parole Board Member — Right to Hearing Denied Absent Opportunity to Appear in Person Before Board: Haney sought immediate parole and release from the state prison on grounds that he was improperly denied parole after being allowed only a brief appearance before a hearings officer rather than the full Board of Pardons and Parole. The state contended that there is no statutory requirement that Haney be allowed a personal appearance before a majority of the Board and that Haney's procedural rights were satisfied by the interview conducted by the hearings officer. The Supreme Court disagreed with the state's position. The language of this section clearly requires that before consideration of a prisoner's application for parole, the Board must conduct a hearing at which statements from interested persons can be considered, and this section clearly requires both a hearing and an interview of the prisoner. Section 46-23-104 authorizes only delegation of the interview to a hearings officer, but the fact that the interviews may relate to parole eligibility does not eliminate the separate requirement in this section for a hearing conducted by the Board. Thus, Haney was denied his statutory right to a hearing before the Board when the Board denied his parole without an opportunity to personally appear before the Board and when the hearing responsibility was delegated to the hearings officer. Although the Supreme Court declined to grant Haney his immediate freedom, the case was remanded to the Board for reconsideration of Haney's parole application after providing him with an opportunity to appear in person and present witnesses on his behalf. (See 2001 amendments requiring an initial appearance and hearing before at least one member of the Board if the offense was committed prior to March 20, 1989, and 2003 amendment.) Haney v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 201, 306 M 288, 32 P3d 1254 (2001).

Authority to Condition Parole on Participation in Sexual Offender Program — Parole Considered Privilege, Not Right: McDermott pleaded guilty to four counts of assault and one count of bail-jumping in exchange for dismissal of four counts of incest and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. Because of the violent nature of the assaults and the fact that they were committed against young victims, the sentencing court found that McDermott was a substantial danger to society and designated him a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. When he began serving his sentence, an initial needs assessment concluded that he suffered from severe sexual problems and recommended participation in the prison sexual offender program (SOP). McDermott chose not to participate in the SOP, and the Board of Pardons and Parole later considered that fact during evaluations for placement in a prerelease center and for purposes of parole and inmate classification. The Board recommended that McDermott participate in the SOP to enhance success on parole. McDermott again declined to participate and, as a result, four points were added to his classification status for noncompliance with the Board's recommendation. McDermott then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus ordering his immediate release and rescinding the four points. McDermott argued that the Board did not have the authority to consider his lack of participation in the SOP as a basis for denying his early release on parole, citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished both Ommundson and Field, noting that under Montana and federal precedents, parole is a privilege, not a right. Because parole is granted as a matter of grace rather than right, the state may offer that grace under and subject to conditions that are considered most conducive to accomplish the desired purpose. Rather than restricting the Board's authority to set conditions precedent to parole, 46-23-201 obligates the Board to ensure that no prisoner is released on parole who cannot meet the statutory criteria, and the Board may also consider factors that may not be considered by the District Court at trial and sentencing and evidence of offenses that were charged in dismissed counts. Even though McDermott was not a convicted sex offender, he did have four counts of incest dismissed and was identified as having severe sexual problems. Thus, his completion or lack of completion of the SOP was pertinent to his ability to be released without detriment to the community and to fulfill the obligations of a law-abiding citizen. The Board was well within its authority to consider McDermott's failure to enroll in the SOP when his petition for early release was denied. McDermott's petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001). See also Christopher v. U.S. Bd. of Pardons, 589 F2d 924 (7th Cir. 1978), and Robinson v. Hadden, 723 F2d 59 (10th Cir. 1983).

Due Process Rights of Inmate Regarding Preparole Interview — Presence of Sufficient Number of Board of Pardons and Parole Members Required: Under 46-23-107 (now repealed), decisions regarding an inmate's parole are to be made by a majority vote of the members of the Board of Pardons and Parole. As stated in Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996), to deny an inmate the opportunity to appear before those who will personally decide the merits of the parole application implicates the inmate's due process rights. In this case, only one member of the Board was present at West's parole hearing. West contended that he had a right to appear before the full Board and that a hearing before only one member violated his due process rights. The state argued that pursuant to the unpublished opinion of Radford v. Mahoney, No. 98-150 (July 1998) (unpublished), not all Board members are required to be present for the personal interview and that 46-23-104 allows the Board to delegate the responsibility for parole eligibility interviews to one of its members. The state contended that having only one Board member present was permissible because the full Board ultimately participated in the decision to deny West' parole. The Supreme Court was unpersuaded by the state's argument, noting that the copy of the case disposition attached to West's habeas corpus petition was signed by only one Board member. The court found its order in Radford inconsistent with the Sage decision, and therefore unpersuasive. West's due process rights were no less implicated because West had the right to appear before one Board member when a majority vote of the Board was required for a decision. The court remanded to the Board with instructions to provide West with an opportunity to appear before a sufficient number of Board members so that those who decide his case will have done so based on a personal interview. West v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 82, 305 M 117, 22 P3d 201 (2001).

Prehearing Interview Not Substitute for Constitutional Right to Personal Appearance Before Parole Board: The Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) contended that under 46-23-104, its personal interview responsibility could be delegated to an appointed hearings officer, precluding the need for a parole applicant to appear personally before the Board. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting a parole applicant's due process right to appear before those entrusted with the subjective responsibility of passing judgment on the application. Therefore, under 46-23-104, the Board may designate one of its members, one of its staff members, or any other adult correctional releasing authority to conduct a prehearing interview with an inmate relative to parole eligibility to assist the Board and expedite the hearing process. However, the prehearing interview is not a substitute for the applicant's constitutional right to personally appear before the Board. (See 2001 and 2003 amendments.) Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822, 53 St. Rep. 1234 (1996).

No Duty of Department to Inform Board of Prisoner's Marijuana Violation: The Parole Board (now Board of Pardons and Parole) released a prisoner who subsequently shot the plaintiff. The plaintiff argued that the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) should have informed the Board of the prisoner's use of marijuana because then the Board would not have paroled him at that time and the shooting would never have occurred. The Supreme Court held that the Department had no statutory duty to inform the Board of the marijuana infraction. Kiger v. St., 245 M 457, 802 P2d 1248, 47 St. Rep. 2206 (1990).

Failure to Complete Prison Sex Offender Program Not Because of Defendant's Willful Conduct — Consideration of Incarceration Alternatives Constitutionally Required: Lee was sentenced to two concurrent 40-year terms in prison for sexual intercourse without consent and attempted sexual intercourse without consent and was ineligible for parole during the first 10 years of the sentence unless a sex offender treatment plan was successfully completed. Lee entered prison in 1995 and immediately requested enrollment in Phase I of the two-phase program. Lee was finally enrolled in Phase I after a 3-year wait, successfully completed that phase, and was placed on a waiting list for enrollment in Phase II. Because of a sitdown strike, Lee was unable to complete Phase II by his scheduled release date. The state petitioned to revoke Lee's suspended sentence because the program was not completed, and Lee moved to dismiss on grounds that the failure to complete treatment was not his fault. The District Court found that Lee's failure to complete the program was not due to any volitional conduct on Lee's part, but the court nevertheless determined that the failure constituted a violation of the terms of the suspended sentence and ordered Lee to serve the remaining 30 years on each count, declaring Lee ineligible for parole until both phases of treatment were completed. Lee appealed on grounds that the court violated his right to due process because it was impossible to complete the program during incarceration because of prison waiting periods and the length of the program. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Williams, 1999 MT 240, 296 M 258, 993 P2d 1 (1999), it was held that a court could revoke a suspended sentence even though a probationer's failure to comply with the terms of the sentence was not willful, and the court in this case affirmed Williams to the extent that violations of nonfinancial probationary conditions need not necessarily be willful in order to justify revocation. However, the probationer in Williams was unable to gain acceptance into sex offender programs because of a lack of social skills, immaturity, and "acting out" behavior, whereas Lee was unable to access the programs because of actions of the state. Due process required the trial court to consider whether there were alternatives to incarceration that would further the purpose of Lee's suspended sentence. The Supreme Court remanded for a determination of whether there were any reasonable alternative measures other than continued incarceration because to do otherwise would deprive Lee of his conditional freedom simply because the state prevented him from completing the sex offender program while imprisoned. St. v. Lee, 2001 MT 176, 306 M 173, 31 P3d 998 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Authority to Condition Parole on Participation in Sexual Offender Program — Parole Considered Privilege, Not Right: McDermott pleaded guilty to four counts of assault and one count of bail-jumping in exchange for dismissal of four counts of incest and was sentenced to 30 years in prison. Because of the violent nature of the assaults and the fact that they were committed against young victims, the sentencing court found that McDermott was a substantial danger to society and designated him a dangerous offender for purposes of parole. When he began serving his sentence, an initial needs assessment concluded that he suffered from severe sexual problems and recommended participation in the prison sexual offender program (SOP). McDermott chose not to participate in the SOP, and the Board of Pardons and Parole later considered that fact during evaluations for placement in a prerelease center and for purposes of parole and inmate classification. The Board recommended that McDermott participate in the SOP to enhance success on parole. McDermott again declined to participate and, as a result, four points were added to his classification status for noncompliance with the Board's recommendation. McDermott then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus ordering his immediate release and rescinding the four points. McDermott argued that the Board did not have the authority to consider his lack of participation in the SOP as a basis for denying his early release on parole, citing St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), and St. v. Field, 2000 MT 268, 302 M 62, 11 P3d 1203 (2000). The Supreme Court distinguished both Ommundson and Field, noting that under Montana and federal precedents, parole is a privilege, not a right. Because parole is granted as a matter of grace rather than right, the state may offer that grace under and subject to conditions that are considered most conducive to accomplish the desired purpose. Rather than restricting the Board's authority to set conditions precedent to parole, 46-23-201 obligates the Board to ensure that no prisoner is released on parole who cannot meet the statutory criteria, and the Board may also consider factors that may not be considered by the District Court at trial and sentencing and evidence of offenses that were charged in dismissed counts. Even though McDermott was not a convicted sex offender, he did have four counts of incest dismissed and was identified as having severe sexual problems. Thus, his completion or lack of completion of the SOP was pertinent to his ability to be released without detriment to the community and to fulfill the obligations of a law-abiding citizen. The Board was well within its authority to consider McDermott's failure to enroll in the SOP when his petition for early release was denied. McDermott's petition for a writ of habeas corpus was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001). See also Christopher v. U.S. Bd. of Pardons, 589 F2d 924 (7th Cir. 1978), and Robinson v. Hadden, 723 F2d 59 (10th Cir. 1983).

Due Process Standard Applicable to Parole Release Determination: Having determined that McDermott had a protected liberty interest in parole, the Supreme Court set out to determine whether McDermott's due process rights were protected when his application for parole was denied. There is no absolute standard for what constitutes due process. The requirements are flexible so that they may be adapted to meet the procedural protections demanded by a particular situation. The process due in any given case varies according to the factual circumstances, the nature of the interests at stake, and the risk of making an erroneous decision. A parole release determination is not subject to all the due process protections required to convict or confine, nor must a parole release determination provide the same protections that are required in a parole revocation hearing, which presents a much greater risk of error than a parole release determination because incarceration, whether as a result of conviction or parole revocation, involves a loss of liberty. On the other hand, denial of parole involves the loss of the mere anticipation of freedom to which a lawfully convicted inmate is not otherwise entitled. Thus, in the case of a prisoner seeking parole, due process is satisfied when the prisoner is, at a minimum, provided with an opportunity to be heard and a written statement explaining why parole was denied. McDermott v. McDonald, 2001 MT 89, 305 M 166, 24 P3d 200 (2001), following Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebr. Penal & Correction Complex, 442 US 1 (1979), and Sage v. Gamble, 279 M 459, 929 P2d 822 (1996).

Parole Officer Duty of Care to Supervise Parolees — Jury Instruction Properly Given: Corliss was paroled, after serving time for an execution-style slaying with a handgun, under the condition that he not possess a firearm. While on a visit, with the approval of his parole officer, to Washington state to look for work, Corliss failed to return to Montana within the established time, failed to see a parole officer in Washington, had a temporary restraining order obtained against him by a girlfriend because of threats made to her and her family, and had an altercation with his wife involving a handgun. In neither instance of violence did Corliss's parole officer investigate the circumstances of the violence. Later, Corliss shot and killed one friend of his girlfriend and injured another. Both the estates of the deceased woman and the wounded woman brought actions against the state for negligent supervision of Corliss's parole. The state objected to an instruction given by the District Court concerning a parole officer's duty of care, claiming that there must be some special relationship between the parole officer and the person injured by a parolee in order for a duty of care to arise. The Supreme Court reviewed statutes defining negligence, statutes describing the general duty of one individual toward another, and statutes concerning parole and concluded that Robbins had a general duty to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of Corliss and had a duty to the killed and injured women in particular. Starkenburg v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Racial Bias of Judge Who Illegally Made Deportation Condition of Parole Not Shown by Mere Unsupported Speculation: Upon an aggravated kidnapping and assault conviction of a native of Bangladesh, the court ordered deportation as a condition of parole. This was an illegal condition but did not alone show the judge was racially biased against defendant. A claim of bias was not upheld when it was supported by mere speculation or conjecture by defendant. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Supervised Release Program Not Inclusive of Furloughs — Escape Not Chargeable to Furloughed Convict: Roberts was released from the state prison into the parole-related furlough program rather than the supervised release program and did not meet the requirements of the administrative rules governing the supervised release program. A part of Roberts' parole included a 10-day furlough to allow him to find housing and employment. When he failed to meet his parole officer on a specified date, he was charged with felony escape. Roberts moved to dismiss the charge. An escape charge can be maintained only against a person subject to official detention, which is defined in part as supervision under a supervised release program. The term "supervised release program" clearly and unambiguously refers to the program codified in Title 46, ch. 23, part 4 (now repealed), and not to the furlough associated with parole proceedings under this section. Because Roberts was not being supervised under a supervised release program, the District Court erred in concluding that Roberts could be prosecuted for escape and in denying his motion to dismiss the escape charge. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded with instructions to enter an order of dismissal. St. v. Roberts, 275 M 365, 912 P2d 812, 53 St. Rep. 181 (1996).

Alcoholics — Refraining as Valid Condition of Parole: One who, because of addiction or character disorder, is unable to control his excessive drinking of alcoholic beverages has no constitutional or statutory right to release free from limitations on his use of alcohol, either on parole or pursuant to a suspended sentence. There was no merit to appellant's contention that it was vindictive and unreasonable or illegal to require him, an acknowledged alcoholic, to refrain from drinking as a condition of his probation or parole. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982), followed, with regard to the requirement for nexus between the sentencing limitation or condition and the underlying offense, in St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620, 56 St. Rep. 70 (1999).

Parole Conditions — Application to Suspended Portion of Sentence: Parole conditions set by Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) also applied to period of suspended sentence where court passing sentence did not set conditions upon suspended portion of sentence, particularly where that court expressly directed that when defendant was not in prison he was to be under the supervision of the Board and court could revoke the suspended sentence for violation of those conditions. St. v. Sullivan, 197 M 395, 642 P2d 1008, 39 St. Rep. 412 (1982).

Erroneous Parole Revocation: Given the issue of whether a parolee who, after a full revocation hearing, had been found by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) not to have violated his parole could nevertheless be confined pending submission of an acceptable new parole plan, the Supreme Court held that the parolee must be released within 30 days from the decision and that the Board was under a duty to develop and approve a parole plan within that period. Lopez v. Crist, 176 M 352, 578 P2d 312 (1978).

Parole to Out-of-State Prison: Prisoner who had been sentenced concurrently in Wyoming and in Montana could not be released on parole from the Montana prison since the Wyoming sentence provided that if the duration of the Wyoming sentence had not expired at the time of defendant's release from the Montana prison then the prisoner should be returned to Wyoming. Petition of Glover, 166 M 546, 539 P2d 721 (1975).

Good Time Held Applicable to Parolees: Where the petitioners sought Writs of Habeas Corpus to release them from prison on the basis of good time earned while on parole, the trial court correctly held that parolees could be credited with good time under 53-30-105 (now repealed) while on parole. Following rules of statutory construction, the court concluded that it was the intention of the Legislature to grant parolees good time for time served on parole and that the language of 53-30-105 (now repealed) did not act as a saving clause to apply that section only to inmates convicted prior to April 1, 1955. Good Time Earned While Serving One Sentence Not Applicable to Later Sentence: In 1970, petitioner was convicted of burglary and sentenced to 10 years in the Montana State Prison. He was released on parole in 1971. In 1976, he was returned to the Montana State Prison after being convicted on another burglary charge. Subsequently his parole was revoked. During the time petitioner was on parole, good time could be earned under 53-30-105 (now repealed) by a parolee. Under a 1981 amendment to that section, this is no longer possible. In 1982, petitioner filed a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, claiming that the good time he earned while on parole should be applied to reduce the discharge date of his second sentence, as the second sentence had been merged (under 46-23-217, prior to amendment) with the first sentence. The Supreme Court ruled that the sentences ran concurrently but were not merged and that therefore any good time petitioner earned while on parole on his first sentence may be applied only to the first sentence. Case Notes

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), and St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), regarding authority of sentencing court.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 92 in (2), in first sentence after "clemency", inserted exception clause prohibiting filing of application for clemency while automatic review proceeding is pending before the Montana Supreme Court and inserted third sentence requiring the filing of an executive clemency application with the Board no later than 10 days after set date of execution; inserted last sentence in (3) prohibiting the appeal of Governor's decision to grant or deny clemency; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 19, 1997.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 92, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-19-103 and 46-23-301] applies to death warrants issued by a court on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 19, 1997.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (1)(a) defining clemency; inserted (1)(b) defining pardon; and substituted (2) and (3) relating to procedure for applying for clemency for former language that read: "The board shall investigate and report to the governor with respect to all cases of executive clemency. A majority of the board shall advise, investigate, and approve each such case before the action of the governor shall be final. All applications for executive clemency shall be made to the board, which shall cause an investigation to be made of all the circumstances surrounding the crime for which the applicant was convicted and as to the individual circumstances relating to social conditions of the applicant. If the board or a majority thereof approves such application for executive clemency, it shall advise the governor and recommend action to be taken." Amendment effective April 15, 1989.

Part 5
Registration of Sexual and Violent Offenders

Part Compiler's Comments
Retroactive Applicability: Section 1, Ch. 152, L. 2001, amended sec. 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, to read: "Section 18. Retroactive applicability. The provisions of Title 46, chapter 23, part 5, and of [this act] relating to registration apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:
(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced by a state or federal court in any state on or after July 1, 1989, or who as a result of a sentence are under the supervision of a county, state, or federal agency in any state on or after July 1, 1989; and
(2) violent offenders who are sentenced by a state or federal court in any state on or after October 1, 1995, or who as a result of a sentence are under the supervision of a county, state, or federal agency in any state on or after October 1, 1995." Amendment effective March 29, 2001.
Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that the danger of recidivism posed by sexual and violent offenders and the protection of the public from these offenders is of paramount concern to government and the people; and
WHEREAS, the Legislature further finds that law enforcement agencies' efforts to protect their communities, conduct investigations, and apprehend sexual and violent offenders is impaired by the lack of information about offenders who live within their jurisdictions; and
WHEREAS, the system of registering sexual and violent offenders provides law enforcement with information critical to preventing victimization and to resolving incidents of sexual or violent offenses promptly, including notification of the public when necessary to the continued protection of the community; and
WHEREAS, persons who have committed a sexual or violent offense have a reduced expectation of privacy because of the public's interest in safety; and
WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that releasing information about sexual or violent offenders to law enforcement agencies and, under certain circumstances, providing access to limited information about certain sexual offenders to the general public will further the primary governmental interest of protecting specific vulnerable groups and the public in general from potential harm.
THEREFORE, it is the policy of the State of Montana to assist local law enforcement agencies' efforts in protecting their communities by requiring that sexual or violent offenders register and to authorize the release of necessary and relevant information about sex offenders to the public."
1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance for rules adopted under [section 12] [46-23-509] concerning the qualifications of sexual offender evaluators and concerning evaluations of sexual offenders. The legislature intends that sexual offender evaluators possess education and experience similar to the education and experience requirements of therapists certified by the Montana sex offender treatment association. The legislature further intends that rules for evaluating the risk of repeat offenses by sexual offenders include the following factors:
(1) whether the sexual offender has a mental abnormality;
(2) whether the sexual offender's conduct is repetitive and compulsive;
(3) whether drugs or alcohol played a part in the offense or offenses;
(4) whether the sexual offender served the maximum term for the offense or offenses;
(5) whether the offense or offenses involved a child;
(6) the age of the sexual offender at the commission of the offense or offenses;

(7) the relationship between the sexual offender and the victim or victims;
(8) whether the offense or offenses involved use of a weapon;
(9) the number, date, and nature of prior offenses;
(10) conditions of release that minimize risk of another offense, including whether the sexual offender is under supervision or receiving counseling and treatment;
(11) physical conditions that minimize the risk of another offense, such as advanced age or debilitating illness of the sexual offender;
(12) whether psychological or psychiatric profiles of the sexual offender indicate a risk of recidivism;
(13) the sexual offender's response to and participation in treatment;
(14) recent behavior of the sexual offender;
(15) recent threats or gestures by the sexual offender against persons; and
(16) a review of any victim impact statements."

Failure of Trial Court to Address Issues Raised in Defendant's Pro Se Petition — Reversible Error: After being charged with failure to register as a sexual offender, Samples was granted the opportunity to file a pretrial pro se petition addressing the ex post facto application of Title 46, ch. 23, part 5, as well as a variety of other constitutional challenges to the sexual offender registration law. The District Court substantively discussed and rejected Samples' ex post facto argument, refused to discuss the other constitutional concerns, and denied the petition. Following denial of the petition, Samples pleaded guilty, but reserved the right to appeal the ruling on the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, even though the District Court could have refused to allow the pro se motion, once the District Court expressly authorized Samples to file a pro se motion challenging the constitutionality of the sexual offender registration law, the court was obligated to address the constitutional issues raised in the petition. Failure of the District Court to consider all of the constitutional issues raised in the petition was reversible error, and the case was remanded for consideration of all issues raised by Samples in the petition. St. v. Samples, 2005 MT 210, 328 M 242, 119 P3d 1191 (2005).

Sexual and Violent Offender Registration Requirements Not Part of Criminal Sentencing — Registration Violation Separate Offense: White Bear was convicted of failing to register as a sexual or violent offender. On appeal, White Bear contended that offender registration violated due process, but the argument was based on an incorrect premise that registration was a condition of sentencing and punishment for the original offense. In fact, the registration requirements are not part of criminal sentencing for a sexual or violent offense, and violation of registration requirements is a separate offense. White Bear's conviction for failing to register as a sexual or violent offender was affirmed. St. v. White Bear, 2005 MT 7, 325 M 337, 106 P3d 516 (2005). See also St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act Nonpunitive — Not Considered Ex Post Facto Legislation: Defendant was convicted of failing to update registration as a violent sexual offender. The District Court found that the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act, Title 46, ch. 23, part 5, was ex post facto because 46-23-504 subjected defendant to enhanced punishment based on a prior conviction. The state appealed. Applying Smith v. Doe, 538 US 84, 123 S Ct 1140 (2003), which dealt with an Alaskan registration act similar to the Montana Act, the Supreme Court noted that if both the declared purpose and the structure of a sexual violent offender registration law are nonpunitive, then the intent is to enact a civil regulatory scheme. The court then conducted an indepth analysis of the intent and effects of Montana's law, finding that the legislative intent was clearly nonpunitive, noting that codification of the law in the Montana code of criminal procedure did not in itself transform the law from a nonpunitive civil regulatory scheme into a criminal one. As to effects, the court applied the factors in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 US 144 (1963), finding the regulatory scheme to be a reasonable effort on the part of the Legislature to tailor what information may and may not be disclosed, and held that the registration requirements were not excessive. As a nonpunitive act designed for public protection, the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act does not violate the ex post facto clauses of the state or federal constitution. The District Court was reversed, and the charges against defendant were reinstated. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in St. v. Murphy, 2003 MT 276, 317 M 500, 78 P3d 843 (2003).

House Bill No. 214 was approved as Ch. 407, L. 1995, on April 13, 1995. Although the amendment to 46-23-502(2)(a) in House Bill No. 214 is void, a similar amendment was made by Ch. 550.

1991 Amendment — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Case Notes

Erroneous Reference to Offense in Charging Document — No Grounds for Reversal Absent Surprise or Prejudice: As a condition of sentencing, Bahr was required to maintain registration as a violent offender. Bahr was subsequently charged with failure to provide notice of a change of address, and the charge was later amended to failing to provide notice of a change of residence. At trial, Bahr asserted that the charge should be dismissed because the initial charging document cited an offense of failure to provide notice of a change of address that was not a crime. The District Court concluded that the charging document properly charged an offense under 46-23-507 and dismissed Bahr's argument. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The original information and the supporting affidavit clearly set out that Bahr was required to register as a violent offender, that the last registration was completed in Glacier County in 2002, and that Bahr had acknowledged the requirement to provide notice of any change but had failed to provide notice after moving from Glacier County and residing in Cascade County for over a month without updating the registration information. This was enough as a matter of law to apprise Bahr of the charges and to prevent any surprise. Even if there were errors in wording in the charging document, there was no ground for reversal unless Bahr demonstrated prejudice. Additionally, amendment of the information from "change of address" to "change of residence" was not substantive. Therefore, absent surprise or prejudice, the District Court properly declined to dismiss the charge. St. v. Bahr, 2009 MT 378, 353 M 294, 224 P3d 610 (2009).

Criminal Endangerment Not Requiring Registration as Violent Offender: Upon conviction for felony criminal endangerment, Perkins was required to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that criminal endangerment is not an offense that requires registration as a violent offender. The court ordered that the registration condition be stricken from Perkins' sentence. St. v. Perkins, 2009 MT 150, 350 M 387, 208 P3d 386 (2009).

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended this section to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Retroactivity of Requirement That Out-of-State Sexual Offenders Convicted in State That Requires Registration Also Register in Montana: The 2005 Legislature amended this section to provide that, as a matter of public safety, a sexual offender convicted in another jurisdiction that requires registration of sexual offenders must register in Montana upon taking up residence in this state, regardless of the specific sexual crime committed in the other state. However, the 2005 amendments were not applied retroactively from their October 1, 2005, effective date. Examining the legislative history, the Supreme Court noted that the amendments were enacted for administrative efficiency rather than as a punitive measure. If the amendments were applied only to offenses committed after the effective date, the result would be administrative chaos rather than efficiency. Therefore, the Legislature intended the 2005 amendments to apply retroactively, and Hamilton, who was convicted of a sexual crime in Washington in 1996 and was required to register there, was also required to register in Montana after moving here in 2000. St. v. Hamilton, 2007 MT 167, 338 M 142, 164 P3d 884 (2007), following St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under this section and because a 1989 Attorney General's opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under 46-23-504. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General's opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Attorney General Opinions

Registration of Out-of-State Sexual and Violent Offenders: A sexual or violent offender who is convicted of a violation of any law of another state or the federal government that is reasonably equivalent to a violation of subsection (6) or (9) of this section and who is sentenced on or after July 1, 1989, must register with the local law enforcement agency within 10 days of entering a Montana county for the purpose of taking up permanent or temporary residence. The registration requirement applies whether or not the state in which the offender was convicted has a registration program. 47 A.G. Op. 15 (1998).

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in (1), after "writing", inserted "not less than 10 days" and after "under" deleted "46-18-254, 46-18-255, and"; in (2), at beginning of introductory clause, inserted "Prior to the offender's release from custody" and after "obtain" substituted "and give to the department of justice and to the sheriff of the county in which the offender intends to reside or, if the offender intends to reside in a municipality, to the chief of police of the municipality" for "the address at which the person expects to reside upon the person's release and report"; in (2)(a), after "address", substituted "at which the offender intends to reside upon release from the department's custody" for "to the department of corrections. The department shall inform the appropriate law enforcement agency having local jurisdiction where the person expects to reside"; inserted (2)(b) regarding the offender's fingerprints and photo; inserted (2)(c) regarding the registration form; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989;and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 407 near beginning, after "sexual", inserted "or violent"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 in first sentence, after "department of corrections", deleted "and human services or the department of family services" and in second sentence substituted "department of corrections" for "department of corrections and human services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Case Notes

Release From Confinement, Not Supervision, Trigger for Registration as Sexual or Violent Offender: Azure asserted that because he was still under direct supervision of the Department of Corrections under the intensive supervision program following his release from prison, he was not required to register as a sexual or violent offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. The trigger for registration is the release from confinement, not release from confinement and supervision. Thus, Azure was required to register within 10 days of release from confinement, notwithstanding continued Department supervision during Azure's conditional release. St. v. Azure, 2008 MT 211, 344 M 188, 186 P3d 1269 (2008), overruling Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004), to the extent that Wagner provided that registration is required upon release from confinement and supervision.

Public Warning of Release of Violent Offender Futile: The plaintiffs sued the state in tort on the basis that the state should have issued a public warning announcing the release of a violent offender who subsequently murdered their child. The Supreme Court ruled that the Legislature had considered the issue of warning the public in its last regular session, had recognized the futility of a warning requirement, and had not made issuing warnings of the release of violent offenders a statutory obligation of the state. VanLuchene v. St., 244 M 397, 797 P2d 932, 47 St. Rep. 1609 (1990).

2007 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Section 4, Ch. 254, L. 2007, a coordination section, in (3) inserted fourth sentence requiring yearly photographs for level 2 or 3 offenders. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Chapter 483 in (1) at beginning of introductory clause inserted exception clause; in (1)(c) near beginning after "within" substituted "3 business days" for "10 days" and near middle after "temporary" substituted "residence" for "domicile"; inserted (1)(d) requiring an offender who is a transient to register within 3 business days of entering a county of this state; in (2) near beginning of first sentence after "(1)(c)" inserted "or (1)(d)" and after "with the" substituted "appropriate registration agency" for "chief of police of the municipality or the sheriff of the county if the offender resides in an area other than a municipality", at beginning of second sentence substituted "If an offender registers with a police department, the department" for "Whichever law enforcement official the offender registers with" and after "notify the" substituted "sheriff's office of the county in which the municipality is located" for "other official", and near end of third sentence after "appropriate" substituted "registration" for "law enforcement"; in (3) near middle of first sentence after "required by" inserted "subsections (3)(a) through (3)(g) and any other information required by", at beginning of second sentence and near beginning of third sentence substituted "registration agency" for "chief of police or sheriff", and inserted fifth sentence and (3)(a) through (3)(g) outlining information required to be collected from the offender at the time of registration; inserted (4) requiring registration in each county or municipality if an offender regularly resides in more than one county or municipality at the time of registration; inserted (5) requiring monthly reporting by a transient; inserted (6)(a)(ii) requiring the mailing of a registration form each 180 days to a level 2 offender; in (6)(a)(iii) after "level 1" deleted "or level 2"; inserted (6)(b) regarding mailing of forms to transients; in (6)(c) in first sentence after "offender's" deleted "current address and", at end of second sentence substituted "registration agency where the offender last registered or, if the offender was initially registered pursuant to subsection (1)(b), to the registration agency in the county or municipality in which the offender is located" for "department", and inserted third sentence requiring the offender to return the form to the appropriate registration agency in person and requiring the registration agency to take a photograph of the offender at the time that the sexual offender returns the registration verification form; inserted (7) requiring the registration agency to provide a copy of the form and the photograph to the department of justice within 3 days; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 1, Ch. 254, L. 2007, were rendered void by sec. 4, Ch. 254, L. 2007, a coordination section.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: "[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

2005 Amendment: Chapter 313 in (2) near beginning of first sentence after "(1)(a)" inserted "or (1)(c)" and after "with the" deleted "probation office having supervision over the offender. Registration under subsection (1)(c) must be with the", in second sentence at beginning after "Whichever" substituted "law enforcement official" for "person", after "registers with" deleted "under subsection (1)(c)", and after "other" substituted "official" for "person", and inserted third sentence requiring a supervising probation officer to verify the offender's registration status with the appropriate law enforcement agency; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 22 in (1)(c) at end substituted "or for an aggregate period exceeding 30 days in a calendar year" for "if the offender was sentenced in another state". Amendment effective August 21, 2002.

Applicability: Section 9, Ch. 22, Sp. L. August 2002, provided: "[This act] applies to convictions on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective August 21, 2002.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in (1), near beginning after "offender", substituted (1)(a) regarding registration upon conclusion of the sentencing hearing and (1)(b) regarding registration 10 days prior to release for "shall, within 14 days of conviction or release from prison or"; in (1)(c), at beginning, inserted "shall register", after "within" substituted "10 days" for "14 days", after "domicile for" substituted "10 days" for "14 days", and at end inserted "if the offender was sentenced in another state"; in (2), at beginning of first sentence, substituted "Registration under subsection (1)(a) must be with the probation office having supervision over the offender. Registration under subsection (1)(c) must be" for "register, as required under 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part" and inserted third sentence requiring notice to the other person; in (3), in four places, substituted reference to offender for reference to person, at end of first sentence, after "department", inserted "of justice", and in third sentence, after "photographs to the", deleted "department and the" and after "justice" deleted "and to the sheriff of the county where the person resides, if registration is with the chief of police"; inserted (4) regarding the registration verification form; in (5), at beginning of first sentence after "The", substituted "offender" for "person registered under this section" and inserted third and fourth sentences regarding fees to cover registration costs; in (6), after "within", substituted "10 days" for "14 days"; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989;and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 407 in (1), near beginning after "sexual", inserted "or violent" and substituted "conviction or release from prison or within 14 days of entering a county of this state for the purpose of residing or setting up a temporary domicile for 14 days or more" for "coming into a county in which he resides or is temporarily domiciled"; inserted (2) relating to signing an information statement, to fingerprints, to photos, and to sending the statement, fingerprints, and photos to certain agencies; inserted (3) relating to the person's payment of registration costs; inserted (4) requiring notice to the Sheriff after entry of judgment; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Defendant's Agreement in Plea Bargain That Included Possibility of Sex Offender Registration — Authority of Sentencing Court to Include Registration as Sentencing Condition: Grana was convicted of multiple burglaries, which would not otherwise require registration as a sexual offender. However, Grana acknowledged that he entered the homes to commit "sexually offensive acts against the occupants", and Grana's original plea agreement provided that the District Court could require sex offender registration, subject to Grana's right to argue that registration was not appropriate. Grana agreed to and obtained the full benefit of the plea bargain, which was sufficient to bring the case within the authority of 46-23-512 and to authorize the District Court to require registration as a sentencing condition as a matter of law. St. v. Grana, 2009 MT 250, 351 M 499, 213 P3d 783 (2009).

Violent Offender Registration Not Required for Criminal Endangerment: Rowe was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and misdemeanor negligent endangerment after assaulting a 2-year-old child whom Rowe was babysitting. As a sentencing condition, the District Court required Rowe to register as a violent offender. Rowe appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Criminal endangerment is not a statutorily listed violent offense for which registration is required. St. v. Rowe, 2009 MT 225, 351 M 334, 217 P3d 471 (2009).

Criminal Endangerment Not Requiring Registration as Violent Offender: Upon conviction for felony criminal endangerment, Perkins was required to register as a violent offender. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that criminal endangerment is not an offense that requires registration as a violent offender. The court ordered that the registration condition be stricken from Perkins' sentence. St. v. Perkins, 2009 MT 150, 350 M 387, 208 P3d 386 (2009).

Release From Confinement, Not Supervision, Trigger for Registration as Sexual or Violent Offender: Azure asserted that because he was still under direct supervision of the Department of Corrections under the intensive supervision program following his release from prison, he was not required to register as a sexual or violent offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. The trigger for registration is the release from confinement, not release from confinement and supervision. Thus, Azure was required to register within 10 days of release from confinement, notwithstanding continued Department supervision during Azure's conditional release. St. v. Azure, 2008 MT 211, 344 M 188, 186 P3d 1269 (2008), overruling Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319

M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004), to the extent that Wagner provided that registration is required upon release from confinement and supervision.

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under 46-23-502 and because a 1989 Attorney General's opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under this section. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General's opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Sexual and Violent Offender Registration Requirements Not Part of Criminal Sentencing — Registration Violation Separate Offense: White Bear was convicted of failing to register as a sexual or violent offender. On appeal, White Bear contended that offender registration violated due process, but the argument was based on an incorrect premise that registration was a condition of sentencing and punishment for the original offense. In fact, the registration requirements are not part of criminal sentencing for a sexual or violent offense, and violation of registration requirements is a separate offense. White Bear's conviction for failing to register as a sexual or violent offender was affirmed. St. v. White Bear, 2005 MT 7, 325 M 337, 106 P3d 516 (2005). See also St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

Instructions for Self-Destructive Activity Given From Afar — Elements of Aggravated Assault Satisfied Given Foreseeability of Injury: Posing as a doctor, Sherer made numerous telephone calls from Florida to Montana women, asking the women to do destructive things to their bodies under the guise of performing self-tests to diagnose possible infection. Three women harmed themselves at Sherer's suggestion, for which Sherer was convicted of two counts of criminal endangerment and one count of aggravated assault and ordered to register as a violent offender. Sherer appealed the aggravated assault charge, arguing that encouraging "someone to injure themselves does not constitute aggravated assault" and that the causation element was too remote to form the basis of an aggravated assault charge. The Supreme Court disagreed. Sherer's instructions to the victims were intended to produce the precise injuries suffered, and by admitting to the facts in the information, Sherer could not credibly claim that he did not intend the injuries because the injuries flowed directly from Sherer's instructions. Statutes defining aggravated assault, cause, act, and conduct gave fair warning that the nature of Sherer's conduct constituted the offense of aggravated assault if that conduct resulted in the intended injuries. The definition of aggravated assault does not require a defined parameter of proximity between defendant and victim or require that a defendant personally direct force toward the victim, but specifically contemplates that any form of communication may itself be sufficient conduct. Sherer was successful in causing the intended injury, and his attempts to blame the victim for falling for the deceptive, illegal activity were meritless. The aggravated assault conviction was affirmed. St. v. Sherer, 2002 MT 337, 313 M 299, 60 P3d 1010 (2002).

Violent Offender Registration Not Violative of Due Process: After being convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide, Miller contended that the District Court's order requiring him to register as a violent offender infringed his right to due process because the court made no specific findings regarding his violent offender status and failed to hold a hearing to allow the introduction of contradictory evidence regarding his status. However, violent offender status is determined purely by this section. The registration statute does not vest a District Court with the discretion to designate defendants as violent offenders, does not prescribe a notice and hearing procedure for determining violent offender status, and does not require a District Court to issue findings based on evidence regarding a defendant's violent offender status. Rather, a defendant's designation as a violent offender is triggered merely by conviction of a violent offense. The process due to a defendant for designation as a violent offender is reasonable notice and an opportunity to be heard during sentencing. St. v. Miller, 1998 MT 177, 290 M 97, 966 P2d 721, 55 St. Rep. 719 (1998), following St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990).

Violent Offender Registration Requirement Not Retroactive: Prior to July 1993, Whitmer was sentenced for felony assault (now assault with a weapon). Upon his release in January 1996, Whitmer was notified of his obligation to register as a violent offender. Whitmer did not register and was charged with and convicted of failure to register as a violent offender. On appeal, he claimed that the 1995 amendments to this section, which added individuals convicted of a violent offense to the list of those required to register, did not apply retroactively. Although the original bill adding the amendments did contain a retroactive applicability clause, the clause was removed during the legislative process when the issue arose that applying the law retroactively might violate the ban on ex post facto legislation. The Legislature did not express its intent to apply the amendments retroactively in the final version of the bill. Therefore, Whitmer had no obligation to register after his release from prison because the amendments did not apply to crimes committed before October 1, 1995. Whitmer's conviction on failure to register was reversed. St. v. Whitmer, 285 M 100, 946 P2d 137, 54 St. Rep. 1063 (1997).

Attorney General's Opinions

Registration of Out-of-State Sexual and Violent Offenders: A sexual or violent offender who is convicted of a violation of any law of another state or the federal government that is reasonably equivalent to a violation of 46-23-502(6) or (9) and who is sentenced on or after July 1, 1989, must register with the local law enforcement agency within 10 days of entering a Montana county for the purpose of taking up permanent or temporary residence. The registration requirement applies whether or not the state in which the offender was convicted has a registration program. 47 A.G. Op. 15 (1998).

2007 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Section 5, Ch. 254, L. 2007, in (1) in first sentence near middle after "46-23-504(1)(b)" substituted "to the registration agency for the county or municipality" for "to the department and to the chief of police of the municipality or sheriff of the county" and inserted second sentence requiring offenders to have a new photograph each year. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Chapter 483 in (1) near beginning after "change of" substituted "name or residence or a change in student, employment, or transient status" for "address", after "within" substituted "3 business days" for "10 days", after "change" substituted "appear in person and give notification of the change" for "give written notification of the new address", before "agency" inserted "registration", and after "46-23-504(1)(b), to the" substituted "registration agency for the county or municipality" for "department and to the chief of police of the municipality or sheriff of the county" and deleted former second sentence that read: "The agency or department shall, within 3 days after receipt of the new address, forward it to the department of justice, which shall forward a copy of the new address and photograph to the sheriff having jurisdiction over the new address and to the chief of police of the municipality of the new address if the new address is in a municipality"; inserted (2) concerning registration by a transient; inserted (3) regarding forwarding of the information by the registration agency and the department of justice; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 2, Ch. 254, L. 2007, were rendered void by sec. 5, Ch. 254, L. 2007, a coordination section.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: "[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

2005 Amendment: Chapter 313 in first sentence near beginning after "part" substituted "has a change of address" for "changes residence" and at end after "registered" inserted "or, if the offender was initially registered under 46-23-504(1)(b), to the department and to the chief of police of the municipality or sheriff of the county from which the offender is moving" and in second sentence at beginning after "agency" inserted "or department" and near end in three places after "new" substituted "address" for "place of residence". Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in first sentence, in three places, substituted "offender" for "person", after "under" deleted "46-18-254, 46-18-255, and", after "10 days" inserted "of the change", and before "agency" deleted "law enforcement" and in second sentence, before "agency" deleted "law enforcement", after "receipt of the" substituted "new address" for "information", after "forward it to the" deleted "department, the", after "justice" deleted "and the local law enforcement agency having jurisdiction over the new place of residence and", after "copy of the" substituted "new address and photograph to the sheriff" for "statement, fingerprints, and photographs of the person to the local law enforcement agency", and at end inserted "and to the chief of police of the municipality of the new place of residence if the new place of residence is in a municipality"; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 407 in second sentence inserted reference to the Department of Justice and at end inserted "and shall forward a copy of the statement, fingerprints, and photographs of the person to the local law enforcement agency having jurisdiction over the new place of residence"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Erroneous Reference to Offense in Charging Document — No Grounds for Reversal Absent Surprise or Prejudice: As a condition of sentencing, Bahr was required to maintain registration as a violent offender. Bahr was subsequently charged with failure to provide notice of a change of address, and the charge was later amended to failing to provide notice of a change of residence. At trial, Bahr asserted that the charge should be dismissed because the initial charging document cited an offense of failure to provide notice of a change of address that was not a crime. The District Court concluded that the charging document properly charged an offense under 46-23-507 and dismissed Bahr's argument. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The original information and the supporting affidavit clearly set out that Bahr was required to register as a violent offender, that the last registration was completed in Glacier County in 2002, and that Bahr had acknowledged the requirement to provide notice of any change but had failed to provide notice after moving from Glacier County and residing in Cascade County for over a month without updating the registration information. This was enough as a matter of law to apprise Bahr of the charges and to prevent any surprise. Even if there were errors in wording in the charging document, there was no ground for reversal unless Bahr demonstrated prejudice. Additionally, amendment of the information from "change of address" to "change of residence" was not substantive. Therefore, absent surprise or prejudice, the District Court properly declined to dismiss the charge. St. v. Bahr, 2009 MT 378, 353 M 294, 224 P3d 610 (2009).

Offender Registration Statute Not Void for Vagueness: This section uses clear language that gives fair notice to offenders that they are required to update their registration when they change their residence. Thus, the statute is not void for vagueness because it states with sufficient definiteness what offenders must do to maintain registration. St. v. Samples, 2008 MT 416, 347 M 416, 198 P3d 803 (2008).

Violation Upon Registrant's Failure to Notify Upon Move From Homeless Shelter to Streets: Samples was registered as a sexual offender while residing at a Billings homeless shelter. Samples moved out of the shelter but failed to notify authorities. Samples contended that he was not required to provide notice of a change of address because he moved from the shelter to the streets of the city and had no actual address. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 46-23-505, a registrant is required to provide notification of a change of residence, which Samples failed to do upon moving from the shelter. Because Samples failed to keep his registration current, he was subject to the penalty in 46-23-507. St. v. Samples, 2008 MT 416, 347 M 416, 198 P3d 803 (2008).

Release From Confinement, Not Supervision, Trigger for Registration as Sexual or Violent Offender: Azure asserted that because he was still under direct supervision of the Department of Corrections under the intensive supervision program following his release from prison, he was not required to register as a sexual or violent offender. The Supreme Court disagreed. The trigger for registration is the release from confinement, not release from confinement and supervision. Thus, Azure was required to register within 10 days of release from confinement, notwithstanding continued Department supervision during Azure's conditional release. St. v.

Azure, 2008 MT 211, 344 M 188, 186 P3d 1269 (2008), overruling Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004), to the extent that Wagner provided that registration is required upon release from confinement and supervision.

Sexual Offender Registration Statute Unconstitutionally Vague Regarding Whether Residential or Mailing Address of Offender Required: Knudson was charged in 2005 with failure to reregister as a sexual offender after changing residences in Chouteau County. Knudson contended that the registration statute was unconstitutionally vague because it was unclear whether an offender was required to provide a residential address or a mailing address. Knudson asserted that the charge should be dismissed because the mailing address that he used when originally registering in 2002 did not change. The District Court denied the dismissal motion, but on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The void for vagueness doctrine requires that a penal statute define the criminal offense with sufficient definiteness that an ordinary person can understand what conduct is prohibited and in a manner that does not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement. It was unclear from the face of this section whether an offender should provide a residential or mailing address when registering. The ambiguity in the use of the word "address" failed to provide Knudson with actual notice that a mailing address was insufficient, and the state's action in charging Knudson for failing to reregister was arbitrary and discriminatory because if Knudson violated the statute by providing a mailing address instead of a residential address, the state should have notified Knudson of the violation when he first registered in 2002. The case was remanded for dismissal of the charge. (Note that the 2007 Legislature substituted "name or residence or a change in student, employment, or transient status" for "address" and applied the amendment retroactively to sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the Department of Corrections on or after July 1, 1989, and to violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the Department of Corrections on or after October 1, 1995.) Conditioning Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender on No Contact With Persons Under 18 and No Possession of Pornographic Material: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. He appealed conditions on his suspended sentence that prohibited contact with persons under 18 years of age and access to or possession of pornographic or other material tending to arouse deviant thoughts or fantasies, claiming that the conditions were not reasonably related to the offense, as required by case law interpretation of the 46-18-201 provision allowing "reasonable restrictions or conditions considered necessary for rehabilitation or for the protection of the victim or society". The Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act was adopted to protect the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevent victimization of vulnerable children, and assist law enforcement in keeping track of sex offenders. Malloy had two prior sex offense convictions and failed to complete two different sex offender programs. He had a history of inability to conform his conduct to the demands of the state's sex offender laws and exhibited behavior placing society in danger because of his recidivism. The conditions were reasonably related to the goal of protecting society, including children. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004).

Suspension of Part of Sentence for Failure to Register as Sex Offender — Conditions in Written but Not Oral Judgment That Full Employment Be Maintained and Offender Not Have Contact With Victims: Malloy, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty to failing to report his change of address. The written judgment, but not the oral pronouncement of sentence, required him to maintain full-time employment and to not have contact with the victims of his offense. The court could not say that the conditions would not substantively increase his loss of liberty or sacrifice of property, and accordingly, the court ordered those conditions to be vacated. St. v. Malloy, 2004 MT 377, 325 M 86, 103 P3d 1064 (2004).

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 in (3)(b) near middle of first sentence after "registration" inserted "for a level 1 sexual offender and at any time after 25 years of registration for a level 2 sexual offender" and after "an offender" deleted "required to register for life". Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: "[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

2005 Amendment: Chapter 313 in (2)(a) at end after "hearing" inserted "but the offender is not relieved of the duty to register until a petition is granted under subsection (3)(a)"; in (2)(b) at end after "(3)" inserted "(b)"; inserted (3)(a) allowing a registered offender to petition for relief from the duty to register after 10 years without a conviction; in (3)(b) near beginning of first sentence after "offender" inserted "required to register for life"; in (4) at beginning of second sentence after "proceeding" inserted "under subsection (3)(b)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 22 inserted (5)(a)(ii) exempting an offender from subsection (3) if the victim was under 12 years of age when the offense occurred; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective August 21, 2002.

Applicability: Section 9, Ch. 22, Sp. L. August 2002, provided: "[This act] applies to convictions on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective August 21, 2002.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 227 at beginning of (3) inserted exception clause; in (3)(b) deleted former second sentence that read: "If the offender was designated as a sexually violent predator under 46-23-509, the court is also required to find that the offender no longer suffers from a mental abnormality or personality disorder that makes the offender likely to engage in a predatory sexual offense"; inserted (5) outlining certain convicted sexual offenders who may not petition, after 10 years of registration, for an order relieving offender from duty to register; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 in (1), in three places, substituted reference to sexual offender for reference to person and after "under" substituted "this part shall register" for "46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part shall comply with 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part"; inserted (2) regarding registration time; in (3), in first sentence after "10 years", substituted "of registration" for "since the date of the offender's last conviction of a sexual or violent offense", after "petition" substituted "the sentencing court or the district court for the judicial district in which the offender resides" for "a district court", and at end deleted "under 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part"; in (3)(b) inserted second sentence requiring a finding that a designated sexually violent predator no longer suffers from a mental abnormality or personality disorder; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989;and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 407 in (1) substituted compliance for the rest of the person's life, except as provided in subsection (2), or during a period of time during which the person is in prison for compliance for 10 years after conviction if not imprisoned during those 10 years and for 10 years after release from prison if imprisoned during the initial 10 years; and substituted (2) relating to a petition for relief from registration and proceeding on the petition for former (2) that provided that the registration duty terminates 10 years after the initial registration if the person commits no act during that time requiring registration.

Chapter 550 in (1), near beginning after "part for", substituted "the remainder of the person's life, except as provided in subsection (2) of this section or during a period of time during which the person is in prison" for "a period of 10 years after conviction, if not imprisoned during that period. If a person required to register under 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part is imprisoned during the initial 10-year period, he shall comply with the provisions of 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part for a period of 10 years after release from prison"; and substituted (2) and (3) allowing a petition for relief from registration for former language that read: "A convicted sexual offender's duty to register under 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part terminates at the expiration of 10 years from the date of initial registration, provided that during the 10-year period the convicted sexual offender does not again become subject to 46-18-254, 46-18-255, and this part."

Code Commissioner Correction: In preparing the 1995 composite for this section, in (2) the words "or violent" were omitted from the first sentence. The omitted words were contained in Chapter 407, Laws of 1995, and should have been included. The Code Commissioner has inserted the erroneously omitted words.

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old

Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

1997 Amendment: Chapter 375 after "register" inserted "verify registration, or keep registration current" and after "under" deleted "46-18-254, 46-18-255, and".

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989;and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 407 near beginning inserted "or violent" and increased penalty from "not less than 90 days or a fine not to exceed $250, or both" to "not more than 5 years or may be fined not more than $10,000, or both".

Chapter 550 near end substituted "more than 5 years or may be fined not more than $10,000" for "less than 90 days or a fine not to exceed $250".

Case Notes

Erroneous Reference to Offense in Charging Document — No Grounds for Reversal Absent Surprise or Prejudice: As a condition of sentencing, Bahr was required to maintain registration as a violent offender. Bahr was subsequently charged with failure to provide notice of a change of address, and the charge was later amended to failing to provide notice of a change of residence. At trial, Bahr asserted that the charge should be dismissed because the initial charging document cited an offense of failure to provide notice of a change of address that was not a crime. The District Court concluded that the charging document properly charged an offense under 46-23-507 and dismissed Bahr's argument. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The original information and the supporting affidavit clearly set out that Bahr was required to register as a violent offender, that the last registration was completed in Glacier County in 2002, and that Bahr had acknowledged the requirement to provide notice of any change but had failed to provide notice after moving from Glacier County and residing in Cascade County for over a month without updating the registration information. This was enough as a matter of law to apprise Bahr of the charges and to prevent any surprise. Even if there were errors in wording in the charging document, there was no ground for reversal unless Bahr demonstrated prejudice. Additionally, amendment of the information from "change of address" to "change of residence" was not substantive. Therefore, absent surprise or prejudice, the District Court properly declined to dismiss the charge. St. v. Bahr, 2009 MT 378, 353 M 294, 224 P3d 610 (2009).

Violation Upon Registrant's Failure to Notify Upon Move From Homeless Shelter to Streets: Samples was registered as a sexual offender while residing at a Billings homeless shelter. Samples moved out of the shelter but failed to notify authorities. Samples contended that he was not required to provide notice of a change of address because he moved from the shelter to the streets of the city and had no actual address. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 46-23-505, a registrant is required to provide notification of a change of residence, which Samples failed to do upon moving from the shelter. Because Samples failed to keep his registration current, he was subject to the penalty in 46-23-507. St. v. Samples, 2008 MT 416, 347 M 416, 198 P3d 803 (2008).

Persistent Felony Offender Statute Not Violative of Double Jeopardy Protections: Wardell was convicted of felony sexual contact with a child in South Dakota and later was charged with numerous sexual crimes in Montana, including failure to register as a sex offender. The District Court sentenced Wardell to 5 years on the failure to register count and designated Wardell as a persistent felony offender, ultimately adding an additional 20-year consecutive sentence. Wardell appealed on grounds that the conviction for failure to register and the sentence for persistent felony offender constituted double jeopardy because each relied on the same underlying conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. A sentence as a habitual criminal is not to be viewed as a new jeopardy. The sentence enhancement was related to the second crime—failure to register—and thus did not constituted double jeopardy. Under 46-18-501, the dual use of the prior South Dakota conviction for designating Wardell as a persistent felon was authorized. Further, it is not a crime to be a persistent felony offender, and being designated a persistent felony offender cannot constitute double jeopardy. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005).

Use of Persistent Felony Offender Statute to Increase Sentence Not Considered Cruel and Unusual Punishment: Wardell was originally sentenced as a persistent felony offender to 45 years in prison with 30 years suspended. Wardell filed a petition for postconviction relief, and that sentence was vacated. Upon resentencing, Wardell's sentence was increased to 20 years suspended plus 5 years for failure to register as a sex offender. Wardell argued on appeal that the sentence constituted cruel and unusual punishment because it was excessive when compared to other sentences for failure to register. The Supreme Court noted that Wardell's sentence was within statutory maximum guidelines and was not so disproportionate to the crime as to shock the conscience or outrage the moral sense of the community or of justice. The sentence was affirmed. St. v. Wardell, 2005 MT 252, 329 M 9, 122 P3d 443 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003).

Sex Offender Registration and Disclosure Requirements Not Violative of Privacy or Right of Convicted to Restoration of Rights: Mount was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and served his sentence. Nine days after final discharge from prison in 1996, Mount registered as a sexual offender, but he was convicted in 2000 of failing to update the registration as required in this section. On appeal, Mount asserted that the ongoing registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act violated the right to privacy under Art. II, sec. 10, Mont. Const., and constitutional and statutory provisions for reinstatement of the rights of a citizen under Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., and 46-18-801. The Supreme Court disagreed. As a fundamental right, the right to individual privacy may be infringed only by a compelling state interest; however, protection of the public from the recidivism of sex offenders, prevention of the victimization of vulnerable children, and assistance in keeping track of sex offenders constitute the requisite compelling interest. Further, Art. II, sec. 28, Mont. Const., and 46-18-801 apply only to the restoration of civil and political rights, and a conviction for sexual intercourse without consent does not fall under this category of protected rights. Thus, Mount was not deprived of any rights by the registration and disclosure requirements of the Sexual or Violent Offender Registration Act. St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), followed in Wagner v. St., 2004 MT 31, 319 M 413, 85 P3d 750 (2004).

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

Attorney General's Opinions

Limit of Immunity Regarding Release of Sexual Offender Registration Information: Under 46-23-511, state and local agencies, private entities, and their employees are exempt from liability as a result of good faith decisions regarding the release of information on sexual offenders, but that immunity does not extend to gross negligence or willful or wanton misconduct. Pursuant to Russell v. Gregoire, 124 F3d 1079 (9th Cir. 1997), release of information is tailored to help the community protect itself from sexual predators under the guidance of law enforcement, not to punish sex offenders. 47 A.G. Op. 15 (1998).

Registration of Out-of-State Sexual Offenders — Information Subject to Disclosure: The general language of subsection (1)(b) of this section governs the dissemination of information regarding out-of-state sexual offenders who are registered in Montana. At a minimum, the name of the registered sexual offender may be disclosed. Additional information may be disclosed if the offender is determined to be a risk to the safety of the community and if disclosure of the additional information promotes public safety. The identity of a victim may not be released without the victim's permission. 47 A.G. Op. 15 (1998).

Case Notes

Plea Not Considered Involuntary Based on Defendant's Belief in Designation as Low-Level Sexual Offender: Brinson entered a plea agreement stating that he would be sentenced to 20 years suspended if he completed a sexual offender evaluation with an evaluator certified by the Montana Sex Offender Treatment Association (MSOTA) and if the evaluator concluded that Brinson was a low risk to reoffend. However, if Brinson was not found to be a low risk, the parties would be free to argue for an appropriate sentence. Brinson received two evaluations. A non-MSOTA evaluator found Brinson to be a level 1 low-risk offender, but an MSOTA evaluator concluded that Brinson was a level 2 moderate-risk offender. The sentencing court held that because Brinson was not found to be a low risk by an MSOTA evaluator, the suspended sentence provisions of the plea agreement did not apply. The court subsequently adopted the recommendation in the presentence investigation report and sentenced Brinson to 20 years in prison with 10 years suspended. Brinson appealed on grounds that he was misled by the plea bargain, however slightly, so withdrawal of the guilty plea was warranted. The Supreme Court disagreed. The court disapproved the "however slightly" language in the analysis of the voluntariness of a plea. Even though Brinson's expectations were bolstered by the low-level evaluation 3 months after his plea, those subsequent expectations were irrelevant to whether the plea was voluntary when entered. Even though Brinson may have had a good faith belief that he would ultimately be designated a low-risk offender, he presented no objective proof that he was assured of receiving that designation. In fact, the plea agreement was clear that a low-risk designation might not be forthcoming, so Brinson's argument that the plea was involuntary because it was induced by a misrepresentation or an unfulfillable promise was unpersuasive. The sentencing court did not err in denying Brinson's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009), overruling St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), and St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008), regarding applicability of the "however slightly" language in the analysis of the voluntariness of a plea.

No Error in Level 3 Sex Offender Designation: Hill asserted error in the District Court's designation of Hill as a level 3 sexual offender. A District Court makes a sexual offender designation in the exercise of the court's discretion, and in this case the court did not abuse its discretion given Hill's: (1) history of multiple sexual contacts with young children of both sexes spanning at least 7 years; (2) admission of multiple sexual assaults; (3) failure of two sexual offender treatment programs; (4) commission of a sexual felony following return to the community; (5) high risk to reoffend; (6) danger to the community; and (7) need for lifelong supervision. St. v. Hill, 2009 MT 134, 350 M 296, 207 P3d 307 (2009).

Sentence Not Based on Materially Inaccurate Information Affirmed: Following conviction on a sexual assault charge, Hirt was sentenced as a level 3 sexual offender. Hirt contended that the sentence was erroneous because it was based in part on materially inaccurate information that Hirt had three prior felony convictions, when in fact Hirt had only one prior felony conviction. However, the sentencing judge knew at sentencing that Hirt had one prior felony conviction, not three as stated in the original presentence investigation (PSI) report, because the information had been corrected in a subsequent PSI report. The level 3 designation was based on a number of considerations besides Hirt's prior criminal history, including Hirt's drug and alcohol abuse, mental health history, misuse of prescription medication, credibility, and failure to assume responsibility for his actions. The sentencing judge was not bound by the level 3 recommendation and was required to and did make an independent decision on the issue after considering the range of relevant and material factors presented in the sentencing record. Thus, the sentencing court did not rely on misinformation, and the information in the PSI was true, so there was no error or violation of Hirt's due process rights. Hirt v. St., 2009 MT 116, 350 M 162, 206 P3d 908 (2009).

Parole Restriction Based on Defendant's Danger to Society Warranted: Following conviction for kidnapping and sexual assault, Dunning was sentenced to 10 years in prison and designated as ineligible for parole. Dunning argued on appeal that the parole restriction was unwarranted, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Two psychosexual evaluations confirmed Dunning's high risk to reoffend equivalent to a level 3 offender, and Dunning remained an untreated sexual offender who was considered a danger to society based on a 30-year history of sexually related offenses. The factual evidence presented to the sentencing court provided a sufficient basis to support the court's conclusion that the parole restriction was proper. St. v. Dunning, 2008 MT 427, 347 M 443, 198 P3d 828 (2008).

Offender Entitled to Opportunity to Contest Sex Offender Designation — Liberty Interest at Stake: Samples contended that his due process rights were violated when the Department of Corrections assigned him a level 3 offender designation without notice, a hearing, or an opportunity to contest the designation. The Supreme Court agreed. In the context of a criminal sentence in Montana, it is not the duration or severity of a sentence that might render it unconstitutional, it is the imposition of a sentence based on a foundation that might be extensively and materially false and that a prisoner has no opportunity to correct that can result in a due process violation. There is a liberty interest at stake when a person is designated as a particular risk level for registration purposes because the level of designation places varying requirements on an offender to update the registration or face criminal sanctions. Therefore, Samples was denied due process in this case because he did not have the opportunity to know what information was used to designate the risk level, nor was he given the right to contest that information or the chance to argue for a different designation. The court remanded to allow Samples an opportunity to explain, argue, and rebut any information used in the designation of his sexual offender risk level. St. v. Samples, 2008 MT 416, 347 M 416, 198 P3d 803 (2008).

Sentence Based on Recommendation of Sexual Offender Evaluator — State Breach of Plea Agreement by Presenting Conflicting Testimony of Different Evaluator: In a plea agreement, the state agreed to recommend one sentence if Rahn was designated by a sexual offender evaluator as a level 2 or lower offender and a harsher sentence if Rahn was designated as a level 3 offender. An evaluator who personally evaluated Rahn opined that Rahn should be designated as a level 2 offender. At the sentencing hearing, the state presented testimony by a different evaluator, who had not evaluated Rahn, attacking the level 2 designation and arguing that Rahn should be designated as a level 3 offender. Rahn objected on grounds that the state witness's testimony breached the plea agreement, but the sentencing court overruled the objection and subsequently designated Rahn as a level 3 offender and imposed the harsher sentence. Rahn appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Rahn complied with the plea agreement, but the state's conduct in presenting alternate testimony and recommending a level 3 designation was not what was agreed upon in the plea bargain; therefore, the state breached the plea agreement. The state was obligated to make the recommendation as agreed upon in the plea bargain, and the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing with a different judge pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement. St. v. Rahn, 2008 MT 201, 344 M 110, 187 P3d 622 (2008).

No General or Inherent Authority of Sentencing Court to Generally Impose Parole Conditions — Parole Condition Related to Sexual Offense Authorized: There is no general or inherent authority for a sentencing court to impose parole conditions. A sentencing court may impose conditions on parole that are authorized by statute only. In this case, all conditions on Burch's suspended sentence for sexual offenses were proper, but only one parole condition, prohibiting Burch from possessing pornography or accessing the Internet, was authorized under 46-18-255. Burch's admission that he used the Internet at work to access pornography while on parole established that Burch violated a condition of his suspended sentence by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, the sentencing court did not err in revoking Burch's suspended sentence. St. v. Burch, 2008 MT 118, 342 M 499, 182 P3d 66 (2008), followed in St. v. Dennison, 2008 MT 344, 346 M 295, 194 P3d 704, (2008), and followed in St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), regarding authority of sentencing court.

Petition for Redesignation of Level 3 Sexual Offender Status Applicable to Convictions Prior to August 21, 2002: Bullman was sentenced under the 1999 version of this section that allowed a level 2 or level 3 offender to petition for a change in the offender designation upon completion of a sexual offender program. Bullman was designated as a level 3 offender and petitioned for a change in designation in 2006. However, in 2002, the Legislature amended this section to allow only level 2 offenders to petition for a change in designation, so the District Court denied Bullman's petition. The Supreme Court reversed. The 2002 amendment applies only to convictions on or after August 21, 2002, and does not apply retroactively, so Bullman was entitled to petition for redesignation. The case was remanded for the District Court to determine whether Bullman qualified for redesignation. St. v. Bullman, 2007 MT 288, 339 M 461, 171 P3d 681 (2007).

Department of Corrections Assignment of Offender Level if Not Designated by Sentencing Court: Defendant contended that the sentencing court erred in failing to designate a sexual offender risk level at the time of sentencing. The Supreme Court found that the sentencing court erred in failing to designate a level, but the error did not warrant remand because this section provides its own remedy by allowing the Department of Corrections to assign an offender level at the time of an offender's release from confinement if the sentencing court fails to do so. St. v. Legg, 2004 MT 26, 319 M 362, 84 P3d 648 (2004).

Attorney General's Opinions

Limit of Immunity Regarding Release of Sexual Offender Registration Information: Under this section, state and local agencies, private entities, and their employees are exempt from liability as a result of good faith decisions regarding the release of information on sexual offenders, but that immunity does not extend to gross negligence or willful or wanton misconduct. Pursuant to Russell v. Gregoire, 124 F3d 1079 (9th Cir. 1997), release of information is tailored to help the community protect itself from sexual predators under the guidance of law enforcement, not to punish sex offenders. 47 A.G. Defendant's Agreement in Plea Bargain That Included Possibility of Sex Offender Registration — Authority of Sentencing Court to Include Registration as Sentencing Condition: Grana was convicted of multiple burglaries, which would not otherwise require registration as a sexual offender. However, Grana acknowledged that he entered the homes to commit "sexually offensive acts against the occupants", and Grana's original plea agreement provided that the District Court could require sex offender registration, subject to Grana's right to argue that registration was not appropriate. Grana agreed to and obtained the full benefit of the plea bargain, which was sufficient to bring the case within the authority of 46-23-512 and to authorize the District Court to require registration as a sentencing condition as a matter of law. Case Notes

Restriction on Financial Transactions as Condition for Suspended Sentence for Sexual Assault Affirmed: As a condition for a suspended sentence for sexual assault of a child, Hernandez was required to obtain permission from the probation officer before engaging in financial transactions to finance or purchase a vehicle, engage in business, or incur debt. Hernandez appealed on grounds that the condition was unrelated to the crime. The Supreme Court noted that the sentencing condition was authorized by statute and Department of Corrections rule, so the Ashby requirement of a nexus to the offender or the offense did not apply. The financial transaction restriction was considered a standard condition of the Department, and Hernandez offered nothing indicating that the condition would impose a hardship; because Hernandez's priority financial obligations while serving the suspended sentence would be restitution, child support, fines, and fees, the imposition of the condition was appropriate and not an abuse of discretion. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Hernandez, 2009 MT 341, 353 M 111, 220 P3d 25 (2009).

Entry of Intensive Supervision Program Officer Into Probationer's Home Without Consent Unlawful — Information Gathered Via Search Admissible as Independent Source or Inevitable Discovery Exceptions to Fruit of Poisonous Tree Doctrine: As a condition of suspended sentencing, Therriault was placed in the intensive supervision program (ISP). Near the end of the program, Therriault's supervising officer, McCarty, arrived at Therriault's residence for a routine check. Although Therriault was not there, McCarty entered the residence and found, in plain view, what he thought might be a note for him from Therriault, but which turned out to be a high school registration form for a female student. McCarty then went to Therriault's sister's home next door. Therriault's sister informed McCarty that she had seen a girl at Therriault's home during the prior 2 weeks and inquired about the lawful age of consent. McCarty then reentered Therriault's home and reviewed the form, discovering that the applicant was 14 years old. McCarty left a note for Therriault to contact him and left the residence but returned later that night to discover a 14-year-old girl in Therriault's basement. Upon petition to revoke his probation, Therriault alleged that the discovery directly resulted from an illegal search and seizure and moved to suppress all evidence under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. The District Court denied the motion, revoked Therriault's suspended sentence, and sentenced him to prison for the remainder of the term. Therriault appealed. The state contended that as a participant in ISP, Therriault enjoyed little or no expectation of privacy and that McCarty's conduct did not constitute a search. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that ISP is merely a rigid condition imposed on certain probationers and that it is the sentencing tribunal, not the ISP officer, that establishes the conditions for any search of the probationer's person or property and that any ISP rules, terms or conditions, or means of supervision that conflict with a court-ordered condition of probation will be superseded by the court's conditions. The state misconstrued Therriault's expectation of privacy under ISP because the court's probationary condition stated that Therriault would submit his residence "to search at any time by lawful authorities upon reasonable request of his Probation Officer", so Therriault could expect that an intrusion into the privacy of his home would not occur unless McCarty had reasonable cause and first posed a reasonable request. Accordingly, McCarty's conduct constituted an illegal search and evidence obtained through the unlawful conduct would not generally be admissible under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. However, under St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919

(1996), such derivative evidence is admissible if it is: (1) attenuated from the constitutional violation so as to remove its primary taint; (2) obtained from an independent source; or (3) determined to be evidence that would have been inevitably discovered apart from the constitutional violation. In this case, the second exception applied. McCarty received independent incriminating evidence from Therriault's sister; thus, it was not the tainted evidence of the girl's name or age or the fact that she was transferring to a different school that led to her discovery, but rather the independent information that a girl of questionable age had been residing with Therriault. This irrefutable evidence, ascertained through a source sufficiently independent of McCarty's unlawful conduct, warranted exclusion from the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. The District Court's revocation of Therriault's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Therriault, 2000 MT 286, 302 M 189, 14 P3d 444, 57 St. Rep. 1185 (2000).

Case Notes

No Statutory Authority of District Court to Restrict Future Interstate Compact Agreements: Muhammad was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. One condition of sentencing was a restriction on Muhammad's ability to enter future interstate compact agreements. The state conceded that the District Court lacked authority to approve interstate compact agreements, but asserted that the court did have the authority to condition Muhammad's sentence in such a way as to require sexual offender treatment if Muhammad's probation supervision was transferred to another state. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under this section, it is the duty of the Department of Corrections to administer interstate compacts for the supervision of probationers. Therefore, the requirement that Montana treatment providers and the District Court approve any interstate compact agreement was vacated. However, the Supreme Court did note that the District Court was not precluded from requiring that Muhammad complete a program that was equivalent to a Montana program if supervision was transferred to another state. The order was remanded to the District Court to allow modification to provide for that condition. St. v. Muhammad, 2002 MT 47, 309 M 1, 43 P3d 318 (2002).

Failure to Object to Constitutionality of Probation Condition Constituting Waiver of Issue on Appeal: When LaFreniere was sentenced for sexual intercourse without consent, the sentencing court did not attach any probation conditions. The County Attorney subsequently petitioned the court to add probation conditions pursuant to this section, one of which was that LaFreniere complete sex offender treatment. LaFreniere objected to that condition on grounds that he couldn't afford it, but the District Court nevertheless imposed the treatment requirement along with 14 other probation conditions. LaFreniere later appealed on grounds that imposition of the treatment condition violated the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws. Without addressing the constitutional argument, the Supreme Court affirmed. By failing to raise the constitutional argument in District Court, LaFreniere waived the issue for purposes of appeal. St. v. LaFreniere, 2008 MT 99, 342 M 309, 180 P3d 1161 (2008).

Error in Revoking Suspended Sentence for Refusal to Sign Rules of Probation: In 1993, Gillingham, a resident of Canada, was convicted of five felonies and sentenced to 10 years on each count with the sentences suspended on certain conditions, one of which was a requirement that Gillingham sign a copy of the conditions of probation. Before Gillingham could sign, he was deported to Canada. Gillingham's probation officer sent a copy of the conditions to Canada for Gillingham's signature. The document contained the conditions imposed at sentencing, but also included an additional condition not imposed at sentencing, requiring that Gillingham waive extradition from Canada. Gillingham refused to sign the document with the new extradition condition, so in 1996, the state filed a petition to revoke Gillingham's suspended sentence because of his refusal to sign. In 1998, the state submitted a supplemental petition to revoke the sentence based on three additional violations of sentencing conditions. Gillingham was finally extradited to Missoula County in 2004, and the District Court considered the petition to revoke Gillingham's sentence. The court found that Gillingham had violated the condition of his sentence requiring that he sign a document containing the rules of probation, revoked Gillingham's sentence, and sentenced him to 45 years at the state prison. Gillingham appealed the sentence revocation, and the Supreme Court agreed that revocation based on this issue was error. At the time that the charged offenses occurred and the sentences were imposed, the Department of Corrections had the authority to require that a probationer sign the conditions of probation, but the Department did not have the authority to add to the conditions of probation the requirement that a probationer waive extradition because that authority was not added to this section until the 2001 legislative session. Therefore, the District Court did not have the authority to revoke Gillingham's sentence based on Gillingham's refusal to sign a copy of probation conditions containing a provision that the court did not impose. St. v. Gillingham, 2008 MT 38, 341 M 325, 176 P3d 1075 (2008).

Modification of Probation Conditions to Include Intensive Supervision Program Affirmed — Modification Not Punitive or Change to Original Sentence: Following a conviction for felony incest, Griffin served one-half of his sentence and was released on parole. A probation officer recommended that Griffin complete the intensive supervision program (ISP) to assist in reentering the community. Griffin signed a formal request to modify the conditions of parole to include the ISP, and the District Court approved the modification. Griffin moved to set the order aside 1 day later after consulting an attorney, claiming that the probation officer had coerced Griffin into signing the request for modification. Finding no evidence of coercion and noting that Griffin had consented to the request for modification, the District Court denied the motion to set aside, and Griffin appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Although the order modified the conditions of Griffin's supervision, it did not modify Griffin's punishment, so Griffin's due process, double jeopardy, and ex post facto rights were not implicated. Griffin's original sentence contemplated the ISP as one of the conditions of a suspended sentence, so the order to successfully complete the ISP was not a change to the original sentence, but rather ensured Griffin's compliance with the terms of the original sentence. The District Court did not err in denying the motion to set aside the order modifying probation conditions. St. v. Griffin, 2007 MT 289, 339 M 465, 172 P3d 1223 (2007).

Oral and Written Versions of Original Sentence Requiring Outpatient Sexual Offender Treatment — Violation of Suspended Sentence: The District Court revoked Van Haele's suspended sentence on grounds that he failed to qualify for outpatient sexual offender treatment. Van Haele contended that the sentencing condition was improperly added by amendment and that he was entitled to a hearing on the added condition because it was not part of the original sentence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The requirement could not have been added to the original sentence because it was part of the original oral and written sentence, so no hearing was required. The basis for revoking Van Haele's suspended sentence was therefore not invalid, and suspension was affirmed. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Alleged Inadequate Supervision of Parolee No Excuse for Probation Violation: Senn's parole supervision was transferred to Washington state, and after several years the Missoula County Attorney filed a petition to revoke Senn's suspended sentences based on several alleged probation violations. Senn admitted violating some of the probation conditions, but contended that the violations should be excused because of health problems, poverty, arrests in Washington that precluded contact with Montana, a good faith assumption that matters in Montana could be resolved after the criminal issues in Washington were addressed, and the Montana parole officer's failure to provide adequate supervision. The Supreme Court disagreed. Senn's own conduct resulted in the probation violations, and although there was a period when Senn was unsupervised, even when supervised Senn failed to comply with the probation officer's requests. The District Court did not err in revoking Senn's suspended sentences. St. v. Senn, 2003 MT 52, 314 M 348, 66 P3d 288 (2003).

Reasonable Cause for Search of Probationer — Motion to Suppress Evidence of Search Properly Denied: As a condition of a suspended sentence for conviction of felony sale of drugs, Roper consented to warrantless searches of his person, vehicle, or residence. Roper was subsequently granted a conditional discharge from state supervision of his probation because he was serving a concurrent probation as a result of a federal criminal conviction. However, despite the conditional discharge, the state reserved the right to warrantless searches and drug checks during the term of the state probationary sentence, and Roper was relieved only of the requirement to report to the state probation officer monthly. After a few months, the state probation officer became concerned that Roper was both using and selling drugs when two clients reported Roper's continued involvement with drugs. An informant told investigators that Roper stored drugs in a black leather pouch. Based on the gathered information and the close proximity of Roper's workplace to a school, the probation officer believed that reasonable cause existed to search Roper and, with other police officers, went to Roper's workplace and observed him outside involved in what appeared to be a drug transaction. They searched Roper but found no drugs in his possession. The officers went into the workplace and conducted a urinalysis on Roper, which tested positive. While there, the officers noticed a black leather pouch next to Roper's work gloves, seized it, and discovered methamphetamine. Roper was arrested, and the officers went to his house where additional drug evidence was discovered and seized. Roper moved to suppress all the evidence found at both his workplace and residence, contending that the probation officer did not have the right to perform any type of warrantless search and that the evidence seized at the residence was the result of the illegal search of the workplace. The motion was denied, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The probation officer's authority to conduct warrantless searches was extended by the waiver of privacy to which Roper agreed as a condition of probation. The officers were lawfully at Roper's workplace because they had authority to request a urinalysis and to search Roper's person, and the seizure of the black pouch was proper based on the plain view doctrine and information that the pouch was where Roper kept drugs. Further, because the evidence at the workplace was lawfully gathered, the District Court did not err when it denied the motion to suppress evidence gathered during the subsequent search of Roper's home. St. v. Roper, 2001 MT 96, 305 M 212, 26 P3d 741 (2001).

Entry of Intensive Supervision Program Officer Into Probationer's Home Without Consent Unlawful — Information Gathered Via Search Admissible as Independent Source or Inevitable Discovery Exceptions to Fruit of Poisonous Tree Doctrine: As a condition of suspended sentencing, Therriault was placed in the intensive supervision program (ISP). Near the end of the program, Therriault's supervising officer, McCarty, arrived at Therriault's residence for a routine check. Although Therriault was not there, McCarty entered the residence and found, in plain view, what he thought might be a note for him from Therriault, but which turned out to be a high school registration form for a female student. McCarty then went to Therriault's sister's home next door. Therriault's sister informed McCarty that she had seen a girl at Therriault's home during the prior 2 weeks and inquired about the lawful age of consent. McCarty then reentered Therriault's home and reviewed the form, discovering that the applicant was 14 years old. McCarty left a note for Therriault to contact him and left the residence but returned later that night to discover a 14-year-old girl in Therriault's basement. Upon petition to revoke his probation, Therriault alleged that the discovery directly resulted from an illegal search and seizure and moved to suppress all evidence under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. The District Court denied the motion, revoked Therriault's suspended sentence, and sentenced him to prison for the remainder of the term. Therriault appealed. The state contended that as a participant in ISP, Therriault enjoyed little or no expectation of privacy and that McCarty's conduct did not constitute a search. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that ISP is merely a rigid condition imposed on certain probationers and that it is the sentencing tribunal, not the ISP officer, that establishes the conditions for any search of the probationer's person or property and that any ISP rules, terms or conditions, or means of supervision that conflict with a court-ordered condition of probation will be superseded by the court's conditions. The state misconstrued Therriault's expectation of privacy under ISP because the court's probationary condition stated that Therriault would submit his residence "to search at any time by lawful authorities upon reasonable request of his Probation Officer", so Therriault could expect that an intrusion into the privacy of his home would not occur unless McCarty had reasonable cause and first posed a reasonable request. Accordingly, McCarty's conduct constituted an illegal search and evidence obtained through the unlawful conduct would not generally be admissible under the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. However, under St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919 (1996), such derivative evidence is admissible if it is: (1) attenuated from the constitutional violation so as to remove its primary taint; (2) obtained from an independent source; or (3) determined to be evidence that would have been inevitably discovered apart from the constitutional violation. In this case, the second exception applied. McCarty received independent incriminating evidence from Therriault's sister; thus, it was not the tainted evidence of the girl's name or age or the fact that she was transferring to a different school that led to her discovery, but rather the independent information that a girl of questionable age had been residing with Therriault. This irrefutable evidence, ascertained through a source sufficiently independent of McCarty's unlawful conduct, warranted exclusion from the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine. The District Court's revocation of Therriault's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Therriault, 2000 MT 286, 302 M 189, 14 P3d 444, 57 St. Rep. 1185 (2000).

New Sentence Restriction Added Upon Revocation of Suspended Sentence Stricken: If a District Court finds that a defendant has violated the terms or conditions of a suspended sentence, the court may revoke the suspended sentence and require the defendant to serve either the sentence imposed or any lesser sentence, but nothing in 46-18-203 authorizes a court to impose additional restrictions when revoking a suspended sentence. (See 2001 amendment to this section, which allows it.) In this case, the District Court originally sentenced Richardson to 20 years in prison for felony sexual assault against a child, with all but 70 days suspended, conditioned in part upon completion of a sex offender treatment program. Richardson failed treatment and admitted violating other conditions of the suspended sentence, so the sentence was revoked, and Richardson was sentenced to prison for the remainder of the 20-year sentence. Additionally, the court conditioned Richardson's parole eligibility upon successful completion of the first two phases of sexual offender treatment in prison. The additional restriction on the sentence was error, and the case was remanded for the limited purpose of striking that condition from the sentence. St. v. Richardson, 2000 MT 72, 299 M 102, 997 P2d 786, 57 St. Rep. 320 (2000), following St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

"Finding" in Probation Modification Order Not Res Judicata as to Issue of Compliance With Terms of Probation: Lindeman pleaded guilty to charges of sexual abuse and incest and, as a condition of probation, was required to complete a sex offender treatment program and to have no unsupervised contact with minors. After some efforts at treatment, for which the treatment provider issued a letter saying that Lindeman had "graduated" from the program, Lindeman petitioned the District Court for a modification of the previous order in order to allow him to have contact with his minor daughter. In issuing the order, the District Court found that Lindeman had completed the sex offender treatment program. However, Lindeman had not in fact completed a treatment program meeting the standards required in his original probation order, and the treatment provider was not qualified to treat Lindeman because the provider lacked credentials required by the original probation order. Later, when the state sought to revoke Lindeman's probation and impose the suspended sentence based upon Lindeman's failure to complete the treatment program, Lindeman argued that the issue of completion of the program was res judicata under the probation modification order of the District Court. Citing Hollister v. Forsythe, 277 M 23, 918 P2d 665 (1996), the Supreme Court held that the issue of Lindeman's completion of the treatment program was not res judicata because the issues in the probation modification proceeding and the later revocation proceeding were not the same. The Supreme Court pointed out that at the probation modification hearing: (1) the issue of completion of the treatment program was not before the District Court; (2) the hearing was requested by Lindeman to change a condition concerning contact with minors, not completion of the treatment program; (3) the District Court did not remove the condition that Lindeman complete the treatment program; and (4) the "finding" was unnecessary to the District Court's decision to modify the condition of probation. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988), and St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530 (1990), and noted that the only way that the issue of completion of the treatment program could have been determined by the District Court was through a petition filed pursuant to 46-18-203, which did not occur. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the "finding" by the District Court was not a conclusive, litigated finding and therefore was not res judicata as to whether Lindeman had completed treatment as required in his probation order. St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Parole Officer Duty of Care to Supervise Parolees — Jury Instruction Properly Given: Corliss was paroled, after serving time for an execution-style slaying with a handgun, under the condition that he not possess a firearm. While on a visit, with the approval of his parole officer, to Washington state to look for work, Corliss failed to return to Montana within the established time, failed to see a parole officer in Washington, had a temporary restraining order obtained against him by a girlfriend because of threats made to her and her family, and had an altercation with his wife involving a handgun. In neither instance of violence did Corliss's parole officer investigate the circumstances of the violence. Later, Corliss shot and killed one friend of his girlfriend and injured another. Both the estates of the deceased woman and the wounded woman brought actions against the state for negligent supervision of Corliss's parole. The state objected to an instruction given by the District Court concerning a parole officer's duty of care, claiming that there must be some special relationship between the parole officer and the person injured by a parolee in order for a duty of care to arise. The Supreme Court reviewed statutes defining negligence, statutes describing the general duty of one individual toward another, and statutes concerning parole and concluded that Robbins had a general duty to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of Corliss and had a duty to the killed and injured women in particular. Starkenburg v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Failure to Conduct Preliminary Onsite Hearing in Extradition Case — No Due Process Violation: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision, supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. Hardy pleaded no contest to the Utah offenses. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that there was a violation of his due process rights in not receiving a preliminary hearing upon his return to Montana, that his Montana probation officer wrongly informed him that his probation would not be revoked for misdemeanor convictions, and that he was improperly denied credit for his street time while on probation in Utah. In this case, a preliminary onsite hearing would have contributed nothing to a determination of whether Hardy had violated his probation. As evidenced by his no contest pleas and admissions, Hardy indisputably violated the conditions of his probation. A preliminary onsite hearing would not have led to any other finding. Failure to provide Hardy with a hearing did not prejudice his substantial rights. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Representations of Parole Violations by Parole Officer Not Clearly Erroneous — Revocation Proceeding Not Estopped: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision, supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. Hardy pleaded no contest to the Utah offenses. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that his Montana probation officer wrongly informed him that his probation would not be revoked for misdemeanor convictions and that his probation should thus not have been revoked. The Supreme Court noted that Montana did not participate in plea negotiations between Hardy and the State of Utah and that Hardy knowingly, voluntarily, and with assistance of counsel entered into a no contest plea agreement. The representations to Hardy by his Montana parole officer were not clearly erroneous. The court's conclusion that Montana was not estopped from proceeding with revocation based on the parole officer's representations was correct. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Five-Year Suspension Revoked for Failure to Enter Inpatient Alcohol Program: There was substantial evidence to support the revocation of probation and imposition of the original 5-year sentence since defendant failed to comply with a condition that required immediate entry into an inpatient alcohol counseling program. The probation officer fulfilled his duty to advise probationer of the conditions and consequences of a violation. The District Court revoked the suspension pursuant to the discretion granted in 46-18-203 in accordance with the minimum requirements for invoking such discretion. There was no abuse of discretion in the court's consideration of the factors in the original sentencing, except for the sentencing judge's determination that defendant was a dangerous offender. (See 1995 repeal of 46-18-404.) No findings appeared in support of such designation. St. v. Ford, 218 M 215, 707 P2d 16, 42 St. Rep. 1530 (1985).

46-23-1012. Arrest when violations of probation alleged — probation compliance plan — probation violator intervention.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 493 in (1) substituted text regarding issuance of warrant or notice to appear for former text that read: "At any time during probation or suspension of sentence, a court may issue a warrant for the arrest of the defendant for violation of any of the conditions of release or a notice to appear to answer to a charge of violation. The notice must be personally served upon the defendant. The warrant must authorize all officers named in the warrant to return the defendant to the custody of the court or to any suitable detention facility designated by the court"; in (2) throughout subsection substituted reference to probationer for reference to defendant, in first sentence near beginning after "warrant or may" inserted "orally", near middle after "12 hours delivering to the" substituted "detention center" for "place of detention", and at end after "violated the conditions of" substituted "probation" for "the defendant's release", and in second sentence near middle after "the official in charge of a" substituted "detention center" for "county detention center or other place of detention"; and substituted (3) through (5) regarding detention of probationer and revocation of probation for former (3) through (5) that read: "(3)

Provisions regarding release on bail of a person charged with a crime are applicable to the defendants arrested under these provisions.

(4) Any probation and parole officer may hold a defendant arrested under subsection (1) without bail for 72 hours. After the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection, a hearings officer for the probation and parole bureau shall hold a hearing within 36 hours of the defendant's arrest. The hearings officer shall determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the defendant has violated a condition of probation and, if probable cause exists, notify the sentencing court and determine an appropriate plan to ensure the defendant's compliance with the conditions of probation. An appropriate plan may include:

(a) holding the defendant for a period of time up to 30 days, with credit for any time served from the time of the arrest to the time of the hearing to determine probable cause;

(b) a request to the court pursuant to 46-23-1011 to modify the defendant's terms or conditions of probation; or

(c) a notification to the court with jurisdiction over the defendant pursuant to 46-23-1013.

(5) The department shall adopt policies and procedures to implement a probation violator prison diversion program. If the department is able to sufficiently sanction a defendant with a term in a detention center as provided in subsection (4)(a) for a proven technical violation that could result in the revocation of a suspended or deferred sentence, the department may pay the expense of the detention center costs and pursue payment of costs by the defendant as provided in 7-32-2245. If the action plan developed for the defendant proceeds as provided in subsection (4)(b) or (4)(c), the expenses of the detention must be paid as provided in 7-32-2242." Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 493, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to offenders who are under the custody or supervision of the department of corrections on [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 505 in first sentence in (2) after "giving" inserted "the officer oral authorization and within 12 hours delivering to the place of detention" and in second sentence after "statement" inserted "or oral authorization", after "county" substituted "detention center" for "jail", and after "defendant" inserted "if the probation and parole officer delivers the written statement within 12 hours of the defendant's arrest"; inserted (4) authorizing probation and parole officer to hold arrested defendant without bail for 72 hours, providing for hearing, notification, and determination of appropriate plan, and outlining contents of appropriate plan; inserted (5) requiring department to adopt policies and procedures for probation violation prison diversion program and authorizing payment of detention center expenses; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

Case Notes

Arrest Limited to One Initiated Pursuant to Statutory Procedures: The Supreme Court construed the meaning of the term "arrest" as used in subsection (4) of this section to refer to one of two specific types of arrests a probation officer initiates pursuant to subsection (2): (1) a probation officer may ask the court to issue a warrant; or (2) the probation officer may arrest the probationer or may authorize a peace officer to arrest the probationer. Thus, in this case the state correctly followed statutory procedures when it filed a report of probation violations within 10 days of the probation officer's issuance of a warrant to arrest and hold the defendant. St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008).

Due Process in Probation Revocation Process Considered Constitutionally Adequate: The following procedures in 46-23-1012 provide adequate due process to an alleged probation violator: (1) the probation officer must file a report of violation within 10 days of the probationer's arrest; (2) the state must bring the probationer before a judge for a hearing on the charges without unnecessary delay after the report of violation is filed; and (3) the state must notify the probationer at the hearing of the alleged probation violations. St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008). See also St. v. Swan, 220 M 162, 713 P2d 1003 (1986).

District Court Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence for Parole Violation for Which Defendant Not Sanctioned or Punished: Martinez was given a 7-year suspended sentence for felony criminal endangerment, subject to 25 conditions, including a requirement that Martinez notify the probation officer upon a change of residence. Following numerous probation violations, three separate intervention hearings were held to address the violations. One of the probation officers subsequently recommended that Martinez be brought before the District Court for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court heard testimony from two probation officers regarding the repeated violations and revoked Martinez's suspended sentence. Martinez appealed on grounds that the probation officer lacked the statutory authority to seek sentence revocation for conduct addressed by the revocation hearings and contended that the revocation violated double jeopardy because it amounted to double punishment for violations addressed by the revocation hearings. The Supreme Court agreed that once a probation officer elects to pursue an intervention hearing under 46-23-1012(3), the officer cannot then also pursue a revocation hearing before the District Court for the same violation. However, Martinez's violation of the requirement to notify the probation officer upon a change of residence occurred after the third intervention hearing, and Martinez was not sanctioned or punished for that violation. That violation in itself was sufficient to support revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence, and even if the District Court considered the history of Martinez's violations in reaching its decision, the court did not abuse its discretion or exceed its statutory authority in revoking the sentence based on that violation alone. Additionally, no double jeopardy violation occurred when the sentence was revoked based on a violation for which Martinez was not previously sanctioned or punished. Thus, revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 M 394, 188 P3d 1034 (2008).

Untimely Hearing on Alleged Probation Violation — Not Considered in Postconviction Relief Proceeding When It Could Have Been Raised on Direct Appeal: Appellant's claim that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to revoke a suspended sentence following his arrest for another offense because he was not given a probation revocation hearing within 72 hours of his detention, as required by this section, did not raise a true jurisdictional question. The claim was more properly characterized as a claim that his sentence was illegal, which was a nonjurisdictional claim for purposes of postconviction relief statutes. Section 46-21-105 precludes postconviction relief on such a claim because appellant could have raised the claim on direct appeal. Sanders v. St., 2004 MT 374, 325 M 59, 103 P3d 1053 (2004).

Waiver of Constitutional Issues Related to No-Bond Hold by Failure to Object in Trial Court: Hendricks contended that his constitutional right to due process and the right against excessive bail were violated when he was held without bond for more than 72 hours in violation of this section. However, there was no factual record to support the allegations, nor did Hendricks object to the asserted constitutional violations at a revocation hearing or move to dismiss the proceedings. Failure to adequately raise the issue in District Court and to create a factual record constituted a waiver of objection and precluded review of the issue on appeal. Further, Hendricks' assertion of error in the District Court's reliance on hearsay testimony at the revocation hearing failed on the same grounds. St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 163, 316 M 296, 71 P3d 1212 (2003), following St. v. Azure, 2002 MT 22, 308 M 201, 41 P3d 899 (2002).

Dual Statutory Revocation Proceedings — Formal Revocation Proceedings Not Subject to Time and Procedural Requirements of Probation Violator Prison Diversion Program: This section authorizes two distinct methods of commencing revocation. One method is the formal proceeding outlined in 46-18-203 and subsection (1) of this section. The other method is an abbreviated proceeding initiated by detention by the probation and parole office, known as the probation violator prison diversion program, set forth in subsections (3) through (5) of this section, and the abbreviated proceeding may be converted to a formal revocation pursuant to subsection (5) of this section. The time and procedural requirements of the probation violator prison diversion program, as provided in subsections (3) through (5) of this section, do not apply to the formal proceeding initiated pursuant to 46-18-203 and subsection (1) of this section, which requires that an offender be brought before the court without unnecessary delay. Gonzales v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 259, 307 M 228, 37 P3d 653 (2001), followed in St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003).

No Entitlement to Probable Cause Hearing Upon Revocation of Parole Rather Than Probation — Goebel Clarified: Gundrum was arrested for a parole violation, and his parole was revoked. Gundrum contended that he was illegally restrained because he was not afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of his arrest as provided in this section and discussed in St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), and St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001). Gundrum cited the language in Goebel that this section applies to individuals whose "probation or parole" was revoked between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001. The Supreme Court held that the Goebel decision, as it related to parole revocation, was in error. Although this section applies to probation revocation, a separate statute, 46-23-1023, applies to parole revocation. There is no strict time period for a probable cause hearing related to a parole violation; rather, 46-23-1024 simply requires that a hearing be held within a reasonable time. Further, Goebel and Giddings both dealt with probation violations, and the Supreme Court declined to apply the same hearing requirements to parole violations. Gundrum's incarceration was legal. Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001).

No Power of State to Refile Petition to Revoke Suspended or Deferred Sentence Once Original Sentence Expires: Vance claimed that because a probable cause hearing was not held within 36 hours of arrest under a bench warrant for probation revocation, the provisions of St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001), should apply and the revocation proceedings should be rendered void. The state agreed that Giddings applied, but indicated that a petition for revocation of deferred sentence would be refiled pursuant to this section. Vance pointed out that the original deferred sentence had expired, and argued that the refiling of a petition for revocation of an expired sentence was prohibited under 46-18-203. The state contended that the reasoning in St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), implied that the original sentence was tolled during the period of the void proceedings for purposes of refiling a petition to revoke. The Supreme Court agreed with Vance. The fact that the previous revocation proceedings were defective and therefore void ab initio did not mean that time stood still during the defective proceedings, nor do Giddings and Goebel suspend the provisions of 46-18-203, which clearly state that the petition for revocation must be filed with the sentencing court during the period of suspension or deferral. Nothing in law allows the state to refile a revocation petition to relate back to the date of the probation violation, and once the term of the sentence expires, the state has no more power to refile to revoke the suspended or deferred sentence than it would have to file an original proceeding to revoke under those circumstances. Vance v. Acton, 2001 MT 243, 307 M 71, 36 P3d 881 (2001).

Retroactivity of New Judicial Rules and Judicial Interpretation — This Section (1999) Applied Retroactively to Parole Revocations Between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001: On April 26, 2001, the Supreme Court held that a probable cause hearing was mandatory only when an offender had been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. On May 4, 2001, Goebel petitioned the court to look beyond the plain language of this section and hold that the probable cause hearing was mandatory only when an offender has been arrested by a probation officer rather than pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Effective May 1, 2001, the Legislature amended this section to delete the requirement for a probable cause hearing. On May 9, 2001, Giddings filed a petition for rehearing, asking the court to direct the District Court to dismiss the petition to revoke Giddings' suspended sentence on grounds that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to revoke the suspended sentence because of the amendment to this section, contending that application of the new statute would violate the constitutional ban on ex post facto legislation. The Supreme Court declined to modify the decision in either Goebel or Giddings because no material fact or question decisive of the cases themselves was overlooked and the decisions did not conflict with any express statute or controlling decision. However, the court did discuss the retroactive application of judicial rules of criminal procedure and the judicial interpretation of a statute, as well as the claim that the retroactive application of this section was a violation of the ex post facto clause. Citing Rivers v. Roadway Express, 511 US 298 (1994), the court held that a court's interpretation of a statute is never new law because the decision declares what the statute meant from the day of its enactment, not from the date of the decision. In determining whether a statute violates the ex post facto clause, the court referred to the test in St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453 (2000), which provided that to be in violation of the clause, a statute must be retrospective and must disadvantage the offender affected by it. In this case, Giddings was not disadvantaged because the statutory change did not alter the definition of or punishment for the probation violation that Giddings was charged with. Further, the error that was the basis for reversal of Giddings' case was jurisdictional, so all proceedings in the District Court were void ab initio, and the state was entitled to proceed anew, following the procedure outlined in the newly amended version of this section. The Supreme Court's decisions based on the 1999 version of this section were applicable retroactively to persons whose probation or parole was revoked between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001. Thus, if a person was arrested during that period pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge and was not afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of arrest, then the District Court did not have jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing, so the state could refile the petition to revoke the person's probation pursuant to the 2001 version of this section, as long as the probationer was still under the custody or supervision of the Department of Corrections on May 1, 2001. If the person was afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of arrest, then the District Court did have jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing. St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 155, 306 M 83, 31 P3d 340 (2001), followed in St. v. Finley, 2003 MT 239, 317 M 268, 77 P3d 193 (2003), and St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Erroneous Dismissal of Petition to Revoke Sentence Based on Failure to Hold Timely Hearing: Under this section, there are two ways that an offender can come into custody for allegations of a probation violation. The first is when a judge issues a warrant for the offender's arrest, and the second is when the offender is arrested by a probation or parole officer or when a probation or parole officer authorizes a law enforcement officer to make the arrest. In this case, Goebel was arrested by a probation and parole officer. Prior to the 2001 amendments, the second sentence of subsection (4) of this section read: "After the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection, a hearings officer for the probation and parole bureau shall hold a hearing within 36 hours of the defendant's arrest" (emphasis added). Goebel contended before the District Court that the petition to revoke his suspended sentence should be dismissed because the state did not hold a hearing within 36 hours of his arrest. The court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the state argued that the 1999 amendments to subsection (4) of this section mandated a hearing only in the case of violators who are arrested pursuant to a warrant and that the Legislature left to the discretion of the Probation and Parole Bureau the decision of whether to hold a hearing for every other violator, while Goebel maintained that the phrase "pursuant to this subsection" required the Bureau to hold a hearing in every case of alleged parole violation before proceeding under 46-23-1013 (now repealed). The Supreme Court found the statutory language in subsection (4) to be clear and unambiguous and contrary to the assertions of both parties. Because a defendant may be arrested only under the provisions of subsections (1) and (2), the phrase "after the arrest of the defendant pursuant to this subsection" could not refer to the entirety of this section, as Goebel contended, nor could it refer only to subsection (4), as the state contended. Rather, the court held that "this subsection" related back to the reference in the previous sentence to subsection (1), which allows a judge to issue a warrant or notice to appear, so a probable cause hearing by the Probation and Parole Bureau is mandatory only when an offender has been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Because Goebel was not arrested pursuant to a warrant, the 36-hour rule did not apply. Despite the fact that the Supreme Court found the statute clear and unambiguous, it pointed out that this interpretation rendered the statute illogical because probable cause must be shown before a warrant is issued. It makes little sense to require a second probable cause hearing, while common sense would dictate that there should be a reasonably prompt probable cause hearing when an arrest is made without a warrant. Rather than examine the legislative history to discern the Legislature's intent in using the particular language, the court ascribed the confusion to a legislative drafting error and left correction of the language to the Legislature. St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), clarified in Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001), in which it was held that the 36-hour requirement for a probable cause hearing applies only to probation revocation proceedings under this section and not to parole revocation proceedings under 46-23-1023, and followed in St. v. Johnson, 2001 MT 277, 307 M 317, 37 P3d 701 (2001).

Probable Cause Hearing Required When Offender Arrested Pursuant to Warrant — Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction When Timely Hearing Not Held: Giddings was arrested August 1 on a probation violation warrant issued by his probation officer. The next day while he was still detained, the District Court issued a warrant for his arrest based on the earlier petition to revoke his suspended sentence. A hearing on the petition was held on November 10, Giddings' suspended sentence was subsequently revoked, and he was sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 4 years. Giddings argued on appeal that pursuant to this section as it read prior to the 2001 amendments, the Probation and Parole Bureau was required to hold a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of his arrest and that because no such hearing was held, the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to hold a revocation hearing 3 months later regarding the technical violations of probation alleged in the probation violation report. The state contended that a probable cause hearing is required only when the probationer is dealt with administratively through the probation violator prison diversion program described in subsection (4) of this section as it read prior to the 2001 amendments and that an administrative probable cause hearing is not required when a probationer is arrested on a bench warrant and is processed through the judicial system. The Supreme Court reversed, applying St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), in holding that a hearing by the Probation and Parole Bureau under subsection (4) of this section as it read prior to the 2001 amendments is mandatory within 36 hours when an offender has been arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by a judge. Because the probable cause hearing was never held, the District Court lacked jurisdiction to hold its revocation hearing later. St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001), clarified in Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001), in which it was held that the 36-hour requirement for a probable cause hearing applies only to probation revocation proceedings under this section and not to parole revocation proceedings under 46-23-1023.

Arrest Without Written Authority — Suppression of Evidence: An arrest by a Montana law enforcement officer for violation of the terms of probation must be in accordance with this section. The police officer arrested the probationer in violation of this section when the arrest was for a probation violation and the police officer did not have written authority to arrest from the probation officer. Assuming that probation violation is a criminal offense and that the police officer had probable cause to arrest for violation of probation, the arrest was not proper under 46-6-311 because existing circumstances did not require an immediate arrest. The gun seized in defendant's bedroom after the arrest was suppressed as evidence in the federal prosecution for violation of 18 U.S.C. 922(g)(1), which prohibits possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. U.S. v. Shepard, 21 F3d 933 (9th Cir. 1994).

Failure to Appear for Probation Officer-Ordered Urine Sample — Minimal Grounds Required to Order Testing: It was error for the District Court to dismiss a petition for revocation of suspended sentence based on the defendant's failure to appear for purposes of providing a urine sample because the probation officer did not have some articulable reasons for requesting the test. Under the standard established in St. v. Burke, 235 M 165, 766 P2d 254, 45 St. Rep. 2278 (1988), the Supreme Court held that a probation officer's opinion that rehabilitation could not begin until the defendant was free of drugs and the fact that the defendant had not passed a drug test since his arrest constituted sufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds for requiring a urine sample. St. v. Sigler, 236 M 137, 769 P2d 703, 46 St. Rep. 244 (1989).

Admission of Parole Violation — Hospital Detention Not Unlawful: Defendant was admitted to the hospital the day after he confessed to a parole violation. While in the hospital, he was informed that he was not free to leave and would be arrested upon release. Defendant's admission of a parole violation constituted probable cause to detain him, and the hospital detention was not unlawful. Because defendant had already been convicted and was on probation, any presumption of innocence was gone. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Probation Violator Subject to Provisions Regarding Release on Bail: A person who has been convicted, sentenced, and placed on probation and who has violated probation is subject to the provisions regarding release on bail. The provisions of 46-20-204, providing for a stay of execution and relief pending appeal of original conviction, do not apply. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

No Preliminary or Probable Cause Hearing — Due Process: Defendant was not denied due process for the state's failure to provide an appearance denominated as a preliminary or probable cause hearing prior to a probation revocation hearing. After a defendant is arrested for violation of probation, he is brought before the court without unnecessary delay for a hearing on the violations charged. No two-stage hearing process is necessary under this statutory system because the reasons for having a preliminary hearing are absent. The revocation hearing is held promptly, before a defendant is returned to prison. The defendant receives notice of the hearing and alleged violations, and the hearing is held before a judge, rather than an administrative body. Section 46-23-1013 (now repealed) sets forth the procedure to follow after the arrest of a probationer for violation of probation. Because the scheme affords due process, the statute is not an unconstitutional violation of due process. St. v. Swan, 220 M 162, 713 P2d 1003, 43 St. Rep. 259 (1986). See also St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Preliminary Hearing Not Required to Establish Probable Cause: Where probation was revoked by original sentencing judge, petitioner was not denied minimum standards of due process as petitioner was not arrested until a bench warrant was issued pursuant to the final order of revocation after a hearing at which petitioner was represented at every step by counsel. Where no detention is involved, a preliminary hearing to establish probable cause for filing a petition for imposition of final judgment and sentence is not necessary as no rights of the probationer have been violated. In re Meidinger, 168 M 7, 539 P2d 1185 (1975). See also St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989).

Parole Violation: This section does not require parolee to be taken before court for complete hearing on parole violation but provides only for persons on probation or on suspended sentence. Petition of Spurlock, 153 M 475, 458 P2d 80 (1969).

Subsequent Arrest for Violation: When petitioner was placed on probation for 1 year on conditions aimed at rehabilitating him, subsequent imposition of judgment after he violated his probation did not put him in jeopardy in violation of the federal or Montana Constitution. In re Williams' Petition, 145 M 45, 399 P2d 732 (1965).

Commencement of Sentence: When relator was sentenced to 4 years' confinement and the execution of the sentence was then suspended, which suspension was later revoked, the sentence commenced to run for all purposes on the date when judgment of conviction was entered. Any time between the imposition of the suspended sentence and its revocation should have been credited to the relator and failure to do so resulted in his illegal confinement. State ex rel. Wetzel v. Ellsworth, 143 M 54, 387 P2d 442 (1963).

Case Notes

Breach of Intervention Agreement — Issue Preclusion Applicable: McDaniel was sentenced to 20 years for burglary, with the sentence suspended subject to several conditions. About 4 months after sentencing, McDaniel tested positive for drugs, and the probation officer elected to initiate an intervention hearing, where an agreement was entered into in lieu of a formal violation being filed. Upon learning of the intervention hearing, the County Attorney filed a petition to revoke McDaniel's suspended sentence based on McDaniel's drug use. McDaniel moved for partial summary judgment on grounds that the intervention hearing agreement constituted a final adjudication of the probation violation and a binding contract and that the state was barred from relitigating the issue. The District Court denied the motion, McDaniel appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. McDaniel and the state, acting through the Department of Corrections, entered a valid binding contract that precluded filing of a formal violation, and the state breached the contract by filing the revocation petition. Additionally, the elements of issue preclusion were satisfied with respect to the state's liability on the breach of contract claim, including the state's opportunity to argue liability, so absent any genuine issue of material fact, McDaniel was entitled to partial summary judgment on the breach of contract claim. McDaniel v. St., 2009 MT 159, 350 M 422, 208 P3d 817 (2009), following Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006).

No State Prosecutorial Immunity for Actions of County Attorney: McDaniel was sentenced to 20 years for burglary, with the sentence suspended subject to several conditions. About 4 months after sentencing, McDaniel tested positive for drugs, and the probation officer elected to initiate an intervention hearing, where an agreement was entered into in lieu of a formal violation being filed. Upon learning of the intervention hearing, the County Attorney filed a petition to revoke McDaniel's suspended sentence based on McDaniel's drug use. McDaniel moved to dismiss on grounds that in filing the revocation petition, the state breached the agreement. The District Court granted McDaniel's motions, and the revocation petition was dismissed. McDaniel subsequently filed an action against the state for damages, claiming that the state breached the written agreement and deprived McDaniel of property in violation of due process. The state asserted that because the County Attorney was acting within the scope of his duties as an agent of the state when filing the revocation petition, the state was entitled to prosecutorial immunity. The District Court agreed and granted the state's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the state contended that prosecutorial immunity should be extended to include county and state governments employing prosecutors who are named as defendants in tort actions. However, for the state to extend the County Attorney's immunity to itself, the state must establish that the County Attorney could raise prosecutorial immunity as a defense if the claims were brought against the County Attorney rather than the state. Here, the County Attorney was not a party to the intervention agreement, so there was no factual or legal basis for McDaniel to bring a contract-based claim against the County Attorney, and absent a basis for the prosecutor to assert prosecutorial immunity, there was no basis for the state to extend immunity to itself. The Legislature intended to waive state immunity as to express contracts, so it was incongruous for the state to assert immunity as a defense to the alleged contract violation. The Supreme Court reversed. McDaniel v. St., 2009 MT 159, 350 M 422, 208 P3d 817 (2009).

District Court Authority to Revoke Suspended Sentence for Parole Violation for Which Defendant Not Sanctioned or Punished: Martinez was given a 7-year suspended sentence for felony criminal endangerment, subject to 25 conditions, including a requirement that Martinez notify the probation officer upon a change of residence. Following numerous probation violations, three separate intervention hearings were held to address the violations. One of the probation officers subsequently recommended that Martinez be brought before the District Court for revocation of the suspended sentence. The District Court heard testimony from two probation officers regarding the repeated violations and revoked Martinez's suspended sentence. Martinez appealed on grounds that the probation officer lacked the statutory authority to seek sentence revocation for conduct addressed by the revocation hearings and contended that the revocation violated double jeopardy because it amounted to double punishment for violations addressed by the revocation hearings. The Supreme Court agreed that once a probation officer elects to pursue an intervention hearing under 46-23-1012(3), the officer cannot then also pursue a revocation hearing before the District Court for the same violation. However, Martinez's violation of the requirement to notify the probation officer upon a change of residence occurred after the third intervention hearing, and Martinez was not sanctioned or punished for that violation. That violation in itself was sufficient to support revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence, and even if the District Court considered the history of Martinez's violations in reaching its decision, the court did not abuse its discretion or exceed its statutory authority in revoking the sentence based on that violation alone. Additionally, no double jeopardy violation occurred when the sentence was revoked based on a violation for which Martinez was not previously sanctioned or punished. Thus, revocation of Martinez's suspended sentence was affirmed. St. v. Martinez, 2008 MT 233, 344 M 394, 188 P3d 1034 (2008).

Parole Officer Duty of Care to Supervise Parolees — Jury Instruction Properly Given: Corliss was paroled, after serving time for an execution-style slaying with a handgun, under the condition that he not possess a firearm. While on a visit, with the approval of his parole officer, to Washington state to look for work, Corliss failed to return to Montana within the established time, failed to see a parole officer in Washington, had a temporary restraining order obtained against him by a girlfriend because of threats made to her and her family, and had an altercation with his wife involving a handgun. In neither instance of violence did Corliss's parole officer investigate the circumstances of the violence. Later, Corliss shot and killed one friend of his girlfriend and injured another. Both the estates of the deceased woman and the wounded woman brought actions against the state for negligent supervision of Corliss's parole. The state objected to an instruction given by the District Court concerning a parole officer's duty of care, claiming that there must be some special relationship between the parole officer and the person injured by a parolee in order for a duty of care to arise. The Supreme Court reviewed statutes defining negligence, statutes describing the general duty of one individual toward another, and statutes concerning parole and concluded that Robbins had a general duty to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of Corliss and had a duty to the killed and injured women in particular. Starkenburg v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Erroneous Parole Revocation: Given the issue of whether a parolee who, after a full revocation hearing, had been found by the Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) not to have violated his parole could nevertheless be confined pending submission of an acceptable new parole plan, the Supreme Court held that the parolee must be released within 30 days from the decision and that the Board was under a duty to develop and approve a parole plan within that period. No Entitlement to Probable Cause Hearing Upon Revocation of Parole Rather Than Probation — Goebel Clarified: Gundrum was arrested for a parole violation, and his parole was revoked. Gundrum contended that he was illegally restrained because he was not afforded a probable cause hearing within 36 hours of his arrest as provided in 46-23-1012 and discussed in St. v. Goebel, 2001 MT 73, 305 M 53, 31 P3d 335 (2001), and St. v. Giddings, 2001 MT 76, 305 M 74, 29 P3d 475 (2001). Gundrum cited the language in Goebel that 46-23-1012 applies to individuals whose "probation or parole" was revoked between April 28, 1999, and May 1, 2001. The Supreme Court held that the Goebel decision, as it related to parole revocation, was in error. Although 46-23-1012 applies to probation revocation, this section applies to parole revocation. There is no strict time period for a probable cause hearing related to a parole violation; rather, 46-23-1024 simply requires that a hearing be held within a reasonable time. Further, Goebel and Giddings both dealt with probation violations, and the Supreme Court declined to apply the same hearing requirements to parole violations. Gundrum's incarceration was legal. Gundrum v. Mahoney, 2001 MT 246, 307 M 96, 36 P3d 890 (2001).

Revocation of Suspension of Part of Sentence While Nonsuspended Part Being Served: The District Court had authority to revoke suspension of part of a sentence when, prior to having begun to serve the suspended part, the prisoner was released on parole before serving the whole of the nonsuspended part of the sentence and violated conditions of probation relating to the suspended part. Case Notes

"No Contact" Agreement Construed: A probation agreement stated: "You will have no contact with the victim of this offense or her family." Defendant claimed that because the victim made contact with him, rather than vice versa, he did not violate probation. Defendant misconstrued the agreement, and his contacts with the victim constituted a probation violation. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Parole Violation — Evidence Not Within Scope of Appeal Properly Excluded: Defendant convicted of parole violation contended that tape recordings, which might have shown distress and suicidal tendencies, were useful in his development of a defense of "duress" and "necessity". However, admission of the evidence was properly denied because it was cumulative and irrelevant to the issue of parole violation and revocation of his suspended sentence. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Revocation of Suspended Portion of Sentence — No Due Process Violation: Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault and sexual intercourse without consent and was sentenced to a term of 40 years in the Montana State Prison. The sentence review board modified the sentence to 40 years with 20 years suspended provided that the defendant successfully complete a sex treatment program. Upon defendant's failure to complete the program, the District Court, following four hearings, ordered the original 40-year sentence to be reinstated. Defendant appealed, alleging due process violations for failure to follow parole and probation revocation procedures. The Supreme Court, in affirming the revocation, ruled that the right to a speedy trial, while guaranteed in criminal prosecutions, is not applicable in revocation of probation proceedings and that no preliminary hearing is required before a revocation proceeding when detention is not involved. St. v. Friedman, 225 M 373, 732 P2d 1322, 44 St. Rep. 313 (1987). See also St. v. Stangeland, 233 M 230, 758 P2d 776, 45 St. Rep. 1446 (1988).

Revocation of Parole Without Preliminary On-Site Hearing or Counsel at Final Hearing: The Supreme Court held that a preliminary on-site hearing was not necessary in this situation. The purpose of an on-site hearing is to "determine whether there is probable cause or reasonable ground to believe that the arrested parolee has committed acts that would constitute a violation of parole conditions. Cf. Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 US 267". In this case, defendant's presence in another state clearly established probable cause that defendant had violated his parole. Not only was he not supposed to be outside of Montana, he was not supposed to be away from Galen State Hospital. He would have had no mitigating circumstances of misunderstanding to voice at an on-site hearing. At a final parole revocation hearing defendant had no constitutional right to counsel. Owens v. Risley, 217 M 35, 702 P2d 1, 42 St. Rep. 1000 (1985).

Admissibility of Suppressed Evidence: Evidence of drugs seized in a search conducted under a defective warrant, although not admissible in prosecution for possession of the drugs, was properly considered in hearing on revocation of parole. St. v. Thorsness, 165 M 321, 528 P2d 692 (1974).

Appointment of Counsel Not Required: Under this section, a parole violator is required to be brought before board for hearing, but court hearing is not required; the parole violator does not have constitutional right but has statutory right to an attorney at parole revocation hearing, and board is not required to furnish parolee an attorney during such hearing. Petition of Wing, 154 M 501, 464 P2d 302 (1969).

Promptness of Hearing: When 5-month delay by parole board (now Board of Pardons and Parole) was seemingly caused by parolee being in hospital, requirement under this section that hearing be "prompt" was not violated. Petition of Spurlock, 153 M 475, 458 P2d 80 (1969).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 559 throughout section substituted "hearing panel" for references to board; in (2) in second sentence after "parole" deleted "or conditional release"; in (4) near beginning substituted "the hearing panel determines" for "it appears" and after "prisoner's" substituted "return to the custody of Montana law enforcement, the department, or the department's agent" for "arrest"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Case Notes

No Standing to Raise Constitutionality of Restitution Statutes Absent Showing of Direct Personal Injury: The 2003 Legislature amended the state restitution statutes, and Thaut sought to challenge the constitutionality of the amendments on numerous grounds. However, Thaut was unable to show a direct personal injury resulting from application of the restitution laws. Pursuant to St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298 (1990), and Helena Parents Comm'n v. Lewis & Clark County Comm'rs, 277 M 367, 922 P2d 1140 (1996), Thaut lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the restitution statutes, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue. St. v. Thaut, 2004 MT 359, 324 M 460, 103 P3d 1012 (2004). See also St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), in which defendant established direct economic injury and thus standing to challenge the constitutionality of repayment conditions on equal protection grounds through the District Court's order to repay $2,398 in costs of appointed counsel.

Revocation of Parole Without Preliminary On-Site Hearing or Counsel at Final Hearing: The Supreme Court held that a preliminary on-site hearing was not necessary in this situation. The purpose of an on-site hearing is to "determine whether there is probable cause or reasonable ground to believe that the arrested parolee has committed acts that would constitute a violation of parole conditions. Cf. Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 US 267". In this case, defendant's presence in another state clearly established probable cause that defendant had violated his parole. Not only was he not supposed to be outside of Montana, he was not supposed to be away from Galen State Hospital. He would have had no mitigating circumstances of misunderstanding to voice at an on-site hearing. At a final parole revocation hearing defendant had no constitutional right to counsel. Owens v. Risley, 217 M 35, 702 P2d 1, 42 St. Rep. 1000 (1985).

Admissibility of Suppressed Evidence: Evidence of drugs seized in a search conducted under a defective warrant, although not admissible in prosecution for possession of the drugs, was properly considered in hearing on revocation of parole. St. v. Thorsness, 165 M 321, 528 P2d 692 (1974).

Appointment of Counsel Not Required: Under this section, a parole violator is required to be brought before board for hearing, but court hearing is not required; the parole violator does not have constitutional right but has statutory right to an attorney at parole revocation hearing, and board is not required to furnish parolee an attorney during such hearing. Petition of Wing, 154 M 501, 464 P2d 302 (1969).

Promptness of Hearing: When 5-month delay by parole board (now Board of Pardons and Parole) was seemingly caused by parolee being in hospital, requirement under this section that hearing be "prompt" was not violated. Petition of Spurlock, 153 M 475, 458 P2d 80 (1969).

Attorney General's Opinions

Use of Less Than Full Board for Parole Revocation Hearings: The Board of Pardons (now Board of Pardons and Parole) may conduct parole revocation hearings using a single member designated by the board chairman if the full board makes that examiner's decision final, and the single member's decision may be appealed by the offender at a new hearing before the full board. 37 A.G. Op. 23 (1977).

2005 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Section 6, Ch. 360, L. 2005, a coordination section, provided that if House Bill No. 288 is passed and approved and if it amends 46-23-1031, then [section 3 of this act], amending 46-23-1031, is void and 46-23-1031 must be amended as follows: in (1)(a)(i) after "pay to the" substituted "department" for "clerk of the district court that has jurisdiction over the person during the person's supervision"; inserted (1)(a)(ii) requiring payment of a supervisory fee by a person under continuous satellite-based monitoring; in (1)(c) near middle after "subsection (1)(a)" inserted "or (1)(b)"; in (2)(b) at beginning substituted "The department" for "Prior to July 1, 2003, district court clerks shall deduct from the total supervisory fees collected pursuant to subsection (1) the administrative cost of collecting and accounting for the fees and shall deposit the remaining amount into the state special revenue account established in subsection (2)(a). After June 30, 2003, district court clerks" and at end after "subsection (2)(a)" deleted "as specified by the supreme court administrator"; and made minor changes in style. House Bill No. 288 was approved as Ch. 473, L. 2005. Section 3, Ch. 473, L. 2005, amended sec. 8, Ch. 360, L. 2005, to provide that this amendment is effective October 1, 2005.

Chapter 473 in (1)(a)(i) after "shall pay to" substituted "the department" for "the clerk of the district court that has jurisdiction over the person during the person's supervision"; and in (2)(b) deleted former first sentence that read: "Prior to July 1, 2003, district court clerks shall deduct from the total supervisory fees collected pursuant to subsection (1) the administrative cost of collecting and accounting for the fees and shall deposit the remaining amount into the state special revenue account established in subsection (2)(a)" and at beginning substituted "The department" for "After June 30, 2003, district court clerks" and at end deleted "as specified by the supreme court administrator". Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 360, L. 2005, provided: "WHEREAS, the United States Department of Justice has published confirmed statistics that over 60% of serious and violent offenders in state prisons have a history of prior convictions and that the number of prisoners convicted for violent sexual assault has increased by an annual rate of 15% each year since 1980; and

WHEREAS, criminals who commit sexual and violent crimes have shown unusually high recidivism rates, thereby posing an unacceptable level of risk to the community; and

WHEREAS, intensive supervision of sexual or violent offenders is a crucial element to both the rehabilitation of the released convicts and the safety of the surrounding community; and

WHEREAS, mature technological solutions now exist to provide improved supervision and behavioral control of sexual or violent offenders following their release; and

WHEREAS, these solutions can now also provide law enforcement and correctional professionals with significant new tools for electronic correlation of the constantly updated geographical location of supervised sexual or violent offenders following their release with the geographic location of reported crimes, both to possibly link released offenders to crimes or to possibly exclude released offenders from ongoing criminal investigations; and

WHEREAS, continuous 24-hour-a-day, 7-day-a-week electronic monitoring of those convicted of sexual offenses is a valuable and reasonable requirement for those convicts who are placed on probation, who failed to register as sexual or violent offenders as required by law, or who have been released from incarceration while they remain under the active supervision of the state."

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 360, L. 2005, was a severability clause.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 386 in (1)(a) near beginning of first sentence after "parolee" inserted "or person committed to the department who is supervised by the department under intensive supervision or conditional release" and after "pay" inserted "to the clerk of the district court that has jurisdiction over the person during the person's supervision", inserted second sentence providing for a $50 transfer processing fee, and at beginning of third sentence after "The" substituted "interstate transfer fees required by this subsection" for "fee" and at end after "collected by the" substituted "department" for "clerk of the district court with jurisdiction during the probationer's or parolee's period of supervision under this part"; in (1)(b) at beginning after "court" inserted "department", after "fee" inserted "required by subsection (1)(a)", near middle after "payment of the" inserted "supervisory", and near end after "cause the" substituted "person" for "probationer or parolee"; in (2)(b) near beginning of first sentence after "total" inserted "supervisory" and in second sentence after "deposit the" substituted "total supervisory fees collected pursuant to subsection (1)" for "fees"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 17, 2003.

2002 Amendment: Chapter 13 in (2)(b)(i) at beginning inserted "Prior to July 1, 2003"; inserted (2)(b)(ii) relating to deposit as specified by the supreme court administrator; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective August 16, 2002.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 505 in (1)(a) after "fee" substituted "of no less than $120 a year and no more than $360 a year" for "of $120 a year" and after "prorated at" inserted "no less than". Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

Case Notes

No Error in Allowing Parole Officer to Set Restitution Schedule — Refusal to Waive Administrative Fees Proper: Denham contended that it was error for the sentencing court to delegate the scheduling of monthly restitution payments to a parole officer because the version of 46-18-244 in effect at the time of the crime did not provide for that delegation of authority. The Supreme Court held that the amendments to the statute were purely procedural and did not constitute retroactive legislation, impair Denham's rights, or impose additional duties on Denham, so allowing the parole officer to set the restitution schedule was not error. Denham also appealed the $60,099 restitution and the 10% administrative fee and minimal surcharges. However, Denham assured the court at sentencing of his ability to pay the restitution amount, so it was reasonable to assume that he also had the ability to pay the administrative fee and surcharges. The sentencing court was affirmed. St. v. Denham, 2005 MT 26, 326 M 24, 107 P3d 1263 (2005).

Extra Conditions in Sentencing Order Not Mentioned in Oral Sentence Stricken: The District Court that sentenced Waters imposed two extra conditions in the sentencing order that were not contained in the plea agreement or presentence investigation or contained in the oral sentence: (1) payment of supervision fees; and (2) submission to Texas authorities. Pursuant to St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9, 55 St. Rep. 311 (1998), the oral pronouncement controls. Thus, Waters contended that only the conditions contained in the oral sentence could be imposed. The Supreme Court clarified Lane, noting that Waters was on notice of the conditions in the plea agreement and presentence investigation and that those terms applied despite the ambiguous sentencing conditions that were imposed orally. However, the court remanded for an amendment of the written sentence to strike the submission to Texas authorities, which was never mentioned, and to strike the payment of supervision fees as well, unless it was determined that payment of the fees would not impose a significant hardship on Waters, pursuant to this section. St. v. Waters, 1999 MT 229, 296 M 101, 987 P2d 1142, 56 St. Rep. 901 (1999), followed in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 290, 302 M 265, 14 P3d 480, 57 St. Rep. 1225 (2000).

Parolee and Probationer Supervision Fee Not Violative of Ex Post Facto Restriction: Frazier asserted that because he was sentenced prior to the enactment of this section, the supervisory fee assessed in that section against parolees and probationers could not be retroactively applied to him or other parolees and probationers similarly situated. For a criminal or penal statute to be ex post facto, it must: (1) be retrospective, applying to events occurring before its enactment; and (2) disadvantage the affected offender. A civil sanction will implicate ex post facto concerns only if it can be fairly characterized as punishment. The legislative history of this section indicated that the supervisory fee was assessed to help defray the costs of supervision and to hold parolees and probationers accountable, rather than to punish. Because the fee is administrative rather than punitive, it does not violate the prohibition against ex post facto laws. Frazier v. Dept. of Corrections, 277 M 82, 920 P2d 93, 53 St. Rep. 551 (1996), distinguishing St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97 (1992).

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Governmental Entity Liable for Tortious Acts of Contractor Transporting Prisoners: Paull was a prisoner who was injured in an auto accident while being extradited to Park County by a private prisoner transportation service. The District Court summarily dismissed Paull's tort claim against the state and county for his injuries after the state and county argued that they owed Paull no actionable duty because the injuries were inflicted by the transportation company or its employees and that Paull's injuries were not foreseeable. The court concluded that the state owed Paull no duty because the state had no contractual or agency relationship with the company and that the county had no duty because a contractor-independent contractor relationship existed between the county and the company. Paull appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The court first addressed the county's liability, considering whether the county had a contractor-independent contractor relationship with the company. Under Beckman v. Butte-Silver Bow County, 2000 MT 112, 299 M 389, 1 P3d 348 (2000), an exception to the general rule that contractors are not liable for torts of their independent contractors applies if the activity is inherently or intrinsically dangerous. The District Court found that the activity in question was driving, which commonly is not an inherently dangerous activity, so the Beckman exception did not apply. The Supreme Court disagreed. Transportation of prisoners is more than just driving and is an inherently dangerous activity; therefore, under Beckman, a county or other governmental entity that contracts to have prisoners transported by an independent contractor may be held vicariously liable for injuries caused by the contractor. Any claim must still be established under the ordinary rules of negligence, requiring proof of the existence of a legal duty on the part of the contractor, breach of duty, causation, and damages. A contractor is not liable for every tort by an independent contractor engaged in inherently dangerous work, but only those torts that arise from risks caused by engaging in the dangerous activity. Here, the risk of driver misconduct was an inherent danger in the transportation of prisoners and part of the peculiar risk of harm arising from that activity. Likewise, the state had a duty to exercise ordinary care in returning Paull to Montana for probation revocation proceedings. Although the state was not strictly liable for any injury during prisoner transportation regardless of fault, the state may be held liable for tortious acts or omissions of its agents undertaking prisoner transportation if the state allows other entities to do the work. Because the acts or omissions of the transportation company for which the state or county might be liable were yet to be determined, summary judgment was inappropriate, and the case was remanded for further proceedings. Paull v. Park County, 2009 MT 321, 352 M 465, 218 P3d 1198 (2009).

Failure to Conduct Preliminary Onsite Hearing in Extradition Case — No Due Process Violation: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision (now repealed and replaced with 46-23-1115), supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. Hardy pleaded no contest to the Utah offenses. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that there was a violation of his due process rights in not receiving a preliminary hearing upon his return to Montana, that his Montana probation officer wrongly informed him that his probation would not be revoked for misdemeanor convictions, and that he was improperly denied credit for his street time while on probation in Utah. In this case, a preliminary onsite hearing would have contributed nothing to a determination of whether Hardy had violated his probation. As evidenced by his no contest pleas and admissions, Hardy indisputably violated the conditions of his probation. A preliminary onsite hearing would not have led to any other finding. Failure to provide Hardy with a hearing did not prejudice his substantial rights. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Representations of Parole Violations by Parole Officer Not Clearly Erroneous — Revocation Proceeding Not Estopped: In 1989, Hardy pleaded guilty to four counts of burglary and was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 10 years in prison with 9 years suspended. In 1990, Hardy was released on probation to serve the suspended portion of his sentence, and pursuant to the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision (now repealed and replaced with 46-23-1115), supervision of his parole was transferred to Utah. While in Utah, Hardy committed other crimes, and Utah refused to continue parole supervision. Hardy pleaded no contest to the Utah offenses. After judgment and sentencing in Utah, Hardy was extradited back to Montana where his suspended sentence was revoked, he was sentenced to four concurrent terms of 9 years in prison, and he was not given credit for the 2 years he spent on probation in Utah. Hardy contended that his Montana probation officer wrongly informed him that his probation would not be revoked for misdemeanor convictions and that his probation should thus not have been revoked. The Supreme Court noted that Montana did not participate in plea negotiations between Hardy and the State of Utah and that Hardy knowingly, voluntarily, and with assistance of counsel entered into a no contest plea agreement. The representations to Hardy by his Montana parole officer were not clearly erroneous. The court's conclusion that Montana was not estopped from proceeding with revocation based on the parole officer's representations was correct. St. v. Hardy, 278 M 516, 926 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 998 (1996).

Interstate Probation — Retaking Violator — Hearing Not Always Required: Montana probationer who had been transferred to Idaho was arrested for assault and then transferred back to Montana, where his probation was revoked after a hearing. He petitioned the Supreme Court for a Writ of Habeas Corpus on the grounds that he had been denied due process because he was not given a preliminary hearing in Idaho. The Supreme Court held that he had not been denied due process and that he was not entitled to a preliminary onsite hearing because he did not have a liberty interest at the time of the revocation proceedings since he was under lawful arrest in Idaho at the time. St. v. Howell, 222 M 136, 720 P2d 1174, 43 St. Rep. 1119 (1986).

Insufficient Evidence — Remand for Evidentiary Hearing: While working in North Dakota on the recommendation of his Montana probation officer, defendant whose Montana sentence had been suspended pleaded guilty to North Dakota charges of driving under the influence, no driver's license, and escape from lawful custody. He was returned to Montana and his suspended sentence was revoked. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing because: (1) it was not clear from the record whether his right to due process was violated; (2) there may have been a plea bargain consented to by Montana in which North Dakota stated there would be no recommendation of probation violation if defendant pleaded guilty; and (3) there was insufficient evidence, in view of unresolved fact issues, to support the revocation. St. v. Monteith, 216 M 413, 701 P2d 993, 42 St. Rep. 911 (1985).

Revocation of Parole: When an individual's parole revocation failed to meet the statutory requirements of 46-23-1101 through 46-23-1106 (all now repealed and replaced with 46-23-1115) and the requirements of Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 US 471, 33 L Ed 2d 484, 92 S Ct 2593 (1972), the individual's parole must be reinstated. Fisher v. Crist, 182 M 124, 594 P2d 1140 (1979).

Waiver of Hearing: The failure to demand an onsite hearing cannot be construed to be a waiver of that right. Fisher v. Crist, 182 M 124, 594 P2d 1140 (1979).

Constitutionality: Requirement that parolee sign waiver of extradition before release to another state was not unconstitutional, and parolee could be detained for parole violation by unauthorized departure from the host state. In re Petition of Schwartz, 154 M 505, 463 P2d 316 (1970), certiorari denied, 398 US 913, 26 L Ed 2d 75, 90 S Ct 1713 (1970).

Return of Parolee Without Extradition: Parolee's rights under United States Constitution were not violated when parolee was returned to state from Oregon for parole violations without resort to extradition and, even if constitutional right was involved, it was waived by parolee's agreement with state wherein, as condition of parole, he waived certain rights. In re Petition of Dixson, 149 M 412, 430 P2d 642 (1967).

TREATMENT OF VICTIMS AND WITNESSES

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble to Ch. 554, L. 1985, which enacted this chapter, provided:

"WHEREAS, without the cooperation of victims and witnesses, the criminal justice system would cease to function; yet with some exceptions, these individuals are either ignored by the criminal justice system or simply used as a means to identify and punish offenders; and

WHEREAS, all too often the victim of a serious crime is forced to suffer physical, psychological, or financial hardship, first as a result of the criminal act, and then as a result of contact with a criminal justice system unresponsive to the real needs of such victim; and

WHEREAS, while the defendant is provided with counsel who can explain both the criminal justice process and the rights of the defendant, the victim or witness has no counterpart and is usually not even notified when the defendant is released on bail, the case is dismissed, a plea to a lesser charge is accepted, or a court date is changed; and

WHEREAS, the victim and witness who cooperate with the prosecutor often find that they must share the pretrial waiting room with the defendant or his family and friends; and

WHEREAS, the victim may lose valuable property to a criminal only to lose it again for long periods of time to law enforcement officials until the trial, and sometimes until all appeals are over; and many times the property is damaged or lost, which is particularly stressful for the elderly or the poor; and

WHEREAS, the majority of serious crimes fall under the jurisdiction of state and local law enforcement agencies.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to provide for the fair and proper treatment of crime victims and witnesses in the criminal justice system."

No Common-Law Duty of County to Notify Tenant of Release of Detainee: Leanne Miller obtained a protective order prohibiting her husband, Tommy, from contacting Leanne, her property, or her children. When Tommy was arrested following multiple violations of the restraining order, Leanne requested that the Gallatin County detention center notify her upon Tommy's release. However, the center did not contact Leanne when Tommy was released. Tommy then went to Leanne's rental home, killed her, and set fire to the home. The landlord filed a negligence action against the county for damages to the property resulting from the county's failure to notify Leanne, asserting that the county had a common-law duty to the landlord. The District Court granted summary judgment to the county, and the landlord appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The complaint was couched in terms of the county's duty to Leanne, but cited no independent common-law duty extending to the landlord. Without a prevailing common-law theory, the cause of action derived solely from 46-24-203 and this section, regardless of whether those sections were cited or not. Therefore, under 46-24-105, the landlord was precluded from recovering against the county based on the failure to notify Leanne of Tommy's release, and summary judgment was proper. Bos v. Case Notes

No Common-Law Duty of County to Notify Tenant of Release of Detainee: Leanne Miller obtained a protective order prohibiting her husband, Tommy, from contacting Leanne, her property, or her children. When Tommy was arrested following multiple violations of the restraining order, Leanne requested that the Gallatin County detention center notify her upon Tommy's release. However, the center did not contact Leanne when Tommy was released. Tommy then went to Leanne's rental home, killed her, and set fire to the home. The landlord filed a negligence action against the county for damages to the property resulting from the county's failure to notify Leanne, asserting that the county had a common-law duty to the landlord. The District Court granted summary judgment to the county, and the landlord appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The complaint was couched in terms of the county's duty to Leanne, but cited no independent common-law duty extending to the landlord. Without a prevailing common-law theory, the cause of action derived solely from 46-24-104 and this section, regardless of whether those sections were cited or not. Therefore, under 46-24-105, the landlord was precluded from recovering against the county based on the failure to notify Leanne of Tommy's release, and summary judgment was proper. Bos v. CHAPTER 30
UNIFORM CRIMINAL EXTRADITION ACT

Chapter Case Notes

Applicability to Juveniles: Since juveniles were not intentionally omitted from the provisions of Title 46, ch. 30, commonly known as the "Uniform Criminal Extradition Act", and because there is no additional procedural protection for juveniles under the Act, a Governor's warrant that fulfilled the applicability considerations outlined in In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985), was properly applied to extradition of a juvenile, since juveniles are not to be treated any differently than adults by the asylum state. Coble v. Magone, 229 M 45, 744 P2d 1244, 44 St. Rep. 1766 (1987).

Extradition for Criminal Nonsupport: Although a child support order issued by another state is a civil and not a criminal action, failure to pay the support may be a crime (felony criminal nonsupport) in that state and the defendant is subject to extradition for criminal proceedings. Crabtree v. St., 186 M 340, 607 P2d 566 (1980).

Chapter Attorney General's Opinions

No Entitlement to Bail After Waiver of Extradition — State Jurisdiction Only to Effect Transport: There is no provision for bail either after an arrest on a Governor's extradition warrant or upon waiver of extradition, so a fugitive prisoner, after waiver of extradition, is not entitled to bail. Once extradition is waived, Montana District Courts retain jurisdiction only to effect transport of the fugitive to another state. 50 A.G. Op. 7 (2004).

Nondelinquent Youth Charged With Crime in Another State: Because Montana has not adopted Art. XVIII of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles, which provides that the Compact applies to juveniles charged with being delinquent by reason of violation of any criminal law, a youth who has not run away, escaped, or been adjudged delinquent is outside the scope of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles in Montana. A juvenile residing in Montana, and charged with a crime in another state, may be extradited under the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, Title 46, ch. 30. The soundest policy is to extradite any juvenile charged with a crime in another state, regardless of whether a juvenile court or an adult court has final jurisdiction. 41 A.G. Op. 24 (1985).

Uniform Commission Comments

The reason for this section lies in the fact that there is a conflict in the decisions upon the question whether a person who has been removed from a state under the compulsion of the authority of that state can be classed as a "fugitive" from that state so that his return can be secured through extradition proceedings. See, In re Whittington, 34 Cal. App. 344, 167 P 404; Hart v. Mangum, 146 Ga. 497, 91 S.W. 543; People ex rel. Hutchings v. Mallon, 245 N.Y. 521, 157 N.E. 842; State ex rel. Shapiro v. Case Notes

Burden of Proof of Identity Upon Issuance of Warrant: Once the Governor of Montana has issued a warrant for the arrest and extradition of an accused, a presumption arises that the accused is the demanded fugitive. The burden of proof then shifts to the accused to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he is not the fugitive charged in the demanding state. Upon failure of the accused to produce the evidence, the District Court may properly deny a writ of habeas corpus. In re Henrichs, 237 M 59, 771 P2d 967, 46 St. Rep. 620 (1989).

Misspelling of Petitioner's Name — Extradition Proceedings Not Defective: Slight misspelling of petitioner's name on a criminal complaint and arrest warrant, where "Henrichs" was spelled "Hendricks", constituted a technical defect and did not render extradition proceedings defective in light of the fact that the description accompanying the warrant correctly described the petitioner. Under the doctrine of idem sonans, two names spelled differently are regarded as the same if they sound alike in their pronunciation. In re Henrichs, 237 M 59, 771 P2d 967, 46 St. Rep. 620 (1989).

Adequacy of Demand for Extradition — Technical Pleading Rules Inapplicable: Papers demanding extradition need not meet the technical rules of pleading. The court should consider whether they satisfactorily show that the person has been charged with a crime, no matter how inartfully they may be drawn. In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985).

Scope of Inquiry on Challenge to Extradition: The scope of inquiry by a court in an extradition proceeding is limited to whether: (1) the extradition documents on their face are in order; (2) the petitioner has been charged with a crime in the demanding state; (3) the petitioner is the person named in the request for extradition; and (4) the petitioner is a fugitive. Petitioner's claim that the transaction at issue in the state seeking his extradition from Montana constitutes a civil matter goes to the underlying charge and is thus beyond the scope of inquiry, though he could pursue that claim in the requesting state. The present law of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Delaware and Minnesota allows merely an "opportunity" to the accused to demand an investigation. New York and some other states prescribe definite time. For a uniform act, an indefinite time to be made certain by a judge before whom the accused shall be brought, would seem the plan most likely to satisfy all the states. This is the law in Oklahoma.

GENERALLY

Application for Writ of Habeas Corpus in Asylum State: Defendant was extradited to this state from another state and sentenced to prison. The remedy for a fugitive arrested in another state who opposes extradition is to apply for a writ of habeas corpus in the asylum state. Defendant, who did not oppose extradition in the asylum state before his return to this state, may not now attempt to do so in Montana. St. v. Kingery, 239 M 160, 779 P2d 495, 46 St. Rep. 1587 (1989), followed in Walker v. McCormick, 260 M 301, 858 P2d 373, 50 St. Rep. 1053 (1993).

Burden of Proof of Identity Upon Issuance of Warrant: Once the Governor of Montana has issued a warrant for the arrest and extradition of an accused, a presumption arises that the accused is the demanded fugitive. The burden of proof then shifts to the accused to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he is not the fugitive charged in the demanding state. Upon failure of the accused to produce the evidence, the District Court may properly deny a writ of habeas corpus. In re Henrichs, 237 M 59, 771 P2d 967, 46 St. Rep. 620 (1989).

Scope of and Necessity for Investigation: Section 46-30-212 does not require that the accused be given notice of an investigation, nor does it require an investigation of the demand for extradition. It simply gives the Governor the discretion to check the demanding papers. The legal rule for a century or more has been that the executive of the asylum state may act upon the requisition papers in the absence of the accused and without notice to him. The Governor's investigative authority and the scope of his discretion is limited to determining that the person demanded is charged with a crime and is a fugitive from justice and to the adequacy of the demand. The accused is entitled to a hearing with the aid of counsel before a judge of a court of record on the above issues, but there is no right of the accused to have an investigation by or a hearing or other appearance before the Governor. In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985).

Scope of Inquiry on Challenge to Extradition: The scope of inquiry by a court in an extradition proceeding is limited to whether: (1) the extradition documents on their face are in order; (2) the petitioner has been charged with a crime in the demanding state; (3) the petitioner is the person named in the request for extradition; and (4) the petitioner is a fugitive. Petitioner's claim that the transaction at issue in the state seeking his extradition from Montana constitutes a civil matter goes to the underlying charge and is thus beyond the scope of inquiry, though he could pursue that claim in the requesting state. In re Petition of Blackburn, 215 M 440, 701 P2d 715, 42 St. Rep. 525 (1985).

DISMISSAL

No Court Authority to Quash Writ of Extradition — Governor's Warrant Effective Despite Expiration of Federal Statutory Time Limit: Defendant contended that 18 U.S.C. 3182 gave the District Court authority to dismiss his case when he was not picked up by out-of-state authorities within 30 days after he was served with a Governor's warrant. Under the federal statute, the court could discharge him, if he was detained, or release him from bail, but the 30-day provision did not allow dismissal of the case or grant the court authority to quash the writ of extradition. The Supreme Court found the 30-day limit to be discretionary, not mandatory. Under 46-30-302 and 46-30-304, the governor's warrant was legally effective even though the 30-day limit had expired. St. v. Campbell, 233 M 502, 761 P2d 393, 45 St. Rep 1678 (1988).

Authority to Dismiss: A judge had no authority under 46-13-101 to grant defendant's motion to dismiss based on a defense which went to the general issue to be determined at trial or under 46-13-201 (renumbered 46-13-401) because he did not set forth the reasons for dismissal in an order entered on the minutes. St. v. Cole, 174 M 380, 571 P2d 87 (1977).

Dismissal on Application of Prosecutor: Where defendant did not move to dismiss or demur to second information which was filed after defendant had pleaded to first information, and thus was improperly filed under this section as it read at that time, but rather entered plea to second information and moved to dismiss first information, and where defendant entered no objection to second information at subsequent trial and did not question the information on appeal, defendant waived any right he may have had to object to second information as improper amendment to first information. Gransberry v. St., 149 M 158, 423 P2d 853 (1967).

"In Furtherance of Justice": Since the Legislature did not define the phrase "in furtherance of justice" as used in predecessor to this section, it is left for the court's judicial discretion, exercised in view of a defendant's constitutional rights and the interests of society, to determine what particular grounds warrant dismissal of a pending criminal action, and mandamus will not issue to control the court's discretion. State ex rel. Anderson v. Gile, 119 M 182, 172 P2d 583 (1946).

Operation and Effect: After dismissal of an indictment because of substantial defects therein, the District Court may, but is not required to, submit the case to another grand jury, or permit or order the County Attorney to file an information charging the defendant with the same offense ineffectually sought to be charged against him by the indictment. St. v. Vinn, 50 M 27, 144 P 773 (1914).

SPEEDY TRIAL

Factors to Consider: There are four factors to be considered in determining whether the right to a speedy trial is violated: (1) length of delay; (2) reason for delay; (3) defendant's assertion of the right; and (4) prejudice to the defendant. Length of delay is a triggering mechanism, and a delay of 317 days is sufficient to trigger an inquiry into the other factors. A delay due to the operation of the system is chargeable to the state. An accused must take some affirmative action to obtain a trial to be entitled to a discharge for delay. This burden is satisfied by making an appropriate motion. The incarceration of the defendant for the period of the delay demonstrates prejudice against him. St. v. Puzio & Allen, 182 M 163, 595 P2d 1163 (1979).

Good Cause for Delay: Although the defendant was not brought to trial until 8 months after entry of plea, there was good cause for the delay because defendant made four motions which had to be fully considered and there were several substitutions of presiding judges, often at the defendant's request. Also, under these circumstances it could not be said that the defendant's trial was not postponed upon his application. St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435 (1978).

Not Proper Issue in Asylum State: The issue of lack of speedy trial is not properly cognizable by a court of the asylum state in a habeas corpus proceeding in that court contesting extradition to another state. In re Hart, 178 M 235, 583 P2d 411 (1978).

Delay Attributable to Defendant: Although the defendant was not brought to trial within 6 months after the filing of the information as required under former law, the defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial because trial had originally been set for a date within the 6-month period and was removed from the trial calendar only when the defendant sought supervisory control on an original procedure filed in the Supreme Court, even though the cause was not set for trial until 2 months after the Supreme Court had denied defendant's petition for supervisory control and returned the matter to the trial court. St. v. Lagerquist, 152 M 21, 445 P2d 910 (1968).

Delay Attributable to Prosecutor: Under former statute providing that court shall dismiss charges against a defendant who is not brought to trial within 6 months after the filing of the information unless the trial has been postponed upon application of defendant, defendant was entitled to dismissal, even though defendant had demurred to the information and had not entered a plea, since County Attorney had failed to call up the demurrers for a hearing as he was entitled to do before the 6-month period had expired. State ex rel. Sullivan v. District Court, 150 M 203, 433 P2d 146 (1967).

Part 3
Procedure for Arresting Accused Without Warrant

Part Attorney General's Opinions

No Entitlement to Bail After Waiver of Extradition — State Jurisdiction Only to Effect Transport: There is no provision for bail either after an arrest on a Governor's extradition warrant or upon waiver of extradition, so a fugitive prisoner, after waiver of extradition, is not entitled to bail. Once extradition is waived, Montana District Courts retain jurisdiction only to effect transport of the fugitive to another state. 50 A.G. Op. 7 (2004).

46-30-301. Arrest of accused without warrant.

Uniform Commission Comments

See 11 Ruling Case Law, p. 720: "The arrest may be made either by virtue of a warrant from a magistrate or by an officer or private person, who may justify the arrest by showing that prima facie a felony or other crime has been committed by the prisoner in another state, or that he stands charged therewith." To the same effect see Scott on Interstate Rendition, p. 161. An arrest without warrant was sustained in the following cases where the accused stood charged with a felony punishable by imprisonment for more than one year. Simmons v. Van Dyke, 138 Ind. 380 (forgery); In re Henry, 29 How. Pr. (N.Y.) 185 (robbery); Dow's case, 18 Pa. 37 (forgery); State v. Taylor, 70 Vt. 1 (burglary).

The preliminary draft of this Section provided for arrest without warrant in all cases where the accused stood charged with a "felony" in the demanding state. Because of the belief that "felony" did not have a uniform meaning, the Conference substituted the expression "charged with a crime punishable by death or life imprisonment". The Conference has become convinced that the enactment of this substituted language would result in restricting too severely the machinery for the enforcement of the criminal law, and would in many instances change the present practice of arresting without a warrant persons who have committed felonies punishable by imprisonment for more than one year but less than for life. To avoid this restrictive effect, the Conference in 1932 revised the section to provide for arrest without a warrant where the accused stands charged "with a crime punishable by death or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year". This is an adoption of the usual definition of "felony".

Case Notes

No Court Authority to Quash Writ of Extradition — Governor's Warrant Effective Despite Expiration of Federal Statutory Time Limit: Defendant contended that 18 U.S.C. 3182 gave the District Court authority to dismiss his case when he was not picked up by out-of-state authorities within 30 days after he was served with a Governor's warrant. Under the federal statute, the court could discharge him, if he was detained, or release him from bail, but the 30-day provision did not allow dismissal of the case or grant the court authority to quash the writ of extradition. The Supreme Court found the 30-day limit to be discretionary, not mandatory. Under this section and 46-30-304, the governor's warrant was legally effective even though the 30-day limit had expired. St. v. Campbell, 233 M 502, 761 P2d 393, 45 St. Rep 1678 (1988).

Applicability of Time Limits: The time limits in 46-30-302 and 46-30-304 refer only to the length of detention permitted before an accused person must be released from custody in the asylum state. These sections do not require dismissal of extradition proceedings for any supposed time limits on issuance of the Governor's warrant. These sections have no applicability once a Governor's warrant has been issued. Once the Governor of Montana issues his warrant, all questions involving the prior arrest and detention are rendered immaterial. Attorney General's Opinions

No Entitlement to Bail After Waiver of Extradition — State Jurisdiction Only to Effect Transport: There is no provision for bail either after an arrest on a Governor's extradition warrant or upon waiver of extradition, so a fugitive prisoner, after waiver of extradition, is not entitled to bail. Once extradition is waived, Montana District Courts retain jurisdiction only to effect transport of the fugitive to another state. 50 A.G. Op. 7 (2004).

Extradition to This State From Another State

Part Case Notes

Application for Writ of Habeas Corpus in Asylum State: Defendant was extradited to this state from another state and sentenced to prison. The remedy for a fugitive arrested in another state who opposes extradition is to apply for a writ of habeas corpus in the asylum state. Defendant, who did not oppose extradition in the asylum state before his return to this state, may not now attempt to do so in Montana. St. v. CHAPTER 31
INTERSTATE AGREEMENT ON DETAINERS

Chapter Case Notes

Arrest Warrant Not Sufficient to Trigger Interstate Act: An arrest warrant, unless based upon an untried indictment, information, or complaint, is insufficient to trigger the Interstate Agreement on Detainers. Blakey v. District Court, 232 M 178, 755 P2d 1380, 45 St. Rep. 972 (1988).

Error in Dismissal of Detainer: The Montana District Court erred in dismissing a detainer from Colorado after mistakenly determining that the accusatory instrument was itself subject to dismissal in the receiving state, Colorado. Blakey v. District Court, 232 M 178, 755 P2d 1380, 45 St. Rep. 972 (1988), followed in Walker v. McCormick, 260 M 301, 858 P2d 373, 50 St. Rep. 1053 (1993).

Sending State's Failure to Comply: Relief should not be denied a defendant when officials of the sending state fail to comply with the provisions to which they are bound. St. v. Seadin, 181 M 294, 593 P2d 451 (1979).

Case Notes

Institutional Delays in Trial Not Chargeable Against Requesting State Absent Notice of Request for Speedy Trial: While in federal custody in Texas, Dodson filed a speedy trial request under the Interstate Agreement on Detainers Act (IAD) with officials in Texas after Montana filed a warrant for Dodson's arrest. However, Texas officials failed to forward the speedy trial request, so Dodson moved to dismiss the Montana charges based on Montana's failure to bring him to trial in Montana within 180 days of filing the charges. The dismissal motion was denied and Dodson was ultimately convicted on the Montana charges. Dodson appealed on grounds that the Montana charges should have been dismissed for lack of a speedy trial pursuant to the IAD. The Supreme Court disagreed. The speedy trial clock provisions are not triggered until the prosecutor and court receive the prisoner's request pursuant to the IAD. In cases where delay is occasioned by the custodial state's failure to forward the request, causing harm or detriment to the prisoner, the institutional delays against the custodial state should not be charged against the requesting state that had no notice of the delay or control over the institution causing the delay. St. v. Dodson, 2009 MT 419, 354 M 28, 221 P3d 687 (2009), following Fex v. Mich., 507 US 43 (1993). See also St. v. Seadin, 181 M 294, 593 P2d 451 (1979), and St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339 (1991).

Speedy Trial — Failure to Petition for Disposal of Charges Properly Considered by District Court in Attributing Delay to Defendant: Stewart was convicted on state theft and forgery charges and appealed his sentence to the Supreme Court, which stayed execution of the state sentence. Conspiracy and mail fraud charges were then filed by the United States, and Stewart was tried, convicted, and incarcerated. After Stewart's state conviction was overturned by the Supreme Court, a warrant was issued for his arrest on other state charges and a detainer was sent to the federal prison. Stewart was informed of his right to request final disposition of the state charges under Article III of the Interstate Agreement on Detainers, but he did not file a petition. Stewart was then released from federal prison and brought to Lincoln County, Montana, to face the state charges. He moved to dismiss the charges for lack of a speedy trial. The District Court denied the motion. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly analyzed Stewart's speedy trial claim under the four-part test set forth in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972). The record shows that 245 days elapsed from the filing of the detainer to Stewart's release to state officials for trial in Montana. Stewart was aware of his right to petition for disposition of the state charges during that time but failed to do so. The Supreme Court held that those days were therefore properly charged to Stewart and were not the fault of the state.

The Supreme Court also found that Stewart was not prejudiced by the delay. St. v. Stewart, 266 M 525, 881 P2d 629, 51 St. Rep. 910 (1994).

Running of Speedy Trial Clock Begins Upon Entry Into Term of Imprisonment: After being imprisoned in the Montana State Prison for felony assault (now assault with a weapon), Walker was extradited to Ohio, where he was tried and convicted of aggravated murder. Ohio then placed a detainer on Walker, and he was returned to Montana to complete his term of imprisonment. Walker brought a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that his trial in Ohio was not conducted in accordance with the speedy trial requirements of the Interstate Agreement on Detainers. The Supreme Court held that the 180-day speedy trial clock imposed by this section began to run when Walker was imprisoned in Montana and not on the date he requested final disposition. The trial was therefore well within the 180-day limit, and the Supreme Court denied the petition. Walker v. McCormick, 260 M 301, 858 P2d 373, 50 St. Rep. 1053 (1993).

Failure to Trigger IAD Speedy Trial Provision: Wolfe argued that he had been denied a speedy trial because the state had failed to try him within 180 days as required by the Interstate Agreement on Detainers (IAD). The Supreme Court held that Wolfe had failed to file with the District Court the papers required by the IAD and therefore had failed to trigger the 180-day provision. St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339, 48 St. Rep. 1001 (1991).

Speedy Trial — Incarceration in Another State — Delays Attributable to Defendant: Eleven days after his arraignment in Montana for burglary, defendant was arrested in Idaho for burglary and felony theft, convicted, and sentenced to the Idaho State Prison for 5 years. On January 22, 1985, Montana filed a detainer in Idaho. Defendant asserted his right to a speedy trial in Montana by requesting final disposition of the charges against him on June 19, 1985. Defendant requested a delay of his trial on September 3, 1985, and trial was held on October 22, 1985. Defendant appealed his conviction in Montana on the grounds that his right to a speedy trial had been violated and the charges against him should have been dismissed. The Supreme Court found that a total of 196 days of the 393-day delay were attributable to defendant. The presumption that defendant did not receive a speedy trial, which was raised by the 393-day delay between defendant's arrest and his trial, was satisfactorily overcome. Defendant's own conduct prevented the state from bringing him to trial within 180 days. He cannot now complain that he was not given a speedy trial. St. v. Grant, 227 M 181, 738 P2d 106, 44 St. Rep. 994 (1987), followed in St. v. Stewart, 266 M 525, 881 P2d 629, 51 St. Rep. 910 (1994).

Probation Violation Charge: A probation violation charge is not an "untried indictment, information, or complaint" for purposes of Art. III of the compact, and the person charged thus need not be tried within 180 days of his request for a final disposition of the charge. Carchman v. Nash, 87 L Ed 2d 516, 105 S Ct 3401 (1985).

CHAPTER 1
STATEWIDE PUBLIC DEFENDER SYSTEM

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Implementation: Section 68, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "(1) The governor shall appoint the members of the public defender commission established pursuant to [section 5] [2-15-1028] no later than July 1, 2005.

(2) The department of administration shall provide staff support to the commission beginning July 1, 2005, and continuing until the commission hires a chief public defender and until the chief public defender hires necessary staff for the commission and the office of state public defender.

(3) By December 31, 2005, the commission shall hire a chief public defender and issue any requests for proposals for consulting services and technical assistance that may be needed to help establish the office of state public defender provided in [section 7] [47-1-201].

(4) Standards and procedures required to implement the provisions of [sections 1 through 4 and 6 through 14] [Title 47, ch. 1] must be established, and the office of state public defender must be opened by no later than July 1, 2006.

(5) During fiscal year 2006, a commission member is entitled to $50 for each day that the member spends conducting the official business of the commission.

(6) The department of administration shall assist the commission in developing a public defender information technology system that utilizes existing resources as much as possible and that interfaces with state executive branch, judicial branch, and local computer systems to the extent necessary and practicable to ensure that data required to effectively manage public defender caseloads and track costs can be efficiently collected and analyzed."

Transition — Transfer of County and City Employees to State Employment — Rights: Section 69, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "(1) Employees of county or city public defender offices who are employed by a county or city on June 30, 2006, may be transferred to state employment in the office of state public defender provided for in [section 7] [47-1-201]. Transferred employees become state employees on July 1, 2006.

(2) All transferred employees become subject to the state classification plan on July 1, 2006, except those specifically exempted under [section 7(2) and (3)(a)] [47-1-201(2) and (3)(a)].

(3) The salary of transferred county or city employees on July 1, 2006, must be the same as it was on July 1, 2005, plus any salary increases provided for by the county or city not exceeding 4%.

(4) An employee's compensation may not be reduced as the result of the transfer to the state classification plan.

(5) This section does not preserve the right of any former county or city employee to any salary or compensation, including longevity benefits, that was not accrued and payable as of June 30, 2006.

(6) A transferred employee may elect to become a member of the state employee benefit plan beginning July 1, 2006, or remain on the employee's county or city benefit plan through the remainder of the plan year in effect on June 30, 2006. For an employee who elects to remain on a county or city benefit plan, the monthly state contribution toward insurance benefits must be transferred to the county or city benefit plan. Any benefit costs in excess of the state contribution must be paid by the employee.

(7) Accumulated sick and vacation leave and years of service with a county or city must be transferred fully to the state and become an obligation of the state on July 1, 2006. On January 1, 2007, and on January 1, 2008, the counties and cities with office of public defender employees who are transferred to state employment by this section shall pay the state 12.5% of the sick leave accrual and 50% of vacation leave accrual for each employee who is transferred to state employment. The transferred employees shall retain their accumulated sick and vacation leave. Any liability for accumulated compensatory time of employees who are transferred from county or city employment to state employment under this section is not transferred to the state and remains an obligation of the county or city that employed the employee prior to the transfer, subject to federal law and the county's or city's personnel policies.

(8) A transferred employee who is not already covered by the public employees' retirement system provided in Title 19, chapter 3, becomes a new member of the public employees' retirement system on July 1, 2006, and is subject to the provisions of Title 19, chapter 3.

(9) A collective bargaining agreement in effect on July 1, 2006, may not be construed as binding on the state. However, transferred employees are entitled to organize and collectively bargain pursuant to Title 39, chapter 31."

Transition of Appellate Defender Commission and Office: Section 70, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "(1) The terms of members of the appellate defender commission established in 2-15-1020 terminate on June 30, 2006, when that section is repealed.

(2) Commission staff in the office of appellate defender established pursuant to the Appellate Defender Act in 46-8-210 through 46-8-213 [all now repealed] must be officially transferred to the office of state public defender established pursuant to [section 7] [47-1-201]. The transfer is effective July 1, 2006, at which time the position of chief appellate defender becomes exempt from the classification and pay plan pursuant to 2-18-103 and [section 7(3)(a)(ii)] [47-1-201(3)(a)(ii)]. The compensation and benefits of the chief appellate defender and other staff of the office of appellate defender may not be reduced as a result of this transfer and the chief appellate defender and other staff of the office of appellate defender remain entitled to all compensation, rights, and benefits accrued as of June 30, 2006.

(3) The appellate defender commission and the public defender commission shall work together to provide that the duties and responsibilities of the appellate defender commission and the caseload of the staff of the office of appellate defender are transferred to the public defender commission and office of state public defender in a manner that ensures continuity of services. On July 1, 2006, all work of the appellate defender commission must officially be transferred to the supervision of the public defender commission and the chief public defender.

(4) Subject to the provisions of [section 5] [2-15-1028], a member of the appellate defender commission may be appointed by the governor to simultaneously serve on the public defender commission and the appellate defender commission until the appellate defender commission terminates pursuant to this section. A member serving on both commissions simultaneously is entitled to the compensation provided for the public defender commission in [section 68(5)] [not codified] when engaged in the official duties of the public defender commission, provided that expenses paid pursuant to 2-18-501 through 2-18-503 may not be paid twice for the same period of time."

Rights to Property: Section 71, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "(1) Subject to subsection (2), office equipment, computer equipment, furniture, and fixtures that are owned by a county or city and used by employees of a public defender office on June 30, 2006, remain the property of the county or city unless otherwise agreed upon by the county or city and the state.

(2) (a) An employee of a county or city public defender office who becomes a state employee under [section 69] retains the right to use all property relating to the functions of the office and being used by the employee on June 30, 2006. The property includes records, office equipment, computer equipment, supplies, contracts, books, papers, documents, maps, grant and earmarked account balances, vehicles, and all other similar property. However, the employee may not use or divert money in a fund or account for a purpose other than as provided by law.

(b) Whenever the state replaces office equipment, computer equipment, furniture, or fixtures used as provided in subsection (2)(a) and still owned by a county or city, the right to use the replaced property reverts to the county or city.

(3) This section does not apply to property owned by the federal government."

Implementation — Determination of Actual Costs — Legislative Audit — Report: Section 72, Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "(1) The legislature's intent is to provide that:

(a) funding responsibilities for public defender services pursuant to [sections 1 through 4 and 6 through 14] [Title 47, ch. 1] will be shared by state and local government; and

(b) the counties, consolidated governments, and cities will pay their share of costs through a reduction in the county's, consolidated government's, or city's base entitlement share under 15-1-121.

(2) To fulfill the intent of subsection (1) for Cascade County, Gallatin County, Lewis and Clark County, Missoula County, Flathead County, and Yellowstone County, an audit, by or at the direction of the legislative auditor, must be conducted on all actual costs for public defender services in district court and justice's court proceedings incurred from July 1, 1998, through June 30, 2004, for which records exist. The audit must separate the costs by expenditure category and distinguish between costs paid by a county and costs paid or reimbursed by the state.

(3) Each county audited under subsection (2) shall reimburse the legislative auditor for 50% of the cost of the audit for that county.

(4) By April 30, 2006, the results of the audit must be reported to the governor's budget office, the legislative audit committee, the legislative finance committee, and the law and justice interim committee.

(5) The law and justice interim committee shall prepare legislation to be introduced in the 2007 legislative session that will amend 15-1-121 to provide that the base entitlement share for Cascade County, Gallatin County, Lewis and Clark County, Missoula County, Flathead County, and Yellowstone County is adjusted by an appropriate amount arrived at based on the audit and in consultation with the legislative finance committee, the legislative audit committee, representatives of the counties, the governor's office, the American civil liberties union, the attorney general's office, and all other interested and participating parties.

(6) (a) For the fiscal year beginning July 1, 2011, and every 5 years thereafter, the legislative fiscal analyst shall compare the percentage change in general fund revenue for the previous 5 years to the percentage change in the amounts allocated to local governments under the provisions of 15-1-121, as amended in 2005, and the actual costs for public defender services in [this act] for the same time period.

(b) The results of the comparison must be presented to the governor, legislative finance committee, law and justice interim committee, and supreme court by September 1 of the following fiscal year.

(7) As used in this section:

(a) "actual costs" means all expenditures by a county for public defender services in justice court and all expenditures by a county for public defender services in district court that were not reimbursed by the office of court administrator pursuant to 3-5-901; and

(b) "public defender services" means all services and support associated with providing defendants in district court or justice court proceedings with assigned, appointed, or contracted attorneys, including:

(i) compensation;

(ii) personal expenses, including travel, meals, and lodging;

(iii) office operating costs, including rent, utilities, supplies, postage, copying, computer systems, and other office operating costs;

(iv) professional and paraprofessional support services, including services provided by investigators, paralegals, researchers, and secretaries;

(v) services required to support a defense, including transcripts, witnesses, and other support;

(vi) professional support, including professional education and training;

(vii) costs of psychiatric evaluations under 46-14-202 and 46-14-221, including the cost of examinations and other associated expenses; and

(viii) other services or support provided by the county to provide assigned, appointed, or contracted defense counsel in justice court and district court proceedings."

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Effective Date: Section 80(1), Ch. 449, L. 2005, provided: "Except as provided in subsection (2), [this act] is effective on passage and approval." Approved April 28, 2005.

Case Notes

Showing of Good Cause Required Prior to Appointment of State Public Defender in Habeas Corpus Proceedings: More than a simple motion is required before the Supreme Court will appoint the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) to represent a person seeking habeas corpus relief. In such case, OSPD counsel will be appointed only upon a demonstration of good cause. A showing of likelihood of the illegality of the sentence of the person seeking relief, and that the sentence will be shortened or terminated if habeas corpus relief is granted, is required before OSPD counsel will be appointed. A statement that an applicant is untrained or unskilled in the law is insufficient, without more, to establish good cause. Dyer v. Mahoney, 2008 MT 117, 342 M 495, 182 P3d 737 (2008).

Appointment of Public Defender Prior to Filing of Petition for Postconviction Relief Prohibited: Section 46-8-104 provides that a District Court may order that counsel from the Office of State Public Defender represent an eligible person who has filed a postconviction action or proceeding under certain circumstances, but nothing in that section allows appointment of a public defender in advance of the filing of a petition for postconviction relief. Further, this section does not give a District Court authority to appoint counsel employed by the public defender system to represent a person who may desire to file a petition for postconviction relief but who has not done so. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. District Court, 2007 MT 333, 340 M 234, 178 P3d 693 (2007).

Attorney General's Opinions

Discretion of Public Defender Commission and Office of State Public Defender to Retain City and County Defender Employees: Senate Bill No. 146 (Ch. 449, L. 2005), which created a new state public defender system, contained a transition section that allowed but did not require the Public Defender Commission and the Office of State Public Defender to hire current city and county public defender employees. Thus, it was within the discretion of the Commission and the Office whether to retain current city and county public defender employees for the new public defender system. 51 A.G. Op. 10 (2005).

Case Notes

No Mistake of Law in City Court's Failure to Appoint Counsel Given Defendant's Prior Refusal of Appointed Counsel or Appropriate Request: Compton was arrested in Flathead County and charged with first offense DUI. At both Compton's initial appearance in City Court and at the subsequent arraignment hearing, Compton refused appointed counsel. However, a few days later, Compton submitted a whimsical, handwritten document to the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD) in Whitefish requesting appointment of counsel. The OSPD then appeared in court and requested permission to file a notice of appearance on behalf of Compton, but the judge refused to enter the OSPD's appearance because of the absence of documents demonstrating an attorney-client relationship. The OSPD then faxed the handwritten document to the court, but the judge declined to appoint counsel absent a request from Compton, either in person or by an appropriate written request. The OSPD then filed a petition for supervisory control with the Supreme Court requesting that the court order the City Judge to appoint the OSPD to represent counsel. The Supreme Court noted that a writ of supervisory control is appropriate only in extraordinary circumstances when a court is proceeding under a mistake of law that will result in significant injustice if not corrected. Here, the OSPD was unable to demonstrate a mistake of law. Under 47-1-111, it is assumed that a court's initial order for appointment of counsel will follow an appropriate request by a defendant. Compton had twice refused appointed counsel, and the handwritten request lacked credibility and was inappropriate, so refusal to appoint counsel absent a request from Compton, either in person or by an appropriate written request, was not a mistake of law. The Supreme Court denied the petition for supervisory control, noting that if Compton desired appointed counsel, he could submit an appropriate request and that his eligibility could then be determined in accordance with statute. Office of St. Pub. Defender v. Whitefish City Court, 2008 MT 79, 342 M 141, 188 P3d 43 (2008), distinguishing Rios v. Justice's Court, 2006 MT 256, 334 M 111, 148 P3d 602 (2006).

Conditions for Appointment of Appellate Counsel: The Supreme Court found 46-8-104 to be vague, confusing, lacking in legislative guidance, and either overbroad or underinclusive with regard to appointment of counsel for defendants. The court determined that it will appoint counsel when a defendant's, petitioner's, or appellant's motion or petition demonstrates that: (1) a statute specifically mandates appointment of counsel; (2) the defendant, petitioner, or appellant is clearly entitled to counsel under the U.S. or Montana Constitution; or (3) extraordinary circumstances exist that require appointment of counsel to prevent a miscarriage of justice. The motion or petition must reference specific facts and documents in the record and cite specific jurisprudential, statutory, or constitutional authority to demonstrate the existence of a condition warranting appointment of counsel. (Note: The 2007 Legislature revised 46-8-104 to provide guidance as suggested in Dillard.) Dillard v. St., 2006 MT 328, 335 M 87, 153 P3d 575 (2006).

When Review of Indigency to Take Place: Any review of a defendant's eligibility for public defender services takes place after the state public defender's office has conducted a determination of the defendant's eligibility for public defender services. The court's review of the office's determination takes place only when one of the parties seeks review. However, nothing in this section contemplates the court initiating the review process based on its own doubts about a defendant's eligibility or authorizes a procedure designed to place the court in a gatekeeper role by asserting primary authority over indigency determinations. Rios v. Justice's Court, 2006 MT 256, 334 M 111, 148 P3d 602 (2006).

Case Notes

Applicable Statutory Scheme for Providing Interpreter for Deaf Person in Criminal Proceeding — Payment of Interpreter's Fees: Alkire was arrested and charged in Municipal Court for criminal trespass to vehicles and was assigned representation by the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD). Because Alkire was hearing impaired, he requested and was granted a team of interpreters. A question then arose regarding whether the OSPD or the county was responsible for costs associated with the appointment of the team of interpreters. The court determined that, pursuant to 47-1-201, the OSPD was responsible for the costs. Alkire contended that 49-4-503 provided that the court was required to bear the costs. On a writ of supervisory control, the Supreme Court considered two possible statutory schemes for determining the entity responsible for the costs. Scheme no. 1 provides interpreters for the deaf in official proceedings pursuant to Title 49, ch. 4, part 5, and 49-4-509 requires the court to pay, from the county general fund, reasonable compensation for services plus travel and transportation expenses for an interpreter who is appointed in a criminal proceeding. Scheme no. 2 arises from a combination of Title 26, ch. 2, part 5, 46-15-116, and 47-1-201, and requires payment by the OSPD for witness and interpreter fees, including interpreter fees in a criminal proceeding. The Supreme Court concluded that scheme no. 1 was more specific because it pertained to providing an interpreter for a deaf person in a criminal proceeding, while scheme no. 2 was more general and pertained to the appointment of interpreters and translators generally and who are treated as witnesses. In this case, the more specific statutory scheme no. 1 for an interpreter for Alkire in the criminal proceeding prevailed over the general provisions of scheme no. 2, so the trial court erred in requiring that the OSPD bear the costs of the interpreters. Thus, the writ of supervisory control was granted, and the case was remanded to Municipal Court for further proceedings directing that the costs of the interpreters be paid from the county fund. Alkire v. Missoula Municipal Court, 2008 MT 223, 344 M 260, 186 P3d 1288 (2008).
